of course they are not stockholders who harbor such feelings. It cannot be denied that the several railroad companies, whose roads run through the sections of country that has either been inundated or threatened by that dire misfortune, have done all in their power to counteract the ravages of the flood. The work performed by the Illinois Central Company and the Mississippi Valley Company has been of a nature so gigantic as to almost exceed belief. The companies not only recognized the fact that they had the selfish motive of guarding their property from total destruction, but also were aware that they are, in the true sense of the term, the public's servants, and that, being so, it was incumbent on them to do all they could to give their masters good service by not permitting transit to be hindered. To that end the companies not only labored to secure their lines from destruction, but also when a stoppage occurred at once formulated plans by which the public's convenience was not one bit retarded, either in personal travel or in the transportation of merchandise. The railroad companies are only the public's servants—they fully recognize that fact, and are willing to do servants' work. Both servants and slaves have rights—and surely one of those rights is respect. The officials of the several companies whose termini are in New Orleans, from the president down to the man holding the most subordinate position, are worthy of our respect, for they at all times are willing and anxious to do what they can to promote the comfort and to evince courtesy to their patrons—the general public. No better proof of this statement could possibly be adduced than what occurred recently, when the excursion train on the Illinois Central was belated at Manchac. The officials of the road at once did all in their power to assist the excursionists, supplying those short of money with that necessary evil, and doing everything that could be thought of to promote the comfort of the travelers and assuage their anxiety. Certainly it was their duty to do so. It is pleasing to think that there were those who recognized the railroad officials' desire to serve them, as the letter of thanks published in the papers showed. The public did doubtless suffer inconvenience—great inconvenience—but the railroad company was not to blame. The misadventure was caused by Him who is more powerful than all the railroad corporations on earth.—New Orleans Evening News.

An Open Drawbridge.—A Suggestion.

A distressing drawbridge accident is reported from California, where a train ran into an open draw, the engine and one car going down, and drowning fourteen people. Means have been devised by which such accidents as this are made practically impossible, and it is incredible that the management of any railroad having a drawbridge in the line, can be unaware that means exist for making that bridge as safe as any bridge of any description can be.

Not enough of the details concerning this accident are at hand to enable us to specify just the particular point at which failure took place in the operation of such protective devices as were in use there, but it is quite certain that the best of such devices were not in use, or the accident could not have occurred.

According to the press dispatches, passenger trains go over this bridge every half hour during the day, and the man in charge of it was supposed to raise a red flag on a pole above the bridge, as a signal that the draw was open.

This, if it was all the protection afforded, was entirely inadequate. A signal, intended to indicate to a locomotive engineer that a draw is open, should not be upon the bridge, but at a distance from it, sufficient to enable the heaviest trains to be stopped between it and the bridge. Thus the danger of failure to see the signal until too late, on account of fog or other obstructions, is avoided. Then the proper setting of the signal should not depend upon the bridge tender, but it should be automatic—so arranged as to make it impossible to open the bridge without first setting the signal at danger.

This may be, and usually is accomplished by arranging so that the levers which unlock the rails preparatory to opening the bridge, has also set the signal at the same time.

Another very good practice is, to require all trains to come to a full stop at some distance from a draw, no matter how the signals may be set; but sometimes, when a locomotive engineer undertakes to stop, he finds that, for some reason he cannot do so, and that for the time being the engine is out of his control. Nothing will then avail to avert a serious and probably terribly fatal accident, except a derailing switch. This is the last resort when all else fails, and as it will certainly prevent any train from going into an open draw, every such bridge should be provided with them.

We do not thus specify the various means by which drawbridges may be made safe for the information of railroad men, for there is no need of it; every railroad man worthy of the name knows all about them. Our object in detailing them is, that we may do our part in educating the public—unfamiliar with such matters—to know that means are available by which it may be protected from such accidents, and that, when such accidents happen, some one is directly responsible for them, and for the loss of life attending them.

When the public fully understands to what extent such accidents as this and others which occur on railroads are preventable, the responsibility for them can be fixed, and some one made to feel the weight of it, and any one who knows how they can be prevented, and fails to raise his voice in protest against their needless repetition, fails to perform a plain duty. An improperly protected drawbridge in a railway line is nothing more nor less than a death trap, and the first condition imposed for the use of such bridges should be that every known appliance for rendering them safe should be applied.

In this connection it has occurred to us that there is a large field of useful employment for the various organizations of railway employees. Their members are interested in securing the universal adoption of safety appliances more than any other body of citizens, while at the same time they are in position to, and do possess a better knowledge of the defects of the bad and the advantages of the good devices, than any others. They already possess the organization, through which accurate knowledge of the condition of every road can be known, and influence brought to bear in the direction of correcting deficiencies. We can think of no new direction in which their power and energy could be exerted, that would be productive of more good, or would more certainly secure for them the friendship of the public, than to have it known that they had taken an active part in lessening the number of fatal accidents to travelers, by securing the adoption and use of the best appliances. While there may be good reasons why such organizations should not take part in such work, we can think of none, and the matter is at least worthy of attention.—American Machinist.

In our next number we shall give the text of Senator Cullom's bill on safety appliances.

In answer to numerous inquiries, we would say that two divisions of the Order, viz: 198 at Springfield, Mass., and 201 at New Haven, Conn., have resolved themselves into the "Association of Railway Conductors," as near as we can learn from news paper reports. It is more than probable that these reports are true and that these divisions have thus dishonorably carried out the resolution formed some time prior to the meeting of the Grand Division, when they declared that if they did not succeed in ruling the Order they would endeavor to ruin it. As we have said elsewhere, if these men had complied with the laws they have all sworn to obey, left the Order honorably and then endeavored to organize an opposition. THE CONDUCTOR would have had no complaint to make. The result of the "crusade" on the line of the C. B. & Q., has been that every division with the possible exception of 21 at Creston, will remain with the Order. We do not believe that 21 will leave, and know that others will not. In Bro. Cross' own division, the vote was almost unanimous against leaving the Order.

Found Dead.

YOUNG ARTHUR ECKMAN'S DEAD BODY FOUND BY • THE ROADSIDE.

[From Houston Post, May 19th.]

GALVESTON, Texas, May 18.—This afternoon Alexander Kenneth, while out driving with some little girls, discovered a dead body lying south of the fair grounds, in a copse of coffee bushes at the foot of the sand hills. He reported the fact to the police, and conducted them to the place, and upon examination the body was identified as that of young Arthur Eckman, aged 16 years, of Richmond, Texas. Young Eckman, who was attending the West avenue K school, left Mrs. Branch's where he was stopping, for a ride last Friday evening. Not returning that night or the next day Mrs. Branch became alarmed and notified his parents at Richmond of Arthur's disappearance. Lee Eckman, an elder brother, arrived to-day to look for him, assisted by Dr. Gibson and Mr. Clem Bassett. When the body was discovered it was lying face downward some feet away with his hands clasped underneath his forehead. It was very much decomposed, but was recognized by Dr. Gibson and Mr. Bassett, and when Mrs. Branch was shown his hat and handkerchief, she said they belonged to young Eckman. There was no mark of violence on the body, and the supposition is that young Eckman was suddenly taken ill, dismounted from his pony tied him to the coffee bushes and crawled beneath them and laid down in the position he was found and died. The bridle of the pony was found on the bushes, but the animal is still missing. Young Eckman was a member of one of the oldest and most respectable families of Richmond and was a bright and promising boy, whose sudden and mysterious death will be a severe blow to his family. His remains will be taken to Richmond in the morning for interment.

[Mr. Eckman was a brother of J. W. Eckman, a worthy member of Div. No. 105, who has our sympathy in his afflictions.—Ed.]

Editor Railway Conductor.

DEAR SIR:—I am greatly interested in those letters about "Sunday Work" and would like to add my mite. Most of the States in the Union have laws for the protection of the Sabbath and this has obviously grown out of the conviction of all intelligent legislators, that a holy day of rest, and the public worship of God "are", (as the statutes of Vermont so well express) "in the highest degree promotive of the peace, happiness, and prosperity of a people."

Learned men have abundantly shown (particularly in a recent examination before the British House of Commons,) that the horse and ox live longer, perform a greater amount of service, and are every way more valuable to their owners, when allowed to rest one day in seven.

Careful examination at a public institution in London, employing above two thousand laborers proved that more work was performed in a year, when the Sabbath was faithfully kept than during the same amount of time when the men were required to labor every day.

A large Company in London after having decided to allow their men the Sabbath, were surprised at the end of the year to find that their receipts had greatly increased. This they thought must be because the men were more "honest" since the abolition of Sunday work.

Planters in the West Indies not many years since worked their Slaves on the Sabbath till they became satisfied that this practice was a pecuniary loss to them. It produced enfeebled constitutions and premature death.

The Sabbath is one of the strongest safeguards of virtuous principle in the young, while on the other hand it is well known, that children rarely honor their parents, or prove a blessing to their old age unless taught to honor the Sabbath.

Sabbath breaking leaves the mind to be filled with dark and dangerous errors in regard to God and religion. This sin often leads men into scepticism and in many ways tends to instability of character.

Sabbath breakers are generally found among the foul-mouthed and profane, and it is believed that very few persons ever become licentious or drunken until they are accustomed to desecrate the Lord's day.

A gentleman in New York says those merchants of his acquaintance who kept their counting rooms open on the Sabbath have failed with scarcely an exception.

History most clearly proves that every nation and community has been prospered while it honored God's Sabbath, and that social order and the supremacy of the law have not been maintained where the Sabbath has been trampled on.

France attempted to destroy the Lord's day by public enactment, but brought such scenes of bloodshed and horror upon itself, in consequence, that the Infidel authorities were compelled to restore the fourth Commandment and institute religious worship to save the Metropolis and Kingdom from utter desolation.

Brothers, as you prize your liberties be entreated to lend your whole influence in favor of the Christian Sabbath. Civil freedom and national prosperity cannot exist without it. Our children cannot be trained in the fear of the Lord, nor can we have good hope of leaving them with fixed moral principles that shall carry them honorably through life.

To those in authority; Be entreated to require your workmen, your mills, your boats, your shops and your ledgers to rest on the Sabbath. You will gain nothing substantial by violating this law of your country and your God. By desecrating the Lord's day, you peril everything that can be dear.

Finally, to every dying reader, will you not henceforth "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy"! It is an institution rich in mercy and blessing. O, turn not away from it, thrust not from you its sacred influences lest its slighted privileges weigh you down in deep anguish and woe at the last.

But love the Sabbath-day, receive it with gratitude, with gladness as the type and earnest of that Sabbath, sweet, unending glorious, which shall be to the children of God.

OPERATOR.

BRATTLEBORO, Vt., June 1, 1890.

To Editor Railway Conductor:

Are the returns all in? Whether they are or are not, I suppose I may be allowed to say a few words in reply to my Christian opponents. When the question of running Sunday trains was brought up for discussion, I had no idea that the Brothers and Sisters would be quite so "touchy" about it. One good-meaning sister, signing herself "A Conductor's Wife," in No. 8 of the RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, says, "How sad it made us feel to read Brother Severance's letter against the Christian Sabbath." To enter into the details of that subject would require more time and space than is usually allotted correspondents, but if "Conductor's Wife" will give me her address I think I can soon convince her that she is somewhat in error. She says, by way of argument, "I have never yet heard of a Christian man being discharged." I can give her the names of several, if she wishes, men, too, who were very devout Christians. Being a Christian is no safe-guard against dismissal by railroad corporations, by any manner of means.

Our good Sister admits that she started on her journey on the Sabbath (probably she means Sunday) last year, when the conductors had their excursion from Denver to Salt Lake City, and that not an accident occurred to mar the pleasure of the occasion; also, that the next Sabbath was spent in sight-seeing in that city. According to her own testimony no harm resulted from doing so wicked (?) a thing.

In closing her remarks she reverently quotes what is undoubtedly correct so far as the origin of the Sabbath is concerned. She says: "And God blessed the Sabbath day, and sanctified it." I would respectfully call the Sister's attention to the fact, however, that she is mistaken, for the passage quoted by her reads the "seventh" day, and not Sabbath. To further strengthen her position she adds the following: "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary." Why does not "A Conductor's Wife" be consistent, then, and practice what she so warmly espouses. "Six days shall work be done, but the seventh day (Saturday) is the Sabbath of rest, a holy day of convocation."—Lev. 23-3. Again: "And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day."—Gen. 2-2. "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it."—Gen. 2-3. What more evidence, taking the Sister on her own grounds, is needed to prove that Saturday, and not Sunday, is the day set apart by God, not man, for rest and worship?

As usual, my Brother Martyn, of Division 80, is color blind, and cannot distinguish the difference between the Sabbath of the old testament and the Sunday of the new. Like the rest of my disputants, he ignores the cold fact that the Sabbath of the bible was established by God, and that Sunday is a man-made institution of more recent date. His bible sustains me in the assertion that he places man above his Creator, when he insists on recognizing Sunday instead of the Sabbath as a day of rest and worship. Deny it if he can! If he and all other Christians, who believe as he does, wish to even appear consistent, they should keep the Sabbath at the time and in the manner commanded in the old testament, or not keep it at all. Those who keep Sunday as the Sabbath are complying not with the commands of God, but legal enactments made by men. If the Sabbath is obligatory, it must be kept at the time and in the manner commanded by God.

To Brother Martyn and the rest of my opponents, I wish to say, that I am not combatting the idea of one day out of seven as a day of rest. It is the idea that one day is any better than another for that purpose, that I am opposed to. I repeat, that the Sabbath or Sunday, whichever he may choose to call it, is no better than any other day in the week, for all days are alike in that respect, and I challenge him to prove it to the contrary. When my friendly opponent says he thinks numbers count for something in deciding this all-important question, he simply voices the sentiments of kings and tyrants who are kept in power by their dupes. Because a majority think so and so, does not make it so, any more than "Might makes right." The world will never submit to ecclesiastical oppression in the shape of such a measure as the Blair bill contains.

M. SEVERANCE.

MACON, Ga., May 27, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR BROTHER: Some six months ago Division No. 123 appointed me as their correspondent. Having seen no communication, though I have written three, my Brothers think me negligent, and that you should hear from us. Each Brother feels proud of No. 123, and happy to report that our Order is progressing. We have received some good workers, and every meeting we have the pleasure of welcoming some one. Am happy to report harmony, peace and good will toward one another. What a pleasure? And, what can be more beautiful than true friendship, peace and brotherly love, unless it is that each would love and serve the Author of love. I trust the day will soon come when every Brother of 123 will love and follow Him who loves them. We would not be selfish, but include every one in our prayer that belongs to our noble band. What a beautiful spectacle even for the Angels of Heaven to witness.

We have had to part with some good Brothers, but not by the mighty hand of death, for our Heavenly Father has been so good, so kind, and so watchful over our division, but by transfers. It was hard for us to give up our true, tried and faithful Secretary, Brother J. T. Johnson, who was appointed yardmaster at Columbus, Ga. We were at a loss to find one to fill his place. The mantle fell upon our worthy, highly esteemed and ever watchful Brother, J. G. Visscher, who has proved equal to the emergency and is ever on the alert for the good of the Order.

I see a good deal is being written about desecrating the Sabbath by running trains on Sunday. Why do not the O. R. C. set the example, for how many divisions of our noble Order hold their meetings on one of the six days that belong to us instead of taking the seventh which we have no right to, and that belongs to God. Let us first, pull out the mote in our own eye. Let the O. R. C. get right, and then by our example and influence be enabled to lead our officials to remember the Sabbath.

I remain, yours fraternally,

GEORGIA.

He Squelched the Young M. D.

For many years he had been the sole dispenser of pills in town, but in the height of his fame, a rival, in the shape of an immature fledgling from a medical school, appeared on the scene. The young chap had just received his diploma and was one of those perambulatory encyclopædias of universal knowledge that one often sees in these days of liberal education.

The old doctor paid no attention to the young aspirant for medical fame. One day, however, the two were brought together at consultation, and on this occasion the young M. D. essayed to squelch the old man with his preponderosity of knowledge. He accordingly began to rattle off Latin phrases and French idioms in a manner that startled the old man.

"Yes," mused the old doctor, meditatively, as he rubbed his chin, "that's so, that's so. But what do you think of a cataplasm for this case?"

"A—a what?" ejaculated the new doctor, completely dumbfounded.

"A cataplasm," was the reply.

"Well, I am not familiar with that mode of treatment, though I've seen it advertised. It's something new, isn't it?"

"New? Great heavens, no!" exclaimed the old physician, thoroughly enjoying the joke. "A cataplasm means simply a poultice. It always has meant a poultice and probably always will."

The young doctor straightway subsided.—Leviston Journal.

Carriers of Passengers—Negligence—Direction of Conductor.

Action for damages on account of personal injuries. From a judgment of $10 000 defendant appealed. Where a passenger aged 67, and in good health, was directed by the conductor of the train to get off of said train before reaching his station, the evidence showing that his duties required haste upon his part, the train, a freight carrying passengers, not yet having moved up far enough, hence he hastened on beside the train, but soon came to a bridge, to cross which he had to mount a flat car, as did also another passenger. Reaching the front of the car, and being anxious lest the train might start, he having first examined the ground, jumped from the coupling outward, with one hand on the car in front, and on landing broke his leg.

Held, That it was for the jury to determine whether defendant's wrongful act was the proximate cause of the injury. Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

Adams vs. Missouri Pac. R'y Co., Mo. S. C., March 22d, 1890.

NOTE:—It was contended that his contract was that he should be safely carried to his place of destination; that having related his necessity for haste to the conductor and the latter directing him to leave the car and walk up to the station gave him license to do so and this direction was the approximate cause of the injury resulting. For the reason that this question was taken from the jury, the cause is reversed and remanded.

Ejecting Passenger—Payment of Fare—Ordinary Ticket.

Action for damages on account of being ejected from defendant's train. Plaintiff bought his ticket at B., entitling him to transportation from B. to H. It was an ordinary unlimited ticket. Plaintiff rode to A., an intermediate station, got off, and after transacting some business resumed his journey by the next train. The conductor of the second train inspected his ticket, and told him it was punched to H. and he must pay the fare from A. to H., or be put off the train. Plaintiff protested that he had paid his fare to H., and had not ridden beyond A. on the ticket, and claimed the right to be carried the rest of the way. The conductor told him he should put him off at (M.) and left him. When the train stopped at M. plaintiff left the train and went into the ticket office and applied for a ticket from M. to H., which was sold to him in the presence of the conductor, who declared to the plaintiff and ticket agent that he would not accept the new ticket unless the plaintiff also paid the fare from A. to M. The plaintiff resumed his seat in the train, and soon after the train started the conductor came to him and upon the tender of the new ticket he refused to accept it unless it be accompanied with the fare from A. to M. This was refused and the conductor stopped the train and ejected him.

Held, 1. That plaintiff's ticket was evidence that defendant had contracted to convey him from B. to H. by passenger train which stopped at the latter station. The contract was not limited by its terms to the day on which the ticket was purchased, nor to the train by which the journey was commenced. And where, under a rule for punching tickets, conductors are directed to make endorsement on the ticket only in case the stop-over is to be made between "punching stations," and where plaintiff had no knowledge that A. was not a "punching station," and there being no evidence that the ticket had been used beyond A., as between the conductor and the company, it was the duty of the conductor to give the mark on the ticket an arbitrary significance, but to do so was at the company's risk, and violated the rights of the passenger thereby rendering the company liable.

2. That where the plaintiff had committed no breach of the peace, nor created any disturbance, nor been a trespasser, nor owing defendant anything, having once paid his fare to H., voluntarily left the train at M. and purchased a new ticket, which was evidence of a new contract, the conductor having no authority to forbid him to make it, and for such refusal and ejection the company is liable.

Ward vs. New York Cent. R'y Co., N. Y. S. C., April 11th, 1890.

NOTE:—This is a very interesting decision involving the rights of both carrier and passenger. The fare between A. and M. was alleged by the company to be due from plaintiff. The conductor had a right, says the court, to follow his instructions regarding the marks on the ticket, but when such a rule interferes with the right of a passenger the company must bear the consequences. Very interesting decisions on this question may be reviewed by reference to Terry vs. R'y Co., 13 Hun. 359; Kelsey vs. R'y Co., 28 Hun. 460; Elmore vs. Sands, 54 N. Y. 512; Beebe vs. Ayers, 27 Barb. 275.

*To the Friends of the Late Mrs. A. L. Carey of

O, Death, why dost thou ever take
The fairest we have here?
Why dost thou wrest from the tender heart
The ones I hold most dear?
Why dost thou ever seek to rend
The sacred, holy ties
That make the home where love abides
An earthly paradise?

Was there no homeless, friendless one,
No weary, aching breast,
That would be free from toil and strife,
That longed and sighed for rest?
Could'st thou not find some wanderer
With no love ties to bind,
Whose loss would leave no aching void,
No breaking hearts behind?

O, hearts, with fresh wounds bleeding,
Eyes, dim with tears of woe,
O, lips, quivering with anguish
That only the stricken know;
List! through the hush of eventide,
Like leaves by the night wind stirred,
Tenderly whispering words of peace
A loving voice is heard.

"'Tis only the bird with the drooping wing
That early seeks its nest;
Only the weary storm-tossed soul
That sighs and pines for rest,
Only the eyes grown dim with tears
Look up for relief in prayer;
And we never long for heaven,
Till we have some loved one there."

VICKSBURG, Miss., June 2d, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: We are sad to chronicle the death of Brother James T. Schofield, a member of Wayne Division 119, of Fort Wayne, Ind., which occurred in the Vicksburg yard on the night of the 30th of May.

He had just returned from an extended visit through the north and east, including the Grand Convention at Rochester, and this was his first trip since his return.

He had just signed his last order and his train was pulling out of the yard, when himself and a brakeman were thrown from the top of his caboose.
The brakeman caught on the draw head and was saved, but Brother Schofield fell on the track, and the caboose ran over him, killing him instantly.
This derailed the caboose, and soon a large crowd gathered, bewailing the sad death and shedding warm tears of sorrow and regret.

Alas, it was too late to offer any earthly assistance and his body was taken charge of by some of the brothers and transferred to the undertakers.
A message was sent to his wife informing her of the accident, and was responded to by Brother G.
M. Dillon, C. C., of Bellevue, Ohio, Division 134, requesting that his remains be forwarded to that place. Brother M. N. McIlwain left here yesterday with his remains, via the Queen and Crescent route, and will offer condolence to Mrs. Schofield, so far as it is in the power of the Order to do so.

His remains were escorted to the Q. & C. depot by Magnolia Commandary No. 2. Knight Templars and Division 231 O. R. C.; also, several employes of the Miss. Valley railroad.

We believe that the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe is all wise, and that our loss is one more Brother consecrated to the grand order of God.

May his soul cross the dark river of eternity without a ruffle to disturb its voyage, and land safely in the realms of eternal love.

With steady mind thy course of duty run,
God never does, nor suffers to be done,
Aught but thyself would'st do, could'st thou foresee,
The end of all events so well as He.

Look up, my soul! be like the lark,
That singing soars afar,
Theres n'er a cloud, however dark,
But veils a shining star.

Yours Truly in P. F.,
JOHN B. WHITE.
Division 231.

At a regular meeting of New Brunswick Division, No. 219, held in St. John, N. B., June 8th, 1890, it was resolved that

WHEREAS, It has pleased God in his all wise providence to remove from the family of Brother J. C. Costly his beloved daughter; therefore, be it Resolved, That the heartfelt sympathy of the members of this division be extended to Brother Costly and his wife in their sorrow, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to Brother Costly; also, the RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

Resolutions of Respect.

At a special meeting of Bellevue Division No. 134, Order of Railway Conductors, held June 3rd, 1890, the following resolutions were adopted in memory of our worthy brother James F. Schofield, a worthy brother of Division 119:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the universe to permit death to enter the circle of Division 119 and remove from our midst our worthy and beloved Brother, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in his death we feel as Brothers and members of the Order of Railway Conductors, that we have met with a loss that can never be repaired. Our Brother had endeared himself to us by his strict adherence to the principles of our Order, by the faithful discharge of his duties, by his pleasant and cheerful manner and his kindness and sympathy in distress and sorrow. Though his death was sudden, we may hope that his is perfect rest. We shall miss him in our division room, as he always met with us whenever it was possible to do so. We shall meet him no more on earth but we may hope to meet him in the presence of the Most High who doeth all things well. Our beloved Brother was killed in the strict performance of his duties. We extend to the bereaved widow and relatives our heartfelt sympathy in this their irreparable loss, but which we trust is his everlasting gain. We would say to them, be ye faithful unto the end, that in heaven you may meet the loved ones that have gone before. Also that our charter be draped in mourning for 30 days, that this resolution be put upon our division records, that it be published in each of our city papers and a copy sent to the stricken and bereaved widow and published in RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

IN MEMORY OF OUR DEAR BROTHER JAMES F. SCHOFIELD.

Ere we breathed our last farewell,

Who can tell the grief and sorrow

That within our bosoms dwell.

Dearest Brother, now cold and silent,

Thou art resting in the grave,

While we weep thy happy spirit has flown away to God who gave.

It is hard to part so sudden,

With that loved one so good and true;

But our Heavenly Father called him to his happy home.

We must give thee up, dear Brother,

Whom we loved so long and well,

It is past, the hopes are blighted,

O, our loved one, fare thee well.

EXTENSION FRONTS FOR LOCOMOTIVES.

Various smokestack and spark arresters for locomotives have been designed, but have failed to accomplish the purpose of preventing sparks from setting fire to objects along the line of the road, injuring the rolling stock and annoying the passengers. Among the various devices the extended smoke boxes, or extension fronts, as they are often called, were brought out. At first they were not as favorably received as they deserved to be; they were tried several times and then abandoned, but in late years their valuable features have been recognized, and extension fronts are now extensively used in different sections of this country. They undoubtedly have their enemies, but they have many more friends. That a few sparks will occasionally fly out of the stack on an extension front is true, and cannot be prevented so long as an opening for the escape of gases is required; but it is also true that the extension front retains the largest bulk of the sparks, cinders and unconsumed fuel, and carries them to a place where they can do no harm, instead of throwing them along the line of the road—the worst use they can be put to. The extra expense incurred for emptying the boxes at designated places should not be an objection, as it certainly amounts to much less than the compensations paid for fires so often caused by the use of other devices.

In order to make the extension fronts work successfully they must be fitted perfectly air tight, otherwise the cinders will catch fire, warp the sheets and render the box useless. Neither should they be allowed to fill up too much, as then the sparks will be thrown out of the stack; also ample means should be provided for emptying the smoke boxes without opening the door in the front.

Although the primary object of the extension fronts is to retain the sparks it is often claimed that they save fuel; we believe that this claim could be substantiated by carefully conducted experiments. The strong blast in the short smoke box not only draws the sparks but also unconsumed fuel into the smoke box, and since there is no room in the short boxes to hold them, they have to be lifted bodily and thrown out of the stack, and this means an expenditure of work which the exhaust steam must supply. Again, this solid matter meets obstructions in the smokestack, such as the netting, cones, etc., against which it is violently thrown and broken up; this also requires work which must be furnished by the exhaust steam. Even the fact alone of having obstructions to the passage of the exhaust steam must necessarily reduce the useful effect of the blast. Now, the extension front has generally a plain smokestack without any obstruction in it; the exhaust nozzles extend to above the netting in the smoke box, hence the exhaust steam has an unobstructed passage and will on this account lose little of its useful effect.

The cinders are held in the box, hence there is no work expended in lifting these and throwing them out of the stack; no work is required from the exhaust to break them up, hence it is reasonable to conclude that the exhaust steam in the extension front has less work to do than in the short box, and that in the extension front nearly the whole force of the exhaust steam is expended for its legitimate purpose, namely, creating the necessary forced draught. It is also reasonable to conclude that since the exhaust steam has less work to do the exhaust nozzle can be made and in fact is made larger in the extension front than in the smoke box. But enlarging the exhaust nozzle leads to other consequences—it reduces the back pressure in the cylinders and creates a milder draught so that lighter fires can be carried and more time given to combustion. In view of all these advantages we believe the claim of economy in fuel to be just.

But there is a possibility of over-estimating the economy of fuel with the use of the extension front. In the majority of cases a brick arch in the fire box is used in connection with the extension front; the brick arch tends to prevent unconsumed fuel from being drawn into the smoke box which also tends to save fuel and the amount saved by the brick arch and that saved by the extension front can only be determined by carefully conducted experiments.

That extension fronts have not given satisfaction in some cases cannot be denied, but we believe the cause to have been bad workmanship, faulty design or want of proper care when in operation. On the other hand many of our prominent roads are using them successfully and there are no signs of abandoning them. It is sometimes stated that the great capacity of the extension front is detrimental to the draught. Mr. D. K. Clark, in his treatise on railway machinery, recommends 3 cubic feet of capacity per square foot grate surface as the proper proportion for a smoke box. Many extension fronts do not contain much more than that when empty, and when partly filled will probably contain less, hence not much trouble need be anticipated from the increased capacity.

Besides the advantages named, the use of the extension front also promotes the comfort of passengers and cleanliness. The passengers may keep the windows open with comparative comfort, and are not so liable to soil their hands in taking hold of hand rails when stepping off the car.—Railway Age.

A union meeting of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was held at New Haven, Conn., May 25, and was attended by about 1,000 engineers. Chief Engineer P. M. Arthur delivered a lengthy address, from which the following extract is taken:

Today we have 48,000 members. Twenty-five years ago the character of railroad men was not high. After a man becomes a member of our society he has got to behave himself or we will put him out. We have with us today two prominent railroad presidents and I am glad to see them, and I want to say something about strikes. There always will be differences between capital and labor. My idea of the best way to settle these differences is in the language of the bible: "Come let us reason together." [Applause.] When employers have been willing to meet us and discuss matters with us there never has been a strike and there never will be. There is no man invested in our order with authority to order a strike. Such authority is fatal. I hope the time will never come when any order will hesitate to strike if such action becomes necessary, but every means to avoid a strike should be adopted. I am opposed and always have been to our men forming alliances with other labor organizations. I attribute our success to our policy of minding our own business and keeping out of all other labor entanglements.

Mr. Arthur was followed by the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, president of the New York Central, who spoke as follows:

I want to say at the outset and say it at the president of the New York Central & Hudson River railroad, I endorse the object of your order, the conduct of your order and I endorse all your chief has said today. I am here not so much for the purpose of making a speech as to be here. I wanted also to say something in reference to the attitude of the officers and employes of railroad corporations. Presidents and all officers down to the errand boy draw their pay from the same treasury. All are dependent upon the directors for employment. Therefore all meet on a common level. If an officer of high degree, clothed with a little brief authority, seeks to oppress those under him, the hand of a higher authority should reach out and throttle him. Railroad men must learn to think in emergencies. Those who cannot do that cannot stay in the service. Railroad men are all important men, I care not whether he is an engineer or a baggage smasher. No man more than the railroad man must be temperate and true, and your order makes him so. It is not for me to say anything about federation. That is your affair. But I want to say that during my connection with the New York Central railroad there has not been a single matter with your brotherhood that has not been settled in five minutes. The question of capital and labor has been settled by your order in a truly admirable manner. In olden times when an engineer came to the president to state a grievance, the president immediately told him to go to a place where he would not need an overcoat. Those days have gone by. No laborer comes to my door with a grievance without securing an audience no matter who is in my office. The knock of an employe ought always to secure an entrance to the railroad officials' office. On several occasions I have had opportunities to exchange railroad for political life, but I refused, because I liked railroad life better. Engineers are the best paid men in the operating department of railroads, and they should be. My acquaintance with your order makes it possible for me to say that you are a noble body of men. May God prosper you until the last trump shall make us all brothers.

An address was also made by president Clark of the New York, New Haven & Hartford, who said that he endorsed the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

The Convenience of Foreign Coaches.

It has come to the knowledge of the police in England, France and Germany, says the New York Evening Sun, that organized bands of robbers, who make railway carriages the field of their operations and use chloroform and other drugs to stupify their victims, are at work in those countries. It is believed that many of these daring and ingenious scoundrels are Americans. Sometimes they go provided with opium and chloroform. This is the ordinary modus operandi: The robber, who must be well dressed, enters into conversation in the carriage with a man whom he knows or suspects to have money or things of value on his person. He offers the intended victim some food or drink heavily drugged with opium. The victim, if he partakes of the kindly offered refreshment, soon falls into a deep sleep, and while in that condition is robbed. If he refuses as an experienced traveler would do, the robber pretends to fall asleep and waits until the other man really does so. Then he approaches him silently, holds a piece of parchment called a "stifler" before his mouth and the chloroform bottle under his nose. The robber usually leaves some money and all the jewelery on the victim's person. Sometimes he administers an overdose of chloroform and the traveler never awakes. In such cases, as the victim is found in possession of a certain amount of money and his jewelry, death is usually attributed by not overintelligent provincial authorities to natural causes.

M. Mace, the well known French detective, says that three such deaths occurred in one day on the same French railway. An English lady was recently chloroformed and outraged in a railway carriage in Germany. Hundreds of outrages in railway carriages have been recorded in European papers during the last few years. All England was stirred some years since by the crime of Lefroy, who shot an old merchant in a railway carriage in the heart of London, and whose guilt it was found difficult to establish. Another sensational case was that in which Miss Dickson charged Col. Valentine Baker of the British army with attempting to assault her in a railway carriage. Col. Baker was expelled from the army. There were many persons who believed him innocent and wished to have him reinstated in the army, but the queen was inexorable.

Many Americans will not understand how the outrages are possible. They would be impossible here, but the carriages on European railways are divided into compartments by partitions running from one side of the carriage to the other. In the first-class carriages the partition is carried to the roof, so that the occupants of a compartment are isolated. In the third and second class carriages the partition is not carried to the roof, and communication is possible from one end of the carriage to the other. This, added to the fact that robbers do not look for victims in third-class carriages, has caused a great number of persons to ride third-class when alone who do not do so from necessity.

When a train is bound on a journey of any length the porters distribute the passengers so that there are not more than two or three in each first-class compartment. Of course that insures quiet and plenty of room. At night, if you are not in a sleeping carriage, it is not uncommon to find yourself the sole occupant of a compartment, but more common to have one fellow-passenger. It is not conducive to sound sleep to be alone, practically beyond the reach of all human aid, with a man whom you can hardly see, and who may be provided with a revolver, knife, life-preserver, chloroform, and opium. The partitions are so thickly padded that the loudest noises scarcely penetrate them. Railway companies are compelled by law to provide means of communication with the guard on trains going 25 miles without stopping. A button, which it is necessary to press in order to communicate with the guard, is placed high up on each side of the carriage. But communication can only be effected by the button on one side, according to the direction in which the train is going. A frightened man would probably press the wrong button, or he might find his fellow-passenger with a drawn revolver between himself and the right button.

The Anti-Strike Clause.

Since the close of the Grand Division much has been said and written of the action of that body in eliminating from the obligation all reference to the word strike. The claim is set up that the action taken was the direct result of the organization of another body of conductors. There is absolutely no truth in that claim, as it is a well known fact that the clause in question has been opposed for years by a large number of the ablest men in the Order, and, as in all cases, since the world was made, right has at last conquered.

There is no sense in any number of the men who are now in the minority leaving the organization because of the action on that important question, as the Order is bound to thrive and flourish like a Green Bay tree in spite of all opposition. Conductors generally are conservative, and there is, at this time, no more danger of a strike among them than there was before the clause was eliminated. There is one great satisfaction, however, and that is that an individual member of the organization, or any number of them, can quit work without violating any solemn pledge. It was not the intention of the majority, by whose votes the strike clause was made a thing of the past, to inaugurate a series of strikes. The Order, as a whole, will oppose that action in the future as in the past, and in so doing will do right. There is a growing sentiment against such action, and in a very few years strikes will cease altogether, and all grievances between employer and employes will be settled by arbitration.

While the question of federation is being discussed in nearly all sections of the country, the men on several systems in the west have virtually federated. This is especially true of the Union Pacific road, where a perfect understanding exists between all classes of labor. It is expected, of course, that some railway managers who see the beginning of the end, will oppose this step toward self-protection, but those who do might as well try to stem the current of the mighty father of waters. The action of the Reading and Burlington & Missouri officers in ordering their employes, who are members of the Order, to quit it or their situations, is a disgrace to civilization and our form of government. If the officers of those lines succeed in compelling their men to resign from the Order, their victory will be short lived, as there is a growing sentiment in these United States that the rights of its citizens must be protected against the grasping monopolies, who will find that in this case, at least, they have overreached themselves.—Railway News Reporter.

The above-named association began its third annual convention at St. Louis Mo., June 10. President A. A. Zion of Indianapolis occupied the chair, and W. M. Eggleston of Louisville, who succeeded Mr. E. J. Peabody as secretary since the last annual meeting, took the minutes of the proceedings. After an address of welcome by a member of the city council president Zion delivered his annual address, in which he referred to the prosperous condition and rapid growth of the association, which now has about 1,000 members. The first day was taken up with preliminaries, and the election of about 90 new members. The constitution provides that each new member must be accepted separately by ballot and the task of casting 90 ballots is a dry and tedious proceeding.

The committee on train rules submitted its report on Wednesday and the entire day was spent in the discussion of the report. The association is trying to formulate a set of rules for the dispatching of trains, which will be adopted by all the roads of the country. Each rule was taken up separately and considered carefully. An addition to rule 20 was made which provides that a new train must not be started from its originating point until the time table bearing its number goes into effect. Rule 21 was amended to call special attention by the time table to points where trains are to meet and pass.

Papers on the following subjects were read at Thursday's session.

C. M. Coomer, why train dispatchers should cultivate the fraternal spirit; H. Seward Miller, what should be the conditions as to the train service from which it could be determined which plan is preferable, viz: Train order signals normally at danger, or normally at safety. Mr. J. M. Host as to the conditions under which it would be preferable to permit yardmasters or other persons than train dispatchers to start trains, i. e., extras and sections, from terminals without orders from the train dispatcher; and the restrictions, if any, that should be observed in the matter of trains using the left hand track, on double track, without orders from the train dispatcher. Mr. J. E. Tilley, the conditions under which it would be preferable to not schedule freight trains, or at least not to schedule freight trains of one direction and run them as extras.—Railway Age.

A Spotter Confesses.

LIMA, MONT., April 22, 1890.—State of Montana, county of Beaverhead, Christopher James Lynch being by me first duly sworn on oath deposes and says: I was born in Coughohochen, Montgomery county State of Pennsylvania, on the 25th day of December, A. D. 1865. My present occupation is an operative in the Pinkerton National Detective agency, with headquarters at Denver, Col., and I have been so employed since the 22d day of February, A. D. 1880.

I was to receive a compensation of thirteen ($13.00) dollars per week and two ($2.00) dollars per day as expenses. I was employed by C. K. Hibben, superintendent, with headquarters at Denver. I was given a set of instructions by Hibben, defining and setting forth what I was to do, and looked them over for a couple of days. I was to take a freight train, get number of engine and number of caboose, and make note of cash fares, when collected, where they got on and off. I got on a train at Silver Bow, Mont., and handed a cigar to the conductor and told him I was going to Dillon, Mont.; that I was traveling light; at the same time handed him two (2) silver half dollars telling the conductor I had a friend in Dillon, and if I could get to Dillon I would be on my feet. I made a written statement of my trip from Silver Bow to Dillon which I calculated to forward to headquarters at Denver, relating to receiving fares, but it is incorrect and false. I "blew" in eighty (80) dollars at "faro" in Butte, Mont., and I wanted to get even by making false reports against the conductors. I got on a train at Dillon, Mont.; conductor came to me; I asked the fare to Camas, Idaho; conductor said he only went to Spring Hill, and said the fare was $2.45; I told him I was nearly out of "soap," but had a friend in Camas; could get help there. I offered him all the silver I had, viz: $1.50. It was not all I had. He gave me 20 cents in change and told me to get off the train at Red Rock; when I got to Red Rock he called station; I stayed in car and he told me he would not carry me unless I paid fare. I then gave him 70 cents—all the silver I had. He told me it would only carry me to the second station and he put me off there. I rode from Dell to Spring Hill on a hand-car and wrote in my running book, "Cash to Spring Hill, now Lima, $3.00," which entry was false and incorrect.

The foregoing statement of my trip from Silver Bow to Lima I make without fear, compulsion, duress or restraint, and without the hope of reward. I received $250 as expenses since I went into the employ of the company. I sent my reports to J. R. Allen, a fictitious name for C. K. Hibben, I presume it is. I always made, in answer to questions put by train men, any kind of a statement to suit my fancy irrespective of the truth and facts. I never tried to dead-head my way before I made the trip from Silver Bow to Spring Hill.

I am about 5 feet 10 inches high, weigh about 150 pounds, light complexion, grey steel eyes, light blue. I turned my papers over to persons here freely and voluntarily and without compulsion.

Signed,

CHRISTOPHER JAMES LYNCH.

I, W. S. Barbour, a notary public in and for Beaverhead county, State of Montana, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original affidavit from which this copy was made by me. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this, the seventh (7th) day of April, A. D. 1890.

Hughitt and Pullman.

Years ago in their youth George M. Pullman and Marvin Hughitt were in the employ of the New York Central Railway company. Both were industrious and ambitious young fellows and both prospered. At this time Chauncey Vibbard was president or, at least he was the managing head of that great railway corporation. Pullman was in some subordinate capacity and Hughitt was a telegraph operator. Vibbard saw the earnestness of the boys and did all he could to push them along on the road to riches and success in their chosen occupation. He was in a measure their benefactor. It is not necessary to trace the course of these two men. The people of Chicago know them both well, and what they have achieved in the way of material prosperity.

Not many days ago old Mr. Vibbard passed through Chicago on his route to the northwest. It is evident that fortune has not smiled upon him quite so generously as upon the two employes of many years ago. He wanted to pass through St. Paul. He had watched with pride and satisfaction the careers of the two young men whom he had done his best to befriend. When he came to Chicago he resolved to see his old "boys" and ask them for a pass to St. Paul. First he called upon George M. Pullman. He sent up his card and with it the reason of his visit. The servant in attendance upon the Italian marquis handed in Mr. Vibbard's card. It took Mr. Pullman about a minute to send word to Mr. Vibbard that he had no time to spare and would have to decline the honor of a visit with him.

The old gentleman, as he related these facts to a Chicago friend, was greatly affected that one who should be so largely indebted to him could be so cruel. But he was not discouraged, and he made up his mind to see Mr. Hughitt. He called upon the Northwestern railway magnate, and the meeting between the two was most affecting. Mr. Hughitt threw his arms around his old employer's neck, and hugged him and almost kissed him. He was certainly delighted to see him. It is safe to say that if Mr. Vibbard had asked for a special train to St. Paul, to be occupied by himself only and to be pulled by two locomotives, he would have got it. Mr. Hughitt showered upon him all the courtesies that Mr. Vibbard was willing to accept. This incident shows pretty well the difference between George M. Pullman and Marvin Hughitt.—St. Louis Republic.

Fate of Two Innocents.

There was only one chair vacant in a down-town barber shop the other day when a tall young man, accompanied by a lady and a lovely little girl of five, entered, and, calling the head barber to one side, gave him a few explicit directions. Then the little girl's hat was removed and the barber enveloped her in one of the big white aprons. The young man lifted her up into the barber's chair with a whispered word of reassurance, and the lady, after kissing her, passed her hands caressingly over all the beautiful golden brown curls. Then she sat down in a corner where the child could not see her face and pulled out her pocket handkerchief.

By this time the occupants of the five other chairs had become vastly interested. All eyes were fixed on the sweet baby face, with its curly halo. It was a pale little face, and there were no rosebuds on its cheeks, but above them were two glorious gray eyes that shone like a pair of stars. On each side of the little face rested a particularly fat curl. The child placed her hand upon each as the barber advanced with the big shears, and gazed beseechingly up into his face.

"Now, Mr. Barber, I want you to leave Dimple and Dumpling until the very last—cut all the rest off first please. I shall miss them dreffully, you know; me and Dimple and Dumpling has always been such friends. Dimple is going out to my papa in a letter. My papa is way out in Ceylon, you know. You haven't got a papa way out in Ceylon, Mr. Barber."

"No, Miss. I ain't got none at all."

"And haven't you got no mamma, Mr. Barber! My mamma is going to put Dumpling into her 'Don't You Remember' box. Did you ever see a 'Don't You Remember' box, Mr. Barber?"

"No, Miss, I never did."

"Mamma's has got such a funny lot of things in it. There's a little bit of orange blossom, and a little pinafore that Alec used to wear. That's Alec over there by the window. And there's a little red shoe that was our little bruffer's. His name was Robin, and he died before any of us was borned, you know."

At this moment the mother stepped forward and whispered to the little girl. There was an old gentleman with a very red face, in one of the chairs, who shook like a veritable jelly at the child's remark. Big brother Alec was blushing furiously, and the whole barber shop was all agog. There was silence for a moment or two, while the scissors went snip, snip, snip. Then the little prattler broke forth again.

"Mamma says I'm talking too much, Mr. Barber; but if I don't talk I shall begin to cry. I cried awfully yesterday, you know; so did mamma and nurse. That was when the doctor came and said they'd have to be cutted off. We all cried—'cept Cecil. He's eight. He never cries 'cept when mamma spans him. Then he howls. But at last I stopped crying, for Alec said he'd take me to lunch with him when we came in to have it done; nurse said she'd let me sit up till half past seven for a whole week; mamma's going to get me a silver thimble, and cook is going to have waffles for tea when we get back. Do you like waffles, Mr. Barber?"

The barber replied in the affirmative, and then there was silence for a little while.

"Have you got a sweetheart, Mr. Barber?" A titter ran around the room, and the barber turned as red as his pole outside, but he replied in the negative.

"Alec's got one," pursued the child. "He goes to tea with her on Sunday. Cecil says he's awfully sweet on her. Cecil knows, too; he was under the sofa when——"

But Alec waited to hear no further. He bolted bodily and waited on the corner until the ordeal was at an end. The lady arose and whispered some further cautions, but they proved of no avail.

"Well, Mr. Barber, if you haven't got any sweetheart, or papa, or mamma, you must be a norphan. Are you a norphan, Mr. Barber?"

The man nodded his head and then asked his questioner to keep her head still, like a good girl."

Another pause. Then:

"Mr. Barber?"

"Yes, miss."

"If you is a norphan what does you say when you go to bed? You can't 'God bless papa and mamma' any more. I'm very glad I'm not an norphan."

There was a dead silence in the room after that until the red-faced old gentleman blew his nose. The barber's task was almost finished now.

"What's the matter, mamma? You're cryin'."

"Why, no, I'm not, Lena. What makes ——"

"Oh, but yes you are, mamma. I can hear you sniffing, and besides I can see your face in the looking glass. There's two big tears running down your nose."

"Now, miss, just please sit steady a minute."

The scissors gave a snip, and poor Dumpling fell down into her lap. Dimple followed an instant later, and the child gazed ruefully at the two beautiful severed curls.

"Good-by, Dumpling and Dimple," she said, and the tears began to gather. They almost overflowed a moment later as the barber lifted her from the chair and she walked to the long mirror to survey herself. But her mother was equal to the emergency. Before Lena had time to realize her changed appearance she called to her to come and help her put Dimple into the letter for Ceylon. The mother wound the two curls about her finger and then tied a little bit of blue ribbon round each of them. She put Dumpling away in her reticule and Dimple was placed among the closely written sheets of foreign paper which she took out of an envelope. The letter was sealed then and after that they arose to go.

"Thank you very much, Mr. Barber," said the little child, holding her hand out. "When me and Cecil get whiskers we'll come to you to cut them off. Do you play base ball, Mr. Barber? Cos if you do I'm going to give you a present. Would you like a ticket for our base ball match, Mr. Barber."

She pulled out a little bit of pasteboard from her pocket and handed it to him:

 GRAND BASE BALL MATCH.

 DICK TURPINS VS.
 TUSCARORAH'S.
 Admishun 3 Pins.

"Cecil is captain of the Dick Turpins, and he said now that I was going to have my hair cut off I'd be just as good as a boy. So he's going to lend me a pair of his trousers and I'm to be second base."

A roar arose from each respective chair. As for the jolly old gentleman, he collapsed utterly. In the midst of the confusion the lady tried to escape, but Lena's hat had to be put on and that caused still another delay.

"No more snarls in the morning now, mamma," remarked the young lady as she put it on. But then she drew a very long face. "Oh, mamma, it wabbles dreadfully."

The barber slipped some paper inside the lining of the hat and then they set off.

But just at the door the red faced old gentleman accosted them. He had his hat on by this time, but he took it off immediately and made a most courteous bow.

"Madam," he exclaimed, "there are two things I want particularly, and you can grant me both of them, I want a kiss from that little daughter of yours and a ticket for that base ball match. I can't pay the price of admission, for I havn't three pins to my name, but perhaps this," and as he spoke he slipped something bright and shiney into Lena's hand, "to be devoted to soda water after the Tuscaroras have been completely done up, might answer the purpose just as well."

The lady smiled and allowed Lena to give him the desired kiss, but she handed him back the money and could not be prevailed upon to accept it. Then, with a parting nod to the barber, the two joined Alec on the corner. When last seen Lena was lifted up to the letter box to dispatch Dimple on the first stage of his long journey, and the red faced gentleman, as he lost sight of her in the crowd on Broadway, vowed fervently that he would see that game of base ball even if it cost a leg.—Exchange.

MY WEDDING TOUR.

BY ELLA RODMAN.

Sitting quietly at my sewing, with the rather lonely consciousness that I was, and would be for some time to come, possibly for the night, the only human being about the premises, I congratulated myself on the prospect of an undisturbed afternoon; and resolved to admit no visitor whatever, or those shirt-bosoms of Samuel's would not get into their proper places.

"Samuel" was the Rev. Samuel Rubbleton, rector of St. Philip's; and I was his maiden sister. We lived very snugly and comfortably in a large country town, that boasted several other churches besides St. Philip's, and "set up for shapes" and fashions in a pretentious way, that contrasted, criminally enough, with a very decided streak of rurality and primitive simplicity. It suited me, however; I had grown old there, and Samuel's work was there—and mine too, as a natural consequence.

I was alone, as I have said; for the "help," a very excellent girl, generally, had gone to spend the afternoon and evening with "a friend," as she phrased it; but with a spruce young baker, as I more than suspected. She had suddenly presented herself before me in a spangled net, and tinsel odds and ends of ribbon, rustling skirts, and jaunty hat, and announced her intention; and though I could ill spare her, for I expected my brother home, and knew he would want his tea, I did not dare to refuse; for I called to mind a vividly remembered two weeks' of servitude, the penalty of letting my anger get the better of my rudeness, with a quick-tempered Bridget. So I racefully submitted to the inevitable—and locked Phebe out, with a delightful feeling of uncertainty as to when we should meet again.

Suddenly I heard the bell—a loud, brisk ring, as of some one quite in earnest; and peeping behind the curtain, I caught a glimpse of fine roadcloth, a manly figure, and a very prepossessing face. Now, what could Nelson Chardleigh want there—the afternoon before he was to be married? He wanted Samuel, of course, but Samuel was not to be had; and besides, what could he want of Samuel? He would surely see enough of him on the morrow.

I liked the boy—I believed I was a great favorite of his; but I had no idea of letting him in, and listening to a long harangue on the endless subject of Miss Florence Eberton's perfections. So, smiling when the ring was repeated, I stitched on in fancied security, until suddenly a sharp knocking on the window pane gave me a nervous start; and I turned around, with a scream, to encounter a laughing face pressed close against the glass.

"Shame on you, Miss Margie, to be 'playing possum' in this way! You heard me well enough. Why don't you let me in? or where is the pretty Phebe."

"I didn't let you in," said I, going to the front-door, and laughing in spite of myself, "because I didn't want you, nor any one else. Now you are here, however, I suppose you may as well come in; but I cannot imagine what has brought you here, under the circumstances."

"Hospitable, upon my word!" exclaimed the young gentleman, as he followed me into the parlor. "And I do not see why I am not to be here 'under the circumstances.' Etiquette, I believe, shuts up the bride-elect for a week or two before the ceremony; but allows the gentleman to be at large—under the impression, probably, that he is too insignificant to be noticed. But seriously, Miss Margie," he continued, "I am really troubled—and that is why I am here. You were always a kind friend of mine, and, perhaps, you can advise me what to do. His Reverence, as you perceive, is not forthcoming. I went to the station before the morning-train was due, and waited patiently until all the living freight had disembarked; but no Mr. Rubbleton. You know he said, on going away, that he would probably take the morning-train; if not, he would be sure to come at evening—but he would feel safer to come in the morning. Now, when you reflect that there is only one more train in which he could possibly come, in order to perform the ceremony—and that something may occur to cause him to miss that train—you must admit that circumstances look rather discouraging."

The poor fellow was evidently in a state of great nervous excitement, as well he might be; for if Samuel gave him the slip at the last moment, (as I thought he was quite likely to do,) would he not be set down as "a laggard in love," like the miserable rival of "young Lochinvar?" Samuel had been his tutor, and his valued friend ever after—there had always been an intimacy between the families; and Nelson had, almost at the first brush of his engagement, with the gracious permission of the fair Florence, bound my brother under a solemn promise, that if it were a possible thing, he would perform the marriage ceremony.

The idea of that boy being married seemed almost absurd. I could remember so well the days when he wore a short, white frock, with immense blue-rosettes at the shoulders, and a broad sash to match. A magnificent-looking fellow he was always, with great, wondering eyes, and cheeks like marble-roses; and he screamed and hallooed with a royal unrestraint that was anything but refreshing to weak nerves. I loved to see the boy with his stately, young mother; he was her only one, and as much like her as though both had been carved, by the same hand, from one block of marble. She was rather unapproachable, this handsome Mrs. Chardleigh; and she died young.

Nelson had an uncle—his father's brother; and some people called me a pretty girl, though it seemed to me that I had little else but a loving heart. The garden-walls joined, over which we talked; and finally, they sent Herman away, probably, because they did not want him to marry a poor, ignorant girl, who had had few advantages. And then came a story of yellow fever—and then—

I never saw him again; but I think there was a reason why I loved the boy, Nelson Chardleigh, so well, and watched his growth from childhood to manhood. Even after he went to college, he seemed to remember us with affection; and ran over to the rectory, in his vacations, just as he had done when a boy in round jackets. He was a teasing, mischievous, winning fellow, and had a wonderful power of making people do just as he pleased.

Suddenly, he encountered Florence Eberton, a gay beauty under the care of his uncle, whose splendid mansion, some miles from the town, was the theme of general admiration. Everything else went to the four winds; and when, in the course of time, he actually found himself engaged to this peerless creature, his happiness knew no bounds. That there should be the barest chance of any unpleasant contretemps at the anticipated wedding, was not to be endured; and I quite appreciated his annoyance.

All these thoughts flashed through my mind, while, like a caged lion, my visitor nervously paced the floor; and, finally, he burst out with,

"Miss Margie, what is to be done? It will scarcely be safe to hang our last hope upon the evening-train; and I feel very much disposed to go in quest of some one else. I could never face Florence, or her friends, if there should be any hitch in my part of the proceedings. I really did not think that Mr. Rubbleton would have served me so! Why he needs travel off at the very last minute?"

Why, indeed? except that it was just exactly like him to forget all about the wedding, and stay over another day with the old college-chum whom he had so suddenly gone to visit.

"I think he will be here to-night," I said, half hesitatingly; "he certainly promised that he would come. 'If I do not get here on the morning train,' he said, 'you may certainly expect me in the evening.'"

"But thinking will not do much in such a case!" exclaimed the troubled bridegroom. "Suppose something should happen to the train? Suppose that Mr. Rubbleton should have a fit? Or fifty thousand other things that might happen? Just put yourself in my place, Miss Margie, and fancy how you would feel under the circumstances! Of course, you couldn't, though, very well; but I'll tell you how I feel—like going out to engage some one to officiate to-morrow, in case Mr. Rubbleton does not appear.

"But would any of the clergy be willing to make such an arrangement?" said I, smiling at the idea.

"We can drum them up and try," was the eager response.

I was afraid that the bump of reverence was not well-developed in the handsome head before me; but the plural pronoun "we" was decidedly startling.

"We!" I exclaimed, in dismay. "Why, surely, Nelson, you do not want an old maid, like me, dragging about with you? I can't possibly think of such a thing!"

"Yes, you can," said the persevering fellow. "You are hand-and-glove with all the clergy. Miss Margie, and can vouch for my respectability, you know. Why, if I went alone, they would probably think me some stray loafer, not worth marrying."

"You look very much like it, I replied, surveying the tall, aristocratic figure before me; "but really, Nelson, I cannot leave the house—there is no one here."

"It will not run away," said he, philosophically; "and we shall be back again almost before you know it. So, Miss Margie, put on your bonnet please, like the good, kind lady you are, and introduce me to some Reverend gentleman, who will promise not to run off on a journey between this and twelve to-morrow. I think I shall never forgive Mr. Rubbleton; and Florence will certainly laugh at me, if some one else marries us."

"There is Dr. Poacher," said I, reflectingly; "he is the nearest—we might go to him first."

"That stiff-looking old gentleman, who is so absent minded?" was the irreverent reply. "I am afraid he would read the burial-service over us by mistake!"

"Well," said I, not able to contradict this statement, "suppose we try Mr. Kem?"

"He'll do nicely, I've no doubt; but let us start speedily, Miss Margie, for October afternoons have wings, you know."

I heaved a quiet sigh as I glanced at my sewing; but it seemed to be my fate always to have some helpless man on my hands, who required all my time and energies. Samuel was a regular stand-by; and various forlorn ones craved my help at intervals. There seemed to be no getting out of this expedition, now, with Nelson Chardleigh; it was quite natural that he should not feel willing to trust to the hope of Samuel's arriving at the last moment; and being Samuel's sister, it was clearly my duty to get the poor fellow out of the scrape, if possible—nevertheless, I felt a little queer while arraying myself for the walk.

I wished to do credit to my cavalier, by putting on my best; and I had a very pretty lavender bonnet, with white roses inside—a present from an old friend; in which I looked quite possible—a soft, white shawl, and a plain colored silk dress.

"Miss Margie, you are the best-dressed lady I have seen for some time," observed my escort, with an appreciative glance at my toilet.

Then, helping me to fasten up the house, he opened the gate in high glee; and we were fairly launched.

Mr. Kem's residence was what indefinite people call "something of a walk;" and it was a walk, too, through the busiest part of the town. People looked and stared at me and my companion, and not a few bows were accompanied by comical smiles, for which I could not quite account.

"Isn't that a sort of wedding attire?" asked Nelson, evidently interested in such matters. "Don't brides, sometimes, dress in that way?"

"I believe they do," I replied, suddenly awakening to the fact that my dress was rather bridal than otherwise.

We walked on to Mr. Kem's—Nelson frequently reminding me that I had agreed to open the ball, and do the introductory talking.

Mr. Kem boarded in a large house, where numbers of female heads decked the windows; (not, however, like the Dyak trophies, detached from their bodies,) and I counted five, at least, on the lower floor. Much gazing and whispering as we approached the door.

A very pretty, pert-looking Bridget answered our ring.

"Was Mr. Kem at home?"

Eyeing us from head to foot, she said that she would see; and left us standing in the hall.

Presently a young gentlemen appeared, one of the smiling kind, whose very eyes were laughing, as they rested on us.

"Did you wish to see Mr. Kem particularly?" he inquired; as though it might be possible to produce him in an extreme case, but not ordinarily.

"Yes!" exclaimed my companion, with nervous haste, before I had a chance to reply. "Our business with Mr. Kem is very important, and there is no time to lose. I want him to perform a marriage ceremony—is he at home?"

"I regret to say that he is not," was the smiling reply. "He has gone out to tea; but it would not be a very difficult matter to send for him. If I could oblige you and the lady in any way——"

I verily believe that Nelson would have had the Reverend gentleman dragged from the tea-table, without the slightest compunction, had I not interposed and informed our smiling friend, with as severe a look as I could muster, that we would not trouble him farther. We left him standing on the broad steps, and gazing after us, with a wondering smile stereotyped on his face.

Bridget must have enlightened the heads at the window, for they all tittered as we passed by, and bent forward to get a better view of us, to the imminent danger of dislocating their necks.

"Didn't that gentleman strike you as a little peculiar?" asked the unsuspecting Nelson.

He was evidently a stranger to the conviction that had suddenly flashed through my mind, and amused me mightily. The smiling youth and Bridget had, doubtless, taken me for the bride-elect; and hence their merriment.

"It is a strange thing, continued my excited companion, "that Mr. Kem should have selected this afternoon, of all afternoons, to go out to tea!"

"Very strange," I replied, laughing at his disgust; "the sunset of life should have given him mystical lore, and caused him to feel in his bones that you were coming."

"Where shall we go now?" he asked, in dismay, evidently thinking that the clergy were banded against him.

"I scarcely dare mention Dr. Poacher again," said I.

"Let us try him?" he exclaimed, "and if he does anything queer to-morrow, I wash my hands of the responsibility—it will have to rest on your shoulders, Miss Margie."

Of course, I was used to this; to do my best, and then bear the burden of everything that went wrong.

A walk of about a mile farther brought us to a nice, old-fashioned place, where Dr. Poacher spent much of his time in secluded study. We were almost sure of finding him, and raised the brass knocker quite confidently.

A very honest looking Irish-woman, who was afflicted with a chronic grin, soon made her appearance, and gazed upon us with tender interest. It was some little time before we learned that "Dr. Poacher was not just at home now."

"How soon would he be in?" was the eager inquiry.

"Mebbe in an hour; yees can come back and see."

We exchanged looks; and the Irishwoman assured us that "she would hould him at home for us when he came."

"What did possess that woman to grin so?" said Nelson, rather angrily, as we left the door. "Have you any idea Miss Margie? Is there anything queer about either of us, that people act so curiously?"

"Yes," I replied, enjoying his excitement, "I have some idea."

"Well, what is it?"

"Why, I think that all these people imagine that you have been silly enough to select me for the bride."

"Too bad!" he exclaimed, "for you Miss Margie! After your kindness, too! What can we do about it? Shall we go home?"

"No!" I replied stoutly. "If they choose to be so silly, let them have the benefit of it. I do not mind them in the least; and I am determined to see this business through."

"I admire your spirit," said my companion, laughing; "and I should be only too glad to 'see this business through, likewise. But what evil spirit has entered into the clergy of this benighted place, to send them all gadding on this particuiar afternoon."

"The spirit of English Queen Bess, I imagine," said I, "as she was always opposed to marriages. But suppose that we walk around a little now, and wait for Dr. Poacher, as I happen to know him very well?"

We wandered for half an hour, and then, suddenly remembering the possible return of Samuel, I grew frightened, and we concluded to make a fresh application to the brass knocker.

The Irishwoman beamed all over and marshalled us into the front-parlor with evident delight.

"Here they are your reverence!" she exclaimed, triumphantly; and we found ourselves fronting Dr. Poacher, while a mischievous-looking-girl, his niece, stood on one side, evidently in a state of amused expectation, and our Irish friend ambled off to the other.

The expression of the doctor's face, as he recognized me, is better imagined than described.

"Miss Margaret Rubbleton!" he exclaimed, in undisguised astonishment.

To explain all this, it is necessary to say that our Hibernian friend had seized the doctor the moment he appeared, and told him that he was wanted "right away" to marry a couple that were almost ready to cry when they found that he was not to be had on the spot; "a swate-lookin' young feller, and a rale nice lady—a little ould-like, mebbe, for the boy, but as pleasant-spoken a lady as ever stepped." They would be back again, she added, "in the wink of an eye." Anticipating much fun from this performance, the mischievous niece had begged the favor of being present as a witness; the tender-hearted serving-woman had put in a duplicate petition; and here were the household drawn up in battle-array as we entered, quite bent upon doing their best to join us in the bands of holy matrimony!

"Miss Margaret Rubbleton!" said the worthy doctor; and here he stopped, overpowered by his emotions.

I felt my face growing painfully red, while the ridiculousness of the position raised a troublesome inclination to laugh. That young minx, too, was evidently regarding Nelson in the light of a sacrifice; but the troublesome fellow himself seemed struck with dumbness.

"Let me explain to you," said I; but I could get no farther, and I believed I was growing hysterical.

Dr. Poacher bowed stiffly, as though waiting the solution of the riddle; and presently Nelson, with a manliness that delighted me, came to the rescue.

"I think," said he, a little hesitatingly at first, but gathering strength as he proceeded, "that there is a mistake somewhere. I wish to be married; but Miss Rubbleton does not—and she kindly volunteered to introduce me to Dr. Poacher, whose services I am desirous to secure for to-morrow morning, in the event of Mr. Rubbleton's failing us by the morning train."

"Now," said the doctor, laughing more heartily than I had ever seen him laugh before; while the niece and the Irishwoman disappeared, "do you know what I thought?"

"Yes," I replied, quite boldly, "I know exactly what you thought, and am humbly obliged for my share of the compliment. You thought Margaret Rubbleton an old fool, and Mr. Chardleigh a young one; but let me tell you, Dr. Poacher, that my brother Samuel is at the bottom of all this, for we were very much afraid of his giving us the slip this evening."

"I parted from him not half an hour ago," said the doctor, comically, "as he was taking rapid strides from the station to his own house. I thought, then, that he looked like a man whose head was full of some grand idea—and this wedding, I suppose, was the subject."

How like a couple of conspirators we felt, as a picture of the injured Samuel, inhospitably looked out from his own dwelling, rose up before us! With a bewildered excuse, we hastily departed, and sat out on a running walk for the rectory.

"Miss Margie," said Nelson, with laughing penitence, "can you ever forgive me?"

"I suppose I shall, in time," I replied; "for it is one of my weaknesses to forgive people all sorts of things; but I must confess that I do not feel much like it just now."

"I am so glad Mr. Rubbleton has come, after all!" observed my companion, softly.

Now, I did not feel at all glad that he had come, "after all;" on the contrary, I thought it would have been much more convenient, had he verified our fears by missing the train. It is always unpleasant to find that one has been making much ado about nothing.

Nelson escorted me to the gate, and then laughingly departed. No expostulation could induce him to face Mr. Rubbleton that evening.

Samuel's attitude was Napoleonesque, as he stood beside his carpet-bag, which he had deposited on the door-step.

"Why, Margie," he began, "what does this mean? I am very much surprised——"

"Not more than I am," I replied, boldly carrying the war into the enemy's quarters, as I inserted the door-key; "I am sure I never expected to see you this evening!"

"Never expected to see me!" he replied in astonishment. "Did I not say that I would come? And is not Nelson Chardleigh to be married to-morrow?"

"You said that you would probably come in the morning," said I, determined not to be "put down;" "and it is on Nelson Charsleigh's account that I have been gadding this afternoon."

I then gave him a condensed account of our fears, schemes, and adventures; and all that I got for my pains was,

"More deliberate folly I never heard! A performance worthy of two lunatics! I said, as plainly as words could say it, that, if I did not get here in the morning, I would certainly come in the evening—and here I am."

After going over the whole matter from the beginning about five times, with the most eloquent reasoning upon the reasonableness of my conduct, and receiving precisely the same answer every time, I retired from the field, with the firm conviction that my brother Samuel was an excellent man, and a learned man; but that, like most fallible mortals, he had "a kink" somewhere in the construction of his mind, that prevented him from seeing that he could possibly be in the wrong.

I have good reasons for supposing that Nelson Chardleigh went post-haste to his bride that evening, with a highly-varnished account of our adventure, and an extravagant picture of my merits; for a little, scented note, received early the next morning, insisted so warmly upon my presence at the wedding, that I really could not refuse.

I had received an invitation before, and declined it; but now I donned my bridal attire of the day before, and accompanied Samuel to the cars. Here we had the pleasure of encountering Dr. Poacher, who had also received an express invitation.

It was an elegant affair; and the bright, October sun lighted up one of the prettiest faces I had ever seen through the folds of a bridal-veil. Nelson looked perfectly radiant with delight.

"I heard strange things of you this morning," said an acquaintance, laughing, as she nibbled her cake. "I was told that you were married, and had gone on your wedding tour."

"I did go on a wedding tour yesterday," I replied, within hearing of the bridegroom; "but I am not married."

Nelson gave me a comical look; but the person to whom it was addressed was evidently at a loss how to interpret this sphinx-like answer.—Arthur's Home Magazine.

Miss Florence Nightingale is now a confirmed invalid and a patient at Saint Thomas's Hospital, London. Her services during the Crimean War injured her spine, and she has never recovered from the effects thereof. The illustrious philanthropist is nearly sixty-nine years old.

The Vice-President's House.

Though the social world here naturally centers about the President and his family, yet the Executive is hedged in by traditions and ceremonials, at once rigid and democratic. Thus, custom permits the Chief Magistrate and his wife to entertain as their inclination may dictate, but debars them from accepting any hospitality outside a certain official circle. For this reason, the actual social leadership devolves upon the official ranking next the President; and this pleasant, if somewhat formidable, responsibility now rests with the Vice-President and Mrs. Morton.

Besides every evidence of abundant means and cultivated taste, the home of the Vice-President is pervaded by a sense of that genial and warm hospitality for which Mr. and Mrs. Morton have become noted, both here and on the European continent. It is this same simple, unaffected hospitality, more than the luxury of its belongings, which renders this house one of the most attractive interiors in Washington.

The house itself is delightfully located upon one of those old triangles formed by the intersection of several avenues and streets. A porticoed entrance fronts Rhode Island avenue, Fifteenth and "N" streets form the other sides of the triangle, and the point faces some charming bits of green reservation. Beyond is "Scott Circle," where the hero of Mexico sits majestically on his bronze steed, and this park is the center of a locality as beautiful as it is fashionable. A score of notables live within a square or two of the Circle, and a little to the southeast is the famous institution founded by the late W. W. Corcoran, the "Louise Home."

No. 1500 Rhode Island avenue, the residence of the Vice-President, is an ample, turreted structure of pressed brick, irregular in shape, and with numerous swelling windows and projections. Originally built by a naval officer, who put the most of his money into its construction, the house became known as "Brodhead's Folly." Lieutenant Brodhead was soon forced to dispose of his property, and Alexander Graham Bell, of telephone fame, was the purchaser. The distinguished scientist and his family lived here several years, and the house was the scene of many elegant entertainments, until their occupancy was terminated by a fire. This fortunately occurred in the early morning, and was confined to the upper stories, so that all escaped uninjured. The building had always been difficult to heat,—a circumstance most trying to a good housekeeper,—and as the deposed mistress, only half-recovered from her fright, watched the conflagration from a neighbor's window, she remarked with quaint cheerfulness, "Well, that house is warm for once."

Upon Mr. Morton's accession to the Vice-Presidency, he purchased the Bell mansion, and after extensive alterations and additions it was handsomely fitted up. Luxurious in its appointments, the interior is still eminently home-like, and there is an entire absence of newness or crudeness about the furnishings. In fact, most of the belongings and much of the rare bric-a-brac about the rooms are the same which, during Mr. Morton's ministry in Paris, made the American Legation so attractive to his nomadic countrymen.

A paved walk and driveway lead to an ornamental iron portico, festooned with trailing vines which makes a very effective entrance. The first step into the house prepossesses one favorably, as instead of an ordinary hall or vestibule, the entrance is direct into a good-sized but very irregular room in the center of the house. This apartment has, on the left, a broad staircase, and on every side are draped doorways and any number of quaint and effective belongings not usual to the conventional corridor. The walls are tinted a delicate buff, and the woodwork, including a graceful arch through the center, is carved and painted white. Several fine pictures hang upon the walls, notably, "The Fortune-teller," a bit of rich Oriental coloring.

Palms in huge jars rise plume-like in nooks and corners, and all about are carved benches and odd chairs, while a double-sided couch makes a cozy lounging place in front of the hearth. The mantel, in white wood and yellow tiling, is extremely pretty, but very simple in its adornments, which consist of a brass clock, two brazen sconces, and some vases filled with cut flowers. Above the mantel is a portrait of General Grant, painted early in the war, which suggests much of his rugged force of character. A curious fender has been evolved from two spent shells, linked together by a brass chain, and bearing the inscription: "Souvenir of the Siege of Paris. Fired from the Prussian batteries on the heights of Meudon." An elaborate hammered brass chest for wood fills one corner, and completes the hearth furniture, which is all of polished brass.—Democrat's Family Magazine.

Lost Both Ways.

Old Rounder (to chum)—What's the matter professor, you look downhearted this morning?

Professor—I am. I had a dime and I tossed it: up to see whether I would have coffee and rolls or whisky straight.

Old Rounder—Ha, ha, ha! You lost the whisky I suppose?

Professor—I lost the dime: it rolled down the culvert.

Railway Legislation.

We copy from the Official Guide a list of bills affecting inter-state commerce and railway management, which have been introduced in Congress during the present session and are now pending:

SENATE.

S. 208.—Mr. Spooner, Wisconsin.

To regulate commerce carried on by telegraph. Puts telegraph lines under the Inter-State Commission.

S. 399.—Mr. Wilson, Iowa.

To amend Section 3 of the Act to Regulate Commerce by adding thereto words which prohibit the transportation into a state of any article the manufacture and sale of which is prohibited by that state; but not the transportation of the article through the state.

S. 545.—Mr. Hale, Maine.

To protect the rights and natural advantages of United States seaports and connecting railways by regulating the entry into the United States of goods imported through a port thereof and destined to a point in Canada, or imported through a Canadian port and transported through the United States to a point in Canada, and by regulating the transportation through Canada of articles domestic in the United States and destined to a point in the United States, or destined to a point in Canada after re-entry and passage through the United States.

S. 749.—Mr. Plumb, Kansas.

To prevent the issues of passes to official persons.

S. 1643.—Mr. Regan.

To amend Section 9 of the Act, and thereby provide one of two remedies for any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any common carrier subject to provision of the act, by either making application to Commission or bring suit in District or Circuit Court of United States or in any court of any State, Territory or District of Columbia of competent jurisdiction, but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies.

S. 2113.—Mr. George, Mississippi.

To protect employes and servants engaged in foreign and inter-state commerce.

S. 2713.—Mr. Ingalls, Kansas.

To amend the act, making it illegal to transport intoxicating liquors into states or territories whose laws forbid, &c.

S. 2818.—Mr. Paddock, Nebraska

To amend fourth section of the act, to provide further that if in the investigation of any kind or character of complaint, claim or proceeding for any infraction of this section, it should appear from the evidence that the product transported is one of the necessities of life, such as grain or its products, for the purpose of food, is intended for consumption or export and unavoidably subject to a long haul to reach a market, and that upon it a justly lower rate is indispensably necessary in order that such product or commodity be transported from point of origin to destination and marketed under existing conditions of trade, then such rate, so far as long and short haul clause is concerned, shall be considered an exception to the general rule indicated in this section, and Commission shall make an order accordingly. A long haul within the meaning of its amendment for such product shall be five hundred miles or more by route over which freight is actually transported from point of origin to destination, both points being within the United States.

S. 2953.—Mr. Paddock, Nebraska.

To repeal the fourth and fifth sections of the act.

S. 3173.—Mr. Cullom, Illinois.

Amending twelfth section, to provide for attendance of witnesses, production of documentary evidence which was required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing, and for the taking of testimony by deposition in the United States and foreign countries.

S. 3292.—Mr. Hoar, Maine.

To secure the safety of freight cars employed in inter-state commerce by use of proper couplers, freight train brakes and other appliances prescribed by the Inter-State Commerce Commission.

S. 3637.—Mr. Blair, New Hampshire.

For the protection of common carriers of the United States, doing business in competition with common carriers of foreign countries, by land and sea.

S. 3640.—Mr. Cullom, Illinois.

Amending the nineteenth section, providing for appointment of special agents having authority to administer oaths to witnesses, and examine them under oath, also to examine the books, records and accounts of such common carriers.

S. 3665.—Mr. Allison, Iowa.

For the protection of property, trainmen and other railroad employes in handling locomotive engines, freight trains and freight cars engaged in inter-state commerce.

S. 3692.—Mr. Cullom, Illinois.

To regulate the use of safety appliances for railroad cars.

S. 3708.—Mr. Sherman, Ohio.

Relative to the transportation of oil, &c., in barrels and tank-cars.

S. 3717.—Mr. Vest, Missouri.

That all common carriers subject to the provisions of "An Act to Regulate Commerce," approved February 4th, 1887, are hereby prohibited from making any unjust or arbitrary discrimination as to the transporting of improved or palace cattle cars furnished by owners or shippers of cattle for the carrying therein of cattle over the roads of said common carriers, either by refusing to receive and transport said cars, or by refusing to pay the same mileage for the use of said cars as may be paid by said carriers for the use of refrigerator or other cars belonging to shippers carrying dressed beef or live cattle over their roads," &c.

S. 3731.—Mr. Vest, Missouri.

Regulating commerce carried on by express.

S. 3754.—Mr. Hoar, Massachusetts.

For the protections of persons engaged in the service of railways.

S. 3773.—Mr. Gorman, Maryland.

Obligation of railroads operating lines between the United States and foreign countries to obtain license or permit to engage in such business from the Commission, &c.

S. 3786.—Mr. Quay, Pennsylvania.

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates of transportation, and a permit to carry a weight of sample baggage in excess of the amount allowed the ordinary traveler, to commercial travelers, whether employer or employee, who travel to sell merchandise for a wholesale business, taking orders from dealers for goods for subsequent delivery."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

H. R. 197.—Mr. Post, Illinois.

To amend Section 22 so as to add thereto the following, to-wit: Provided that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to commercial travelers, whether employer or employee, who travel to sell merchandise for a wholesale business, taking orders from dealers for subsequent delivery.

H. R. 298.—Mr. Kerr, Iowa.

To amend the inter-state law so as to provide that it shall be unlawful for any railroad company subject to the provisions of said act to transport into any state any article of commerce which the railroads of such state are limited or restricted in transporting, without first complying with the restrictions placed by the state laws on the railroads of such state, and such prohibition shall apply to any express company now or hereafter subject to the provisions of said act.

H. R. 329.—Mr. Anderson, Kansas.

Prohibiting the use of railroad and other passes and of telegraph franks by members of the Congress and Judiciary of the United States, &c.

H. R. 397.—Mr. Blanchard, Louisiana.

Providing an additional section to be known as Section 25, entitling citizen making complaint to all fines and penalties that may be imposed.

H. R. 438.—Mr. Morse, Massachusetts.

To repeal fourth and fifth sections.

H. R. 501.—Mr. Lind, Minnesota.

To amend fourth section, further providing that it shall also be unlawful to charge and receive any greater compensation per ton per mile for contemporaneous transportation of same class of freight for a longer than for a shorter distance over same line, in same general direction, or from same original point of departure or to same point of arrival; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier to charge as high rate per ton per mile for a longer as for a shorter distance, &c.

H. R. 3806.—Mr. Peel, Arkansas.

To regulate and limit charges of express companies.

H. R. 3946.—Mr. Breckinridge, Arkansas.

Railroads, steamboats and other public carrier, and express companies, to comply with restrictions of state or territorial laws in transportation of any article, such as wine and liquors, or any other article.

H. R. 4564.—Mr. Anderson, Kansas.

To declare the duties, enforce the obligations, and regulate the service of railroad companies as carriers of inter-state commerce, &c.

H. R. 5872.—Mr. Bliss, Michigan.

Empowering the Commission to make special rates for members of the Grand Army of the Republic in attending their annual national encampments.

H. R. 6950.—Mr. Flower, N. Y.

Regulating railway appliances.

H. R. 6957.—Mr. Adams, Illinois.

To regulate commerce among the several states, in respect to national banks, bills of exchange, &c., &c.

H. R. 6959.—Mr. Adams, Illinois.

To regulate commerce among the several states in the purchase and sale of goods, merchandise, &c., establishing relation of creditor and debtor, &c.

H. R. 8193.—Mr. Baker, New York.

To amend Section 12, further providing for the taking of testimony by deposition in this country and foreign countries.

H. R. 8205.—Mr. Baker, New York

To amend Section 22, making it legal to reduce rates to members of the Grand Army of the Republic with their families in attending encampments.

H. R. 8278.—Mr. Baker, New York.

Free transportation, ticket brokerage, &c.

H. R. 8546.—Nr, Coruth, Kentucky.

To amend Section 22, making it legal to give reduced rates to commercial travelers selling merchandise for wholesale business.

H. R. 8677.—Mr. McClammy, North Carolina.

To amend Section 10, providing that every common carrier shall connectly weigh and classify all property delivered at the station where such property is first delivered, and freight shall be charged thereon in accordance with such weight and classification, and no property shall be re-weighed for purpose of any additional charge of freight by carrier shipping or receiving said property.

H. R. 9014.—Mr. Rogers, Arkansas.

To define and regulate the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

H. R. 968s.—Mr. Henderson, Iowa.

For protection of property, trainmen, and other railroad employes in handling locomotive engines, freight trains and freight cars engaged in inter-State commerce.

H. R. 20048.—Mr. Boutelle, Maine.

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize any sale of or traffic in intoxicating liquors in any State contrary to the laws thereof.

Coupler Legislation.

A bill by Mr. Allison, for the protection of property, trainmen and other railroad employes in handling locomotive engines, freight-trains, and freight-cars engaged in interstate commerce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, person or persons operating any line of railroad, or for any car or transportation company using or leasing freight-cars engaged in interstate commerce, to put into such use any new cars, or cars that have been sent to the shops for general repairs, or when either of whose draw-bars need to be replaced with new ones, that are not equipped with safety automatic couplers or draw-bars, such as will not necessitate the going in between the ends of the cars to couple or uncouple them, but which will automatically couple themselves, and can be uncoupled from the sides of the cars.

SEC. 2. That after January first, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, or persons operating a railroad, or any transportation company using or leasing cars of any description used in interstate commerce, or in the construction of any interstate railroad, to have in such use for the transportation of freight, or passengers, or both, any car not equipped with the said safety automatic couplers.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, person, or persons operating any line of railroad to use any locomotive engine in the work of interstate commerce upon any railroad, or in any railroad yard, after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, that is not equipped with a proper and efficient power brake, or what is known among railroad men as a "driver brake."

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation, company, or person operating a line of railroad in the work of interstate commerce to run any train in such work after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, that shall not have enough cars in such train equipped with some kind of power or automatic brake, so that the engineer upon the locomotive can control the train, as passenger trains are now controlled by the engineer, without requiring brakemen to go between the ends or on top of the cars to use, as now, the common hand brake.

SEC. 5. That any corporation, company, or person operating a railroad and engaged in interstate commerce, using a locomotive engine or running a train of cars or using a freight-car or "way-car" contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine of not less than five hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars for each and every offense; and any railroad employee injured by such engine, train, or car contrary to the provisions of this act shall not be considered as waiving the right to sue and recover damages for personal injuries by having remained in the employ of such corporation, company, or person running such engine, train, or car contrary to the provisions of this act; and in any civil action brought against such corporation, company, or person by any employee thereof for damages resulting from a personal injury received by the plaintiff in the coupling or uncoupling of cars, or from a lack of such proper and efficient automatic brakes as contemplated in this act, while in the employ of such corporation, company, or person, if it shall be established by evidence upon the trial that either of the cars which the plaintiff was endeavoring to couple or uncouple when such injury was received was then and there in use by the defendant in violation of any of the provisions of this law, the fact that the injury to the plaintiff was caused in whole or in part by the neglect or carelessness of any other of the defendant's employees, or that the plaintiff's negligence or carelessness contributed to the injury, shall not be any defense to the action or received in evidence, but that one of said cars or engines was then and there in use on said railroad, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of gross carelessness on the part of the defendant.

SEC. 6. That it shall be also the duty of the Interstate Commissioners to require all corporations, companies, and persons engaged in interstate commerce as common carriers to report annually under oath the number of cars used in such commerce, and what number equipped with automatic couplers, such as are contemplated in this act, and what kind and the number of each; also the number of engines used in such commerce, and the number equipped with a "driver brake," and the kinds and number of each used; and also the number of cars equipped with power or automatic brakes, and the kind used, and the number of each, all of which shall be included in their annual report.

SEC. 7. That whenever any railroad company, corporation, person, or persons engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce or any railroad shall have equipped their rolling-stock, either prior to or by the time of the dates fixed in this law, with such automatic safety appliances as contemplated in this act, such corporation, company, person, or persons may lawfully refuse to receive cars for transportation over their own lines, or for switching purposes, from lines of connecting roads that are not equipped with such automatic safety appliances as will work, interlock, and interchange automatically with the system of automatic couplers and brakes in use on its own rolling stock.

SEC. 8. That this act, being deemed of great immediate importance, shall take effect upon its approval by the President.

A bill by Mr. Cullom, to regulate the use of safety appliances for railroad cars.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of all common carriers by railroad that are subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce to supply and use automatic car couplers upon all freight cars employed in the business regulated by said act, which couplers shall be substantially uniform in pattern and of ascertained adaptability and convenience for the service; and it shall be unlawful for any such common carrier to use any freight car not supplied with such couplers after the time to be designated therefor as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of securing uniformity in the use of such car couplers and the most approved character of coupler, the President of the United States is authorized to appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate a board of five competent persons three of whom shall have practical knowledge of the operation of railroads and two of whom shall have mechanical knowledge of car construction, and none of whom shall be interested in any patent for safety appliances. It shall be the duty of the board so appointed to make careful investigation of car couplers in use and of designs for couplers not in use, to fully test all such couplers practically, and determine by such investigation and comparison what type or character of car coupler is best adapted for safety and convenience in its use on freight cars, and to make report of their determination and conclusions to the Interstate Commerce Commission, recommending therein the type or character of coupler found by them, or a majority of them, to be best adapted for use, and designating at what time such coupler shall be supplied and put in use upon freight cars. Such report shall be made and filed as herein required within one year from the time that the said board shall enter upon its duties. Any vacancy in said board shall be filled as hereinbefore provided. The board shall have power to take testimony, either collectively or by any of its members, and for that purpose any of its members may administer oaths to witnesses.

Each member of said board shall receive an annual salary of three thousand five hundred dollars, payable in the same manner as the Interstate Commerce Commissioners. The board shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties. Witnesses summoned before the Commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States,

SEC. 3. That if the type or character of car coupler approved and recommended by said board as aforesaid shall be patented, the board may agree with the owner of the patent upon a price, to be approved by the Commissioner of Patents, to be paid by the government for the relinquishment of the patent, so that its use may be free to all; and in case of the refusal of the owner of the patent to relinquish the same for a reasonable compensation, the board may select another coupler.

SEC. 4. That when the report of said board shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, said Commission shall cause the same to be printed and printed copies to be served upon the common carriers by railroad subject to the act to regulate commerce, and the carriers so served shall thereupon comply with the recommendations therein contained.

SEC. 5. That every common carrier so served that shall neglect or refuse to comply with the recommendations of said report, either as to the type or character of coupler to be used or as to the time the same shall be put in use, shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars a day for every car used by such carrier that shall not be supplied with such couplers, to be sued for and recovered in the name and for the use of the United States, by the Attorney-General of the United States, or under his direction; and every such common carrier that shall fail or neglect to supply its freight cars with such couplers in accordance with said report shall also be liable to an action by any employe injured, or by the legal representatives of any employe who may be killed by reason, in whole or in part, of a defective or unsuitable coupler, Any such action may be brought in any circuit or district court of the United States, within the circuit or district in which the injury occurred, or in which the injured person is, or the person killed was, a resident; or may be brought in any court of competent jurisdiction in a State or Territory; the amount recovered for damages in any such act shall not exceed five thousand dollars.

SEC. 6. That the board provided for by this act shall also make investigation and report, separately, whether other safety appliances for freight cars, especially automatic or power brakes, are feasible in the handling and use of such cars, and if the board shall so find, that it shall recommend what brake, or other safety appliance, it shall deem best adapted for use; such report to be subject to the further action of Congress.

SEC. 7. That the sum of — dollars is hereby appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act.

Old Versus New Locomotive Boilers.

In a paper read before the New England Railroad Club, Mr. H. L. Beach said: The question is often asked, at what age should a locomotive boiler be condemned? In answer to that I have to say that the safety of a boiler does not depend as much on its age as upon the material out of which it is constructed. Our locomotive boilers were formerly constructed wholly of iron. It was a great innovation when steel was substituted for iron, and it was believed by many of our best mechanics that steel could not be used successfully in the manufacture of boilers; but it has been found that steel can be made which has more of the qualities that constitute good boiler material than iron, and now all of our locomotive boilers are made of it. There have been many good boilers made of iron. There are iron boilers in locomotives in use to-day on some of our New England roads that are more than 30 years old, and they are good boilers yet. The first boiler built for a locomotive by the Hinckley Locomotive Works, more than 50 years ago, was cut up four or five years since, and then not because of its age or because it was defective. I understand there is a boiler in use to-day on the New York & New England railroad, which came out of a locomotive which was imported from England many years ago for the Boston & Providence road when the senior Griggs was master mechanic. There are other locomotives less than a dozen years old, which have boilers of iron that are hardly safe to be used. Some of these are being replaced by new boilers, and all the others which were manufactured about the same time are to have extensive repairs in order to make them safe. What makes this great difference in the durability of these boilers? There are two reasons. One of the reasons is that 20 to 30 years ago locomotives were not required to perform so much work as they are at the present day and the boilers were not required to carry such a high pressure of steam. But probably the quality of the material out of which the boilers were constructed, was very much better in these old boilers than in the later ones. There is a greater variation in the quality of steel plates than in iron. When iron is reworked it improves the quality, but such is not the case with steel, and plates that are made in whole or in part of remelted scrap steel cannot be depended on as being the best for boilers. It is for the best interests of the railroads of this country to insist that the material for the boilers of their locomotives shall be made wholly from new stock. It is not economy to use poor material because it is cheap, and I am happy to know that most of the managers of our roads act upon that principle and purchase the best, realizing that it will be cheaper in the end.—Railway Age.

One of the most disastrous wrecks to the Atlantic & Pacific railroad occurred Friday evening, May 30, two miles west of its junction with the Sante Fe railroad. A train of double-decked cars loaded with some five thousand fine merino mutton sheep, on the way from California to the Chicago market, was wrecked by the breaking of a truck. Every car but two was destroyed, and about one thousand sheep killed outright. The Indians of the neighborhood worked all night skinning carcasses. They will have mutton for months to come.

An experimental engine was a short time ago built for the Baltimore & Ohio Company by the Baldwin Locomotive Works of Philadelphia, with a guarantee that it would haul seven passenger coaches up a grade 117 feet to the mile at the rate of twenty-five miles per hour. The actual work of this engine not only shows that she can more than fulfil the guarantee, but can haul an additional car up the grade at the speed specified. The Company is well satisfied with her. She is a ten-wheeled engine with cylinders 21x26.

The Union Pacific employees will stand by Dickenson to a man. None who will talk believes for a moment that Brinkerhoff will have anything but a temporary position as successor to Dickenson, and many are ready to name the man who will take the place of J. S. Tebbets, the general freight agent in that city, and formerly division freight agent in Kansas City.

Tebbetts went from Kansas City as the general passenger agent, but for some reason he was transferred to the position of general freight agent immediately after Monroe had been made assistant general traffic manager.

He is said to be a relative of Charles Francis Adams, the president of the road, and for reasons which the federation now organizing thinks sufficient, he has no right to any such preferment. The whole affair is creating a great interest in the outcome.—Sioux City Times.

Wanted a Family.

He strolled into a down-town oyster saloon yesterday afternoon with tears in his eyes and beer and other stuff in the deepest recesses of his stomach.

"I'm sad," he began to the man who didn't seem to have much to do, "and I want your assistance."

"You look as though you needed some assistance," said the oyster man. "and if you don't get out of here I'll give it to you."

"Sir, would you kick a man whose family has driven him from his own home?"

"Have you got a family?"

"I haven't now, and that is just what I'm doing here. I want to consult you."

"What about?"

"About a family. You see my old family has given me the cold shoulder and I want to get another family. Are you on?"

"I can't help you."

"Then you had better take your sign down."

"What sign?"

"Why that sign, 'Families Supplied.' A man who advertises to supply families and can't do it when called upon had better go out of the business."

And the man took a handful of crackers and slowly walked out of the door.—N. Y. Dispatch.

Where are the Other Fellows?

Rural—Who is that long-haired chap with the short stick in his hand, away up there near the band?"

Miss Hauton—That is Herr Nikisch, the conductor."

Rural—Well! well! But say! Where's the brakeman and the baggage-master? Don't they get a show at this kind of a racket?

Country Editor—"Conductor, could you manage me a pass over to Halifax?"

Conductor—"I'm afraid not. The days of the passover are done."

THE "INDEPENDENT" ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS.

Again has the "the mountain labored and brought forth a mouse," but this time it is a mouse of such infinitesimal size, such insignificant proportions and so entirely disproportionate to the preparations made, that it creates more than usual surprise. This "independent" association would be unworthy the slightest notice on our part, were it not for the dishonorable and dishonest methods of some of the men engaged in it. In the last issue of THE CONDUCTOR we gave some facts in regard to Messrs. Chittendon and Ostrander, and in another portion of this issue we give some facts in regard to the man who is now the president of this "independent" organization.

The men who are, and have been prominent in organizing this "independent" order, but a short time ago, were bitterly denouncing other men for appropriating, almost bodily, the title of the Order of Railway Conductors, yet they unblushingly appropriate it entire, simply prefixing, to it the word "independent" in order, if we are to judge by their acts, to call particular attention to their sycophancy to railroad officers. The writer has been accused of doing certain things to please railway officers and of being subservient to them regardless of the interests of employes; we have no apologies to make for anything that we have done, and we repeat that there should always be a friendly feeling between railway employes and the officers of railways and when this feeling is lacking through the fault of the conductors, no one will be found more ready to censure than THE CONDUCTOR, but we do not believe that friendly relations should be maintained at the expense of the manhood of the employe, and whenever any employe, whether he be a conductor, trainmaster or superintendent, sacrifices the interests of his fellow-employes or of those under him, merely to maintain friendship with, or curry favor from superiors, no one will condemn quicker than THE CONDUCTOR. We challenge any man on earth to show any such spirit on the part of the writer or a word or action looking towards it. We have, by force of circumstances, been compelled to take part in differences between the Order and its members and other associations, but no one can say that we have ever urged that certain action should or should not be taken because "superintendents who are members will withdraw," or because "we will lose the friendship of the railways." In the published reports of the organization of this "independent" order, we find the division that boasted of "five superintendents who would withdraw" was on hand, while superintendents Nash and Griffiths took an active part. It is not to be understood that THE CONDUCTOR condemns Messrs. Nash and Griffiths because they are superintendents, nor yet because they wish to leave the Order and from its previous knowledge of Nash, THE CONDUCTOR believes that he has taken the honorable course and withdrawn from the Order before engaging in a futile effort to injure it; if he has not, we shall be very much disappointed and surprised. We are not surprised that Wheaton should act dishonorably as that is the most prominent characteristic of the man.

We can readily understand why on some roads, superintendents should deem it somewhat inconsistent for them to retain membership in the Order and act in an official position at the same time, for under some managements no man can fulfill his obligations as a member and comply with the wishes of the management, and we admire the member who, in a letter to this office says, "I must withdraw, for I feel that under the present circumstances, I cannot do my duty to both the members of the Order and the company as an officer." We are not surprised that some officers should endeavor to form an association and injure the Order; it merely demonstrates that their interests are not with the conductors so much as in other directions. It is too, a notable fact, that the opposition to the Order of Railway Conductors comes almost wholly from railway officers or from members who are directly influenced by officers, and in many instances, from officers of roads that have used the Order and forgotten its existence as soon as possible thereafter.

Among the "prominent" men who assisted the superintendents in New York the other day, we note J. Y. Levensgood, President of the "Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company." For some time past, Mr. Levensgood has been trying to find a society or a lot of conductors who would buy or take as a gift his "Life Insurance Company." He tried to induce Howard of the B. of R. C. to take pity on his orphan, but failed, and now wants the "independent" superintendents to do it. The history of the Philadelphia Insurance as it was popularly known, is too recent to need repeating, suffice to say, that some of its officers and members commenced an attack on the Order; it held but one annual convention afterward and for the past two or three years, Mr. Levensgood has been trying to find some one that would add a company to the "valuable" charter he holds as "President of the Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company." A member of the Benefit Department came to the office of the Order about two years ago and when he paid his assessment said "I am going to drop my insurance as it costs too much." He was asked where he could get cheaper insurance and answered "Almost anywhere, the Mutual Aid and Benefit or the 'Philadelphia.'" He was shown the report of the M. A. & B. and the status of the Philadelphia, and was astonished. "Why," said he, "I came west on Bro. Levensgood's train last week and he told me that the order insurance was costing more than any other, and that he was going to drop out of it right away, and he said that the Philadelphia was a good deal the best and cheapest." When our readers are informed that Levensgood was never a member of the Order insurance, they will better appreciate the anecdote.

The report of this organization says, "the committee reported in favor of calling the organization the 'Independent' Order of Railway Conductors, and practically adopted the ritual of the old order." Thus they start out with the declaration that they either lack originality enough to find a name without stealing ours or else that they adopt ours in the hope of deceiving some one and thus profiting by the reputation of the Order of Railway Conductors. By the adoption of our ritual they confess that they have not among them ability enough to originate a ritual, but must also steal that. It will probably be the same with their laws; they will take a copy of our constitution, insert the word "independent," and have a full set of laws to start with. We find by the further report that C. S. Wheaton was "unanimously" elected president, and that he is also secretary, treasurer and executive board, and this fact alone dissolves all feeling of resentment that we might otherwise have against the seceders; with Calvin Selah at the front, and with no controlling power over him, their punishment will be hard enough without any effort on the part of any one else; it will more than "fit the crime."

It is further stated in this report that Mr. Wheaton was opposed to making any change in regard to the strike clause at Rochester; Wheaton himself alleged as a reason for the withdrawal of his name as a candidate for re-election; that he could not be a candidate on account of the "change of principles," and this is being paraded in the public press as convincing proof that he is a strictly honest, conscientious man, who would sacrifice every personal advantage rather than do violence to his convictions. There lies before me as this is written a letter dated March 8, 1890, in his own handwriting and uncopied, with the well known signature, in which occurs the following: "I do think we ought to 'get rid' of the strike clause," and particular attention is called to it by its being underscored. It was written to a man whom he knew to be in favor of "getting rid" of it and who lived in Texas. Further along occurs this sentence, written while the strike clause was yet in effect, before it had been stricken out, and while he as Grand Chief Conductor had taken a solemn oath to enforce its laws: "I HAVE BEEN WORKING ALL THE YEAR JUST AS IF NO STRIKE CLAUSE WAS IN THE RITUAL."

The fact is, that for the past six months he was working very hard for a re-election, and when with those who favored "getting rid" of the strike clause he was in favor of it, and when with those who was opposed to it he opposed, and he is on record on both sides in at least a dozen places, and when publicly charged with it in the meeting at Philadelphia and also in the Grand Division, he did not dare deny it; had he denied it in Rochester, the letter above quoted from would have been presented to the Grand Division, as the member to whom it was written was present, and wanted to read it anyway, but was persuaded not to do so, because it would be "kicking a man who was down." He was then, and has been all the time, "anything to get the coon," and it was only when he found that his election could not be accomplished by any possibility that he made virtue of necessity and assumed the roll of a martyr to his convictions and "could not accept on account of change of principles." It has been generally assumed that all those who were with the minority on the strike question were in favor of Wheaton's re-election, but this is not true. A large majority of the "66" were more bitterly opposed to Wheaton than to the repeal of the "strike clause," among them such men as Bolles, Evans, and many others, who perhaps would prefer not to have their names mentioned.

Another feature with many of the seceders, illustrative of the honor (?) of some of them is the fact that they propose to retain their membership in the insurance of the Order of Railway Conductors while they are making their Brobdingnagian efforts to destroy the association itself. They expect to retain the financial benefit while acting the part of traitors and after having violated laws that they have sworn to obey. In this they are reckoning without their host, and they may rest assured that those who were active in procuring the incorporation of the Order under the laws of Iowa, did not leave it in a situation so that it could be compelled to sustain its enemies. When the proper time comes to act, action will be taken that will demonstrate to all such dishonorable men that "the best laid plans of mice and men gang aft a'glee."

VALE MR. CORBIN.

We note by the papers that Mr. Corbin has resigned the presidency of the Philadelphia & Reading, and that Gen. Manager McLeod is to be elected to the place. Those who weep over the retirement of Mr. Corbin will be very few and far between. Under his presidency, the road has continued the policy inaugurated by Mr. Gowen, of persecuting its employes and interfering with their private rights. Whether this policy will be continued by Mr. McLeod or not, is a question for the future. We believe, that if the matter rests with Mr. McLeod, that there will be a material change in the policy in this respect. It is however, somewhat doubtful as to whether the president has any discretion in the matter and we should not be very much surprised if it should prove that even Mr. Corbin was not really to blame for the matter, and that he was merely carrying out the orders of his superiors; if this is the case, then no improvement may be looked for, and whether or not he was primarily at fault, Mr. Corbin must bear the blame for the persecutions and petty tyrannies inaugurated during his management just as president McLeod will have to shoulder the blame if the policy is continued. We believe that Mr. McLeod is not the kind of a man that will willingly continue the present state of affairs on the Reading, still, if our memory serves us correctly, Mr. Corbin was well liked during his management of the Long Island, and at that time no one would have thought of accusing him of any tyrannical abuse of employes. Opportunity some times develops traits of character in men that has never been suspected. Mr. R. B. Cable has the reputation of being a fair man who endeavors under all circumstances, to be just to employes under him, yet if he used language that is attributed to him in carrying out Whiskerandos Bonzano's order, he is becoming tainted with the Reading infection and if correctly quoted, has used language that would do credit to Bonzano himself. None of Mr. Cable's many friends will blame him for enforcing an order issued by his superiors, but if he does it in other than a gentlemanly way and with the use of undignified threats, his past record will not retain for him, the present friendship of the many conductors who know him.

CALVIN "SELAH."

While this article appears in the editorial department of THE CONDUCTOR, I wish it distinctly understood that it is not properly editorial, and that the person who bears the name signed to it is wholly and solely responsible for it and the singular personal pronoun will be used instead of the editorial "we."

It is a common expression among mankind in expressing astonishment at any unlooked for event that "nothing in the future can astonish" and I have several times used this expression in relation to actions of the man whose predestinarian, restful patronymic adorns the top of this page, and used it in all sincerity, but notwithstanding the fact that over a year ago I predicted that in case he was not re-elected Grand Chief Conductor of the Order, he would use his best efforts to be made the leader of a group of secessionists, and notwithstanding the fact that his talk and actions at Rochester were all confirmation strong as holy writ of the prediction, I must yet confess to a slight feeling of surprise, that the man, knowing as he knows, the indisputable evidence of his raciality, that is on record in his own handwriting as well as in various other ways, should take any chances of having it made public, and the only hypothesis on which I can assume his action to be based, is that he thought if he would again "humbly apologize" and promise "never to do it again," that this, with the addition of the prayers of others "not to persecute an unfortunate man when he is down," would have the same old effect and persuade myself and others to "let the matter go just once more." If his action is based on any such hope or expectation, he will soon learn that it is futile.

It would be better for some reasons that the facts herein narrated should come from some other pen than mine, while on the other hand, there is no other who is quite so well informed as myself. I wish to borrow, by way of illustration, the simile used by a member from El Paso, in illustrating the situation. I find that I am in the situation of a man who has been in bed with a small pox patient for the past three years, and I have believed that circumstances required that I should subordinate my personal interests and feelings in the matter, for what I have in the past thought to be the best for the Order and its members. That I was then mistaken I am now free to admit; that those who, at New Orleans, at Toronto and at Denver, urged that the cancer be lanced, were right, and myself and those who sided with me, wrong, seems to me now to be beyond contradiction; that when I used what little influence I might have possessed against his removal, and urged the Executive Committee not to take such action, on account of the scandal it would occasion and the injury I believed it would do, I was blindly working ill to the order, I am now, by the force of circumstances, compelled to admit. That some members who urged that he should be removed, are now joining him in a Quixotic crusade against the order, and are willing to accept him for the Moses that is to lead them, is one of the things that is a little "pecoolar."

There is so much crookedness in the entire career of the man Wheaton, that it is difficult to say just where it commenced. So many things that at the time of their occurrence were supposed to be mere errors of judgment or a lack of discretion, that in the light of subsequent events are proved to have been intentional falsehood and dishonesty. So many singular occurrences for which, with the entire confidence then existing, his word was taken without any question. The first "peculiarity" that I now remember, was his absolute and invariable habit of making some one else responsible with him for any act that might possibly be questioned. He would invariably consult some one before acting, and then in accounting for it would say, "after consulting with — I did" so and so. A particular instance of this occurred when the Grand Division first authorized the employment of a clerk. Calvin had made the acquaintance of a stenographer at Indianapolis, and seemed to think that this was the only one that could acceptably fill the position. In reply to his letter asking if a position in his office would be accepted, the stenographer replied that the position would be gladly accepted at a salary of $50 per month. Calvin "consulted" me in regard to it and said that he thought he would offer $60 per month. I objected very strenuously to any such a proceeding and asked him if he would do the same if he was paying the clerk from his private funds. He seemingly acquiesced in the objection, but the stenographer was employed at a salary of $60. A little later it was raised, first to $70 and later to $75 per month, in both cases after "consulting" me, and in both cases against my remonstrance. When his report was made to the Grand Division he said, "after consulting Bro. Daniels I employed — at a salary of $60 per month, and after consulting Bro. Daniels the salary was raised to $70 and $75 per month." Not a word about my objections, and while the words were literally true, he told as direct a falsehood as if he had said in just so many words "with the approval of Bro. Daniels." Thinking this but one of the idiosyncracies with which great minds are sometimes afflicted, and loth to do or say anything that would in the slightest degree tend to create any ill feeling, I said nothing and accepted a full share of the responsibility. This course has been consistently and persistently followed by Wheaton during the entire term of his office, and I have, as I am now fully satisfied, blindly and mistakenly permitted it and permitted myself to be burdened by responsibility for every single act of his upon which there was the slightest criticism, while on anything that met general approval he has without hesitation, assumed the sole responsibility even though in many cases, he had not the slightest connection with the matter. He has repeatedly sold out the interests of members of the order in a vain endeavor to win favor for himself with railway officers. This has often been asserted by some members but has heretofore generally been assertion only. One instance, when he was called to Topeka to go with a committee there to see Mr. Sands, he was advised by the committee that they had been fighting the matter of guarantee bonds for over a year and distinctly instructed that they would not listen to any bond proposition that did not include a proposition for a salary in some degree commensurate with the responsibility and arduous nature of their services. After arriving at the office building he was called aside and again impressed with the wishes of the members in the bond matter. After entering the office, the moment the bond question was introduced by Mr. Sands, he said, "that is just what I have been trying to tell them; they ought to give bonds." He came to Cedar Rapids and told me that Mr. Sands had asked the men to file applications for bonds, that no one would be discriminated against on account of failure to get a bond and that in the course of three months the question of wages would be taken up and he would promise them that the pay for passenger conductors would be made not less than $150 per month and probably more. He told this same story in a Union meeting held in Chicago a few days later and repeated it on several other occasions as will be proved if necessary. The facts are that no promise whatever was made by Mr. Sands, except that he would try and have the collectors taken off. The Company had only wanted an excuse for removing the collectors, and were looking for a way of getting easily out of an experiment that they had found disastrous, and thus through the treachery of the Grand Chief Conductor of the Order, members were virtually compelled to perform additional labor, assume additional responsibilities, and accept increased chances of dismissal without a single cent in increased compensation.

After the Executive Committee had begun to learn something of the character of the man, I was directed by them to accompany him to interview the officers of the "Q" and see that he did not sell them out there. In an interview at which Messrs. Stone, Ripley, Eustis, Wheaton and myself were present. Mr. Ripley gave an outline of what was wanted of their passenger conductors, and his ideas of what was necessary to bring about his ideal of passenger service. I said to him, "you must not overlook the fact that the question of pay is the most important factor in this matter, and that you cannot expect to reach your ideal until you pay conductors a reasonable salary." Wheaton interrupted with, "the question of pay does not enter into the case now at all," and as a consequence I withdrew from the matter entirely, went home that night and reported the facts to the Chairman of the Executive Committee.

I did not believe it would be beneficial for the members to have a dispute occur between the Grand Chief Conductor and myself on that question and I would not be connected with anything in the way of treachery to members and their interests. Wheaton admitted the truth of the above statement before the Executive Committee at Rochester, and in the presence of Brother Ed. Hamilton, the only defense or excuse that he made was that he "didn't mean anything," and thought it was for the best interest of members." He gained nothing, for men with ability enough to hold such positions on railways, see through such men as Wheaton and his efforts, and later, when he asked Mr. Stone for a position, the latter had no place for him. He has been usually sharp enough to have no witnesses to his treachery for it was his invariable custom to say to committees, "it will be better for you to wait until I can see Mr. — alone," and he would leave them outside while he betrayed them in secret.

When the matter of the order by Bozano to his men to withdraw from the Order, was taken up, he asked that the Board direct Brother Evans to accompany him to New York to see Mr. Corbin as he wanted some one present so that there would be no room for suspicion of anything on his part that was not straightforward. The Board did so direct and Brother Evans went to New York with him but when he saw Corbin he was alone and Evans was at the hotel.

When the Order first tried the experiment of paying his expenses, the office being located at Cedar Rapids, he included in his bill his board at Cedar Rapids. The Executive Committee refused to allow this as the law provided that his "expenses should be paid while traveling in the interest of the Order" and not while at the office. He was very indignant, but later boasted that the Executive Committee allowed his expenses not only at Cedar Rapids but at Elmira, although they didn't know it. He was at one time on a train on the N. Y. C. when the conductor had some dispute with a passenger. Wheaton gave his card to the passenger and said, "the conductor is wrong and you should report him; if you do, and want any evidence, refer to me." The passenger did report the conductor and referred to the Grand Chief Conductor of the Order, repeating what Wheaton had said to him. Mr. Burroughs sometimes uses a little profanity and it is said he heartily emphasized the language in which he expressed his opinion of Wheaton's conduct in this instance.

What a spectacle for the Grand Chief Conductor to object to the reading of a letter in the Grand Division said to be written by him, because it "would injure him," and he did not know what the letter was, either, but with the guilty consciousness of having written numerous letters betraying those whose money he was taking, he "objected" to its reading. When openly accused of dishonesty in a union meeting at Philadelphia, he did not dare to deny and ask for proof, but prudently kept his mouth shut. When openly accused of falsehood in the Grand Division, by stating in his report that he had procured the reinstatement of Brother Chas. Cornelius, he did not dare deny it or even to make any excuse. While the Order was paying his expenses, he charged them with his expenses in attendance at meetings of the Y. M. B. A., of which he was a member, also for his expenses while attending conventions of the Philadelphia Passenger Conductors Insurance. How he gained admission to the latter has always been a question, as he never was a passenger conductor, although he prates glibly of his "experience" as a passenger conductor. The only passenger running he ever did was to run a few extras or run extra for some regular man who was off for a trip or so. He invariably has charged the Order for "transfers" in Chicago, although for five years has had an annual pass from the Parmelee Company, which, by the way he kept, in company with eleven other annual passes, when he started to keep the appointment in Massachusetts, that would prevent his attending the meeting in New York. The climax in expense bills was reached in the spring of 1888, when a bill was presented containing the following:

"Incidentals, including porters' fees, newspapers, treating congressmen and senators and used to push the bill, $50.00" and this when the same bill contained items for messengers, telegrams, postage, papers, envelopes, transfers and every item that any one could think of as coming under the head of incidentals except the "treating" part. This bill I declined to pay and held it for the Executive Committee to pass upon; it was followed by a second with the following item:

"Incidentals, including carriages, messengers, newspapers, extra postage, and small amounts that could not be kept track of including congressional influence and general shortage after cleaning up and counting all shortage, $75.00," and this too, when the bill contained itemized charges for all incidentals like the first one. This too was held for the Committee, who after a careful examination, unanimously decided that the bills were dishonest and fraudulent but that it would be better under the circumstances to pay them than to give opportunity for the scandal that would ensue if the matter was made public, but they gave the Grand Chief Conductor a thorough overhauling: They like myself were wrong in their idea of condoning crime with the hope of preventing injury by its exposure.

One member of the Executive Committee that made the above decision has used every effort to induce members to leave the Order and send delegates to the meeting which "unanimously" elected this man its president and entire executive board. To relieve myself, I requested the board to adopt the following, which was adopted at the regular meeting in 1888:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Board that under the laws of the Order, the intent and meaning is, that each officer shall be held personally responsible for expenditures of all kinds made by him individually, and that the joint responsibility is only intended to cover expenditures that are jointly made outside of any provided for by law.

Saturday morning, Feb. 25th, 1888, he came into my office and said "The engineers on the "Q" are going to strike: what had we better do?" I replied, "do nothing it is none of our business." He insisted that we ought to do something but I declined to discuss the matter further with him and he went out. In the evening he came in again and repeated his opinion that something ought to be done, and asked me to come down the next day, (Sunday) and talk the matter over. The next day I took special pains not to go to the office and about five o'clock in the evening, he telephoned and asked me if he had not better telegraph to divisions on the line of the road and give them instructions, and also to notify the officers that the members would stand by them. I replied "No, not by any means; you have no business to interfere and you have no right to compromise the members by pledging their services to the company; let them alone and let them act for themselves." Later I learned that the telegrams had been sent before telephoning to me, and a little later came the same old chestnut, "after consulting with Bro. Daniels." My connection with the "Q" strike after that was in behalf of those members of the Order and the Order itself that had been dragged into this strike by the Grand Chief Conductor, who as soon as he learned of the opposition on part of members, got frightened and endeavored to sneak out of the responsibility, and only mentioned the strike in his report at all because he was told that if he did not, the whole truth would be told; then after arriving at Toronto, the first thing that he did was to make a bargain with certain of his friends by which he was not to read his report and was to aid them in placing the whole responsibility upon me. The only thing that prevented the consummation of the bargain was that he did not have the necessary ability and was entirely outgeneraled, confessing himself, afterwards that certain things came to him unexpectedly and surprised him as much as "a slap in the face." He made several absolutely false statements at Denver in his pitiful whine for charity and a gift of a thousand dollars, and I have been severely criticised for permitting them to go unchallenged but those who criticise must certainly acknowledge that I would have been in a peculiar position had I precipitated a "racket", because of reflections upon myself after urging others not to make any trouble but to let the matter go and give the Executive Committee power to prevent serious mischief bearing "the ills we have" for one short year, rather than "fly to others that we know not of," but no one is now more thoroughly convinced that I was wrong than myself.

During the "investigation" held by the Grand

Chief Conductor on the complaint of Mr. Woodward then superintendent of the "Monon," to which employes of the road were summoned by the aid of Mr. Woodward, the testimony taken was transcribed making a volume of some 200 or 300 pages of manuscript. Soon after it was finished, Wheaton cut out some 40 or 50 pages containing the testimony of Geo. W. Howard, then a member of the Order, with that of some others, and sent them to an employee of the Monon Company, and to my knowledge, they have never been returned. Mr. Woodward called upon me at the office (then in Chicago, and asked to see the testimony taken. I informed him that I could not let him see it. He then informed me that Mr. Wheaton had told him that he could see it any time that he called. I replied that while Mr. Wheaton might show it to him, I certainly should not. Some time later Howard wrote to Wheaton saying that Mr. Woodward had seen the testimony given by him, (Howard) and asking him how it came about. Wheaton's reply to Howard, a copy of which is on file here, was that he did not know, as it had never been shown to any one unless Daniels had shown it, and it had never left the office. This will probably be the first information that Mr. Howard receives, as to how Mr. Woodward came to see the info testimony, and it will also inform Bro. Cutter how the stenographers "gave away" the testimony.

Wheaton is an ignorant, bigoted, bombastic man, over-rated very much by a few others and very much more by himself. He has the merit of being the most illiterate man that ever served in any position in the Order: He is always "curt-chew-us" (Though he knows less of the virtue than he does of the pronunciation of the word,) to any one that he thinks can aid or injure him, that is to their face, civil when he wants a favor, overbearing and insolent to any one that he thinks cannot injure or aid him. As an instance see him on his knees begging the support of Chapman, Forker and others at New Orleans, and using as an argument the fact that if defeated he would not have money enough to get home with, and when his persuasion failed, assailing them with foul-mouthed abuse and threatening to "make life a burden for any one who should succeed him."

I had been pledged for six months previous to support him, and the exhibition there, made me firmly resolve on two things, the first, never to again vote for him under any circumstances; and the second, never to pledge myself in advance to any man. Behold him again after his election, the great "I am" scarcely deigning a civil word to any one. He was then the Grand Chief Conductor and wanted no votes for three years. Note the report made to that Grand Division and see the "please vote for me" in every line, and the absolute absence of a decided position in favor of anything that he had not carefully canvassed and found supported by the members. For more than three months before the meeting, his whole time was devoted to electioneering, and his correspondence was given up to pleadings for support; the lists of "supporters" and "opponents" that was made by him during that time, would discount any ward politicians pre-election estimates by long odds.

His whole career has demonstrated his inability to do anything except to use a little grandiloquent language and make a reasonably fair address, though practically the same address is made to do for all occasions and when any one has heard him once he has heard all that he has to say. In his effort to use many-syllabled words, he not infrequently rivals Mrs. Partington. A fact that is well known to all who are at all familiar with the history of the Order, and his connection with it, is that not a single thing has ever been done by him that has met general approval or benefitted the Order, that has not been first suggested to him by some one else, while on the other hand, not a single thing that has met the general disapproval of members and caused dissatisfaction in our ranks but has been proposed by him and carried out against the advice of others from the "black-list" editorials to the present time. He has on numerous occasions, precipitated something against the advice of others and then when he began to feel the effects of it, with the cowardice inherent in his nature, endeavored to shirk the responsibility and called on others to "help him out" just as in the "black-list" case, and as in the "Q" strike, and when he is taken to task, he does not hesitate to disclaim all connection and accuse some one else of doing it under his name, just as he tried to make Division 183 believe that a letter written by him personally to their Secretary, was written by me over his signature.

The above is but a hasty sketch of a few of the many acts of his official career, and they can be added to almost ad infinitum. Every thing stated above is susceptible of proof and such proof will be forthcoming whenever called for. Who has not heard the man indignantly deny that he "ever offered the services of members in case of a strike", but proof that he has done so is on file here in his own writing.

I do not care to bring into the matter, anything of a personal nature, though free to admit that I am just as likely as any one to be biased by personal feelings and perhaps more so than many and I will not, now at least, give any of the many instances of his false accusations against me personally, nor of the many times that he has confessed himself either a fool or a knave or both, and "humbly apologized" for his acts, only to go out and repeat if he thought there was a chance to do so without being detected.

For myself, in all my connection with the Order as a member or in an official capacity, the only thing that I am heartily ashamed of, is the support that I have given this man in the past, the many times that I have urged others to excuse his wanton neglect of duty, the many excuses that I have offered for it in his behalf and my own neglect to promptly make public his treachery and dishonesty when I first became convinced of it.

WM. P. DANIELS.

SAFETY APPLIANCES.

We give in this issue of THE CONDUCTOR, the text of two bills now pending in the United States Senate compelling railway companies to equip all rolling-stock used in inter-state commerce, with automatic couplers and power brakes and invite the careful attention of not only members of the Order and conductors but trainmen generally, to them for the purpose of comparison. The matter of compulsory legislation in regard to couplers and brakes, originated in Michigan some years ago by the enactment of a law compelling all roads in that state to adopt an automatic coupler; this was followed by Massachusetts, with a law giving the railway commissioners power to direct in the matter. In regard to this we may be in error as it is something that we have not investigated and we simply state our recollection of the matter. The next in order was the preparation of a bill in the office of the Grand Chief Conductor which was presented in the New York legislature and with some amendments, became a law. Next followed Iowa with the bill prepared by Mr. Coffin. The writer has always been and now is, opposed to any state legislation in regard to either couplers or brakes (as well as any "license" legislation) by states, believing it to be productive of more injury than good from the fact that it is likely to lead to a diversity of appliances that would make the life of trainmen more hazardous than with the old link and pin couplers and hand brakes. When the matter was taken up by members of the Order in New York, we did not feel that it was any of our particular business and that we ought not to enter the State of New York and oppose members who were laboring for the enactment of this law, even though a large number of members in that state were also opposed to it, and we replied to all inquiries by saying that while opposed to the legislation, we did not deem it best to make any opposition to it, particularly as the Grand Chief Conductor had been laboring for it and had appeared before legislative committees at Albany, in its behalf. In Iowa, believing that any opposition on the part of the writer would be imputed to other motives than a desire to advance the best interests of trainmen, we made no opposition and it is very apparent that opposition on our part would have had no effect upon the result. The matter was urged by Mr. Coffin with the approval as we understand, of the B. of R. T. In this connection we wish to say that some time since, the writer through misinformation, charged Mr. Coffin with being pecuniarily interested in a patent for an automatic coupler and that this was the reason for his earnestness in the matter of legislation; upon learning that we had been misinformed in regard to that gentleman and that language said to be a quotation from Mr. Coffin had never been used by him, we promptly acknowledged our error and wish to repeat here, that while we have differed with Mr. Coffin as to the best methods to be pursued, and believe that in laboring for state legislation, he has not benefited one cent's interest in any coupler or brake of fitted trainmen in the least, we sincerely believe that he is actuated only by an honest, earnest desire to better their condition, and that he not only any kind, but on the contrary is spending his own money as well as time without hope of any pecuniary reward, and we can further say that in our opinion, he is now on the right road and in asking national legislation, has taken the only path that will be of any benefit to us.

It is more dangerous to couple an automatic and an old fashioned draw-bar together than it is to couple two old ones. When two automatics of different types come together that do not couple interchangeably it is more dangerous than it is to couple two old fashioned couplers together. With the present interchange of cars, it is absolutely necessary that couplers and brakes be uniform, or at least nearly enough so that all that are in use in the United States will couple automatically. If under the different state laws New York adopts some link and pin automatic coupler and Iowa adopts the vertical hook type, the present danger to trainmen is increased: should the Northwestern adopt one type and the "Q" another, and so on, it would still further increase the risk of physical injury to trainmen. In the opinion of THE CONDUCTOR, the only way to provide for safety is by national legislation, compelling the use of a certain type of both brakes and couplers, and in this respect we believe the bill introduced by Mr. Cullom to be a better one than that drawn by Mr. Coffin and introduced by Mr. Allison. The latter bill was endorsed by a very large majority of the members of the last Grand Division, but they were not informed at that time that there were other bills pending. We wish it distinctly understood that THE CONDUCTOR heartily approves this latter bill, and if nothing better can be enacted will give that our hearty support; at the same time, we believe that Mr. Cullom's bill removes some of the objections that can be urged against the other, and that it will meet with less opposition and be more certain of giving that uniformity that is absolutely necessary in order to receive the full amount of benefit.

We believe, however, that Mr. Cullom's bill should be amended so that it will compel the appointing power to recognize the vast army of railway employes who daily use these appliances, and place it out of the power of the President to appoint as members of the board provided for in the bill, any who are not actually practical railway men, and it should distinctly provide that at least two if not three members of the board shall come from the ranks of the men actually employed in train service. We believe the bill should be amended to read, "shall have had not less than five years' experience as a brakeman, conductor or engineer on railways within the United States." The bill now provides that three members of the board "shall have practical knowledge of the operation of railroads," but we have learned by experience that under this language men may be appointed who know as little of train service and requirements as we do of the Chinese language, simply because they may have, at some time, been indirectly connected with a railway.

This is a matter that we think members of the Order should consider and discuss, not only among themselves, but through the columns of THE CONDUCTOR. It is something on which the B. of L. E., B. of L. F., B. of R. T., S. M. B. A. and the Order should be able to "federate" without any articles whatever; there should be unity of opinion among them all, and we certainly cannot see how any can oppose or fail to energetically support any legislation that gives promise of bringing about the desired result. Our personal preference is for the Cullom bill, but we will cheerfully waive that preference and give the mite of our support to the other, if trainmen and employes can be more united in its support than that of any other. There is yet time to have this legislation enacted by this session of Congress, if we will all go to work. Let every member and every employe in railway service read the two bills presented herewith, make up his mind which he prefers, and immediately write to the Congressman from his District and the Senators from his State, saying that while the employes do not wish to impose any unreasonable hardships upon railway companies, nor to ask any legislation that will be unjust to them, that they do insist on some protection to life and limb for themselves as well as for passengers; that you believe the bill presented by Mr. — is preferable; that you demand the enactment of one or the other, and that unless he makes an earnest effort to have one of them passed, he will hereafter meet the solid opposition of the railway employes. Lay aside your politics for this occasion, and work for your wife, your baby and your own life and limb.

We quoted in the last number an article from The Railway Age in opposition to legislation of this character, and characterizing as folly any undertaking to compel railways to equip their rolling stock in "a year or two." The efforts of The Age to create a prejudice against such legislation by incorrect statements should have no effect with employes, and, so far as we know, no one has proposed to compel them to equip in "a year or two"; certainly the employes do not, and the shortest time that we have heard mentioned is five years. While employes are not asking that railways provide the safety equipments "in a minute," neither do they propose to take the unsupported assertion of "one railway manager," that it "would take ten years"; if a careful investigation should show that ten years is not an unreasonable time, the employes and the railway employes' associations will not object to it, but they know that the statements of railway managers, as well as other people, are sometimes slightly biased. If a competent board, after looking into the matter, shall say "ten years," we believe we can speak for every association of railway employes in saying that no one will object; if the board says five years, will railway managers accept it as cheerfully? We do not believe that ten years is required or is necessary, and we do believe that every road handling inter-state traffic can have its stock fully equipped in five years without hardship, yet we are willing to yield cheerfully if competent men decide otherwise. No one wishes to enforce the reform too rapidly, neither should we sit still and see it postponed indefinitely because life and limb is cheaper than safety appliances.

STANDARD TIME.

The Official Railway Guide in a late number, commenting upon the statement of the Astronomer of the Cincinnati Observatory, who asserted that the adoption of standard time "entails endless perplexities," asked its readers to communicate to its office, any "perplexities" occasioned by the use of standard time. In the next number, The Guide says that up to that time, not a single instance had been reported and augurs from that fact that "perplexities" must have existed only in Astronomer Porter's imagination, or else were "discovered by the aid of a telescope, and that they exist upon some of the heavenly bodies" instead of this mundane sphere.

This is to notify Mr. Allen that THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR has a complaint to make and that it has been "perplexed" on more than one occasion and in more than one place: THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR can't always think in time and know exactly how it is that a train can leave a certain point about an hour before it arrives there. On one occasion we strolled leisurely up town to pass the hour of waiting, only to learn later that "standard time" was to blame for our being left and that the train had left on "eastern" time, almost before we were outside of the depot on "central" time. It is true that THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR should not be perplexed and that it should be well enough accustomed to the present standard to enable it to avoid any "perplexities" whatever, but "facts is facts" and THE CONDUCTOR often finds people who are unaccustomed to travel, who are seriously perplexed by this hour of difference in time. THE CONDUCTOR freely admits that the use of standard time is a long step in advance of old methods, and that its adoption reduced the number of places where those perplexities are liable to occur to a few points instead of innumerable ones, and it also freely admits that two standards of time in use at any place is a very great advantage over the use of half a dozen, but it will not be entirely satisfied until we have but one standard for the whole United States, at least so far as railway service is concerned. Why cannot one standard time be used in the little portion of the globe occupied by the United States as well as a single standard on that large portion of it occupied by sea and why is it not just as reasonable too for ships to change their time one hour when they cross, (for instance) the fortieth meridian as for trains to change when they cross the eightieth. And would not the hour "by any other name" answer every purpose?

THE CONDUCTOR breaks its fast at 6:30 a. m. but it would be just exactly as satisfactory if that particular time was called 5:30, 7:30 or any other time that would give us the satisfaction of knowing that when we partook of that meal it was just 5:30 or 7:30 a. m. in every portion of our country, and if that hour was called plain 5:30 or 7:30 without the "a. m.", and we could "homerward wend our weary way" at 18:00, or 16:00 or anything from 1:00 to 24:59, we would be firmly convinced that the acme of convenience had been reached so far as time notation was concerned, and we shall always think that we are behind the spirit of the times until that state of perfection is reached.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL.

It is rumored as we write this, that the strike of the employes on the I. C. has been settled. Superintendent Russell retaining his position, but deprived of the authority to dismiss any one.

With our present knowledge, we cannot but think that the employes acted hastily and without using good judgment. Before censuring them, however, it is but just that the full circumstances should be taken into consideration, and there is no railway employe in the world who does not know that it is in the power of a petty officer on a railway, to persecute the employes in many ways that cannot be distinctly specified, and that if he feels so disposed, he can keep the employes in hot water all the time without giving them any opportunity to make any definite charge.

This seems to have been the case with Mr. Russell: A general disposition to tyrannize over those under him; to make them understand that he was the ring master, to the crack of whose whip they must dance: That the employes had no rights or feelings that he was bound to respect.

The great error of the employes, seems to us to have been that they acted hastily in striking without making a sufficient effort to have their troubles remedied without a strike, and in refusing the request of the officers for fifteen days in which to investigate. Had this fifteen days been given, the employes could have availed themselves of it, to present further evidence and make their case stronger. It is not likely that Russell would have been dismissed after the fifteen days as he appeared to be Herriman's man who is only waiting a decent time to oust Mr. Beck and make Russell general manager, but their case with the public and other employes would have been much stronger.

Mr. Russell claims to be a "good" man, and, of course, he ought to know and be able to decide without any bias. He cites the fact that he has been employed by a large number of roads to prove beyond question that he is a good man and that his services are so extremely desirable that the principle roads are engaged in an energetic struggle as to which shall have them. As a general rule frequent changes of employers is not the best of recommendation for an employe and it is sometimes the case that a man changes his employers frequently because for some reason he cannot stay very long with any, probably however Mr. Russell is the exception that proves the rule.

He farther asserts that each change has been to a better position: If this is true, the position of Division Superintendent on the I. C. must be an extremely desirable one, and we do not blame Mr. Russell for wishing to "hang on". Starting with an official position, making a dozen changes more or less, inside of three or four years, each change being to a better position, and winding up as a division superintendent would naturally lead one to think the betterment must have been by infinitesimal degrees, or that its better to be a superintendent on the I. C. than president of the U. S.

Mr. Russell may be a man who will profit by his experience of the past few days, and if so, the strike will not have been in vain. If, however, he is inclined to be vindictive, nurses his wrath to keep it warm until he supercedes Mr. Beck, and then attempts to take revenge, the I. C. has, probably not seen the last of its trouble.

DANIELS ON WHEATON.

The New York World of Monday says it was reported there that the Order owes Wheaton a large sum yet on his salary. Mr. Daniels says that there has not been three months during the the past five years that Wheaton has not had his salary from one to three months in advance and that he has defrauded the Order on expense bills. There is evidently a racket on hand.—Cedar Rapids Gazette, June 25.

The report that Mr. Wheaton had not been paid all his salary by the Order of Railway Conductors is promptly met by an officer of the Order who declares that Mr. Wheaton has had his salary from one to three months in advance for the past five years, and that he has defrauded the Order on expense bills. This charge is a serious one and Mr. Wheaton should not play the Quay dodge and remain silent. We have known for a long time that the Grand Chief Conductor, recently defeated for re-election was a would-be autocrat, but it is hard to believe that he has intentionally stuffed his expense bills.—Cedar Rapids Gazette, June 25.

Brother Belknap is still improving, and the present prospect is, that readers of THE CONDUCTOR will soon be relieved of the editor pro tem, whereat there will be much rejoicing.

We believe there is a thing or two in this issue which it would be worth a great many dollars to the Order if every member could read. They would be better and more interest-taking members.—The Railway Telegrapher.

Better have 'em learn.

Our friends who send us newspapers with articles to which they wish to call our attention will confer a favor if they will mark the article and thus save us time in looking for it. We sometimes receive a twenty-four page paper with a brief mention in it, which it is wished that we should notice, but owing to the fact that it is not marked, are sometimes obliged to go over the whole of the paper two or three times in order to find it. Send us everything that you think will be of interest to our readers or that pertains to the Order or its members, either individually or collectively, but please mark the articles, and when sending a clipping cut from a paper, please give name and date of paper from which it is taken.

In 1896, a young doctor living in New Orleans, George Howe by name, was commissioned to take the medical charge of a band of free slaves who were to be forwarded to Liberia on the coast of Africa, in accordance with a will left by the planter who had owned them. It transpired, as soon as the ship had fairly cleared the harbor at New Orleans, that the captain and crew of the vessel were determined on slave trading and had undertaken the transportation of the negroes chiefly for the opportunity offered to clear the port under circumstances which should not appear suspicious. The plan was then entered upon to carry out a great slave-hunting expedition. The United States flag was hauled down and thrown overboard wrapped around the ship's papers. The vessel was painted black, the name obliterated, and her identity concealed in every possible way. The course was laid for the mouth of the Congo. The ship ascended the river in October, 1859, passing by the points which of late have been so much written about, and the crew captured or bought 1,200 Congo savages. Many of them were driven into enclosures prepared for the purpose by native chiefs, and secured at a cost of about $8.00 per slave, paid in cloth and beads. Many of the slaves held their breath until suffocated, believing that their spirits would at once return to Africa; but enough were landed to enrich the officers and the crew. Doctor Howe tells the story of the adventure in an article which will be printed in Scribner's.

NOT MUCH OF A SPLIT.

THE RAILWAY CONDUCTORS ARE NOT SERIOUSLY DIVIDED.

The railroad conductors do not take kindly to the movement inaugurated by ex-Grand Chief Conductor Calvin S. Wheaton, in organizing an independent organization. Conductors were found yesterday belonging to the Pennsylvania, New Jersey Central, the Baltimore & Ohio and the Lackawanna systems, bitterly opposed to ex-Chief Wheaton, and who characterized his new movement as a small affair. The fact was developed that the old Order of Railway Conductors is not in the feeble and bankrupt condition that the seceders say it is.

"I am not a member of the Order," said a New Jersey Central conductor, "for I belong to the Brotherhood of Railroad Conductors. We have been hearing a good deal of the causes which led to the split, and from what I can learn the principal one was the manner of conducting business on the part of Wheaton. There is not room for three organizations and I do not believe this Independent Association will succeed."

"If ex-Chief Wheaton and his followers assert that nearly all the conductors on Eastern roads have seceded from the Order, they are misstating facts," said a Baltimore & Ohio conductor. "I am a member in good standing, and shall continue so until I see good reasons for dropping out. It is true some of the men were dissatisfied at first when the rule forbidding members to engage in strikes was stricken out. That was because they supposed that the omission gave power to any division in the central body of officers to order all the members on strike if they saw fit. My personal experience—and I have been a conductor a good many years—has been that train conductors are averse to strikes, and the idea that being members of an order, originally formed for benevolent purposes, made them liable to be ordered out on strike in sympathy with any other body of railroad employes was repugnant to them. But when it was explained and proved that the striking out of this prohibitory clause conferred no power on either the national or local organizations a different feeling prevailed. As the constitution now stands full liberty is accorded to the individual. If a strike occurs among the engineers of a road and any of the conductors are unwilling to run with the new ones they are at liberty to refuse, and should a majority of a division decide to strike their action does not bind the minority. In fact, the omission of the clause gave more liberty, instead of curtailing it. It would take too long to tell the story of the troubles which led to Wheaton's defeat in the Order. In the first place, the Western men are the strongest in numbers, and as they found Wheaton always opposed to legislation they brought forward it was natural that they sought to overrule him."

"It has been said that the Lackawanna division has returned its charter," said a conductor on that road. "The statement is untrue, and most of us continue in full membership. As for Mr. Wheaton, you will find that he has only the New Haven men with him."

"Wheaton has gone out on his train," said a New Haven conductor, "and so has Cutnow. I don't know anything about the new or old order, for I belong to neither of them."

Inquiry among several other conductors on the same road resulted in similar statements.

"Calvin Wheaton was always a hard man to get rid of," said a New Jersey Central conductor, who acknowledged that he is a member of the National Order. "Unless he has his own way he is never satisfied, and being defeated in maintaining his hobby, and seeing that he could not be re-elected chief, he got out, as he has done before. Now he is trying to get up a new order so that he can boss it. We don't care what he does, for I presume there's room for us all. One thing is very certain, there will be no strikes among conductors, for it is against their interest and training to do so."—N. Y. World.

ITS PRINCIPLES UNCHANGED.

(Special to the World.)

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa, June 23.—W. P. Daniels, Grand Secretary of the Order of Railway Conductors, was asked to-day about the split over the abolition of the strike clause in the ritual of the Order. He said the trouble originated with half a dozen men at Rochester, N. Y., who declared they would withdraw and organize another association. The old organization, Mr. Daniels said, has not changed its principles. It has simply declared that each member has a right to his individual opinion and that if he should desire to strike he can do so and not receive the condemnation of the Order. Letters from a majority of the sixty-six men who voted against the abolition of the strike clause have been received at headquarters and with one exception all say they are entirely satisfied with the outcome and that no trouble need be feared.

"It is possible," said Mr. Daniels, "that two or three other divisions may go out, but it will be because they do not fully comprehend the situation. There is absolutely no complaints except from a few places in New England, and I think that back of them will be found the hands of railway officials."—New York World.

A Letter.

W. P. Daniels,

SIR: I regret to learn of your continued illness. I enclose another dose of my infallible pills, and I assure you a persistent use, strictly in accordance with directions, will ultimately restore your equilibrium. In an extended practice I have never known a case of failure. The disease is a relentless foe to humanity. Every vestige of poison may be eradicated from the system by a timely and determined use of the enclosed pill.

Yours in P. F.,

F. A. HERMANCE.

Dose, one pill carefully read, before each meal and upon retiring:

AND THE ENCLOSURE.

Frank A. Hermance, the veteran conductor and one of the best known knights of the punch in New England, was interviewed last night regarding the probable result of the action of the Grand Division of the Order of Railway Conductors, now in session at Rochester, New York, in voting to eliminate the anti-strike clause from the constitution. Frank is a devoted order man and an enthusiastic admirer of the principles upon which the order is founded. He said he believed the era of strikes has passed. There is not on record an instance where a strike in any department of railway service has been in any degree a success. The Order of Railway Conductors was founded away back in the sixties and is now incorporated under the laws of the State of Iowa. It is to-day second in influence to no railway organization. We are indorsed by all railway companies who know us, and are absolutely and positively a no-strike order, believing always that gentlemen should meet gentlemen on equal grounds, and settle all differences as become gentlemen. We desire to raise the standard of the service on all our lines by making the men sober, honest and upright. We teach all to regard the sacred ties of family relations and throw around all a protecting arm. The use of intoxicating liquors is discouraged and no habitual drinker can gain admission. Our members are not allowed to engage in the sale or traffic of it at any time. In a word, we desire to make all our conductors better men socially and morally, and consequently better railway conductors.

Under the leadership of Calvin S. Wheaton as Grand Chief Conductor the Order has prospered beyond precedent. Courteous and gentlemanly, cultured and refined, he has invariably succeeded in securing redress for actual grievances, won the esteem and confidence of railway managers and promoted the welfare of the conductors.

"If this be true, how do you account for the action of the convention?"

"Human nature is frail; men, yes, even conductors, take obligations sometimes, like crackers and cheese. Every delegate who voted at Rochester to eliminate from the obligation the no-strike clause is in my opinion a confessed perjurer, a disgraced member of the fraternity, an incompetent and unreliable railway man, who would walk upon his uppers in thirty days were I a railway manager.

Very many of our members are so situated that they are unable to attend the meetings of their divisions, lose the instruction there imparted, and become the prey of the demagogue. Yes, unfortunately that beast, like the little mosquito, doubtless created for some wise purpose, has an existence in our noble Order. He has taken our obligations, won our confidence, and now saps the life-blood of our organization. We have elevated some to positions of trust and responsibility, honored and paid them from our treasury. They have roamed the country, sowing the seed of disloyalty and treason in our Order, poisoning the minds of honorable men, in their greed for position, sacrificing principle, violating obligations, perjuring their souls. The office-seeking vampire is, in my mind, the most detestable, degraded and poisonous weed in nature."

'What in your opinion is the future of the 'Order, and how can your delegates from New England explain their action?'

'My brother, make no mistake, New England was the birthplace and cradle of American liberty and independence, and grand old Pennsylvania holds to her heart the bell that tolls that fact. The New York Central is on the skirmish line, and New Jersey is in the union. On their boundary is a dead-line over which no disloyal mutineer or violator of his obligations can ever pass. The principles of the Order will be perpetuated, have no fear. Railway owners, managers and employes are one. The demagogue is a mushroom, puffed up in his own conceit, dead in the morning.

MONDAY, June 23, 1889.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I see by this morning's Philadelphia Press and New York Sun that secession was rampant yesterday in New York City.

'Now cry havoc, and let slip the dogs of war,' and there be those who wait to hear the slogan hereabouts, who in the end can say, 'I've fought the fight, I've kept the faith.' We have rejoiced in your utterances in THE CONDUCTOR of June 15th, and confidently expect to find in the next issue your gleaming, trenchant blade lovingly caress somebody's neck in connection with the New York affair. May heaven gird thy loins with strength to do battle against the ungodly.

Yours in the Lord and P. F.,

A SUSPENDED READING MEMBER.

PITTSBURGH, June 24, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR: Allow me through the columns of our journal to mention a worthy act of a St. Louis merchant, Jno. Duff, Esq., of Hart & Duff, the hatters.

On June 20th, arriving in St. Louis on my way to Pittsburgh, and accompanied by other Brothers, we repaired to the above firm in search of some trinkets, soft hats, etc.

On entering we were met by Jno. Duff, who had in his hand a notice of death of one L. D. Pomeroy, who was found dead in bed at a boarding house close to the four courts, and from the effects taken from the body, it was discovered that he held a Division card and was a member of Division 159, City of Mexico.

Mr. Duff had already arranged to go to the morgue to see after the Brother, and if possible locate who he was, and what could be done for him; he wanted the party to go with him but would have been by himself a minute sooner.

Such interest as this is unusual in the common run of business men, especially toward railroad men, and hence I think it worthy of mention.

On our arrival at the police court we inspected the papers, card, etc., and found them to belong to Brother L. D. Pomeroy, and that he had just arrived in the city.

It is said that the unfortunate Brother died of congestion of the bowels, and was apparently at ease on going to bed, but found dead in the morning.

The Chief Conductor of St. Louis, Division 3, took charge of the Brother's remains, notified Division in Mexico, and gave him the benefit of our burial ceremony.

There were papers that showed the Brothers of 159 had made up money and sent him east, evidently on account of his health. He had a small amount of change, a good watch and chain, sleeve buttons, etc., which were taken care of by the coroner.

There was nothing to show that the unfortunate Brother carried any Insurance.

Mr. Duff deserves many thanks for his interest, it being seldom the Order gets a chance to express such in this direction, and I extend to him the well-wishes of Cotton Belt Division No. 252.

W. C. HAZELTINE,
Sec. and Treas.

On account of the information contained, we take the liberty of publishing the following personal letter, criticism and all, and hope the writer will forgive us. The writer is in the main correct in the criticism, and he may rest assured that THE CONDUCTOR will not waste its powder on 'the sightless followers of a 'dead duck,' and after giving members the necessary information, will pursue the same course towards them that it does to other insignificant insects, but it will not criticise the most guilty without giving an opportunity for defense. The statement that Brother Wilkins applied for admission to the New York meeting is false, as he was not in New York at the time of the meeting. They thought he was, and thought that his supposed presence in the city would give an air of probability to the story. They will all be taken care of in due time and placed so they cannot continue to obtain the benefits of the organization they would like to ruin, except as they are benefited by our reputation by appropriating our well-known title and deceiving those not well informed.—Ed.

BOSTON, Mass., June 24th, 1890

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I am today in receipt of THE CONDUCTOR of June 15th, and have read with interest your essays on the conduct of Chitenden, Ostrander and others. Now, while I admit that all you say is true, and not half the truth is told, I want to ask you to consider if "the game is worth the candle." I know they are doing all in their power to injure the O. R. C., and the provocation great to answer in kind, but for all that, consider this: you are pursuing the very course, of all others, they most wish you to. Nothing in the universe pleases them so much as to get "their names in the paper"—as evinced by their readiness to give away anything that they know—and happily that is not much—it seems a mania with them to rush into print. The simple fact of an article being untrue does not in the least interfere with them in their efforts to say something. They are independent of any such small considerations. Then I submit to you that in noticing these further, you are only beating the air and exalting them into notice. It is like pursuing a flea, when you have got your hand on him he isn't there.

I do not wish you to infer that I disapprove of what you have said, I think that all right and necessary to keep the members informed of the truth. But I want you to seriously consider whether further notice of them is consistent with the dignity of this great Order. I am induced to say this, by reading in one of your articles the offer of "these pages" for a reply. I hope you won't dirty the pages of your magazine with anything THEY may say, I mean this in all kindness and for the best interests of the Order, and hope you will so consider it.

I enclose you clippings from the New York World and Boston Herald, (you see how they like publicity) in regard to a meeting held at the Coleman House last Sunday. I haven't any details for not one member of the Order from Boston attended. An invitation to attend a meeting of "True Blues" was treated with silent contempt by 122 and ordered to be thrown into the waste basket by 157. The invite came from Nash.

They must have had a love feast for they wouldn't admit Bro. Wilkins, they didn't want the truth to be told, that would spoil their plans. Poor Wheaton, "to what have the mighty fallen?" He will have to curtail his expenses in order to get along on what that outfit will pay him for his services as president, secretary and treasurer. I wonder does he give bonds?

I would like to ask you will the Order proceed against them for their unlawful acts, and take proper steps to prevent them from longer being able to obtain recognition as members in good standing. It seems to me that longer forbearance is not a virtue.

I congratulate the Order in having secured the services of Bro. Garretson as G. S. C., a good choice which I fully endorse.

Yours truly in P. F.

NEW ENGLANDER.

EXCHANGES.

Dan Honin lost none of his old time vigor and energy by his eastern trip, as the latest issue of The Railway News Reporter shows. We have seen proofs of a part of the special edition, and the member who does not get a copy, makes a mistake.

Wide Awake, St. Nicholas, Scribner and Century for July are on our table, and all merit more notice than our time or space will permit. Every reader of THE CONDUCTOR that has a child at any age from five to twenty-five, should provide it with either St. Nicholas or Wide Awake or both, and no home should be without The Century and Scribner, and we will aid our readers in providing themselves with the very best of reading matter by furnishing any one or all of the above books in connection with THE CONDUCTOR, at very low rates.

The July number of The Cosmopolitan comes to us as bright and sparkling as ever and perhaps we shall not exaggerate if we say that it is a little more so than usual. The publishers of this popular periodical seem determined to stop at nothing that will place it in the front rank of our monthlies, and make it a welcome visitor at the home of all who care for a bright, clean family magazine.

The July number opens with a story of high life in the dominions of the Shah, finely illustrated. A Flying Trip Around the World, Three Great Training Schools and Court Life at Versailles, all illustrated, follow in succession. Mrs. Roger A. Pryor tells us something of American Society, and then comes a page that makes the blood quicken in the veins and makes the heart of him who, in this weather is tied to a desk in the hot dusty city, beat with envy of his more fortunate fellowman, who can forsake the daily grind and enjoy such sport as is pictured to us by Mr. Richardson in Trout Fishing in Lake Edward. Space forbids a more extended notice of this number; it is all good, in fact as the old toper said "there's no bad whisky, it's all good though some is better," and this is true of all numbers of The Cosmopolitan.

MENTIONS

Brother Durbin, who has been suffering from a severe attack of neuralgia, reports that "Richard is himself again," and THE CONDUCTOR is glad to hear it.

The Secretary of Division 60 would like the address of I. A. Campbell and A. M. Cooper. Brother Cooper's mother is also anxious to hear from him.

Agents wanted. Do you want to make money? If so, sell our choice Nursery stock. Write us for terms. MAY BROTHERS, Nurserymen, Rochester, N. Y.

Brother J. S. Gulick, of Division 114, has been appointed general yardmaster of the Valley railway, at Cleveland, and Brother O. N. Pomeroy has been appointed night yardmaster at same place. Both are worthy, capable men.

Henry Ernst would like to know the whereabouts of his son, Wm. H. Ernst, who in May, 1889, was employed on the U. P. at Cheyenne, as brakeman. Any information will be gratefully received by Mr. Ernst, Nunica, Mich.

Mr. C. B. Cox having resigned to accept other service, Mr. F. J. Easley, who is a member of Division 70, has been appointed chief train dispatcher of the Rio Grande division of the Santa Fe, in direct charge of train service and distribution of cars.

The Secretary of Union Division No. 13, wishes to hear from or of Brother E. B. Garver, formerly employed as conductor on the C. S. division of the M. C. R'y. Will any one that knows the address of Brother Garver, kindly send it to J. Mackenzie, box 887, St. Thomas, Ont.?

C. S. Wheaton in presiding at the seceders meeting in New York, has only fulfilled what was prophesied for him six months ago, and he has now placed himself where his history for the past few years will be given to the readers of THE CONDUCTOR. The pleas of the few friends that he has left "not to persecute him when he is down," will have no further effect.

Brother W. I. Allen, late a member of Division 117, and well and favorably known all over the western country has been appointed assistant general manager of the Rock Island from July 1. He will take with him the best wishes of many thousands of employees.

Man-with-the-yellow-vest, Chief Sachem of the Kawonicahoxies, and a bold warrior from the banks of the Chemung canal, now gives his address as Covington, Neb., in other words, that is the present headquarters of Brother C. A. Millard, who reports 100 miles of track laid and the Pacific Short Line progressing finely.

Brother W. O. Salisbury wishes to learn something of his son, Harry H., who left his home about June 1st. He is about 12 years of age, and when he left was dressed in a dark suit of clothes and wore a brown hat. Any one knowing anything of him will relieve the anxiety of his parents by sending information promptly by wire to Brother Salisbury, who is a conductor on the Union Pacific railway. Address Spokane Falls, Wash.

Mr. J. O. Brinkerhoff, who will on July 1 become general manager of the Missouri River division of the Union Pacific, succeeding Mr. E. Dickinson, resigned, began work on that road as a brakeman in 1865. He has remained with the road ever since and has gradually risen through the various grades of the service, serving successively as brakeman, baggageman, freight and passenger conductor, dispatcher, superintendent Smoky Hill division and superintendent Kansas division. The last named position he has held since Nov. 1, 1884. His headquarters will be at Omaha, Neb.

Brother D. C. Brown, of Newton Division No. 11, has decided to abandon his first love, retire from the business of railroading and give his undivided attention to the understanding of the citizens of Newton and surrounding vicinity, regardless of age, sex, color or previous condition of servitude. He will make it his business also to care for the welfare of their soles, and all who will call at his headquarters, on Commercial street, and examine his stock of boots and shoes will be convinced, that if Newtonians are not well shod it will not be the fault of Brother Brown. The only difficulty is, that when the boys drop in, the temptation to "talk shop," or otherwise "railroading," is so strong that he is inclined to make customers wait until he finds out the latest news of the rail. Brother Brown was formerly a member of Division 103 at Indianapolis, and is widely known.

Mr. W. C. Brown, at present superintendent of the Iowa and Missouri lines of the Chicago Burlington & Quincy, has been appointed general manager of the Hannibal & St. Joseph and Kansas City, St. Joseph & Council Bluffs roads, with headquarters at St. Joseph, Mo., to succeed Mr. W. F. Merrill. Mr. Brown has risen from the ranks and has been with the Burlington system since 1876. Prior to that date he was for seven years connected with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul and Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific roads, in various capacities. He was made superintendent of the Iowa lines of the Burlington Jan. 1, 1887, and was subsequently also given charge of the Missouri lines. The fact that he is an old school-mate of the writer as well as a co-employee on the C. M. & St. P., may account for his progress, but it is more likely the reason that he is not now President of the "Q."

Mr. W. F. Merrill, general manager of the Hannibal & St. Joseph and Kansas City, St. Joseph & Council Bluffs roads, with headquarters at St. Joseph, Mo., has been appointed general manager of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, in place of Mr. E. P. Ripley, resigned, and will assume the duties of that office about Aug. 1, with headquarters at Chicago. Before being appointed general manager of the H. & St. J. and K. C. St. J. & C. B., which are a part of the Burlington system, on Jan. 1, 1887, Mr. Merrill was for nearly four years superintendent of the C. B. & Q. lines in Iowa and Missouri. From 1882 to 1883 he was general superintendent of the Chicago & Alton and prior to 1882 was successively general superintendent Toledo, Peoria & Warsaw, superintendent Peoria and Iowa and Chicago divisions of the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific and general superintendent of the last named road.

No member of the Order should permit himself to be misled by the reports of the New York meeting published in the press dispatches. Such reports are greatly exaggerated. We have advice directly from nearly all of the divisions represented by the minority vote at Rochester, and the divisions will not only not leave the Order in a body as has been so vociferously claimed by the loud-mouthed, methodist-voiced, bass-toned improvements on the equine race from New Haven, but a vigorous opposition to any such course has developed itself in the few divisions that were expected to follow the New Haven lead, and the statement that "fifty divisions were represented in New York" is a falsehood. There were present members from five or six divisions, but only in exceptional cases did these members represent anything but themselves, while a number of those present were there simply to learn what was going on and to use their influence against any secession.

Got a Chew.

There was a painter working at top of a long ladder on Fourth avenue yesterday, when a tramp came along and called:

"Hey, you! got any of the weed about you?"

"Well, you've got a cheek!" replied the painter, as he looked down and sized the man up.

"Gimme a chaw?"

"No, sir."

"Does that go?"

"You bet it goes."

"All right—here's another thing to go with it."

And he pulled the foot of the ladder five feet outward, while the painter uttered a yell of terror.

"Hey, you! do you chaw?"

"Y-yes."

"Got any to spare?"

"Lots."

"Throw'er down."

The painter dropped his plug to the ground and the tramp bit off a royal bite, placed the remainder on a stone and went his way with a whistle in one corner of his mouth and a pucker in the other.—N. York Dispatch.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: This is a copy of a letter of condolence to Chief Conductor Hall:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God to take to himself Mrs. Hall, the beloved mother of our worthy Chief Conductor; be it

Resolved, That this Division tender to Brother Hall and family the sincere sympathy of the members of this Division under their affliction. Be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread on the minutes of this meeting, and a copy sent to THE CONDUCTOR for publication.

W. A. COON.

At a regular meeting of Baraboo Division, No. 68, O. R. C., held June 1, 1890, the following epistle of condolence was adopted:

Thursday, May 29, after a brief but severe illness, Brother C. W. Warren of Winona, Minn., was relieved of suffering by the repose of death. Brother Warren was a highly esteemed member of Baraboo Division, No. 68, O. R. C. Too much cannot be said in praise of his character; devoid of all selfish motives he joined our fraternity, not expecting to be benefited thereby, but for the purpose of lending a helping hand to promote the general welfare of the Order, and through his influence and the position he held in the hearts of the public, he has helped to gain for us that position in society which he attained and so justly deserved. Brother Warren was a highly respected citizen of Winona, where he has lived since the city was in its infancy, and anxiously watched its growth from a village to a magnificent city. He was loved by all who knew him and was honored with the mayoralty of the city he helped to build.

Brother Warren had been employed as passenger conductor on the Madison division of the C. & N. W. R. R., for upwards of twenty years, where, by his honesty and integrity he gained the entire confidence of the officials. And what a life was his—a life so wholly devoted to what was good and noble, with a virtue which the possession of power could not even tempt, much less debauch; from whose presence the very thought of corruption instinctively shrunk back. With these virtues he has secured a passage into a brighter and happier abode. He is at rest now—our kind-hearted brother who began his career at the bottom of the ladder, and has now reached the highest round attainable. The members of the Baraboo Division are indeed sorry to have lost by death so illustrious a member, and we wish to extend our united sympathy to the family of our deceased brother.

Resolved, That our charter be draped for a period of thirty days, and that a copy of this epistle be forwarded to the family of our deceased brother, spread upon the records, and placed in the pages of the THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

CHICAGO, June 15th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—It becomes my painful duty to record the death of Brother Levi L. Morris, who died suddenly on May 21st, of rheumatism of the heart.

At our first meeting after his death a committee was appointed to draft resolutions of sympathy; they have this day presented the following:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to remove from our midst our beloved Brother Levi L. Morris, whose death occurred at St. Charles, Ills., May 21; therefore be it

Resolved, That while submitting with human patience to the will that has deprived us of his presence, we deeply feel the absence of one so long among us, whose always smiling countenance and good will towards us all has endeared him to us.

Resolved, That our hopes extend beyond this life for his happiness, in a firm belief that there exists a better state in the long eternity towards which we are progressing.

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved relatives of our deceased Brother our profoundest sympathy in this their hour of sorrow.

Resolved, That to his immediate associates with whom his daily duties brought him in close connection, we turn our sympathy in the loss they have sustained.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for the period of thirty days, and that these resolutions be spread on the records of this division, and a copy sent to the Brother's widow, also to THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, and to the St. Charles Valley Chronicle.

THE BRAKEMAN'S CHANCES.

PERHAPS?

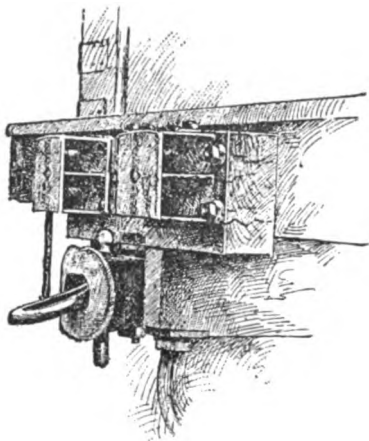

THE danger of sudden accidental death or maiming is constant and great, and the bare record of the numerous cases is acutely suggestive of inexpressible suffering; but, strange to say, it does not worry the average brakeman much. Though probably a thousand trainmen are killed in this country every year,* and four or five thousand injured, by collisions and derailments, in coupling cars, falling off trains, striking low overhead bridges, and other causes, no one brakeman, from what he sees in his own experience, realizes the danger very vividly. As in other dangers which are constant but inevitable, familiarity breeds carelessness which is closely akin to contempt. Falling from trains is really a serious danger, because the most ceaseless caution—next to impossible for the average man to maintain—is necessary to avoid missteps. This will be practically abolished when the long-wished-for power brake comes into use, as that will obviate the necessity of riding on the top of the cars.

Coupling accidents are practically unavoidable because, although the necessary manipulations can be made without going between the cars or placing the hands in dangerous situations, the men as a general thing prefer to take the risk of the more dangerous method. With the ordinary freight-car apparatus (which, however, is destined to be superseded by an automatic coupler) the link by which the cars are connected is retained by a pin in the drawbar of either car; as one car approaches another at considerable speed, this link, which hangs loosely down at an angle of thirty degrees, must be lifted and guided into the opening in the opposite drawbar. This operation must, according to the regulations of most roads, be performed by the aid of a short stick; but, disregarding the regulation, partly to save time and partly because of fear of the ridicule that would be called out by the exhibition of a lack of dexterity, the average brakeman uses his fingers. He must lift the link and hold it horizontally until the end enters the opening, and then withdraw his hand before the heavy drawbars come together. A delay of a fraction of a second would crush the hand or finger as under a trip-hammer. And, in point of fact, this delay does, for various reasons, frequently happen, and the number of trainmen with wounded hands to be found in every large freight-yard is sad evidence of the fact. But again, assuming that this part of the operation is accomplished in safety, there is another and worse danger in the possibility of being crushed bodily. Cars are built with projecting timbers on their ends at or near the centre, for the purpose of keeping the main body of each car twelve or fifteen inches from its neighbor; but cars of dissimilar pattern sometimes meet in such a way that the projections on one lap past those on the other, and the space which would afford room for the man to stand in safety is not maintained. If the brakeman, in the darkness of night or the hurry of his work, fails to note the peculiarities of the cars, he is mercilessly crushed, the ponderous vehicles often banging together with a force of many tons. A constant danger in coupling and uncoupling is the liability to catch the feet in angles in the track. Freight conductors are peculiarly liable to this, as the duty of uncoupling (pulling out the pin) generally devolves upon them, must be done while the train is in motion. Walking rapidly along, in the dark, with the right hand holding a lantern and grasping the car, while the left is tugging at a pin which sticks, involves perplexities; wherein a moment's hesitation may prove fatal.

*During the year ending June 30, 1889, 1,972 trainmen were killed and 20,028 injured. Rep. of Int. State Com. Com.

Of all accidents to employes the most numerous are those which arise in coupling and uncoupling cars. In Massachusetts, in 1888, the employes killed and injured were 391; of these casualties 154 occurred in coupling accidents. The commissioners of other states, especially of Iowa, have for years published statistics showing nearly the same ratio. Fortunately accidents of this class, although numerous, are not proportionately fatal. Far the greater part result in the loss of part of a hand; but they are so frequent as to have caused much discussion, legislation, and invention. Several states have, one time and other, passed laws requiring the use of automatic couplers; and two or three years ago there were on record in the United States over four thousand coupler patents. The laws have been futile because impracticable; and most of the patents have been worthless for the same reason. It was obvious that the business of supplying couplers for the one million freight cars of the country could not be put into the hands of some one patentee unless his device was manifestly and preeminently superior to all others. It became important, therefore, to select as a standard some type of coupler general enough to include the patents of various men, and at the same time so definite that all couplers made to conform to the standard could work together interchangeably. Those who read Mr. Voorhees' story of the wanderings of a freight car will understand that any one freight car in the United States or Canada should be prepared to run in the same train with any other car. A few years ago a committee of the Master Car-builders Association was appointed to choose and recommend a type of coupler to be adopted as the standard of the association. After prolonged and careful study of the subject the committee recommended the type of which the Janney is the best known example, and that has now become the standard of the association. This action does not give a monopoly to the Janney company, as there are already half a dozen couplers which conform to the type. This device couples automatically, and thus does away with the necessity for the brakeman going between the cars. It cal-also be unlocked by the rod shown extending to the side of the car, and the locking device can be set not to couple, to facilitate switching and yard work. The mechanical principles of this coupler are a great and important improvement upon any form of link-and-pin coupler; and the coupler question has now come to this point: A type of coupler has been selected by a technical body representing most of the railroads of the United States. It is general enough to avoid the evils of a patent monopoly. It promises to be economical in operation, and will certainly do away with the terrible loss of life and limb which results from the use of the non-automatic coupler. The railroads are adopting it with reasonable speed, perhaps, but not as rapidly as simple considerations of humanity would dictate.

E. E. CLARK.

The irrepressible Calvin S. Wheaton is like Banquo's ghost, he will not down. He bobbed up serenely the other day at New York with a lot of other soreheads and kickers and established an Independent Order of Railway Conductors, with Wheaton as President, Secretary and Treasurer. It will be amusing to watch the antics of this modern Koko in his attempts to make a living without working for it.—The Western Railway.

A Conductor Talks.

A Herald reporter had a talk yesterday with a member of the local division of the Order of Railway Conductors. "You noticed, I presume, that the striking switchmen on the Illinois Central practically carried their point," was the remark with which the Conductor opened a conversation which, in view of certain occurrences since the convention of the order was held in this city, seems to be worth repeating.

"They never could have won their fight without the aid of the conductors, and what made it possible for the conductors to assist them was the action of the Rochester convention in eliminating the clause prohibiting its members from engaging in a strike. This was the first strike in which Order of Railway Conductors' men have taken part in years, and the result shows that the majority acted wisely in removing the obstructing clause from the constitution of the Order. We are not frightened by the action of the eastern members, who have formed a new organization. The split is not half so bad as they have represented it to be. Instead of taking from us 50 whole divisions they have taken only a faction—in many cases a minority faction—of a much smaller number.

"It is no surprise to us that Wheaton is at the head of the movement. It was believed by many and openly stated in the convention here by one of the delegates that Cal Wheaton meant to ruin the Order if he could not rule it. Wheaton is responsible for the failure of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy strike. This was the real secret of the opposition which he encountered among the western delegates where the fact had become known and had aroused a bitter feeling toward him. Wheaton and those who, like him opposed the change pretended to think that the Order would thereby lower itself in the estimation of the railroad companies. I received a letter a few days ago from a friend who is a conductor on a western road. He states that his company has just agreed to a new scale of wages by which the men are much more liberally remunerated than ever before.

"The seceders thought to gain favor with the Reading and other roads by putting a non-strike clause in their constitution. The scheme didn't work. The Reading officials have notified their conductors that they must not affiliate with the new order and so the bolters are in a hole.

"The Reading is opposed to all organized labor. It has had a terrible experience with strikes. If all the organizations of railway employes federate, as is probable, it will necessitate a change of base on the part of this as well as other roads that have discriminated against members of labor organizations."—Rochester Herald.

At the last meeting of the railway employes, which was held in the Firemans' Hall on Fifteenth street, the question as to which was the best plan of federation, general or system federation, was discussed. The meeting opened at 8 p. m. and lasted until 4:30 the following morning. Among the speakers who favored system federation were Messrs. Carter and Curtis of Texas, Frank Walt and Mr. Hover of Idaho, and W. F. Hynes of Denver. The meeting was free from the unpleasant mutterings of outside organizations which made the session of the previous day so disagreeable, and the discussion was really interesting. Eugene Debs, Grand Secretary and Treasurer of the Firemans' Brotherhood, was the champion of general federation. The employes of the Union Pacific system had seen the workings of system federation as it exists on that road and they were earnest in their arguments in favor of that plan. They were prejudiced against general federation and especially against the supreme council which is the general head. Their ideas of the supreme council and its modus operandi were as varied as the hues of the rainbow. One gentleman talked loud and long about the power of two members of any one of the federated orders to declare a strike off at any time. As a matter of fact, a strike can only be declared off by a unanimous vote. When the meeting adjourned Mr. Debs had made many converts to his faith, and on the other hand he said he had gained much information, and learned much of the wants of the West.—The Western Railway

While we are casting about for a man to take Chief Arthur's place, let us not overlook John A. Hill, of the Locomotive Engineer. Johnny is very popular here in the foot-hills where he is best known. Even his mother-in-law, is said speaks well of him. After having spent most of his life in Pueblo and New York, it is hardly probable that he would consent to settle down in a flag station like Cleveland. Then again it is thought that John A. is not very popular with the eastern element; he is too intelligent.—The Western Railway.

Who Is It?

C. S. Wheaton, who was elected Grand Chief of the Order of Railway Conductors a few years ago, by a majority of three votes in a National Convention, has concluded that the order is going to pieces because at its last convention it failed to re-elect him. Now, in order to provide a fat place for himself, he has seceded and organized the "Independent Order of Railway Conductors" and had himself chosen Grand Chief. Wheaton is at the end of his string, but will never tumble so long as a lot of "soft run" conductors will pay for his meal tickets. Another enterprising but chronic office-seeker has organized the "National Association of Railway Conductors" down among the Yankees and is also "Grand Chief." Now, if the men at the head of the O. R. C. and the B. of R. C. will drop their personal fights, and consolidate—federate—or come to some understanding, they will have Wheaton, Horsestrander & Co., braking for them in six months.—The Western Railway.

Will our Denver cotemporary tell us who of "the men at the head of the O. R. C." have any fights, either personal or otherwise, with the B. of R. C. or "its head men?"

We have seen nothing of any war or fights except that which the Toledo Don Quixote and a few Sancho Panza's of correspondents think they are carrying on in vieing with each other as to who can use the foulest language and the vilest billingsgate in regard to the Order and its members. Their "Rosinante" yclept Gazette, sometimes carries them in reach of one of the sails of the windmill they are so bravely charging: The mill goes steadily on and they retire to muster up courage for another onslaught as soon as they find "the enemy" don't chase them: Don't mistake the Toledo night-arrant and his esquire for the B. of R. C.: In less than a twelve month from now, he will be assailing Howard and the B. of R. C. as he now is the Order and its officers.

Bitter Sweet.

The seed sown at the Rochester Convention, by the anti-Wheaton delegates, is producing one of the most cheering and abundant of harvests ever gathered by any one of the several train service orders. Members of the O. R. C. in this vicinity are very enthusiastic in their praise of the changes made. Their meetings are largely attended, much enthusiasm prevails, and the new converts and accessions compel old veterans and loyal members to work both early and late. Several delegates on returning home visited Cleveland, and while within its confines visited this office. Their expressions for that fraternal feeling which should exist in the future between the B. of L. E. and O. R. C. were very assuring and highly appreciated. To each individual member the Grand Office gave assurance that it would be the endeavor of the B. of L. E. to bring about a more harmonious and fraternal feeling in the future, whereby the two orders might enjoy that respect and esteem for each other that their position and vocation requires. During the past month, Mr. Arthur was called to Savannah to adjust grievances on the Georgia Central. His trip through the South was made very pleasant by courtesies tendered by the members of the O. R. C. They not only realize that a new era has dawned upon their association, but members of other train service orders realize this fact. The feeling of animosity in the past, brought about by the machinations of the quartette, was a personal matter, conducted by the originators with such persistency that the principal manipulator was retired to private life at the Rochester sitting, and the good work should continue until the whole quartette, who accomplished more to bring their association to disgrace than all else, has travelled the same route.—B. of L. E. Journal.

The above article describes exactly what will exist throughout the entire Order of Railway Conductors, provided the Journal does not continue to expose its sores and ask for sympathy. As THE CONDUCTOR has already said, we are ready to "clasp hands over the bloody chasm" and to "let the dead past bury its dead," but THE CONDUCTOR, with its present management is not engaged in an effort to prove the millennium is here by offering the left cheek when the right is smitten, and if the Journal is sincere in its expressed wish "that the past be obliterated," it will hereafter omit anything like the concluding paragraph of the above article.

We have no objection to its attacking Messrs. Wheaton or Cross; It must how, ever, let E. H. Belknap, who is a loyal member of the Order, alone: If it is any amusement for the Journal to assail the writer, it is welcome to sail in and if it does not continue too long, we wont interfere with its fun, at the same time, we are egotistical enough to think that we have enough friends in the Order, to make it a somewhat difficult task to cultivate the "fraternal friendship that should exist," by such a course. "Hands off" from Bro. Belknap though, and if you wish to "take a whack" at the writer occasionally, dont do it by inference and inuendo and as a part of a trio, quartette or anything else, but "have at him" in an open, manly fashion. The "feeling of animosity in the past," was not brought about primarily by members of the Order, nor by the influence of any member or quartette, but by the engineers themselves under the teaching and influence of Mr. Arthur, though the acts of ex-Grand Chief Conductor Wheaton made the situation entirely different from what it otherwise would have been. Prolonged repetition of this charge may compel us to take up this matter in THE CONDUCTOR.

The Journal must take the bitter with the sweet for the present and take the rose with its thorn until next May, when with the aid of "Majah" Leflet it can probably "defeat Daniels."

Why he Wails.

Whatever other effect Bill Daniel's crushing defeat for the office of chief conductor of the O. R. C. may have had, it does not seem to have relieved him of the load of self conceit that is proving such a strain upon him, distorting his mental vision and blinding him as to the opinions of all impartial readers, even of his own Order. He fairly bellows with rage, because during the last seven or eight years, the editor of the Gazette has suffered little or no annoyance from his puny attacks in the O. R. C. journal. It is to him a matter of continual regret that the hide of the editor of the Gazette is so thick that Bill's feeble literary shafts, have no effect upon it. No doubt every one of the little army of Liliputians had the same cause for mourning, when their armies attacked the sleeping Giant Gulliver. Now Gulliver was really no larger than an ordinary man, but the Liliputians were so very small! Now, with Daniels the case is exceedingly exasperating. While he may be a very small Liliput, his self conceit has magnified him into a towering giant, and hence he wails continually, that the world does not stop to sneeze when he takes snuff. Daniels states that it is cowardice on the part of the editor of the Gazette, that has prevented the latter from noticing his Liliputian war. Certainly no reply is needed to this charge. There is no intelligent reader not perfectly competent to decide which is the coward, between the man who at a distance of five or six hundred miles fights with his mouth, and the other who ignores such warfare.—Railway Service Gazette.

Interesting Interviews With Several Prominent Elmira Conductors.

Mr. Daniel's charges against ex-Chief Wheaton, when made known to a number of leading Elmira conductors by a Telegram reporter yesterday afternoon, were the subject of excited comment. All were emphatic in the assertion of their belief in Mr. Wheaton's honesty and probity, but all agreed that charges of so serious a nature called for a prompt and sweeping denial. "I have been a friend and supporter of Wheaton for years," said a Northern Central conductor, "but I don't think he is following the right course now. I am a member of the Order of Railway Conductors, and shall continue so until I see good reasons for dropping out. It is true some of the men were dissatisfied at first when the rule forbidding members to engage in strikes was stricken out. That was because they supposed that the omission gave power to any division in the central body of officers to order all the members on strike if they saw fit. My personal experience—and I have been a conductor a good many years—has been that train conductors are averse to strikes, and the idea that being members of an order, originally formed for benevolent purposes, made them liable to be ordered out on strike in sympathy with any other body of railroad employes was repugnant to them. But when it was explained and proved that the striking out of this prohibitory clause conferred no power on either the national or local organizations, a different feeling prevailed. As the constitution now stands full liberty is accorded to the individual. If a strike occurs among the engineers of a road and any of the conductors are unwilling to run with the new ones, they are at liberty to refuse, and should a majority of a Division decide to strike their action does not bind the minority. In fact, the omission of the clause gave more liberty instead of curtailing it. It would take too long to tell the story of the troubles which led to Wheaton's defeat in the Order. In the first place, the Western men are the strongest in numbers, and as they found Wheaton opposed to legislation they brought forward, it was natural that they successfully sought to overrule him."

"I believe Wheaton is an honest man," said a Delaware, Lackawanna & Western conductor, "but he should not attempt to use the conductors as a body to satisfy his private grievances. The great majority of the conductors feel as I do about this matter, and he will find that only a few of the Elmira men will follow him into the new organization, which I understand he proposes starting. The Elmira lodge has no idea of surrendering its charter in the old Order and will not do so. Even though the conductors on the other roads running into Elmira were united in favor of secession, which is the reverse of being the case, the conductors on the Lackawanna alone would be sufficiently numerous to prevent the forfeiture of our charter. The Lackawanna men, from one end of the system to the other, are opposed to secession. There has a great deal of misinformation been printed about the recent meeting in New York City, at which the so-called Independent Order of Railway Conductors was formed with Wheaton as chief. But few of the sixty-six Divisions which at the Rochester convention voted against the abolition of the no-strike clause were represented at the New York meeting. A majority of those who were present did not have authority from their respective Divisions to take decisive action. As a matter of fact they were present because they were curious to know what was going on. Wheaton took part in the deliberations as a representative of the Elmira Division, but he had no formal permission to do so, and the most of our members did not know at the time that such a meeting was to be held. Nearly all of the sixty-six Divisions defeated at Rochester have given out word that they will stand by the old Order, and you can depend upon it that Elmira Division will do the same."

Another meeting of the Independent Order of Railway Conductors is to be held at the Coleman House in New York next Sunday, at which the organization will be completed and an address issued to the conductors of the country. The Telegram will have a representative present at this meeting and will give a detailed and impartial account of its proceedings.—Elmira Sunday Telegram.

They Have Made a Mistake.

We are of the opinion that Cal. S. Wheaton and those associated with him have made a grave and perhaps fatal mistake in withdrawing from the Order of Railway Conductors and forming a new organization. Such action is undignified, unseemly and ill-advised.

For something like ten years Mr. Wheaton and those who share his views have governed the Order of Railway Conductors and shaped its policy. That new men and new methods were selected by the Rochester convention is not sufficient excuse for the defection of the minority.

The victorious ones had themselves submitted gracefully in the past, not permitting defeat to make them forget mutual interests and a mutual aim. Mr. Wheaton and his colleagues should have been equally generous and dignified, and waited for time to again give them the ascendancy.

Besides, they should remember that in division there is always danger. There should be but one organization of the railway conductors in the country, and that should be as compact and harmonious as possible. Only by such an organization can the welfare and interests of the conductors be best subserved.

To our thinking, the men who participated in the New York City convention have taken the wrong course, and one that will lead inevitably to disaster. In time they themselves will, doubtless, see that they have.—Elmira Telegram, June 29th.

Mr. Wheaton Declines To Talk.

HE INFORMS A "TELEGRAM" REPORTER HE HAS NOTHING TO SAY AT PRESENT.

Ex-Chief Wheaton returned from the west on Thursday and is now at his home in this city. He was seen by a reporter of the Telegram yesterday morning in reference to the charges made by Grand Secretary Daniels. The reporter handed Mr. Wheaton the following written questions and informed him that the Telegram would be glad to publish any answer he might care to make to them.

Mr. Daniels charges you with double dealing on the no-strike clause previous to the recent convention at Rochester. Is this true?

Mr. Daniels accuses you of treachery towards members of the Order and of deliberate falsehood in the settlement of the troubles of the Sante Fe conductors, and also in a settlement with the officials of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road. Is this true?

Mr. Daniels accuses you of presenting for payment dishonest and fraudulent expense accounts. Is this true?

Mr. Daniels states that at the outset of the great engineers' strike on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road you telegraphed the officials of that line tendering them support and informing them that the Order of Railway Conductors would stand by them. Is this true?

Mr. Daniels charges that you sent to superintendent Woodward of the Monon company, testimony given by employes of that company at a secret investigation conducted by you. Is this true?

Mr. Daniels affirms that you have in the past, offered to railroad officials the support of members of the Order of Railway Conductors in case of a strike, and that he has proof of this now in his possession. Is this true?

Mr. Wheaton read the foregoing questions carefully and then said; "For reasons of a private and personal nature at present I have nothing to say in reply to Mr. Daniels. In due season, though, he will hear from me in a convincing and and exhaustive manner. That is all I care to say this morning."—Elmira Sunday Telegram.

The New Conductors' Order.

At a meeting of D. L. & W. conductors last Friday, over which Ass't Sup't F. J. Griffiths presided, a new association was formed with the following officers; President, Abram Ball, South Orange; Vice-President, A. C. Gordinier, Morristown; Secretary and Treasurer, S. O. Chittenden, Newark. The association will probably be named Moses Taylor Division, No. 2, and expects to start with fifty charter members. The new Order of non-striking conductors will probably be named the Independent Order of Railway Conductors. A meeting will be held in New York on July 13th, when the Grand Division will be formally organized.—Dover, (N. J.) Iron Era.

In regard to the number of members, this, like the report of the Coleman House meeting, must be taken cum grano salis to arrive at the truth,

"Korrect."

Referring to the published statement that the seceders propose to retain their membership in the insurance of the Order of Railway Conductors, while making efforts to destroy the association itself THE CONDUCTOR remarks that "they are reckoning without their host, and that they may rest assured that those who were active in procuring the incorporation of the Order under the laws of Iowa did not leave it in a situation so that it could be compelled to sustain its enemies." This should be taken to mean that seceders from the Order will lose their insurance benefits.—Elmira Sunday Telegram.

What We Want.

We are the hewers and delvers who toil for another's gain,
 The common clouds and the rabble, stunted of brow and brain.
 What do we want, the gleaners, of the harvest we have reaped?
 What do we want, the neuters, of the honey we have heaped?
 We want the drones to be driven away from our golden hoard;
 We want to share in the harvest; we want to sit at the board;
 We want what sword or suffrage has never yet won for man,
 The fruits of his toil God promised when the curse of toil began.
 Ye have tried the sword and scepter, the cross and the sacred word,
 In all the years, and the kingdom is not yet here of the Lord,
 We are tired of useless waiting; we are tired of fruitless prayers.
 Soldier and churchman and lawyer— the failure is it not theirs?
 What gain is it to the people that a God laid down his life,
 If, twenty centuries after, His world be a world of strife?
 If the serried ranks be facing each other with ruthless eyes,
 And steel in their hands, what profits a Savior's sacrifice?
 Ye have tried and failed to rule us, in vain to direct have tried—
 Not wholly the fault of the ruler; not utterly blind the guide.
 Mayhap there needs not a ruler—mayhap we can find the way.
 At least ye have ruled to ruin; at least ye have led astray.
 What matter if king or counsel or president holds the rein,
 If crime and poverty ever be links in the bond-man's chain?
 What careth the burden bearer that Liberty packed his load,
 If Hunger presses behind him with a sharp and ready goad?
 There's a serf whose chains are of paper, there's a king with a parchment crown;
 There are robber knights and brigands in factory, field and town.
 But the vassal pays his tribute to a lord of wage and rent;

And the baron's toil is Shylock's with a flesh and blood per cent.

The seamstress bends to her labor all night in a narrow room;

The child, defrauded of childhood, tiptoes all day at the loom;

The soul must starve; for the body can barely on husks be fed;

And the loaded dice of the gambler settles the price of bread.

Ye have shorn and bound the Samson and robbed him of learning's light;

But his sluggish brain is moving; his sinews have all their might.

Look well to your gates of Gaza, your privilege, pride and caste!

The Giant is blind but thinking, and his locks are growing fast.

Looking and Seeing.

Why some are sad eyed,
 Why some are glad eyed,
 Is not because Nature decreed it,
 The vision of each
 When this world they reach,
 Is plastic for something to feed it.

From each mental nook,
 Or angle they look,
 At the world through a shifting focus;
 Judging from effect,
 The cause don't suspect,
 And declare "all life hocuspocus."

Eyes will grow weary,
 Eyes will grow cheery,
 Looking through their different desires,
 For delayed "comings,"
 Or secured "summings," Tempering in uncertainty's fires.

Eyes sometimes see,
 "As through glass darkly,"
 While wearied with bodily weighting, "Entering within"
 "The veil," they begin
 "To know as know," mists dissipating.

To encounter mist
 We cannot resist
 Is the fate of finite capacity.
 To say "it won't clear,
 Or sunshine appear"
 "Again," can't be called sagacity.

The eyes may be true,
 Black, brown, grey or blue,
 Their color affects not the vision,
 But the lens, what kind
 And motives behind,
 Make hues and affect the decision.

We Three and Our Ghost.

BY LA CROSSE.

[FOR THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.]

We three! What and how many memories cluster around those two small words! What hosts of school girls' frolics and good times arise at sound of them. And our ghost, is the most firmly fixed in our memories of all. It happened at Aunt Dell's, the rendezvous for all of our uncles and our aunts and us cousins, "especially our cousins."

Eva and I had been separated from Ollie as much as six whole weeks, and, of course, as Aunt Dell had no children of her own, there we congregated for a solemn (?) conclave of three. But Ollie being her father's house-keeper, having lost her mother some months previous, was prevented from joining us usually before eight or nine o'clock in the evening, and on the especial evening of which I write, company at home detained her so late, that Eva and myself gave up her coming at all and tired and worn with our journey, retired for the night. Sleep had just begun to soothe our tired muscles and close our eyes, in fact we were just at that stage where every thing seems uncanny and weird, when, "Burglars!" in hoarse sepulchral tones reached our ears. One glance, and, I blush to record it, my head ducked under the bed-clothes, with an insane prayer of "O, Lord, let them have the house, only so they let me alone." While, as she afterwards informed me, Eva sat bolt upright, with an idea of plunging into the hall and up the garret stairs, out on the roof. And the vision that met our eyes when first aroused was this: a tall white spectre that in the dim light of the night lamp, put the ghost in Hamlet to shame. After an endless space of time, it seemed to me, a merry laugh and the familiar voice of Ollie exclaiming, "Girls, don't be afraid, it is only me!" gave me courage to draw once more what little remaining breath was left me, and poor Eva's muscles relapsed enough to allow her to fall back on her pillow exhausted. For alas, for all future probability of our ever becoming believers in spooks, our spook was only Ollie with a sheet tossed over her head and arms outspread, and nearly as frightened at the result of her experiment as Eva and myself. Ah, me! such three merry maids were we! I pause and wonder if it be possible that twenty-one years have passed over our heads. We three are separated by land and river, perhaps never to meet again, until the burden is laid down, and the new day has dawned for us over yonder.

PHILADELPHIA, June 25, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Being elected delegate from Erickson Division No. 5, of Philadelphia, to Grand Division of L. A. of O. R. C. convention at Elkhart, Ind., June 10th, accompanied by my husband, we left Philadelphia on Sunday night, and after a very pleasant trip arrived at Elkhart at 11:10 a. m., Tuesday, where we were met by Mrs. A. W. Brown and several other ladies and were taken to lunch at residence of Mrs. Brown; after which all the delegates and many of the members of Elkhart Division, met at hall of No. 19, O. R. C., where convention was opened with open doors. There being several members of O. R. C. present, also two ministers and a reporter of Truth. Mrs. Northway, as President, called the meeting to order and requested an opening prayer from Rev. Parke. After prayer, Mrs. Northway accompanied a stanza of hymn with the organ. Rev. Townsend was then called on for some remarks, which he made very appropriate to the occasion. C. C. Huntley, of No. 19, was then called and responded.

Mrs. C. E. Ragon, of Columbus, was then introduced as Worthy President, and after an apology for use of notes, made an address prepared for the occasion. The convention then went into secret session, all not interested being politely requested to retire.

After the session we were given in charge of Mrs. E. C. Keppler, who royally entertained us during our stay in Elkhart. There were receptions held every eve, the first being at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Northway, next at Mr. and Mrs. C. France, and last at Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Brown's. On Thursday the delegates were invited to dine at Mrs. Jas. Wisharts, where all were in attendance. Friday morning the delegates were photographed in a group, then all left for their respective homes (but us) Mr. Keppler being anxious for us to remain longer in order to see the city. He drove up to the home and took us out for a ride which was continued all over Elkhart and suburbs. I would not forget to mention the drive through their pretty cemetery; which we were really pleased with. Saturday morning Mr. S. and I left Elkhart for Ft. Wayne, via of Chicago, with warmest feelings for our many friends. Our visit to Elkhart will always be remembered as one of the bright spots through this world of care. On arriving at Ft. Wayne we were met at the station by Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Erickson, Mrs. Sauers, Mr. and Mrs. Durham and Mr. and Mrs. Tremel. After a lunch at the home of Mrs. E. we went to the home of Mrs. Sauers where we were entertained until Sunday eve, when we were taken in charge by Mr. E. Erickson and his genial lady. In the evening Mr. Durham and lady of the Nickle Plate called on us with a team and we were driven through the city and suburbs. After spending three very agreeable days in Ft. Wayne we embarked for our home with feelings of highest regard and prayer for their continuous prosperity where all were uniformly kind. I hope none will feel slighted at not being personally mentioned, but it would take up too much of your valuable space, and it is impossible to recall all whom we met.

But before closing would like to thank the Truth of Elkhart through our magazine for courtesies shown, and the kind offer of its columns for our use. With kind regards to all

Yours in P. F.,

MRS. C. L. SPRINGER.

July 9th 1890.

Div. 5, L. A. of O. R. C. gave their 2nd annual excursion, to Woodland Beach, by the steamer Thos. Clyde on Tuesday; July 1st, and was an event which passed off with credit to the committee of arrangement who did their utmost to arrange the days pleasure for the many who wished to take a delightful trip down the Delaware Bay and enjoy a salt water bath, and as there was not any storms or accidents to mar the pleasure of the day, all came home well pleased with the trip and refreshed by their salt water bath. Among the many who were on board, were several members of Div. 162, as follows: Wm. Bingham, Wm. White, Mr. Pearl, Mr. Chininson, Thos. Moore, E. Funk, G. Filly, H. Pickle, many and others. We regretted very much the absence of Mr. and Mrs. A. H. McCauley, but owing to the death of their father they could not join with us, but our sympathy was with them. We would advise Mr. H. P. the next time he takes a trip to Woodland Beach, and desires to take a bath not to stay in the water so long as it may be very injurious to his health, and also the young ladies, and also to be careful of his voice or he might possibly strain his vocal chords, and we will give Mr. T. M. credit for the care he took of his baby, as we never saw it in his arms once all day. He made a good nurse. We appreciate the interest Div. 162 takes in the welfare of our auxillary. Our delegate arrived home from the convention all safe and sound, but the western divisions better be careful or we will be far in advance of them, as we have taken in two more members and expect several more.

MRS. B. F. WILTSE,
Cor. Sec. Div- 5, L. A. of O. R. C.

The Tailor-Made Girl.

To-day the "tailor-made girl" stands as the selection, the survival of the best ideas in dress of the last half of the nineteenth century. Her dress is neat, solid, compact, useful, convenient and adaptable. It stands for service and the absence of superfluity, for readiness in an emergency and propriety everywhere. It is the universal high school and college dress, the best traveling dress, the city walking dress, and it stamps the wearer as an intelligent and cultivated woman, says the Woman's Cycle. It is expensive because good workmanship and good material is put into it; but it never breaks out and never wears out; it has to be given away or cut up to get rid of it. It has done more for the health of American woman than all the medicine in existence. It has reconstructed them and built up an upright, vigorous, well-built, healthy young womanhood out of the shreds and patches, which were about all that was left of the woman that had been.

A Hot Place to Rest.

"Ma, I've an idea that some of the folks in this graveyard haven't gone to heaven."

"You don't say! What makes you think they haven't?"

"Because I read it on the tombstones."

"No."

"Yes, I did, though. It was carved on ever so many, 'Peace to his ashes.' Now, there ain't any ashes 'cept where it's very hot, is there, ma?"

LAWS GOVERNING THE MUTUAL BENEFIT DEPARTMENT OF THE ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS.

ARTICLE I.

TITLE AND GOVERNMENT.

This Department shall be known under the name and title of the Mutual Benefit Department of the Order of Railway Conductors of America, and shall be under the control and government of the Grand Division of the Order of Railway Conductors, and it shall consist of two classes, to be known as A and B.

ARTICLE II.

OBJECT.

Its object is to aid and benefit disabled and the families of deceased members of the Order of Railway Conductors.

ARTICLE III.

WHO MAY BECOME MEMBERS.

Any member of the Order who is in good standing and not over fifty or under fifteen years of age, may become a member of Class A of this Department, any member of the Order who is in good standing and not over sixty and under twenty years of age, may become a member of Class B of this Department, provided they are in good health and free from any disability, and should any member be suspended or expelled from the Order, he shall not forfeit his membership in Class A of this Department so long as he shall pay all assessments. Should any member of Class B be expelled from the Order, he shall forfeit his membership in Class B and all right to any benefit therein, except as provided in Article XIII. No member shall be permitted to hold more than two certificates in Class A, nor more than five in Class B.

ARTICLE IV.

OFFICERS.

The officers of this Department shall consist of an Insurance Committee, a President and a Secretary. The Insurance Committee shall be elected by the Grand Division of the Order. The Grand Chief Conductor of the Order shall be, ex-officio, the President, and the Grand Secretary of the Order shall be, ex-officio, the Secretary.

ARTICLE V.

THE INSURANCE COMMITTEE.

The Insurance Committee shall be the executive head of the Department, shall decide any question of dispute that may arise during recess of the Grand Division, such decision to be final until reversed by the Grand Division. All death or disability claims shall be subject to their examination, and no claim shall be paid until approved by them. In case of a majority and minority report on any claim, it shall be held in abeyance until passed upon by the Grand Division. Any member may appeal to the Grand Division or the Board of Directors. The senior member of the committee shall be the chairman, and shall submit annually a written report of all business transacted by them. They shall receive for their services the sum of one hundred dollars each per annum, and their necessary expenses shall be paid after being audited by the Finance Committee and approved by the Grand Division.

ARTICLE VI.

THE SECRETARY.

The Secretary shall keep a true record of all the business of the Department, a register of the members in each class, with the number and date of each certificate issued, receive and hold in trust all funds of the Department, and for each approved claim in Class A he shall as soon as possible, pay to the proper person or persons one dollar for each certificate on which the assessment for such claim has been paid, provided no payment shall exceed twenty-five hundred dollars on one claim, and for each approved death claim in Class B he shall, as soon as possible, pay to the proper person or persons one dollar for each certificate on which the assessment for such claim has been paid, provided no payment shall exceed one thousand dollars on any one claim; and for each approved disability claim in Class B he shall pay to the proper person or persons fifty cents for each certificate on which the assessment for such claim has been paid, provided no payment shall exceed five hundred dollars on any disability claim. He shall submit a correct report annually, or oftener if required by the Insurance Committee, of all business transacted by him, number of members in each class, and the condition of the Department, and exhibit proper vouchers for all expenditures. His books shall at all times be subject to the inspection of the Insurance Committee, or any person appointed by them.

ARTICLE VII.

LOCAL SECRETARIES.

The Secretary in each Division shall keep a record of all members of the Department, properly certify and forward applications, and perform such other duties as may be required of him by his Division. He shall not be, in any sense, the agent of the Department in forwarding applications or performing any other duty connected with the Department.

ARTICLE VIII.

APPLICATIONS.

All applications for membership must be made in writing, to the secretary, and every applicant must certify before the Secretary of a Division that he is in good health, free from any disability, and to the best of his knowledge and belief he is subject to no hereditary disease, and must be examined by a physician. Such certificate must be verified by a Secretary under seal of his Division, and applications must invariably be accompanied by the required fee. Applications must also be recommended by three members of the Department, who shall certify to the truth of the application. Any member of this Department may protest against the admission of any person. When the application is in due form, there is no protest, and the Secretary knows no cause why a certificate should not issue, he shall immediately issue it in accordance with Article X. When a protest is entered against the admission of any person, all papers shall be referred to the Insurance Committee, but any person may appeal from their decision to the Grand Division, and they shall present such appeal with all papers pertaining thereto, to the Grand Division at its first regular session thereafter.

ARTICLE IX.

FRAUDULENT STATEMENTS.

Fraudulent or false statements to procure the issue of a certificate shall be sufficient cause for the revocation of the same, or for the non-payment of any claim.

ARTICLE X.

MEMBERSHIP.

Applications for membership in Class A if accepted, shall be duly accredited as members from the date their application is certified by a Division Secretary, and certificates must be dated to correspond. Applications for membership in Class B shall take effect and be in force on and after 12:01 A. M. of the day they are accepted by the Secretary of the Department.

ARTICLE XI.

FEES.

A fee of five dollars must accompany every application for membership in Class A of this Department, and in case the applicant has forfeited membership in Class A since January 1st, 1882, a fee of ten dollars must accompany the application. All amounts received for fees shall be placed to the credit of the expense account of Class A. A fee of three dollars must accompany every application for membership in Class B. Two dollars of this amount shall be placed to the credit of the expense account of Class B, and one dollar shall be placed in the Reserve Fund provided for in Article XXV of these laws. In case any application is rejected the fee shall be returned. Any member of Class A who is in good standing may exchange his certificate in Class A for two certificates in Class B without the payment of any fee, and without physical examination, and members so exchanging shall be classified according to age at the time of such exchange.

ARTICLE XII.

ASSESSMENTS AND FORFEITURES.

When a claim in Class A is approved, the Secretary shall, as soon as practicable thereafter, issue a notice to every certificate in Class A, dated on or before the date of the claim, giving the name of the person on whose account the claim is made, to whom payable, cause and date of death or disability, and particulars of any claim or claims paid, and shall notify each to forward to him, immediately, one dollar, except as provided in Article XVI. When a claim in Class B is approved, the Secretary shall issue a notice to every certificate in Class B as above provided, and except as provided in Article XVI, shall notify each to forward to him amounts as follows.

For every certificate held by a member who was under thirty years of age when the certificate was issued, one dollar and twenty-five cents, of which 25 cents shall be placed in the Reserve Fund.

For every certificate held by a member who was thirty and under forty years of age when the certificate was issued, one dollar and fifty cents, of which fifty cents shall be placed in the Reserve Fund.

For every certificate held by a member who was forty and not over fifty years of age when the certificate was issued, two dollars, of which one dollar shall be placed in the Reserve Fund.

For every certificate held by a member who was fifty years of age when the certificate was issued, two dollars and fifty cents, of which one dollar and fifty cents shall be placed in the Reserve Fund.

ARTICLE XIII.

WITHDRAWALS.

Any member of Class A may withdraw by paying all assessments for which notice has been issued up to the date of notice of withdrawal. Any member of Class B may withdraw by paying all assessments as above provided, and after having been a member two years or more shall receive a paid up certificate for ten per cent. of the amount paid by him in assessments during the first two years, and an additional five per cent. for each year over two, provided no paid up certificate shall exceed fifty per cent. of the total amount of assessments paid, or the amount provided for in Article XVI of these laws. And further provided, that the holder of a paid up certificate may make a claim for disability at any time, under Article XV of these laws, but no disability benefit paid on a paid up certificate shall exceed one-half of the amount of the certificate. The provisions of this Article shall also apply to members who forfeit their membership in Class B under Article III.

ARTICLE XIV.

DEATH CLAIMS.

When the death of a member of this department occurs, proof of such death shall be made upon blanks furnished by the Secretary in accordance with instructions of the Committee, and a sworn affidavit from the Chief Conductor, the Assistant Chief Conductor, and the Secretary of a Division of the Order, accompanied by a certificate from the attending physician stating the cause of death, shall be prima facie evidence of a member's death, and the claim shall be paid after being submitted to the Insurance Committee and approved by them. Claims for benefit must be filed within one year from the date of death, and this department shall not pay any benefit for the death of any member unless a claim is filed with the Secretary within one year from the date of death.

ARTICLE XV.

DISABILITY CLAIMS.

Should any member of this Department become totally disabled by accident or disease, and shall furnish a certificate upon a blank provided for that purpose, signed by two competent physicians and five members of the Department, giving date and cause of disability, and certifying that, to their honest belief, the claimant is, and will ever remain, totally disabled from performing any labor whereby he can maintain himself or family, the Secretary shall proceed as provided in Articles XII and XIV, and such member shall thereafter be an honorary member not entitled to any further benefits, provided no claim shall be paid when death or disability is caused by venereal disease or while under the influence of liquor. And further provided, that the loss of eyesight, a hand, foot or limb, or the loss of the use of the same, shall also constitute total disability within the meaning of this article.

ARTICLE XVI.

AMOUNT OF BENEFIT.

No claim paid by this Department shall exceed twenty-five hundred dollars for each certificate in Class A held by the deceased or disabled member, and in Class B the amount paid shall not exceed one thousand dollars for death, or five hundred for disability, on each certificate held by the deceased or disabled member, and when the amount in the Mortuary Fund of either class shall be sufficient to pay a claim in that class, no assessment shall be made for that claim.

ARTICLE XVII.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—TRANSFERS.

It is the duty of every member to notify both the Secretary of the Department and the Secretary of the Division of which he is a member of any change in his address, and the Department shall not be responsible for any delinquencies which may occur through any failure to notify the Secretary of change of address. When a member joins a Division and presents a certificate of membership in this Department and a receipt for the payment of the last assessment, the local Secretary shall place his name upon the insurance roll of that Division.

ARTICLE XVIII.

DESIGNATE PERSONS TO WHOM BENEFITS IS PAYABLE

An applicant may designate in his application some person or persons to whom benefit shall be paid in the event of his death, and the Secretary shall enter such designated name or names upon the register of the Department, and also upon the Certificate of Membership. Any person desiring to change the name or names of the person or persons to whom benefit is payable, shall make the request in writing upon a blank provided for that purpose, which request must be certified by the Local Secretary under the seal of the Division, and forwarded to the Secretary with the certificate of membership. Upon receipt of such request in proper form, the Secretary shall make the requested change on the Register, provided no benefit shall be made payable to any one not having an insurable interest in the life of the member.

ARTICLE XIX.

DUPLICATE CERTIFICATES.

The Secretary shall, upon application, upon a blank provided by him, issue certificates to replace any which may be lost or destroyed. Such certificates must be plainly marked duplicate, and notation of the issue, with date, made upon the register.

ARTICLE XX.

NOTICE OF ASSESSMENT.

The notice of assessment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, and placed in an envelope, properly addressed to the member for whom it is intended, as the address is shown on the books of the Department, one full rate of postage paid thereon, and deposited in the office. The envelope in which such assessment notices are inclosed must have a printed "return card" thereon.

To insure proper credit being given, members must return the notice of assessment with the remittance, and the Department shall not be responsible for any errors that may occur in consequence of failure of any member to return any notice. The Secretary will then stamp the notice "paid," with the date, and deposit the same in the post-office, properly addressed, and the notice so stamped shall be a sufficient receipt for payment of the assessment.

ARTICLE XXI.

BENEFIT—TO WHOM PAYABLE.

In case the designated payee of a member should not survive him, the benefit shall be paid to the first named who shall survive him, as follows:

- 1st. In accordance with the provisions of the lawful will of the deceased, should one be left.
- 2d. To the widow of the deceased.
- 3d. To the child or children of the deceased.
- 4th. To the father of the deceased.
- 5th. To the mother of the deceased.

In default of all the above, the expenses of the last sickness and funeral of the deceased shall be paid by the Secretary, provided no other provision has been made for the payment; and further provided, that bills for the same are approved by the Insurance Committee. In no case shall the amount so paid exceed the benefit, and bills for such expenses shall be paid in the order of their presentation to the Secretary. Any balance remaining after this section has been complied with shall revert to the Reserve Fund of the Department.

ARTICLE XXII.

BENEFIT—TO WHOM PAYABLE.

When a disability claim is approved for payment, the benefit shall be paid to the disabled member, except when such disability is caused by permanent insanity, when it shall be paid as follows:

- 1st, wife; 2d, child or children; 3d, father; 4th, mother.

In default of all the above, the benefit shall be held in trust by the Secretary, and expended solely for the benefit of such disabled members, by the advice and with the approval of the Insurance Committee. In case of the death of such disabled member before the full amount of the benefit is expended, the balance will be paid as provided in Article XXI.

ARTICLE XXIII.

MONEY—HOW FORWARDED.

All money must be forwarded by express, draft or post-office order, and all charges for expressage, collection or exchange must be prepaid.

ARTICLE XXIV.

APPLICATION—FORM OF.

All applications for membership in this Department shall be in the form prescribed by the Secretary when approved by the committee.

ARTICLE XXV.

RESERVE FUND.

There shall be, in Class B of this Department, a Reserve Fund, to be accumulated as provided in Articles XI, and XII, of these laws, and such Reserve Fund shall be invested by the Secretary, with the approval of the Insurance Committee, at a rate of interest not less than three and one-half per cent. per annum. In case there should be a disagreement in regard to the investment of any portion of this fund, such portion shall be invested in United States bonds until the matter is passed upon by the Grand Division. The interest accruing from this invested fund shall also be invested in accordance with the above provisions until such time as the principal sum shall amount to $500,000, when no further additions shall be made to the Reserve Fund, and the full amounts of all assessments for losses and all interest accruing from the invested Reserve Fund shall be used to pay losses.

All bonds or other securities of whatsoever kind shall be deposited with the Auditor of State, of the State of Iowa, in accordance with the laws of said State, and no part of the said securities shall be delivered by the Auditor, except upon the written order of the Secretary, countersigned by not less than two members of the Insurance Committee.

Whenever occasion requires, any portion of this Reserve Fund may be withdrawn and used to pay claims for death or disability in Class B, provided it is approved by the Secretary and not less than two members of the Insurance Committee.

Should the principal sum invested as a Reserve Fund, through losses on investments, withdrawal of a portion, or from any other cause, fall below the amount of $500,000, all interest thereon, and a portion of all fees and assessments in this class, as provided in Articles XI. and XII., shall be invested as provided above in this Article until the sum invested shall reach the sum of $500,000, it being the intent of this Article to provide and permanently maintain an invested Reserve Fund of $500,000, the interest of which is to be used exclusively for the payment of benefits.

ARTICLE XXVI.

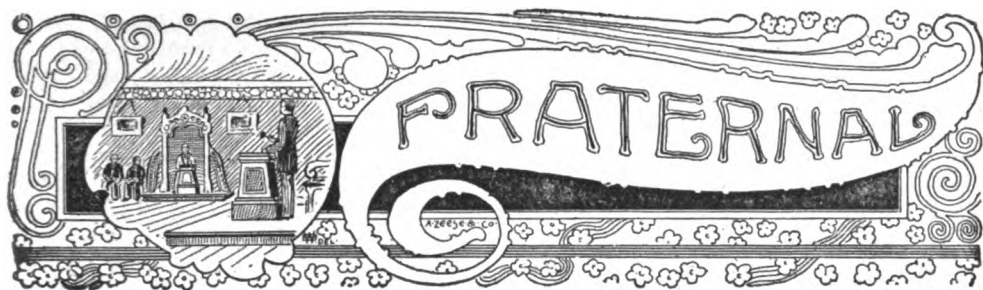

AMENDMENTS.

These laws can only be repealed, altered or amended in accordance with Section 1, Article XI of the Constitution.

ARTICLE XXVII.

EXPENSE ASSESSMENT.

The Insurance Committee shall order an expense assessment in either class, at any time, upon application from the Secretary, showing there is less than five hundred dollars balance to the credit of the expense account. Such application shall contain a full statement of all receipts and expenditures for the expense account from the date of the last expense assessment.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Do you now believe the prophecy of six years ago, while in Kansas City? That "C. S. Wheaton would rule or ruin the O. R. C."

When the striking clause was spoken of in Rochester, I said C. S. Wheaton will use that with R. R. officials to get himself a position, or else, he will start opposition. My husband was invited to Sunday's meeting in New York. I said do not go, for it is Wheaton's work. My husband said: No! he thought not. To-day he is through with C. S. Wheaton for ever. This movement no doubt, will hurt the O. R. C. some, but it is not made up of our good members. Your articles in "RAILWAY CONDUCTOR" do not reach the mass, but the opposite party will advertise its untruthfulness in papers read by the many. I hope you may be directed by a higher power in all you say and do, for you have an oily serpent to deal with. Remember that out of twenty thousand only one hundred have listened to the tempter. If the O. R. C. owes C. S. Wheaton as he claims, I wish he could be paid, and we read in our next R. C. that we were rid of such a man

CONDUCTORS WIFE.

June 25th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Last week I received an invitation to attend a meeting to be held in New York City at the Coleman House, on Broadway, but no body could tell me the hour; so myself and a friend, an O. R. C. brother, went in the afternoon at two o'clock. In ten minutes after the meeting was opened I wished I was home. Mr. Wheaton in the chair called meeting to order, and invited the Committee on Ritual and By-laws to report. Mr. Ostrander said, before the Committee reported he wished everyone in the room to be sworn to secrecy; up jumped McVeigh from Philadelphia Division, 204, and he did defend us in fine style. They let us all stay in but the Committee on Rituals and By-laws did not report, though enough was heard to know that they were building a new Order to be called The Independent Order of Railway Conductors, or in other words I. O. of R. C., Mr. Wheaton as president, secretary and treasurer. Now don't you think it is clear gall and cheek? I think Mr Wheaton a fraud, and Mr. Chittenden. I did always think him a gentleman before this, but I have no words to express my contempt for him now. Frank Griffith, Ass't Sup't of the M. & E. Div. of the D. L. & W., was asked by a man from Hartford where he ran; "Oh," he said, "I am Ass't Sup't of the D. L. & W. R. R., but I have the welfare of the conductors at heart." That would do to tell, but the writer has known him for the last twenty years, the whole sum and substance of it is that the members of 168 have to follow the shepherds, who are Griffith, Chittenden & Co.; in regard to Mr. Devoe, I don't think he will have anything to do with them but I may be mistaken. I have been acquainted with these men for years and some of them are my best friends, but I can't follow them, I must stick to the O. R. C.

They appointed ten members, mostly from Division 201, to constitute a Grand Division to meet at the same time and place on July 6th, and all the Divisions that wished to join should send their delegates to the Grand Division of Wheaton & Co.,—and then they would give them the new work. Ostrander got up and said that he understood that Daniels had sent two members to be present to see what was done. I don't know whether he did or not. I was there, and if there is anything you wish to know that you think I could give you I would gladly do so. The editorial June 15th, was just to my taste. You may hear from me later.

GIANT.

SAVANAH, Ill., June 30th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Brother A. B. Garretson lately appointed G. S. C. to fill vacancy, visited this Div. No. 78 on the 25th, instant, and the few who were fortunate enough to be here, enjoyed quite a treat, in meeting a prince of good fellows, and one and all join me in saying, the Executive Committee made no mistake in appointing him, as it is only necessary to meet him to recognize his ability, for so arduous a position. I can insure Brother G. that he made a host of warm friends in our little town, and all will be anxious to meet him again. We hope we may have more ample notice of his coming next time. Confidence in our Grand Chief and minor officers brings us to a realization of the fact, that we are men among men, may it ever continue thus. All the boys will be pleased to learn that Brother M. E. Lucas has resumed his run, conductors being born, not made; when Mike Lucas was born, a conductor was born. Brother Hodges is still G. Y. M. for the C. B. & N. here and oversees the "Cut off, and come in," act. Brother A. T. Wolcott has been promoted to main line passenger run from Galena Branch, Brother Gleason of Div. 3, taking his run. The prospects for a large increase in our membership are very good, let the good work go on. The last issue of THE CONDUCTOR was a "rattler" and had the true ring to all its editorials. Div. 78 is "in line" and will be found from now on, with a solid unbroken front. If W. C. Cross loses his "grip" with the "Q" I'd recommend him to the fostering care of Chittenden, Ostrander & Co. We all look for THE CONDUCTOR as regularly as we do for pay day, only twice as often.

Yours truly in P. F.,

G. W. A.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Can you inform me when C. S. Wheaton will start west to organize his I. O. of R. C. It seems to me that from the move he has made, it was his intention to either rule or ruin. We have paid him a good salary and have been bound hand and foot, and now after such a majority vote elected Brother Clark to his place he rebels and tries to split our ranks. I feel confident that the O. R. C. can handle it's business, and I see no good reason why we will not succeed. I am glad that Brother Daniels remains with us and for us. Our Order has always been first; let us keep it so; we can, if we will only pull together.

Yours in P. F.,

E. J. DENIS, DIV. 41.

TERRE HAUTE, Ind., May 30th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—In all probability enough has and will be written about Rochester, and the twenty-second annual convention to fill several volumes of THE CONDUCTOR. While I was not the delegate from 92, I am in full accord with the most prominent departures made by that body, for you can't rub it out, but the Order was suffering from a severe case of the dry rot; but thanks to the intelligence and zeal displayed by the members composing the convention, new life has been infused into the Order. The good work has scarcely begun. Away with procrastination. From a human standpoint, it is perfectly natural that we want, "as we journey here below," something; I may not see it, but my children will have the benefit of it," is a saying too far fetched. Then why not let both generations have a chance, as there is no danger of a conductor ever getting more than his share of the good thing. I am away off again. When I commenced this letter I intended saying something of Rochester, its immense water power and fine hotels, and for $2.50 per day what a handsome little 2x6 sky-parlor you could get. There being so many other large cities it may be possible the convention will not fall to Rochester again soon. The members of Division 8 did all in their power to make the delegates and visiting Brothers comfortable, and you will not find in your travels north, south, east or west, any set of Brothers more deeply attached to the Order or its best interests.

The delegates, visiting Brothers and their wives, taking the special from Chicago via C. & A. owe very much to Brother O. H. Ayers who made all of the preliminary arrangements, and safely delivered the train to the "Nip," & O. at Marion. About all the Brothers will remember the delay caused by the washout near Mansfield, of something like ten hours. But we "got there all the same," for $1.10 or a penny a mile which will in some cases go a long ways as a lubricant.

Yours in P. F.,

C. H. ARTHUR.

RICHMOND, Va., June 2d, 1890.

To Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: As I have never had the pleasure of putting up the old X confed bill, I am willing to increase the reward to XX of the same currency for a few remarks from our C. S. through the RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

We had the pleasure of having with us March 23d, Lord Mayor of 224 and staff. Sorry they could not remain longer with us. Next time will try and show them Butchertown and Rockets, this being over looked owing to their short stay. We are drifting above sea level—added five to our list since March 1st, 1890, and several petitions on hand. At our last meeting had the pleasure of having with us Brother Moore of Charlotte Division and Brother E. T. Morris, of 152. All the boys are well pleased with the returns from the G. D.

Here I will give the movement of some of the boys on C. & O:

Richmond Div.—Bro. J. K. Michie, better known as "Horsemar Jack" punching tickets between Richmond and Bethel; Bro. J. B. Ellerton, pulling the string on F. F. V. trains between Richmond and Clifton Forge; Brother G. W. Tayler checks freight between Richmond and Charlottesville; Brother J. J. Robinson through freight and extra passenger; Brother R. F. Burnham shuffles cars in Charlottesville yards.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.: I have just received the CONDUCTOR, and in looking over contents I see that there is some of the members dissatisfied with the action that was taken by the Grand Division in striking out the strike clause. We must remember that it was done by a majority of the members, and that we have agreed to yield a cheerful compliance to the will of a constituted majority, then let us do so. The majority must rule, and we make nothing by kicking. So let us stand together and all have a good word for the Order, and assist our Grand Officers to build up the Order instead of trying to pull it down. I would like to ask the dissatisfied Brothers what they expect to gain by their action? I will say this much, they will gain the contempt of all good men. I would like to say this to the loyal Brothers: the Grand Division by a large majority of all votes cast have elected Brother Clark Grand Chief Conductor; for Brother Clark to be successful he will want the support of all loyal members. Let us give him that support and aid, and assist him in every way we can, and I have no doubt Brother Clark will make a good officer.

Yours in P. F.

R. T. HEDRICK.

Editor Railway Conductor.

THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR of July 1st came to hand about twenty minutes ago, and I laid aside everything until I read the article on the Ind. O. of R. C. While I had heard and even read something about C. S. Wheaton's treachery, and while I am not surprised, I am sorry that the Order maintained such a man so long, and those that he takes with him are no good in our Order, and each one that secedes I would see that their names were dropped from the Insurance Department just as soon as it can be done lawfully and right. I don't often step aside and write upon such matters, but I feel that every true man should sustain the Order and yourself, when a "Traitor" like Wheaton that has lived upon the fat of the Land for several years past, and put on the airs of a Lord is exposed. I should think Elmira would want to rid itself of such a citizen. I hope the boys on the old Erie will shun him as they would a rattle-snake. I pen these few lines to help you to stand firm, and use every fair means to destroy the enemies of our noble Order. Brother Daniels, right is might, and it will prevail. You have my good will. Hoping God will be on our side, I am

Sincerely yours in P. F.,

ERIE.

MR. E. A. FORD AND THE CONDUCTORS.

During the early spring a number of the oldest conductors on the Pennsylvania road were dismissed without any reason being assigned, presumably on account of the reports of spotters.

The newspapers in publishing the accounts of these dismissals published the report that Mr. E. A. Ford, General Passenger Agent of the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburgh, had said, "It is bad policy to keep a passenger conductor in that capacity for more than three or four years," some of them making extended editorial mention of the policy indicated by such a remark. This coming to the attention of Mr. Ford, the following letter was written by him to one of his assistants:

"MY DEAR SIR: Upon my return from an extended absence I have your letter, in which you advise that conductors are charging me with saying that "no passenger conductor should be permitted to run a train longer than two or three years."

"I never made such a statement, nor have I ever said anything about conductors which could be construed into such a statement. I believe that after a man is properly educated for the business of "conducting" a passenger train he should be retained in that position so long as he performs his duties promptly, faithfully, honestly, intelligently, politely and loyally, and is not physically or morally incapacitated, or until his merits entitle him to and secure for him promotion to a higher place under the well-known civil-service rules and policy of the Pennsylvania lines.

"You can hand this letter to any passenger conductor who may desire to have it for reference, and make such other use of it as you think proper in refuting the untruthful reports which have been so persistently circulated regarding my position in this matter.

Yours truly,

E. A. FORD.

The report that Mr. Ford had made the remark above quoted originated with Mr. Wheaton, ex-Grand Chief Conductor of the Order of Railway Conductors, although his statement was not that Mr. Ford had made such a remark, but that Mr. Ford was the author of a resolution which had been adopted by the Association of General Passenger and Ticket Agents, reciting that "the average life of a passenger conductor should be two years, and that the limit should be three years." Mr. Wheaton said, as authority for making this statement, that he had been shown a circular by a high official on a prominent railway, said circular having been issued by the General Passenger and Ticket Agents Association reciting the adoption of the above quoted resolution, and citing cases in support of the line of policy indicated, that is, that passenger conductors should be discharged after having run a train for two or three years.

Mr. Ford's letter was understood by many of those who were acquainted with the origin of the report as being evasive and simply denying the fact that he had said, that no passenger conductor should be permitted to run a train longer than two or three years, but did not deny the allegation that he was the author of the resolution which had been adopted by that association.

On account of this understanding by many of the members, a letter was addressed to Mr. Ford, by the writer, explaining the original report, and asking him in regard to its truthfulness, also informing him that many considered that his open letter was not a reply to the original accusation.

We give here the correspondence in regard to the matter, in full:

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, June 7, 1890.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

DEAR SIR: I have been handed by an employee of the Pennsylvania Company a copy of a letter written by you in which you say you have "never made such a statement, nor have I ever said anything about conductors which could be construed into such a statement," referring to the charge made against you, that you had said that, "No passenger conductor should be permitted to run a train longer than two or three years." This charge as quoted is not as I understand it to have been made originally. Some two years ago I was told by a gentleman whose word ought to be good authority, that he had seen a circular issued by the General Passenger Agents Association to the general managers of railways in the U. S., reciting the fact that a resolution worded something as follows: "Resolved, That the average life of a passenger conductor should be two years, and that in no case should it exceed three years," had been adopted by that association, and then reciting numerous instances where members or at least persons who claimed to be members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Brotherhood of Railroad Brakeman, had traveled over various railways being passed by the conductors in charge of trains in violation of the rules, as one of the arguments in support of the proposition made in the resolution, and as an inducement for them to give their support to the members of the General Passenger Agents Association in an effort to have changes made in accordance with that resolution. The gentleman also informed me that you were the author of the resolution and labored earnestly for its adoption, and it is from this that the charge referred to in your letter has originated. I have upon the authority of this gentleman repeated this charge at different times and places, and I have also heard him repeat it in meetings of conductors.

If you can consistently do so, under the rules of the above named association, I would be very glad to have you advise me as to whether or not such a resolution was adopted, and if adopted as to your position in regard to its adoption. I am well aware that if the above resolution, or anything of that character was adopted, that it is highly probable that you are not at liberty to give me any information in regard to it, though I presume there could be no objection to your stating the fact in case no action of the kind was taken, and if so I should be very glad to give it the widest publicity to counteract any impression that has gained ground with the conductors from my repetition of the matter as told me by the gentleman quoted.

It is perhaps but justice to you to say that many conductors who have heard the charge as outlined above, deem your late letter an evasion of the matter at issue. I was much surprised when I was first informed of the matter, particularly as I had been led to form an entirely different opinion of yourself from correspondence with you some years ago, but at the time I was informed in regard to this circular I believed the veracity of the person who informed me could not be questioned. Since that time, however, matters have occurred which would not make it surprising to me to learn that the matter had been at least considerably exaggerated.

Yours very truly,

WM. P. DANIELS,
G. S. & T.

PITTSBURG, Pa., June 28, 1890.

Mr. Wm. P. Daniels, Grand Secretary, Order of Railway Conductors, Cedar Rapids, Iowa:

DEAR SIR: Answer to your letter of 7th inst. has been delayed by a search of the record, as indicated by a letter herewith enclosed, from Mr. A. J. Smith, General Passenger Agent of the Lake Shore road, who is also Secretary of the National Association of General Passenger Agents, and has been for ten years or more.

As to the alleged resolution of the association

"that the average life of a passenger conductor should be two years, and in no case exceed three," I think the enclosed letter from Secretary Smith, stating that no such resolution was ever offered or discussed, will be conclusive.

I desire to add, however, in order that there may be no possible ground for charging an attempt to evade the question, that I never offered, neither heard any one else offer, at any meeting of the National Association of General Passenger Agents, or at any other meeting, the resolution referred to; or any other resolution which, by any possible construction, could be twisted into such a meaning.

Furthermore: I have never, in conversation or a discussion of the matter, expressed any such views on the subject as the alleged resolution you refer to would imply; for the very simple reason that I do not entertain any such sentiments.

It seems to me almost impossible that a body of such intelligent men as passenger conductors could really have seriously considered that there might be any truth in such an absurd statement. A very little thought on their part should have convinced reasonable men that it could not possibly have been true.

I am much obliged for your letter, however, and for the frank statement you have made of the case. At the same time, I cannot neglect the opportunity to suggest that I think, no matter how apparently reliable your information might have been on the subject, you ought to have given me an opportunity to prove its lack of foundation before aiding in circulating a story that could not but affect me adversely, in the absence of any chance to refute it.

May I ask that you will kindly do me the justice to give this denial as thorough circulation as you may have done concerning the charge referred to, and oblige,

Yours very truly,

E. A. FORD, G. P. A.

CLEVELAND, O., June 13, 1890.

E. A. Ford, Esq., G. P. A., Pennsylvania Company, Pittsburg, Pa.:

DEAR SIR: I have taken considerable time and gone through, carefully, the proceedings of the National Association of General Passenger and Ticket Agents, from September, 1879, to March, 1890, the period covered by my service as secretary of said association, for the purpose of answering your question in your favor to me of June 10th, not that I regarded this as at all necessary, but because I wished to be very sure before I answered. When I first saw in our daily papers that you had been quoted as saying that the average life of a passenger conductor should not be more than two years, I felt sure that some one had started this report for the sake of doing you some injury. There was never any resolution such as Mr. Daniels speaks of introduced in our association, consequently you could not have supported it. There has never been any resolution passed by the association, which has gone to the general managers, except one in March, 1880, which relates to the payment of commissions to ticket brokers, and another in the same month, which relates to the issuing of passes by the passenger department on account of the freight department, and in September, 1884, another circular to the managing officers, relating to the practice, which at that time was indulged in by some roads, of giving transferable transportation to newspapers for advertising purposes.

It gives me pleasure to be able to report on this matter in this way. I have not looked through the proceedings of the C. T. Association, because you have copies of that association's meetings, and can do that yourself. I return Mr. Daniel's letter herewith. Yours truly, (Signed) A. J. SMITH, Sec'y.

We believe that the above correspondence settles the matter and entirely and absolutely vindicates not only Mr. Ford, but the G. P. A. Association, from any accusation of the kind, and we only regret that the matter was not investigated long ago.

A letter has been written to the gentleman who, Mr. Wheaton claims, showed him the circular above mentioned, and his reply is, "I have no recollection of the matter you refer to or of any conversation on the subject."

It seemed to us very strange that Mr. Wheaton should tell any such falsehood without any basis whatever, and in order to satisfy ourselves as to whether there might have been anything upon which such a story could have been founded and grow by exaggeration, a prominent railway officer was asked if he had ever received or had ever known of any circular being issued by the general passenger agents, or any other association of railway officers, that could possibly lead to any such inference as that a resolution of that character had been adopted; the answer was very prompt and decisive: "No, sir; I have never received anything of the kind and have never known of anything of the kind being issued." Members of the Order can very readily verify the statement that Mr. Wheaton spread this report by referring to his circular for the month of September, 1888.

STILL "SACRIFICING."

C. S. Wheaton has decided not to accept any of the numerous offers of positions that have been made to him by a large number of the most prominent railways. He has had, so he says, so many offers, all of them so much better positions in a financial way, than the one lately held by him, that he has been seriously embarrassed to choose between them, and he has removed the embarrassment by refusing all. It is of no use for railway officials to tempt him; he lives not for himself but for his fellow conductors: It is a well known fact that for years he has sacrificed his personal comforts and interests in order to serve us. That this is true cannot be denied for "He himself hath said it." He has in the past, declined many offers, among them, a superintendency on the Northern Central, a General Passenger

Agency on another road, and this when, had he "consulted his own interests," he would, as he told us at St. Louis two years ago, have written his "resignation right there," and have handed it to "that Brother right there," but he did not, and continued to waste his valuable time and energy on us, and incidentally to draw the paltry sum of three thousand dollars per annum, with "expenses."

The "independent" superintendents should feel deeply gratified to him for his present sacrifices in their behalf.

THE CONDUCTOR thinks that his high sense of honor and his idea of what is due to his employers induced him to act somewhat foolishly in declining all the positions offered him. We know something of their desirability in the way of light duties and it is our candid opinion that he could have accepted all and still had plenty of time to devote to the "independents."

NOTHING TO SAY.

We publish in another part of this number, several extracts from the Elmira Telegram of July 6th, among them an interview, very brief indeed, between a Telegram reporter and Mr. Wheaton, the latter's portion of it being to decline to say anything for "private and personal reasons, until the proper time came." This "proper time" and "due season" are oft-told tales that are getting hoary-headed and white-whiskered from old age and frequent use. It is but a short time since, in a letter making reflections upon the character of the writer, Mr. Wheaton used the following language: "At sometime after I have severed my official connection with the Order, I will show to both you and Brother — proofs that cannot be gainsayed that the imputations that have been put upon me are false. I cannot do so now, else I should be charged with an endeavor to curry favor and working for re-election. I shall, however, take opportunity to vindicate myself when the proper time comes." This letter was written just about one month after Mr. Wheaton had "humbly apologized" to and "begged pardon" of the writer and had offered to resign his position in order to set matters right. He certainly cannot be accused of working for re-election if he will give us the proofs that cannot be "gainsayed" now. This threat that we will, at some future time, hear from Mr. Wheaton "in a convincing and exhaustive manner" is rather indefinite, and unless there is a material change in the actions of the man hereafter this "due season" will be one of those "tomorrows" that never come.

The charges made against Mr. Wheaton, if true, make a good basis for a criminal prosecution. The writer made them personally in order to relieve THE CONDUCTOR, and to take the whole responsibility of them. Let us see whether Mr. Wheaton's "convincing and exhaustive" explanation will be made to a jury or to his personal friends in secret, where it cannot be contradicted.

When Mr. Wheaton left here June 10th he was requested to return the latter part of the month in order to give some testimony in a suit then pending. As soon as it was learned that he had taken an active part in the meeting at New York, and had slandered the Order by saying that it owed him money which he could not collect, it was determined by the writer to file an information and arrest Mr. Wheaton on the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, when he returned to the state of Iowa; had this been done it would have been for actions that have not yet been made public. When Mr. Wheaton returned the attorney for the Order decided that his evidence would not be necessary, and he would not be used as a witness; he further advised against the arrest of Mr. Wheaton as it would give grounds for a charge of bad faith on our part towards him, and would look as if we had induced him to come back here merely for the purpose of having him arrested.

It was the intention of the writer to bring several of these matters before the last Grand Division, and give Mr. Wheaton an opportunity to disprove these charges at that place, but owing to the very urgent solicitations of some of his (Wheaton's) friends, as well as those who were not particularly friendly toward him but who deprecated anything of the kind, and who felt more pity than anything else for the predicament that the man was in at the time, the portion of the report referring to these matters was suppressed, and had Mr. Wheaton acted straightforward and had not made false accusations against the Order of Railway Conductors since his defeat at Rochester, these matters would never have been given to the public and he would have been permitted to go his way in peace. There is a point, however, beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue, and Mr. Wheaton has certainly reached that point and need expect no forbearance from us hereafter.

The Telegram, in its questions, incorrectly quotes in saying that Wheaton is charged with sending testimony to Mr. Woodward. The charge is, that the testimony was sent out, we do not know who it was sent to; but we believe that it went to Mr. Woodward either directly or indirectly. The whole investigation was a farce so far as it purported to be anything more than a voluntary matter, as Mr. Wheaton had no more right to hold a trial of members than THE CONDUCTOR has to order Wheaton and the seceders here for "investigation" now. The place for such investigation was in the Divisions where the members belonged. After the farce was completed, Wheaton had no shadow of right to mutilate or send out the evidence to any one unless it was on request of some division whose members were concerned, regularly made under seal.

A DESERVING MEASURE.

We desire to call the attention of our readers to a bill introduced in the United States Senate in January by Mr. George of Mississippi.

The present rule in regard to liability of railways for physical injuries, is that where caused by the negligence of a co-employee, the injured person can not recover; some courts have held that a conductor and brakeman were co-employees within the meaning of the law; others that they were not, and in fact the findings are almost as various as the cases on record. Section 1, does away with this freedom from liability for the negligence of a co-employee except in the case of injury to a person who had authority to dismiss the person whose negligence caused such injury. Section 2 wipes out any forced agreement or as they were universally called when first introduced in the west, "death warrants" and while some courts have held such contracts void it would simplify matters very much if this section should become a law. Section 3, however, contains the most important provision of the entire measure and if it can be adopted, will have a very powerful influence in persuading railway companies to adopt safety appliances. Just as soon as it becomes apparent to them, that the lives and limbs of employees is likely to be more expensive than modern appliances, just so soon will the appliances be adopted without the necessity of compulsory legislation and if the fact that a person was injured by a car that was not equipped with the safest known coupler, is made to establish a right to recover, it will be a powerful argument in favor of automatic couplers.

The trainmen of the United States should not permit this bill to slumber undisturbed in the hands of the Senate committee to which it was referred, but should unanimously demand that it be reported favorably, promptly passed by the Senate and then move upon the House enmasse. Let every reader of THE CONDUCTOR write to the senators from his (or her, for the wives are not uninterested,) state, and urge their support of this bill. Write to Senator Cullom; chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor and urge that it be reported immediately.

A Bill by Mr. George, to protect employes and servants engaged in foreign and inter-state commerce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any sailor or other servant or employee employed in navigating any ship, steamboat, or other vessel engaged in commerce between the United States and any foreign country, or in commerce between the States, and any employee or servant of any person or company engaged in carrying passengers or property by railway transportation through the whole or a part of two or more States, or between the United States and any foreign country, such servant or employee being employed in such business for such person or company, shall be entitled to recover from his employer or master damages for any injury he may sustain in such employment through the careless, negligent, or unskillful act or omission of his employer or master, or through the careless, negligent, or unskillful act or omission of his fellow-servant engaged on the same service: Provided, That the master or mate of any vessel, or the directors, president, vice-president, or superintendent of a railroad company, or any officer, agent or employee of such railroad company or of the owners of such vessel, who has the power to employ or discharge the employee or servant by whose act or omission an injury may be caused, shall not, if injured by such act or omission, be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act:

SEC. 2. That no rule or regulation of such employer or master or company, and no agreement between him or it and any servant or employee, shall exempt said employer, master, or company from the full liability imposed by this act, but every such rule, regulation, or agreement as to the persons protected by this act be, and the same is hereby, declared null and void.

SEC. 3. That where an injury shall be sustained of an employee whilst engaged in coupling cars on any railroad it shall be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company that coupling arrangements, about which said employee was then engaged, were not of the safest kind then known and in use.

THE USUAL WAY.

When anything goes wrong with a railroad company, the officers are in many cases, at no loss to find some one to blame; it doesn't make much difference whether it is the infraction of some law or an accident to some train and while there are notable exceptions, it does not usually make much difference where the blame actually is, some subordinate must shoulder it. A contracting freight agent of the M. C. railway violated the I. S. law and while there is but little if any question as to the real responsibility, the prosecution against the railway and its officers is dismissed and Mr. Street is fined $3,000. He was promptly dismissed from his position by the virtuous company as soon as the rate cutting became public. In this matter Mr. Street's experience is only that of a great many conductors who have learned that rules are not made so much to be enforced and obeyed as to protect the companies. If a conductor lives up to a rule literally and results are bad, he is condemned, many times dismissed for not "using good judgment," being told that "rules cannot be made to fit all emergencies" which is true. If he uses his judgement and the result is bad he is "fired" for disobeying rules and if he ventures a protest as to the probable result of a literal obedience, is told, that is none of his business; "there's the rule; you did not obey it." In Mr. Street's case, if he did not get his share of the freight, the company had no use for him: It is not at all likely that his "cut rates" were unknown to those over him but in all probability he had the approval of his superior; his fault was in getting found out by the public and for that he is punished.

The writer during his experience in train service, has been judged by results, but for the most of the time, it was our good fortune to be under officers who approved the use of good judgement even if it included a violation of rules where circumstances seemed to require it.

AFFAIRS OF THE RAILWAYS.

E. A. FORD TALKS OF PASSENGER CONDUCTORS AND THEIR RELATIONS TO THE COMPANIES.

E. A. Ford General Passenger Agent of the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburg, spent a few hours in the city yesterday. In speaking of the fact that some of the conductors on the Pennsylvania lines were disgruntled because they had been asked to give a bond in the Guarantee Company of North America, he said that this was a mistake on the part of the conductors. When they gave a personal bond, a $3,000 bond was required; with the Guarantee Company they are asked to give but a $500 bond, and the fact that the guarantee company gave bond for them was complimentary to the conductors, as the company would not assume the risk until they well knew the character of the men bonded. He could see no reason why a passenger conductor should not give a bond as well as a station agent or any other employee of the company who handles the company's money; it was simply a business transaction, and he would look with suspicion upon any conductor who was indignant over the matter. Mr. Ford then went on to say that he favored the paying of larger salaries to passenger conductors; he wanted them to show a disposition to be honorable and fair with the company which employed them. He did not wish it to be understood that he thought all passenger conductors were dishonest—far from that; but he disliked to see conductors oppose all efforts to place them in the right light before the traveling public by finding fault with every move made to bring about such a result. He wanted the conductors to be well paid, and in turn wanted them to say to the officials of the company: "If there is any plan by which we can aid you in knowing that you get every dollar collected, and cast off this stigma of dishonesty, we are with you."

heart and hand; if you want us to give a duplex receipt for every cash fare paid, we want to do it." There was no reason for saying that a company was suspicious of their conductors because they ask them to give a duplex receipt; it was simply business. If he paid an agent of the Journal $25 he would want a receipt for it, not that he thought the agent would present the bill again, but simply because it was business. Right here, he said, the passenger conductors have made the mistake. They (not all of them, of course, but numbers of them) become indignant whenever the railroad company which employs them adopts some new method to show that the conductor turns in all the money which he collects, when exactly the reverse should be the case. They should be pleased that the company was trying to place them as a body above suspicion. He then cited several cases where, had certain conductors had such protection, they would not have been charged with dishonesty when they were carrying out their orders from superior officer in collecting fares from persons who claimed exemption from paying fares. He wanted to see the day when the position of a passenger conductor would be so protected that there would not be the least opportunity to charge dishonesty, and when the conductor was paid a salary which would make him feel that his services were appreciated.

The above from an Indianapolis paper purports to be an interview with Mr. E. A. Ford, General Passenger Agent of the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburg. There are various reasons why conductors object to applying for bonds to any of the various guarantee companies, and particularly the Guarantee Company of North America, a foreign company with headquarters in Montreal. As a general rule, refusal to give a bond by any one employed in a position of trust, is cause for suspicion, but we believe that when all the facts are fully known to the public, that the great majority of conductors will be relieved of any possible suspicion as to any wrong motive in their objections to "guarantee bonds." In the first place, conductors believe that it is an imposition for any employer to compel the employe to pay for a bond, when the employer dictates as to where that bond shall be procured, and particularly so when they firmly believe that the men who dictate as to where they shall procure bonds are stockholders in the company indicated and derive a pecuniary benefit thereby. We do not mean by this to charge that Mr. Ford is in any way interested in the Guarantee Company or any other, but there is a very prevalent belief that other officers of the P. R. R. are large stockholders in that company and that that is the reason that company is indicated. The conductors on the P. R. R. west of Pittsburg now give bonds in the sum of $3,000, or at least have done so, procuring such bonds wherever they chose, and when that was the case, no complaints were heard. It would seem that in common justice, if guarantee bonds are required and the employes are compelled to pay the premiums, that they should at least have the right to select the company.

There is, however, another and more potent objection, and that is to the system pursued by the guarantee companies, and particularly by the Montreal company. In making an application for a bond to any of these companies, the applicant must give a complete history, for life if the application is to the Montreal company, and for at least ten years previous to the date of the application if to any other. The applicant must also give the name and address of any and all previous employers; these employers are then asked under a pledge of secrecy, as to the applicant, and should one of them have a feeling of enmity toward the applicant, he can prevent the issue of the bond and place a stigma on the applicant for life. That this very thing has been done in the past, in several cases, is a fact known to the writer.

A short time ago, two conductors were dismissed by a well known railway, and all the information given them was that "their reports were not satisfactory," an indirect way of accusing a conductor of dishonesty without making a legal liability. The cases of these two men were taken up, and after six months they succeeded in getting from the officials the particulars of the accusation against them, and readily proved them false and were restored to their positions. Suppose, as is often the case, that no particulars could be obtained and the men were compelled to seek employment elsewhere, and when that employment was obtained, they were required to apply to a guarantee company for a bond. In their application they are required to give former employment, cause of leaving and employer's name. After the applications had been filed, the company receiving them apply to the previous employer and receive the information that the men were dismissed for dishonesty. As a consequence, the bond is refused, the men "black-listed" without any opportunity for redress whatever, for the companies distinctly specify that "in no case will the reason for a refusal to issue a bond be given," and while it is the opinion of the writer that they could be compelled to give the reason and to show up the private correspondence received by them, it is an unsettled question, and even if such a fact was established, but few conductors are in a position to attempt any legal redress. Conductors do not believe that they should be asked to subject themselves to the cost of this bond and the chances of being ruined for life without redress, by some official, who, though perhaps well-meaning himself, takes as gospel the statement of some irresponsible vagabond of a spotter, or some other minor official who may be glad of so good an opportunity to stab in the dark, and thus vent a personal spite.

Mr. Ford may be absolutely certain that the conductors will gladly join him in any movement that will be fair and just to them, and they will say to him, "If there is any plan by which we can aid you in knowing that you get every dollar collected, and thus cast off this stigma of dishonesty, we are with you heart and hand"; but they will also say, "We object to any system that places us at a disadvantage or brands us as thieves in advance." They will further say, "If you are sincere in your expression that conductors should receive larger salaries and will influence the Pennsylvania R. R. Co. to pay us a reasonable salary, we will even submit to the manifest disadvantages of the guarantee bond, only asking that we be allowed to choose the company to which we shall apply."

Conductors do not object to any reasonable or proper surveillance, nor do they expect to be relieved from it any more than any other class of people in positions of trust, but they do not want to be placed under the surveillance of such men as C. J. Lynch or J. Ward Boyles, nor do they wish to give their personal enemies opportunity to secretly knife them.

To Help Him Out.

It is said that a subscription list will be quietly passed around the board of trade of Chicago by a number of big shippers, on Monday morning, with the view of securing a purse large enough to pay the fine of $3,000 imposed by Judge Blodgett a few days ago upon Arthur Street, formerly assistant freight agent of the Michigan Central railroad, who was found guilty of granting secret rebates to a local grain house and thereby discriminating against other shippers.

Street's case is a peculiarly unfortunate one, and the general comment on the action of the Michigan Central authorities in the matter is extremely denunciatory. All the other indicted official were allowed to go free, and even the indictment against the company as a corporation was quashed. It is admitted that Street acted directly under instructions from his superior officers, but notwithstanding this, the company dismissed him as soon as the affair became public property and devoted its energies towards saving the scalps of those more influentially connected with the road. Street is so financially embarrassed that he was unable to employ counsel to defend him, and to make matters worse, as a result of the trouble, his wife has become deranged. He relied on the statement of his indicted ex-associates that the company would make a strong fight and found himself left in the lurch. The whole affair has excited a feeling of disgust among railroad men generally.

A Tramp Steals a Train.

A tramp with more than the usual amount of "gall" possessed by his species, did a very peculiar piece of work at Earlville, Iowa. While the work gang of the Milwaukee road was eating breakfast at a boarding house near the railroad track, a tramp jumped into the cab of the locomotive attached to the work train standing at the depot, and opened the throttle wide. The train pulled out with lightning speed, and although the railroad men saw it start they were unable to overtake it. Ten minutes later a freight train pulled in, the engine was detached and the crew started in pursuit of the stolen train. Just this side of Panama, seven miles west, the work train was found standing on the track, but no trace was discovered of the thief. Steam was up in the engine, but the tramp was evidently afraid to run by the town, and so deserted his stolen property. The engineer expresses the belief that the tramp must be an engineer.—Exchange.

Union Pacific Statement.

BOSTON, June 29, 1890.

The Union Pacific preliminary statement for May shows the immense increase in gross earnings of $899,546; operating expenses increased $875,786, making the increase in net earnings only $23,760. President Adams says there are three reasons for the large percentage of operating expenses this season—additional service, fast train between Omaha and Portland exclusively for the United States mail, which barely returned a new dollar for an old one, and the expenditure of enormous amounts of money for the repair of equipment. Since January 1 to April 30, $1,700,000 was charged to this latter account, being an increase of $550,000 compared with the same time in 1889. From present appearances every wheel will be wanted the last four months of this year to handle the traffic. The Columbia river must be bridged, and this can be done at Vancouver at a cost of perhaps $1,000,000. As to the reorganization of the coal department, the company has under consideration the subject of developing the commercial branch of the business and something will probably be done by means of a company organized and controlled by the Union Pacific, but definite plans have not been formulated.

The B. of L. E. Journal and B. of L. F. Magazine for July are on our table, and both are fully up to the usual standard, though the former cannot forego the satisfaction of a thrust at the officers of the Order, and the latter indulges in a chuckle over the remark said to have been made by Mr. Wilkinson at Denver. We forbear comment on the remark until we know that Mr. Wilkinson is correctly quoted.

The Gazette of this city is about as lively as any of the dailies that come to this office. The fact that Editor Faulkes is an old time railway employe may in part account for it. Fred is a Republican (at least he says he is, and he ought to know), but he is independent enough to talk Democratic doctrine sometimes, whereupon some of the "leaders" occasionally undertake to discipline him. All such usually retire for repairs after the first attempt.

The Switchmen's Journal for July preaches a short sermon on the mutual obligations of labor organizations and the members thereof, which is pertinent and applicable to the Order of Railway Conductors, if to no other besides the S. M. A. A. It also dissects and exposes the arbitration legislation now pending in Congress. In 1886, when a similar bill was pending, we found ourselves alone in opposing it. We are glad to note the position of the Journal and wish that all our readers might read the article and follow the advice therein. Space forbids or it would be reproduced in these columns.

The Railway Service Gazette comes filled with its usual unanswerable logic, of which the following, condensed from a multitude of words, is a fair sample.

Starting with the unquestioned proposition that "there's lots of good and able men in the Order," it admits that "Clark is a good man," but "he is controlled by Daniels," and "Daniels is a conceited fool," ergo "the Gazette is a great paper, its editor a great man," and "the able men in the Order, including Clark, all permit themselves to be fooled by idiot Daniels."

The "Majah" isn't afraid of anything, as will be noticed by an extract on another page, especially since we have promised to let him fight alone, consequently he "pins" the black flag to his mast and charges everything but the "pass."

Perhaps the most striking feature of the July Century is the long-expected debate on "The Single Tax," by Edward Atkinson and Henry George. Mr. Atkinson opens the discussion in a paper on "A Single Tax Upon Land"; Mr. George replies in "A Single Tax on Land Values," and there is a rejoinder by Mr. Atkinson.

Another article that marks this number of The Century is the beginning of The Century's "Prison Series," the first paper being a thrilling account of the life of "A Yankee in Andersonville," by Dr. T. H. Mann, accompanied by a plan and pictures made from rare photographs.

The first of two papers on "Provence" describes and brilliantly illustrates an unhackneyed region of the Old World: that part of France which is like Italy—with its splendid Roman remains, its palace of the Popes, and its associations with Petrarch and Laura. Miss Preston, who wrote the article, is the well-known translator of "Mireio," by the great Provencal poet Mistral.

Dr. Edward Eggleston in an illustrated article tells the story of "Nathaniel Bacon, the Patriot of 1676,"—and prints for the first time certain details obtained from manuscripts recently acquired by the British Museum and the Congressional Library.

John Burroughs, who has not lately appeared as often as usual in the magazine, prints a characteristic out-of-door paper entitled "A Taste of Kentucky Blue-grass." The pictures are by a Kentucky artist, W. L. Maclean.

Joseph Jefferson, in his charming Autobiography, describes his early experiences in Peru and Panama; he also tells how he revived the play of "Rip Van Winkle," in London, with the literary assistance of Dion Boucicault. He also has an amusing chapter on some English relatives.

Mrs. Amelia Gere Mason describes the "Women of the French Solons of the 18th Century"; and the engraver Cole presents us with one of his most exquisitely engraved blocks—the frontispiece of the number—after a painting by Philip-pino Lippi.

The fiction of the number consists of the second part of the anonymous "Anglomaniacs"; the ninth part of Mrs. Barr's "Olivia"; a story, "The Reign of Reason," by Viola Roseboro, (a young Southern writer with a rapidly growing reputation); and a complete novelette, "Little Venice," by Grace Denio Litchfield, with a full-page illustration by Mary Hallock Foote.

The Editorial Topics are: "On Lack of Conscience as a Means of Success," "New York's Reformed Electoral System," "A Recent Sermon," and "Tom-Toms in Politics." There is an Open Letter on "The Inside Facts of Lincoln's Nomination."

The July Wide Awake gives the young people the fun and the sentiment of the month; base-ball and independence celebrations and patriotic reminiscences abound from beginning to end. The frontispiece illustrates "The Little Fifer," a true story by Helen M. Winslow of a little lad of '76, who was missing from his home in Shirley, Mass., and turned up in Washington's camp, where his father found him at last. Mrs. Clara Doty Bates has a true story, too, a capital one, of "Grandfather's Musket," relating the escapades of two enterprising boys who built an Independence Day cannon out of a precious Revolutionary relic of Valley Forge and Lundy's Lane. "What's in a Name"? chronicles the trials of a little school girl whose name was "Independence Day." "The Freedom's Fourth at the Capitol," by M. S., describes the first Fourth at Washington after the Emancipation. "An Old Flag" is the famous "starry flag" of Paul Jones and his war ship, the Bon Homme Richard, now owned in the family of one of Jones's lieutenants, at Cottage City, Mass. "Indian Base-ball Players" is by one of the Indians graduating from Hampton, Mr. Thomas L. Sloan of the Omaha Reservation. It gives an account of several Indian ball-clubs, with photographs of the "Hampton Indian Nine," and "Ten Little Indians" of Hampton; the article is worth reading for the young author's progressive ideas in regard to his race. "Craps" is a spirited New Orleans story by James B. Cable, the Brother of the novelist George W. Cable. "Two Wills" by Mrs. Jesse Benton Freemont, will command attention. "How Rebecca Harding Went to School," by Grace W. Oliver, shows that all "schooling" is not in the school-room. The extravaganza of

"The Quest of the Whipping-Boy," by Georgiana Washington continues to be amusing; the Acadian Folk-Lore series by Miss McLeod is kept up with spirit. Mrs. White's article in her series, "Business Openings for Young Women," relates to a comparatively new "opening," that of "guides," an excellent and entirely practicable occupation. But perhaps nothing in the number will be read with more interest than the July section of Mr. Ward's serial, "The New Senior at Andover," it concerns the practice of "hazing," and is strongly written.

The Railroad Trainmen's Journal for July continues its discussion of the federation problem, replying to the U. P. E. Magazine. We do not see the latter, but judging from ex parte testimony, except as quotations are used by Bro. Rogers, we are inclined to think he has the best of the argument on the "side issues" at least. The Journal in the past has not only taken care of itself and the association it represents, but, in common with some other publications, assumed the task of directing the Order of Railway Conductors. There has been a radical change in this respect, under its present management.

In this connection, we quote with a hearty endorsement, the following from its columns:

"Every member of the Brotherhood has an undeniable right to criticise the Journal. But in the name of common decency let it not be done with a coward's method. For three months there has been a department in the Journal for the sole purpose of debating questions touching the welfare of the order, and there is no longer the shadow of an excuse for assailing a man where he has no chance to defend himself. The attack on the Journal in the absence of the editor was bad enough, but what must be said of the personal assault upon a man's character? Can a human being be guilty of anything so debasing, so sneaking and so cowardly, as to strike with the weapon of slander a man who is helpless to resist? There is but one way for the man who made that cowardly assault to prove that he is not guilty of intentional calumny, and that is to furnish the names and addresses of the persons who gave him such information."

The July St. Nicholas has several reminders of Revolutionary days and the "glorious fourth." In "The Baby a Prisoner of War" Margaret Forster Owen relates the capture and return of a grand-niece of Washington. Whether the incident is authentic or not, the story is amusing and cleverly told. H. A. Ogden has gracefully illustrated it. Julia C. R. Dorr tells in verse of "The Armorer's Errand," a preliminary to the storming of Fort Ticonderoga; Laura E. Richards and Jane Ellis Joy contribute amusing verse about the Fourth and M. M. D., in the Jack-in-the-Pulpit, gives a side view of the same inspiring subject.

The sports of summer are prominent: Mrs. Pennell writes charmingly of "Cycling," Mr. Pennell furnishing the illustrations; F. W. Pangborn tells "How to Sail a Boat," and Edward Burgess, the distinguished designer of the great prize-winners, the Puritan, Mayflower, Volunteer, and others hardly less famous, has made for St. Nicholas readers complete working-drawings of a boy's sail-boat; Camp's invaluable base-ball series is continued, and no ball-player can afford not to read these articles. Simple enough to instruct the novice, they are so comprehensive as to be of aid even to the expert.

H. W. Henshaw contributes a study of the commoner American hawks, which are described and pictured in such a way as to leave no excuse for the ignorant slaughter of useful varieties, which is denounced by the writer.

A most natural and amusing little story is that by H. H. Ewing, describing "How Hugh went to the Party," which could not but be true in all respects.

Besides the articles spoken of, there are illustrated poems by Anna M. Pratt Harriet Prescott Spofford, Oliver Herford, Margaret Johnson, Katharine Pyle, and Mrs. Richards; continued stories and sketches; and the departments.

No reader could fail to find articles to his taste in a list of features so various in character and so excellent in quality.

Scribner's Magazine for July begins the eighth volume of that periodical, which promises to contain many features of interest. This issue is especially well suited to the season—containing articles on Surf-bathing, the building of Birds-nests, and on Suburban Houses—all of them elaborately illustrated. Robert Louis Stevenson sends a poem from an obscure island in Polynesia; a prominent physician of New Orleans tells of a voyage which he took in a slaver many years ago; the editor of the Evening Post discusses the citizen's rights to his own reputation, and there is plenty of entertaining fiction in the second installment of the striking anonymous serial, "Jerry," the short story by the author of "Expiation," and the conclusion of Harold Frederic's successful historical novel, which has been so widely noticed during the year.

Bruce Price (who has built many successful houses at Tuxedo and other important places around New York) writes of "The Suburban House" with enthusiasm and full knowledge of the necessities and comforts which it demands, as well as of its picturesque aspects. He has kept in view the houses of moderate cost, ranging from five to twenty thousand dollars, although several illustrations are given of the grander style of suburban house. The article will be found full of practical hints for those contemplating the building of a home. This article is the third in the series on homes.

E. L. Godkin, in his acute essay, shows how strong a force is exerted in the state and on the individual by the love of social approbation, and how necessary it is that the right of a man to his own reputation should be adequately protected. He makes some pertinent suggestions as to the infringements of these rights by newspapers, and finds some remedy in more speedy trial for libel suits, and, above all, in developing a sentiment which shall cast social discredit on those newspaper men who invade the privacy of homes.

"The House of Tembinoka" is one of the first-fruits of Robert Louis Stevenson's long voyaging among the islands of the Pacific. It is the song celebrating his parting from the King of Apemama, and is full of barbaric imagery. The illustrations are from original photographs of the king and his subjects.

"The last Slave-ship" is the romantic, but entirely true narrative of a voyage on a slaver from New Orleans to the Congo and back to the West Indies in 1859. The author, George Howe, M. D., had just been graduated at a medical school, and accepted an opportunity to go with some freedmen to Liberia. That part of the voyage accomplished, all disguises were abandoned and the vessel sailed to the Congo for twelve hundred slaves. Dr. Howe's description of the voyage is frank, picturesque, and exciting. It will undoubtedly be widely read, as probably the last record of an eye-witness of the slave traffic as carried on in an American vessel.

"Surf and Surf-bathing," by Duffield Osborne, describes the peculiarities and dangers of the sport, with a series of sketches showing how best to ride the breakers, combat the undertow, dive through waves, etc. The author, from wide experience, gives much practical advice to sea-bathers.

Mr. Wheaton in Town.

Cal. Wheaton, ex-head of the staunch old Conductors' Brotherhood, who is credited with trying to get up a "kickers branch," has been in Elmira for the past three or four days, but is very reticent about his new "mutual admiration society." Perhaps it is just as well as "to a man up a tree," or, on the ground, for that matter, it is very difficult to see how anything in justification of the seceders' movement can be said.—Elmira Sunday Telegram, July 6th.

At a regular meeting of Alexandria Division No. 158, held June 22, 1890, the following resolutions of esteem and respect were unanimously adopted, upon the death of Mrs. Sadie Mankin, wife of our Brother and Chief Conductor, Charles Mankin, which occurred June 15th in the city of Alexandria, after a brief illness:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to visit the home of our Chief Conductor, Brother Charles Mankin and remove by death a devoted and loving wife and mother, thereby causing sorrow to their happy home; and,

WHEREAS, We bow in humble submission to the will of the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe in removing this loving wife and mother from midst of husband, children and friends; therefore, be it, Resolved, 1st, That the heartfelt sympathy of Alexandria Division be extended to our Chief Conductor and family in their hour of sorrow and affliction, and tender them our aid and support.

Resolved, 2d, That, while words of sympathy cannot entirely allay the sufferings of such deep sorrow placed upon our Chief Conductor and family, we can only point them to Him who in a like trying hour cried aloud, "Thy will not mine be done."

Resolved, 3d, That, as a token of respect and esteem toward our Chief Conductor and family, these resolutions be spread upon our minutes, a copy be tendered our Chief Conductor, and a copy be sent to THE CONDUCTOR for publication.

FT. WAYNE, Ind., June 29th, 1890.

At our last regular meeting of Wayne Division 119 O. R. C., the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, Brother Schofield who was so suddenly and unexpectedly called from our midst on the 30th day of May.

Resolved, That we, with humble submission, say: Thy will, Oh God, not mine be done.

Resolved, That we through his death have lost a true and noble Brother, and his wife, a good and true husband.

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved widow, our deepest sympathy in this her greatest loss.

Resolved, That we, the members and friends of Wayne Division, who attended the funeral of our late Brother, do, most heartily return our thanks and gratitude, for the courtesies shown by the officials of the N. Y. C. & St. L. road in running a special free train from Ft. Wayne to Bellevue, and return, for all those wishing to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this Division, a copy presented to the widow, and one to superintendent C. D. Gorham, and S. K. Blair train master of the N. Y. C. & St. L. road at Ft. Wayne, and also that they be published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

• BUTLER, Ind., July 6th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

At a special meeting of Butler Division No. 207 Order of Railway Conductors, held at Butler, July 6th, 1890, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted in the memory of the deceased wife of our beloved Brother, George F. Stoner.

WHEREAS, God in His infinite mercy and wisdom has called the wife of our beloved Brother home, leaving him and his two little girls to mourn the loss of a good wife and mother, that as each and every Brother felt the distress and condole with their Brother in his irreparable loss; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we extend our untold sympathy to him in his severest hour of trial, urging him to be reconciled as God doeth all things well. If he only asks he will receive. Blessed is he that puts his trust in God.

Resolved, That these resolutions be placed upon our minutes, and that a copy be sent to Brother Stoner, and that they be published in THE CONDUCTOR and Butler Review.

MENTIONS

We are glad to learn that Bro. G. W. Ashford has been fully vindicated from the spotter's charge against him and that he is reinstated.

We wish to call the attention of our readers to the change in the advertisement of Messrs. James P. Wathier & Co. Their prices are certainly extremely low and there can be no question as to the responsibility of the firm.

Bro. F. S. Butler, G. O. S., has been confined to his bed by sickness nearly all the time since his return from Rochester, but at this writing is able to be up and hopes to be ready for business soon—a hope that will be echoed by all.

It is rumored that the committee on the Northern Pacific has been successful, and that hereafter that company will save its usual $50,000 annual appropriation for "secret service" and pay its passenger conductors $150 per month.

We regret sincerely to learn that Brother James B. White fell under a train at Huntsville, Ala., a few days ago and had his foot so badly crushed as to necessitate amputation. He is a member of 148, and in the employ of the Memphis & Charleston railway as land agent.

In response to the request of a delegation of brakemen, General Manager Halstead of the "Lackawanna," has issued an order that hereafter the brakemen shall be furnished with two uniforms per year free, the same as has been done with the conductors heretofore.

W. J. Grey, a member of Division No. 17, has forsaken the vicissitudes of a railway life, and gone into business for himself, being now the proprietor of a flour and feed store, corner of Queen and Ontario street, Toronto, Ontario. Brother Grey has the best wishes of THE CONDUCTOR and members of the Order generally, and we sincerely hope that he will prosper so well that his only regret will be that he did not make this departure in years gone by.

One of the firms that deserve the patronage and good wishes of every railroad man in the United States, is the Dueber Watch-case Company of Canton, Ohio. Send to them for their book entitled "We are Posted or Frauds in Watches," as it will be of interest to you whether you wish to buy a watch or not.

Clark should take notice that he is not the head of the Order. He is a "good fellow," but according to the "Majah" hasn't got any sense. To those who know Clark, it won't be necessary for us to say that Clark has forgotten more since his election, than the forty-eight inch brain at Toledo has ever compassed.

In answer to many inquiries, C. S. Wheaton did not withdraw from the Order before presiding over the New York meeting and has not applied for withdrawal, although he told members at New York that his application for dismissal had been presented and would be acted upon that day, June 22d.

An eastern paper says, "it is expected the headquarters of the new 'independent' organization will be Elmira." We presume from this that Calvin's contemplated trip to Europe has been given up and it also gives rise to the query as to whether he has any more worn out furniture to sell at an advance on first cost.

A union meeting of the members of the different associations of trainmen employed on the C., M. & St. P. railway will be held in Savanna, Ill., August 13th. A general union meeting of trainmen's associations will be held in Logansport, Ind., July 20th, and a union meeting of members of the Order will be held in Philadelphia on the latter date.

"We know there are just as good men in that organization as can be found in any other. * * There is not a member of the O. R. C. who in his heart does not know that Bill Daniels, of the C., B. & Q. scabbing circular fame, is the head and front of their Order, and will so continue. We are told that Mr. Clark is a royal good fellow, open, frank and manly, but he is no more the head of the Order, than is Belknap the editor of their journal. It was formerly Cal and Bill. Cal now constitutes one end of the Order and Bill the other."—Railway Service Gazette.

By a circular just received and dated July 1st, 1890, we note that Brother E. Rush has been appointed Assistant Superintendent of the Arkansas Division of the Union Pacific system with headquarters at Wallace, Kansas. Brother Rush is an old-time conductor and member of the Order, and has many friends who will be pleased to learn of his promotion.

The Western Railway publishes a good portrait of E. A. Welby who lately succeeded Mr. Bancroft as superintendent of the Rio Grande Western, and if its opinion of the gentleman is correct, the employes are to be congratulated on the fact that Mr. Bancroft will have a worthy successor. The latter will take with him, wherever he goes, the good wishes of a host of friends.

The vacancy made by the promotion of W. I. Allen to the position of Assistant General Manager of the "Rock Island," has been filled by the promotion of Chas. Dunlap, who takes the position of General Superintendent of lines west of Missouri river. This is a promotion that will give general satisfaction to employes, as they are by it assured a continuance of the considerate and fair treatment heretofore received by them.

The Grand Secretary wishes to apologize to the members who became permanent members at the last Grand Division for giving only the initials of their names in the roll of permanent members. It was the intention to procure and print the names in full as heretofore, but it was overlooked until too late to procure the information without delaying the proceedings of the Board meeting. The error will be corrected hereafter.

By a circular just received we note that E. T. Horn, late of the F. E. & M. V. is now fuel agent of the Mo. Pac. with headquarters at St. Louis. We do not know whether Tom has anything to do with the "inspection" of the fuel or not, but we can vouch for his efficiency as an inspector generally, as will also one poor resident of "Goosetown," Iowa, who clung to the cold side of a door some ten years ago, clothed only in an abbreviated undergarment, waiting for Tom to inspect him.

Ye Editor and better half are in receipt of an invitation to call after July 10th, at 43 Sterling street, Boston, and form the acquaintance of Brother Geo. H. Drown, of Division 122, and Mrs. Mamie K. Drown, nee Higgins, who Drown-d herself June 30th, by saying "yes" to the preacher. THE CONDUCTOR congratulates heartily and sincerely hopes that no matter what fate may betide them in the future, they will always Drown dull care and be happy.

An excellent opportunity for legislative committees to do some good work, is to secure the adoption of a law providing that in case any company doing a guarantee business, refuses to issue a bond to any applicant, the reason for such refusal shall be given, and also providing that when any person whose application has been rejected desires it, they shall be compelled to produce in court all correspondence relating to the application. Such legislation would make those who are inclined to injure another because of the opportunity to do it secretly, careful in what they said. The guarantee companies would of course energetically oppose such a law and claim that it would put an end to the guarantee business because of their inability to get information, but this claim would be unfounded, for no honorable man would tell anything but the truth, and should not object to having it become known, and there would be no danger of any libel or slander suits without cause, for the guilty man of whom the truth is told will not ask for the production of the papers.

C. S. Wheaton has decided to go to Europe as an agent for the Pennsylvania railroad, so he says. He finds that the severe labor of the past ten years has made it necessary for him to recuperate and thinks that he can combine business with pleasure and profit, to health and purse by such a mission. We are not informed as to whether the company are aware of his intention or not. Whether he will follow the example of the illustrious Mr. Corbin and cable his resignation of his numerous positions with the "independent" O. of R. C., or direct their affairs by cable from the other side, is not yet known, though it is quite likely that the brilliant prospects of the "independent" organization, as developed at the meeting of the ten New Haven men who compose the Grand Division, which was presumably held on the 13th inst., will induce him to deprive the P. R. R., of his invaluable services, and that he will, to the serious detriment of both health and pocket, subordinate his personal interests to the public good once more by staying this side of the water.

Brother Chas. A. Burr, of Binghamton Division, has not forgotten the invariable courtesy which made him one of the most popular conductors on the "Lackawanna," and which makes a friend of each and every person who makes his acquaintance; at least such is our inference from the following which appeared in a late number of the New York Graphic;

To-day is the anniversary of the appointment of Chas. A. Burr as deputy collector of the port of New York. The employes of the public store, where Mr. Burr is in charge, had a surprise for their chief this morning, in the shape of an immense floral horseshoe, which had been placed on his desk, before his arrival at the office. The testimonial was accompanied with the following:

July 1, 1890.

Chas. A. Burr, Esq.:

DEAR SIR:—To-day being the first anniversary of your appointment as deputy collector, the employes of the sixth division deem it a fitting occasion to express their appreciation of the uniform kindness which has marked your treatment of them in your official capacity, and they sincerely hope you will continue for a long time to come to retain and enjoy the position which is honored by your capacity. Respectfully,

A. GENTZER,
R. S. HEILFERTY, Committee.

Bro. Honin of The Railway News Reporter, in his partial pen portrait of the Great American Journalist, who by his own account, purchased and wore an O. R. C. pin thinking it was the badge of a press association, is in error in stating that The Railroader was adopted by the Order at St. Paul; It was at Buffalo that the "Majah" first appeared to view and it was at St. Paul, that he loomed up with an O. R. C. pin: It was at Buffalo that he procured the Wagner pass as "a representative of the Order," and it was at St. Paul, that he was "dropped," and it was immediately after the St. Paul Grand Division, that abuse of the Order commenced, and still the "Majah" possessed the necessary cheek to appear a year later at the Kansas City G. D. though the reception was of such a nature that even the pachydermal epidermis of the "Majah" was not sufficient protection and he staid there but a day or so. Bro. Honin is also in error in the statement that the "Majah" did not turn over a dollar to the Order on account of subscriptions received at Buffalo. The "Majah" made a report of a few subscriptions received by him at Buffalo, and the proportion due the Order was deducted from subscriptions sent through this office. "Give the 'Majah' his due" Dan, and then he will not have a large balance to his credit. It is true, however, that a much less number was reported, than the "Majah" himself claimed to have taken before leaving Buffalo, so he—prevaricated, either at Buffalo or in his later statements.

As a partial answer to the question of "Wabash" in the Fraternal department, we note by a circular received at this office that New Haven Division No. 1, Conductors Association, held a memorial service on Sunday June 15th, 1890. The last entry in the cash account of New Haven Division No. 201, O. R. C. is "June 1st, 1890, E. Dickeman $76.86." By a peculiar co-incidence $76 86 was just the balance of cash on hand June 1st. Ex-Sec. and Treas. AS. Ostrander explains that the amount paid to Dickeman was for their memorial service; Mr. Ostrander has in his possession, property of the Order which he refuses to turn over. In New Haven as in Hoboken, the seceders simply appropriated to their own use whatever they could lay their hands upon, sending to this office, only what they could not use. The appropriation of the money by the so-called New Haven Div. No. 1, was a plain case of embezzlement, participated in by the "man with a methodist voice" who made haste to accuse members of perjury while he was almost in the act of dishonestly appropriating property of the Order. The above money can be recovered by law if all of those engaged in the matter are not "execution proof" and Ostrander can be made to surrender the property he holds or be punished for refusal, but it would cost much more than any amount that can be recovered and it is a question as to whether the example would be worth its cost or not. These men probably feel secure in the idea that on account of the expense, distance and trouble, they will not be prosecuted, but they may be mistaken.

"How to Avoid Strikes."

A general superintendent who has been very fortunate as regards strikes on the roads with which he has been connected, says that there should and could be some plan devised to put a stop to strikes, which are breaking out every few weeks. His plan would be that the general managers of the roads in a certain territory should get together, select a committee from their number to meet committees of every branch of service connected with the operating department, and fix a uniform scale of prices for each branch of service, for say two years, which both should abide by. The conditions are such that in certain territories the cost of living and clothing are about the same. He was satisfied that if the general managers would take the matter up in a sensible way, the employes would gladly do their part and put an end to these strikes, annoying and injuring both parties and greatly discommoding the public.

Injury To Passenger—Collision—Contributory Negligence. 1. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, it appeared that plaintiff took his seat in the smoking compartment of the baggage car; that he did not notice that the train had started until it was fairly under way; and then from his knowledge of the time of running the train, knew there were serious danger of a collision. He went into the baggage car, and stood at the door, ready to jump should there be danger of a collision, and did jump just before the trains collided.

Held, that such act whereby he was injured was not contributory negligence.

2. The fact that he went into the baggage car, where passengers were not allowed to go, did not show negligence, though it appeared from his own admission that he knew that the rear end of the train was the safest.

Cody vs. New York & N. E. Ry Co., Mass. S. J. C. May 20th, 1890.

NOTE:—It was admitted that the collision occurred through the negligence of train servants; and, that several passengers in the coaches were injured even more seriously than plaintiff. Hence plaintiff may have fared worse had he attempted to have reached the rear car.

Conditional Ticket—Expulsion of Passengers—Manner Of. In an action for damages for putting plaintiff and her husband off a railway train, it appeared that, their tickets not being stamped as required by the agent at the terminal station before attempting a return, the conductor told the husband that they must pay or get off, and at the next station the conductor returned and said in a "brusque, decided manner," to the husband, "This is H., if you are going to get off;" and, he replying that he had no intention of getting off unless ordered, the conductor said, "very decidedly, quickly and rudely" "Then I order you off;" at which they got off, but returned and paid their fare.

Held, That the company was not liable for damages for the manner of expulsion, though the plaintiff (wife) was riding on pillows and apparently an invalid.

Rose et ux vs. Wilmington & W. R. Co., N. C. S. C., May 15th, 1890.

NOTE:—That passengers have no legal right to ride on a return ticket conditioned to be void if not stamped at the terminal station is universally held by all courts. In this case the manner of expulsion alone constituted the cause of action. In order to entitle one to recover punitive damages from a railroad company for expulsion, there must be some violation of duty on the part of the conductor or servants, accompanied by rudeness, oppression, insult or indifference to consequences. It is true that the contract of common carriers to transport passengers embrace an implied stipulation to protect females against hearing obscenity, witnessing immodest conduct, or submitting to wanton approach. But in this case there was no evidence that the sick passenger's modesty or nervous system was subject to any shock, except such as was necessarily incident to the discharge of the conductors duty.

Ejection of Passenger—Tickets—Reasonable Conditions.—Plaintiff purchased a return ticket from L — to C — sold at a reduced rate on condition printed on the face of the ticket, and signed by plaintiff—that it should not be good for return passage unless stamped again by the company's ticket agent in C — and there signed again by plaintiff as the original purchaser. Plaintiff failed to have the ticket stamped, or to sign it in C — and refusing to pay his fare on the return trip, was ejected from the train.

Held, That having failed to comply with the reasonable conditions of the contract, he could not ride on it, neither could he recover for his ejection from the train after having refused to pay his fare.

Edwards vs. Lake Shore etc., Ry Co., Mich. S. C., June 6, 1890.

Evidence—Admissibility—Negligence—Postal Clerk.

In an action for damages for the death of a postal clerk, the court, on appeal, Held, 1. Where the question is as to the fitness of a particular car for service; evidence of a general custom of the railroad company to inspect its cars is not admissible.

2. Where a car in which a postal clerk is employed runs off the track and kills such clerk, without any fault on his part, there is a prima facie case of negligence which will authorize a recovery of damages, unless it is shown that the defendant and those from whom it has procured its cars had used due care in constructing its cars and inspecting them. In the absence of such evidence the company is liable in damages for the death resulting.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA., AUGUST 1, 1890.

NO. 15.

A "PICNIC."

SOFT SNAPS FOR THE BRAKEMAN.

The hardships of cold and stormy weather are serious, both because of the test of endurance involved and the added difficulties in handling a train. The Westinghouse automatic air-brake, which has served so admirably on passenger trains for the past fifteen years, has only recently been adapted and cheapened so as to make it available for long freight trains, but it is now so perfected that in a few years the brakeman who now has to ride on the outside of cars in a freezing condition for an hour at a time will be privileged to sit comfortably in his caboose while the speed of the train is governed by the engineer through the instantaneous action of the air-brake. On the steep roads of the Rocky Mountains, and a few other lines, this brake is already in use.

But "braking by hand" is still the rule. In running on ascending grades or at slow speeds, the brakeman can ride under cover, but in descending grades, or on levels where the speed is high, they must be on the tops of the cars ready to instantly apply the brakes, for the reason that there are generally only three or four men to a long train weighing from 500 to 1,000 tons, whose momentum cannot be arrested very quickly. In descending steep grades, only the most constant and skillful care prevents the train from rushing at breakneck speed to the foot of the incline, or to a curve, where it would be precipitated over an embankment and crushed into splinters. One of the mountain roads in Colorado which now uses air-brakes is said to be lined its whole length with the ruins of cars lying in the gorges, where they were wrecked in the former days of hand-brakes. Even on grades much less steep than those in Colorado the danger of this sort of disaster is one that has to be constantly guarded against. Take the case of a 40-car train descending a $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. grade (79 2-10 feet per mile). Before all of the cars have passed over the summit and commenced to descend, the forward part of the train will have increased its velocity very perceptibly and will thus by its weight exert a strong pull on the rear portion, "yanking" it very roughly sometimes, and if one of the couplings between the cars chances to be weak it breaks, separating the train into two parts. Mishaps of this kind are frequent, and two or more breakages often occur at the same time, dividing the train so that one of the parts—between the two end portions—is perhaps left with no brakeman upon it. The engineer then has the choice of slackening his speed and allowing the unmanageable cars to violently collide with his portion, or of increasing his own speed to such a rate that he is soon in danger of suddenly overtaking a train ahead of him. To avoid this breaking-in-two the brakemen must be wide awake on the instant and see that their brakes are tightened before the speed even begins to elude control. As soon as the whole train has got beyond the summit, and the speed is reduced to a proper rate by the application of the brakes on, say, one-third or one-half the cars, it will perhaps be found that one or two brakes too many have been put on and that the train is running too slowly. Some of them must then be loosened. Or perhaps some are set so tightly that the friction heats the wheels unduly or causes them to slide along the track instead of rolling; then those brakes must be released and some on other cars applied instead; and all this must be done (sometimes for an hour) when the temperature is 20 degrees below zero, or the wind is blowing a gale, just as under more favorable circumstances. A train moving at 20 miles an hour against a wind with a velocity of thirty miles increases the latter to 50, so far as the brakeman is concerned, and if rain or sleet is falling, the force of it on his hands and face is very severe. If we add to this the danger attendant upon stepping from one car to another over a gap of 27 to 30 inches, in a dark night, when the cars are constantly moving up and down on their springs, and are swaying to one side or the other every few seconds, we get some idea of, though we cannot realize, the sensations that must at such times fill the minds of the men whose pleasant berth seems so enjoyable on a mild summer's day. And this is not an overdrawn picture or the worst that might be given; for rain and snow combined often coat the roofs of cars so completely and solidly that they are worse than the smoothest skating-pond, and moving upon them is attended with danger at every step. Jumping—it cannot be called walking—from one car to another is in such cases positively reckless. The brake apparatus will in a snow storm be coated with ice so rapidly that vigorous action is required to keep it in working condition. Even a wind alone, in dry weather, sometimes compels the men to crawl from one car to another, grasping such projections as they may. The brakeman who forgets to take his rubber coat and overalls sometimes suffers severely from sudden changes of temperature. In spring and fall a lively shower will be encountered in a sheltered valley, and the clothing be completely drenched, and then perhaps within half an hour the ascent of a few hundred feet brings the train into an atmosphere a few degrees below the freezing point, so that with the aid of the wind, fanned by the speed of the train, the clothes are very soon frozen stiff.—[From The American Railway, Chas. Scribner's Sons.

The "Independents."

ONLY THREE HUNDRED MEMBERS YET.

The new Independent Order of Railway Conductors, about which the Sun told something three weeks ago, completed its organization yesterday at the Coleman House. A noticeable change from the old order was the substitution of "President" for "Grand Chief Conductor," and several other changes were made to indicate that the organization is not a labor organization. Here is the list of officers: President, Calvin S. Wheaton of Elmira; Vice-President and Secretary, E. D. Nash of St. Albans; Chaplain, Frank A. Hermance of New Haven; Marshal, A. Holdridge of New York; First Conductor, L. K. Wood; Second Conductor, C. D. Pidgeon. Executive Committee, Frank J. Griffith, M. Severns and S. D. Chittenden. Insurance Committee, A. S. Ostrander, J. V. Levensgood and F. W. Flint.

Only three divisions were represented yesterday out of over fifty that revolted from the old Order of Railway Conductors at the Rochester convention because they were opposed to strikes. The Eastern men haven't rallied around the new standard as fast as Mr. Wheaton probably expected. In talking with many conductors about New York, a reporter found that the majority of those who left the old order had had enough of organization in general, and didn't care to sink any more money. The divisions represented men from the New Haven, the Moses Taylor and the St. Albans. Mr. Wheaton was very indefinite about the date when they expect others to join. He says that they have 300 members to begin with. He was positive that the seceders were entitled to their insurance in the Order of Railway Conductors as long as they paid their assessments. Men who had been expelled had several times got their benefits when disabled.

One of the complaints against the old order, with its 15,000 members, was that it was nearly always in debt on account of the big salary list. How will the new association get along and support an insurance department, too, is a question that has been much discussed by conductors who are timid about joining. It doesn't hope for a membership of more than 2,000, and it will do well if it gets 1,000. Mr. Wheaton used to draw $5,000 in the Order of Railway Conductors; Grand Secretary Daniels $3,000, and other salaried officers swelled the annual expenses to over $12,000.

Mr. Wheaton said yesterday that they haven't established any salaried offices yet—they will wait until the membership warrants it. They allow the executive committee its expenses. Mr. Wheaton has no other business that he can depend on, but the vice-president and secretary, Mr. Nash, is a train dispatcher for the Central Vermont railroad.

The membership fee is $10, and for 300 members this would give $3,000 to begin with. The yearly grand division fee is $2 per capita, but the membership fee for each division has not been fixed yet, probably because the three divisions which constitute the new order have been taxed enough to start out with. In the old order it is $4 apiece.

The insurance plan is a tax of $1 per capita at each death or disability, the beneficiary not to get more than $1,000. He would get $300 at present. The ritual states that the association is for social and insurance purposes. The next meeting will be in St. Albans in June, 1891.—[New York Sun.

The Grand Division of the Independent Order of Railway Conductors held a meeting at the Coleman House yesterday and perfected its organization. The association resulted from a split from the old order, which, at its last national convention, decided to abolish the prohibition against engaging in strikes, which had been a distinguishing feature in its by-laws. This action was taken last May at Rochester, when C. S. Wheaton, the Grand Chief Conductor, severed his connection with the organization. Since then Mr. Wheaton has been very active in laying the groundwork for another order in which the "strike" feature would be entirely absent.

Though not at present in active service as a railway conductor, Mr. Wheaton holds a position on the Erie road. Members of the old order claim that he is acting under the instructions of certain railroads in perfecting this new organization, a charge which Mr. Wheaton indignantly denies.

Reports were received showing the present membership of the order to be about 300. Five divisions have been named, the Hoboken and St. Albans divisions being fully organized, while favorable progress has been made at New Haven, Bellows Falls and Easton. Considerable time was spent in the consideration and adoption of the constitution and by-laws. When finally adopted the document declared the Independent Order of Railway Conductors to be a mutual and fraternal organization, having for its purpose the benefit and protection of its members. It is announced as having no alliance with any of the labor organizations in the United States, for it is in no sense a labor organization. It follows the rules of the old order only in part, the principal one being that it insures each member in the sum of $1,000 in case of death or disability. The old organization maintained its insurance of $2,500 only for the benefit of those who joined that branch. In the new one simple membership secures insurance. The question of dues is left to the discretion of local divisions, but the constitution calls for an assessment of $1 whenever an insurance policy has to be paid.

The following grand officers were then elected and installed: President, C. S. Wheaton; Vice-President and Secretary, E. D. Nash; Marshal, A. Holdridge; Chaplain, F. A. Hermance; First Conductor, L. K. Wood; Second Conductor, V. Pidgeon; Executive Committee, F. J. Griffith (chairman), M. Severance and S. D. Chittenden; Insurance Committee, A. S. Ostrander (chairman), J. Y. Levengood and F. W. Flint.

Having decided that the next Grand Division shall meet at St. Albans, Vt., on the second Tuesday in June, 1892, the meeting was closed.

None of the delegates could explain why no conductors had come from the Western roads, or those in the East having Western connections. A prominent member said they would be welcome, as the constitution made every conductor in active service on any surface steam railroad in the United States and Mexico eligible.—[New York World.

The reason for the division is that the old order has now become a "strike" order and therefore a labor organization. This happened about two months ago at a convention in Rochester. In the constitution of the old order was a special clause prohibitory of strikes. The Western men, it is said, at the instigation of the regular labor organizations, made an issue of this and succeeded in having the clause eliminated. The head of the organization was Mr. Wheaton, under the style and title of grand chief conductor. Mr. Wheaton was known to be hostile to the change and he was supplanted by a man more in sympathy with the majority. It is mainly through Mr. Wheaton's efforts that the present organization has been effected, although I heard that the four railroads mentioned have still more to do with it.

"This is a fraternal organization," explained President Wheaton yesterday after the business had been transacted. "It has for its purposes the benefit and protection of its membership. It has no alliance with any of the labor organizations and is in no sense a labor organization."

"In part we follow the lines of the old organization. The benefits of the Independent order will be insurance in the amount of $1,000 for death or disability. Our association includes in its insurance every member; in the other insurance was a separate inside affair and included only such members as made special application. The amount was $2,500. Our assessment will be but $1, but the dues are fixed by the local divisions."

There are three local divisions at present—one at Hoboken, another at New Haven and a third at St. Albans, Vt. Other divisions are to be organized at Bellows Falls, Vt., and in Easton, Pennsylvania.

The members yesterday were strong in their assertion that the Independent Order of Railroad Conductors was merely a social and benefit organization. They had no manifesto to issue because they were not a labor organization.

I asked why the new order seemed to be confined to Eastern men, and was told that any Western or Southern or other man could join, and there was nothing in the by-laws to the contrary.

A subsequent resolution in the Rochester convention made the members take a middle course in the matter of strikes, that the minority, in fact, was not to be bound by the majority. But even their concession did not prevent a defection and the rebellion, I was told, was formulated by the agents of the four railroads above mentioned. These railroads wanted to break the power of an organization which had about thirteen thousand men in its ranks.

It was not made quite clear yesterday why, if the conductors merely wanted a thousand-dollar insurance, they could not have joined any one of the various benefit associations in their neighborhood, instead of assembling in New York at so much trouble to get up an organization of their own.

The constitution and by-laws as drawn up yesterday contained nothing about grievances or possible differences between conductor and company, but it does not follow, as I heard remarked, that something of that kind may not be inserted later on.

The next grand division or assembly will be at St. Albans, Vt., on the second Tuesday in June, 1891.—[New York Herald.

The Charges Against Mr. Wheaton.

Those are most grave and serious charges which William P. Daniels, Grand Secretary of the Order of Railway Conductors, brings against Calvin S. Wheaton, ex-Chief of the Order.

Leaving out the charge of official dishonesty, Mr. Daniels asserts that Mr. Wheaton has, in his dealings with the Order, been guilty of falsehood and deliberate treachery, that at the outset of the great engineer's strike on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road he telegraphed the officials of that line tendering them support and informing them that the Order of Railway Conductors would stand by them; that he sent to Superintendent Woodward, of the Monon Company, testimony given by employes of that company at a secret investigation conducted by him, and that he has repeatedly offered to railroad officials the support of the members of the Order of Railway Conductors in case of a strike.

We repeat that these are most grave and serious charges.

Thus far Mr. Wheaton has declined to discuss them, although it is only reasonable and just that he should convincingly disprove them before attempting to divide and disrupt the great Order of which he was formerly the head.

Moreover, the men who are inclined to follow Mr. Wheaton into a new Order would do well to pause and carefully consider before taking final and decisive action. In division there is always danger and besides they owe it to the men who now direct the affairs of the staunch old Order to give them a fair trial before cutting loose from them. The vessel which has weathered many a hard storm should not be abandoned until it has been proven unseaworthy. A year hence will be soon enough for the dissenters to talk of secession.

In the meantime Mr. Wheaton should be heard from regarding the Daniels charges. In continued silence he approaches dangerously near to condemnation, and condemnation will be fatal to the man who occupies the position that he does.

He should speak out and that at once.—Sunday Telegram, Elmira, N. Y.

Without any positive knowledge on the subject, we venture to assert that Mr. Wheaton has already secretly denied everything charged against him. We are morally certain that he has already written a confidential letter to Mr. Ford denying that he ever accused the latter of anything in connection with the "two years" for passenger conductors.

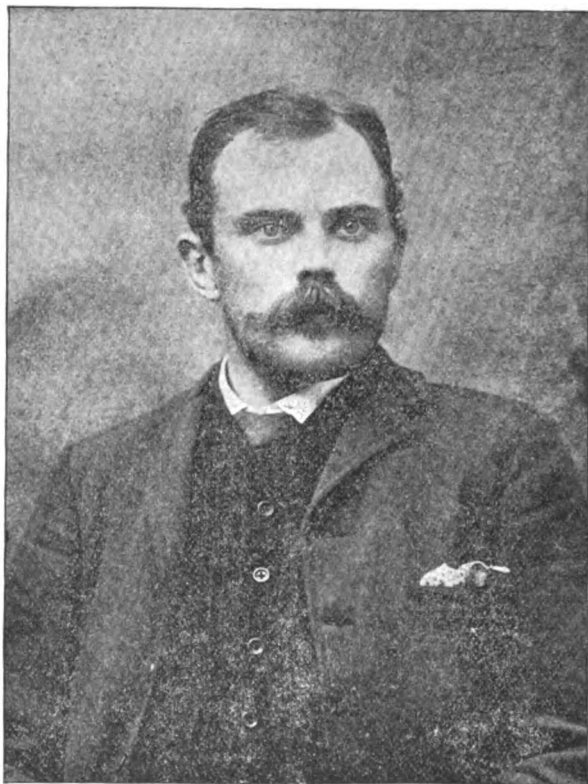

Mr. Wheaton will not publicly deny anything, for he knows that it will bring a flood of proof and also to public notice many things that he would prefer should not be known. His actions in personal matters have been worse than his official actions.

The "due season" in which he will "in a convincing and exhaustive manner," demonstrate his innocence, and the "proper time" when he will shine in all the effulgent glory of a persecuted martyr, will never come, at least not until many of those who know the facts join "Chaplain" Hermance "under the grass wet with the gentle dews of heaven."

W. C. Passford.

A slick and versatile individual, who appears to have as many different names as he has ways and means for imposing upon the public, has come to grief in Millbank. The individual in question, who gave his name as W. C. Passford, introduced himself on the railroad to a conductor as one of the fraternity. He was in possession of enough of the secret work of the Order to pass himself off as being a worthy member, but circumstances subsequently transpired which made the boys his own testimony he is evidently a bad egg. In default of fine and costs amounting to $24 he was sentenced to work sixteen days on the streets, to which he objected, saying he never had worked and would not. When the marshal was about to put the ball and chain on him he changed his mind, and is now working out his fine mowing weeds and shoveling. On the witness stand he claimed to be a Pinkerton detective. Conductors Leonard, Horn and Ryan were instrumental in calling a halt on the fellow, and the railroad boys feel considerable satisfaction in see-distrust him, and ere long they were convinced that he was a first-class fraud. A circular from headquarters conveyed the information that Passford also traveled under the name of W. C. Green. On Sunday he attended the Methodist church here and was very devout, and spoke eloquently to the Epworth League, and made himself generally agreeable. On Monday developments were such that a warrant was issued for his arrest. In court he gave the name of M. W. Larkin. From ing the would-be conductor brought to time.—Grant County Review, Millbank, S. D.

The Illinois Central Plan.

The following statement has been made by President Fish, of the Illinois Central: "When the Illinois Central was built it was necessary to go abroad to secure the necessary capital. The venture proving successful it came about that when I entered the company's service in 1871 something like four-fifths of the then capital stock ($25,500,000) was owned abroad, not over $5,000,000 all told being held in this country. Nearly all of the bonds then outstanding were also owned in Great Britain and in Holland.

"Finding that the corporation was regarded as an alien and suffered thereby it has been my aim for many years past to induce small investors in this country to buy and hold the shares. To-day there are eight times as many stockholders in the United States as there were 20 years ago, and while a majority of the stock is still held in Europe, nearly 40 per cent. of the present capital stock of $40,000,000, to-wit $16,000,000, are owned in the United States, and the number of American stockholders is equal to if it does not exceed the English. Owing to the rates of interest having hitherto been so much higher in the western and southern states than in New York and New England comparatively few residents on the line have as yet bought stock. There are, however, in Illinois some 120 proprietors and the number is steadily though slowly increasing.

"The statement in the western paper to which you invite my attention is premature in that no such circular has been issued or authorized by any officer of the company. With a view of extending to every person in the service an equal opportunity of sharing in the prosperity of the corporation and by mutual co-operation increasing both the efficiency of the service rendered to the public and the profits of the proprietors, we have had under consideration the adoption of a plan somewhat as follows:

"The company has no stock for sale, but it proposes to assist any of its officers or employes to buy one share at a time at a fair market price to be fixed when the purchase is made, the purchaser to pay for his share in sums of $5 or multiples thereof. On the sums so paid interest is to be credited at the rate of 4 per cent., and when the sum at the credit of any purchaser amounts to the prices at which the stock was bought he shall receive a certificate for his share of stock, and can then, if he wishes, begin the purchase of another share. The purchaser may, however, at any time have his contract cancelled and his money returned to him with interest and shall so receive it whenever he leaves the service. Thus the company assumes the entire risk of a fall in the price of the shares and the expense of doing the work.

"It is hoped to enlist every frugal person in any way connected with the corporation as a partner on a basis of the utmost liberality to the small proprietors. It is not proposed to form a savings bank, a mutual benevolent or a life assurance association, the experience of the company being that the men prefer to handle these matters for themselves.

"My belief is that the plan when properly presented will induce greater thrift among the men and, through their example, spread among the people the habit of saving and of investing in the securities of the railroad which runs past their doors and in which the State of Illinois already has so large a proprietary interest, the ultimate object being to produce in the west that community of interest between the citizens and the railways which has given to Great Britain and the eastern states the perfection of railway service and the most profitable of investments for small proprietors—sound dividend-paying railway shares."

A Story of Joseph Jefferson.

Joseph Jefferson relates in the July Century the following concerning a London experience of his: "My approaching appearance was the important dramatic event of my life. I had been five years from America and was on my way home, and I felt satisfied that if this new version of 'Rip Van Winkle' succeeded in London my way was quite clear when I returned to the United States.

"On Sunday evening, being alone in my lodgings, I got out for my own admiration my new wig and beard, the pride of my heart, and which I was to use in the last act. I could not resist trying them on for the twentieth time, I think; so I got in front of the glass and adjusted them to my perfect satisfaction. I soon became enthused, and began acting and posing in front of the mirror. In about twenty minutes there came a rap at the door.

"'Who's there?' I said.

"'It's me, if you please,' said the gentle but agitated voice of the chambermaid. 'May I come in?'

"'Certainly not,' I replied; for I had no desire to be seen in my present make-up.

"Is there anything wrong in the room, sir?" said she.

"Nothing at all. Go away," I replied.

"Well, sir," she continued, "there's a policeman at the door, and he says as 'ow there's a crazy old man in your room, a-flingin' of his 'arnds about and a-goin' on hawful, and there's a crowd of people across the street a-blockin' up the way."

"I turned towards the window, and to my horror I found that I had forgotten to put down the curtain, and, as it seemed to me, the entire population of London was taking in my first night. I had been unconsciously acting with the lights full up, to an astonished audience who had not paid for their admission. As I tore off my wig and beard a shout went up. Quickly pulling down the curtain, I threw myself in a chair, overcome with mortification at the occurrence. In a few minutes the comical side of the picture presented itself, and I must have laughed for an hour. I had been suffering from an attack of nervous dyspepsia, consequent upon the excitement of the past week, and I firmly believe that this continuous fit of laughter cured me."

What Next?

Mr. John Livingston seems to be in demand as a lobbyist as well as an attorney, and it was very unwise for the scalpers to refuse to pay for his valuable services.

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—COUNTY OF TIOGA.

JOHN LIVINGSTON, Plaintiff, vs.

GUSTAV G. LANSING, Defendant.

COMPLAINT.

The complaint of the plaintiff respectfully shows that for more than thirty years last past he has been and now is an attorney and counsellor of this court.

1. That the defendant is or claims to be the chairman of the executive committee of "the American Ticket Brokers' Association," so called, and with H. C. Meader, of 50 West Fourth street, Cincinnati, Ohio, its "committee on hostile legislation." That upon information derived from the defendant, who is a ticket broker having an office at 397 Broadway, New York, where he is engaged among other things in the purchase and sale of railroad tickets and passes, said "association"—a list of whose alleged members delivered to this plaintiff by him hereto annexed as part of this complaint—is not incorporated, but is a voluntary organization designed for the mutual facilities and protection of its members engaged in the business of ticket brokers as well as to antagonize such action or recommendation of the inter-state commerce commission and such proposed legislation as may tend to the suppression of or interference with their business.

2. That on March 17, 1890, the Hon. Charles S. Baker, chairman of the committee on commerce of the house of representatives introduced therein a bill to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved Feb. 4, 1887, sections 24, 25 and 26 whereof were designed to suppress said business of the defendant and of the other alleged members of his so-called "American Ticket Brokers' Association," which bill was on the same day read twice, referred to said committee on commerce and ordered to be printed, and is still pending before said committee.

3. That soon thereafter the defendant employed and retained this plaintiff to counsel and advise him and to perform for him such professional work, labor and services as to this plaintiff might seem proper for the purpose of preventing or deterring said committee from reporting said sections favorably to the house of representatives; that this plaintiff thereupon undertook and faithfully gave such counsel and advice, and successfully performed such work, labor and services, among which were the following and proper charges for the same:

March 31, writing, copying, and mailing letter to W. R. Carter, Louisville, Ky.	5 00
April 4, perusing his answer of April 2, 1890.	2 00
April 7, delivering to defendant 500 copies of Elijah A. Morse's speech of Jan. 17, 1890, for repeal of act.	10 00

The complainant then proceeds to set forth that he received from defendant "as a part of and on account of compensation" six tickets from New York to Washington and return, which he sold at from $6 to $7 cash, and concludes as follows:

That the aggregate for which said six tickets were sold being $30.50, together with the sum of $20 paid by the defendant to this plaintiff on May 1 and May 5, 1890, on account of such services, aggregating a total of $59.50, comprises all the payments made by the defendant or by any person for him on account of this plaintiff's aforesaid claim, leaving now due to him thereon a balance of $342.50, no part whereof has been paid. Wherefore this plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $342.50 with interest from the 13th day of June, 1890, besides the cost of this action.

JOHN LIVINGSTON,
Plaintiff in Person.

The back of this document bears the following endorsement:

The claim mentioned in this complaint, verified on the 14th of June, was compromised and paid by defendant on the afternoon of the same day, and on the 28th of June, 1890, the action was discontinued upon mutual consent and releases.

From this it would seem that Mr. Livingston accomplished the object of his threatened litigation; but how much the scalpers realized from their investment for the purpose of blocking the wheels of legislation does not appear.

We sincerely hope John won't hereafter present any bill for the letters he is now voluntarily writing to this office, nor make any charge for the gratuitous advice that is being given the officers of the Order.

The Wage Earners' Wrongs.

Here, then, is the wage-earners' indictment of the wages system.

Every man has a right because he has a duty to earn his daily bread by the sweat of his brow. The wage system denies this right to myriads of willing workers. In America, the working man's Eldorado, nearly 1,000,000 willing workers were thrown out of employment in 1885. "Enforced idleness," says Carlyle, "is the Englishman's hell." That system cannot be right which turns 1,000,000 of willing workers in rich America into this hell and locks the door against them. Every man has a right to the product of his own industry; under the wage system the greater part of the products of industry go into the hands of the few tool-owners. The wealth of the country has increased during the past quarter century from fourteen billion to forty-four billion. A careful statistician estimates that the wages of 5,200,000 unskilled laborers, were in 1884 less than $200 a year, while the average wages of workmen engaged in manufactures, including skilled laborers, was but $346 a year. That system cannot be right which gives the profits of industry to the few and compels the many to live always praying, Give us this day our daily bread.—[Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott in the July Forum.

Getting Away Under Fire with a Load of Slaves.

Very soon the beach seemed to swarm with moving objects which we could not yet distinguish. A number of long, black objects left the shore, and, when through the breakers, they stopped at the small craft outside. Now we could see that the negroes were being transferred to the boats outside the breakers, from canoes, which ran through them, with from four to six in each. As the sloops were filled they sailed for the ship, and, ladders having been arranged, the negroes were soon coming over the ship's side; as each one reached the deck he was given a biscuit and sent below. It seemed slow work at first, but as the canoes were soon all launched and rushing through the surf, it presented a busy scene. The sloops were now flying to and from us, and a great number of negroes were already on board at 2 P. M.

The lookout at the masthead shouted: "Sail, ho! away to the southward." From the deck we could see nothing. A danger signal was hoisted at once to hurry all aboard faster; in a short while we could see from the deck a little black spot. Smoke! A cruiser! Another signal, a blood-red flag was hoisted, informing those ashore of the kind of danger. If possible the bustle ashore was increased; our own boats were lowered, and they aided materially. The approaching vessel had seen us and the volume of smoke increased. She could now be seen, and was recognized as the Vixen with the naked eye. A signal from shore that a very few remained was hoisted, another hour passed, and the vessel was certainly within three miles. Our boats were recalled, and the entire fleet of sloops soon sailed toward us. Our boats were hoisted, and lines thrown to the sloops now alongside. The Vixen now changed her course slightly and fired a solid shot, which passed to leeward of us, beyond. At this the Spanish captain cried out: "Let go!" The pin holding the staple in the anchor chain was cut, and the chain parted. Sail was hoisted rapidly, the negroes in the sloops climbed over the ship's side, and as the sloops were emptied they were cast adrift with their single occupant, a Krooman. They scattered like frightened birds.—From, "The Last Slave Ship," by GEORGE HOWE, M. D., in July Scribner.

The Destruction of Jamestown.

From an illustrated article on "Nathaniel Bacon," by Dr. Edward Eggleston, in The Century for July, we quote as follows: "On the 17th of September Bacon secured some cannon. Finding it difficult to mount these without losing the lives of some of his band, he sent to the neighboring plantations and brought into his works the wives and other female relatives of the governor's principal advisers and set them in an exposed position in front of his breastwork, sending one of the number into the town to give notice to the husbands of these ladies of the nature of his defenses. When his guns were in position he politely sent the ladies home again. A jaunty time, when men in deadly struggle played such schoolboy pranks!

"Berkeley's recruits had come for plunder, and the business was getting too serious for them. Jamestown, with its malaria and brackish water, 'not grateful to the stomach,' was an uncomfortable place in September. Every day was adding to Bacon's strength, and great numbers were rising in Isle of Wight and Nansemond counties. The governor's friends were particularly anxious to save the spoils already in their hands. On the 18th of September, the day after Bacon's great guns were placed, the plunder that had been gathered—of which the governor had Lawrence's cupboard of beautiful silver plate—was carried on shipboard and the town evacuated.

"The governor's fleet, however, halted in sight of the town; there was evidently an intention to reoccupy it at the first opportunity, nor was it very defensible from the water side. Besides, if Bacon remained he would soon be entrapped, for Major Brent was marching against him with a thousand men mustered from the northernmost borders of Virginia, where the causes and course of Bacon's movement were only known from vague rumors. The rebels did not want any stronger reasons for destroying a place which seemed to them the very fountain-head of all their calamities. Jamestown consisted, at this the pinnacle of its splendor, of sixteen or eighteen widely scattered houses. Of these about twelve were large, new, and built of brick, as was the church. There were only about a dozen families permanently resident there, 'getting their livings by keeping of ordinaries at extraordinary rates,' as a writer of the time tells us. All the dwellings, with the church and the state-house, were burned on the 19th of September. Lawrence and Drummond set fire to their own houses, and if one may believe the governor, Bacon fired the church with his own hand. Drummond saved the records from the burning state-house."

Perhaps the most extraordinary article ever published upon "Hypnotism" will appear in the Cosmopolitan Magazine for August. It was secured from one of the two most celebrated professors of the weird art, the Frenchman Donato, and the illustrations were secured by having a number of subjects taken to the photograph gallery of Mr. Kurtz, in New York, and there hypnotised under the camera by Donato himself. The illustrations show very fairly the frightful powers which the hypnotiser exerts; and the whole article makes plain a subject which is exciting much attention all over the world at this time. One who has not seen the facile movements of the hypnotiser and the change which takes place in the victim under his apparently simple action, cannot for a moment comprehend the wonderful powers exercised. One moment the subject looks you in the eyes, talks to you as any other person; is in his right mind in every particular; the next, under a motion of the professor, his mind is as completely lost to his body as if his head had been cut off, and in this condition, subject to suggestions of the operator, suggestions which may be carried to the most farcical or the most terrible results, he remains until recalled to life by the hypnotiser. Never before has a number of subjects been placed under the camera and operated upon in this way, and the article will doubtless be received with general interest throughout the country.

Conductors and the Strike Principle.

The action of a majority of the Order of Railway Conductors in rescinding the clause in their constitution prohibiting strikes, is explained and defended in a temperate article in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR by W. P. Daniels, which is in pleasing contrast to the unreasonable and excited language in which another organ of the Order attacks those who venture to question the wisdom of the action. THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR says in substance, that the repeal of the anti-striking clause does not commit the Order to a "strike" platform, and that there is no intention to engage in strikes; that the clause repealed was of no effect, as any conductor had a perfect right to quit his employment at any time and that the prohibition only kept him from doing what is prohibited by state and national laws, but that many members did not so understand it and believed that under their agreement they had no right to quit work but "were even compelled to do anything, no matter what, that their superior officers might direct." It continues:

Had all the officers of the Order labored for a correct understanding among members there would have been no need of repealing this clause, but unfortunately some of them taught members that they must do whatever they were directed to do; that if in case of strike of any class of employes on any road they were directed to run engines, switch or do anything of the kind and refused to do it, they were "violating their obligation." The influence and services of the Order have been offered to railway companies in advance by its officers, and it is this which has brought about the necessity for the Rochester action.

While the new attitude of the Order evidently is not in the direction of closer allegiance to the employing companies, it is gratifying to know that it is not the intention to invoke the dangerous and costly machinery of strikes in the attempt to improve their condition. The more effective and lasting way of effecting reform through legislation is, we are glad to see, favored by the organ of the conductors, which says in the same article:

As to legislation, we have only to say that legislation that will deal fairly with us will be welcomed, and we do not fear any other, for we are beginning to appreciate the political influence that we can bring to bear when united, and while it may be difficult for us to unite in regard to what we want, there will be no difficulty in uniting against any adverse or unjust legislation.

The protection of labor against oppression by capital, higher wages, shorter hours of work, improved social conditions and other desirable and proper reforms of this kind can, and we believe will be brought about by peaceful and legal measures, through the ballot, and the time will come when strikes, lock-outs and other methods depending on the exercise of brute force and mob violence will be looked upon with astonishment on account of their folly. Toward the betterment of the condition of every railway man by peaceful and wise means The Railway Age will be glad to lend every possible help.

Must Reduce Expenses.

CHICAGO, July 14, 1890.

The time has come when Western roads must reduce their expenses. From week to week earnings have been showing an alarming decrease, and as there is no chance for increassng them, expenses must come down. As usual the brunt of this falls on the employes and the Northwestern is the first to yield to the imperative demand for retrenchment. The order went out this afternoon that 200 men should be discharged from the Chicago shops and this will be followed by corresponding orders reducing the force at all points. Other lines are carefully considering the possibility of keeping up their equipment and road bed with a less force, and a system of wholesale discharge of employes whose services can possibly be spared will soon be inaugurated on all the Western roads.

Said Vice-President Harris of the Burlington: "We have not yet gone so far as to consider the advisability of lessening our force in any department, but unless there is some unexpected relief it must come to that on all Western roads. At present the expenses are altogether too large a fraction of the gross earnings."

Another Reduction.

CHICAGO, July 14.—Special: Central traffic rates are in such a state of collapse that hardly a week has passed of late without a tumble. To-day's reduction was on live hogs and provisions and the money commodities, taking the same rates such as lard, pork, grease and tallow in barrels and tierces. The reduction was from the present 25 cent basis to 23 cents, Chicago to New York, with corresponding decrease to intermediate points. The reduction goes into effect July 21. It was ostensibly made to meet the lake and rail competition, but probably as much to punish the Grand Trunk, which does a large business in the commodities affected.

[The above appears exactly as clipped from one of the daily papers. If some of the legislatures that make rates for railways would make a minimum as well as a maximum rate, they would act wisely. Cut rates to "punish" a competitor and cut the wages of the employes to even up, is the general rule.]

Rebellion Against Tyrannical Officers.

To the Editor of the Railway Age:

If I may be allowed to express an opinion on the late Illinois Central railroad strike I will say that it does not look reasonable to suppose that so many intelligent railroad employes would strike and become rebellious without a cause, and that in the face of such a great majority against him no railroad officer could vindicate himself, if we are to weigh evidence according to precedents already established. I am decidedly opposed to strikes of any kind, but I cannot help thinking that there is something radically wrong in a management which allows any of its officers to breed discontent among the men. The public must blame the company as much as the men for not investigating sooner the causes which led to a strike which lost them so much money and inconvenienced the public to such an extent.

I have learned through observation and experience, that in order that there may be a fair amount of discipline preserved and to prevent strikes, wrecks, damage to property and carelessness amongst the employes of a road or a division. The officers in charge must be men who are good judges of human nature, and who can gain the respect and confidence of the men by fair, just and impartial methods and where such is the practice the roads are both economically and successfully managed. There can be but little sense in the brain of any railroad officer who imagines himself to be the czar and all the employes holding positions beneath him as so many nihilists or serfs. He is always so generously hated that the company receives many a stab through him in loss of business and insubordination of the men, and I believe I am stating a truth which cannot be doubted when I say, that there should be no place on a railroad for the "bulldozer."

J. KINDELAN.

The Railway Age agrees fully in the general principles enunciated by this correspondent—that a "bulldozing," overbearing and offensive attitude by any officer of a railway towards its men, is wrong, unwise, injurious to the interests of the company and in defiance of the rights of the men. But we have not seen evidence to prove that this principle was violated on the Illinois Central to such degree as to justify a strike. The number of persons claiming to be aggrieved seems to have been small at the outset, the others apparently joining in the strike from sympathy. It is probable that every strict disciplinarian excites some antagonisms, but it would be unjust to assume therefrom that he is universally unpopular. The management of the Illinois Central certainly, from self-interest, would not retain an officer who was justly disliked by the men generally, and the unorganized manner of the late strike and the fact that it was not sustained by any of the employes' organizations, indicate that the grievance was not general. The affair, however, has its lesson, which will doubtless be beneficial to all concerned.—[Railway Age.]

Is not the very fact that the case against Mr. Russell was well enough founded so that the Central management clipped his wings by taking away his authority over the employes, leaving him superintendent in name only, pretty fair evidence that the principle enunciated by Mr. Kindelan was violated in the above instance? It is undoubtedly true, as the Age says, that every strict disciplinarian excites some antagonisms and it would be unjust to assume from that that the officer is unpopular, but no such assumption usually, or in fact ever follows, and railway employes as a rule are inclined to be reasonable and just. If the Age is acquainted with the facts, it will admit that every one of the leading railway managers who are especially popular with the employes are strict disciplinarians. There never was a man who held a warmer place with the employes of the whole United States than Tom Potter, yet he was a strict disciplinarian. In enforcing discipline, though, he did not find it necessary to be discourteous and abusive. The Age does not always seem to us to be particularly anxious to see all the evidence in cases of this kind. It can be set down as a fact that where a railway officer is universally despised by the employes under him, there is good reason for it somewhere, while on the other hand, the man who treats those under him with justice, fairness and courtesy, is generally popular and is respected for his discipline, although there is likely to be a few who have suffered, who will not subscribe to the popular verdict.

One result of the late strike is, that it is now altogether unlikely that Mr. Russell will ever be general manager of the Central, and it is not at all unlikely that he will soon find that his interests require a change to some other road.

And folded hands and serious face,
Who walks sedately down the street,
Her dainty dress all smooth and neat,
Each curl and ribbon in its place;

A dove-like maid with brow demure,
Beneath her bonnet's shady brim,
Who quiet sits within the pew,
And gravely reads the service through,
And joins in every hymn;

The sweetest maid that could be found
From Cuba to the Bay of Fundy;

With glowing cheeks and tangled hair,
Who races up and down the street,
And with her skipping, tripping feet
Is here, and there, and everywhere;

A saucy maid, with cap askew
Upon her rumpled yellow curls,
With twinkling feet and chattering tongue
And breezy skirts about her swung
In swift, ecstatic whirls;

The merriest maid that ever shocked

National Assembly of L. A. to O. R. C.

The national convention of the Ladies' Auxiliary Society of the Order of Railway Conductors, met at the Knights of Pythias hall, Elkhart, Ind., Tuesday, June 10th, at 3:00 o'clock.

The pastors of the city, representatives of the newspapers, and all the railroad conductors and their wives had been invited to be present at the opening session.

The gathering was called to order by the president, Mrs. C. E. Ragon, of Columbus, O., and W. D. Parr opened the proceedings with prayer. Following this Rev. H. B. Townsend addressed the audience in words of welcome to the city and in earnest commendation of the objects and methods of the society. He thought most favorably of the habits of the conductors of enlisting their wives in the business as well as in the social affairs of the Order, which it would be well for all men to follow.

Mr. G. W. Huntley, Chief Conductor of Elkhart Division No. 19, formally welcomed the ladies of the Auxiliary to the city and to the hospitality of the Order here, in a very neat and appropriate address.

At the close of Conductor Huntley's remarks Mrs. C. E. Ragon, the president, addressed the convention briefly, as follows:

LADIES AND SISTERS: When one year ago you elected me to preside over this Order, and when this gavel as the emblem of authority was placed in my hands, it was not without many misgivings as to my capability and fitness for its arduous cares and duties, that I took the obligation and accepted the trust. The generous confidence reposed in my executive ability as expressed by an unsought election to an office of which the noblest woman in the land might be justly proud, has been an incentive to renewed efforts at all times, surpassed only by the inborn love for the principles embraced in the cause we represent. I assumed the responsible duties of the office with an earnest desire for the best good of our Order and the advancement of the cause, that I might be able at the expiration of my term of service to transfer to my successor the business in good working order. The maintenance of all of the principles and the enforcement of the rules and regulations have been to me matters of the greatest concern. My mistakes may have been many, but if I have erred I think it has been in the line of duty, for I have not once forgotten my pledge that I would be loyal and true to the cause, and would to the best of my ability perform all the duties of my office conscientiously.

Ladies, I have served you to the best of my ability, have discharged every known duty, and now at this our second convention, I ask your forbearance and assistance. The work is comparatively new to us all and I shall depend largely upon your counsel and co-operation in all our deliberations and legislation. Let all our proceedings be marked with dignity and decorum, knowing that a gracious woman "retaineth honor," and in the multitude of counsellors there is safety, and let me here charge you my sisters, to preserve well this Order, never failing to proudly remember that we are Auxiliary to that most noble body, the Order of Railway Conductors, and in happy willing service for them and their families will lift our Order higher and higher, the most exalted place in woman's work, and then will be accomplished the sublime purpose whereunto this organization was created. And now, my dear sisters, on this the opening of this our second annual convention, let me extend to you a hearty and courteous greeting.

At the conclusion of the president's address the gentlemen and all non-members were requested to retire, and the Auxiliary went into secret session.

Which Shall It Be.

It was a troubled face with knit brow, that was bent over two letters, pondering over the momentous questions, and Nellie Hartley's thoughts ran something in this form:

"What a noble, manly letter Godfrey Churchman writes, and how the protecting, tender love speaks in every line! I can see him now, as he wrote that letter, his broad shoulders bent, his large, white hand tracing those clear, bold characters, and those great black eyes of his beaming with fervor and hope. He is not handsome, not very talented, but so true, so good, that I could put my hand in his, content to let him lead me, content to obey, as well as love and honor him. But, then, he has nothing but the small fortune his mother left him, and all of that is invested in business; then, too, he is so absorbed in that little counting-house; why, even this letter has a business envelope. There's Mary, too; whoever marries Godfrey, may calculate upon Mary for a life-long fixture, and she is so fretful and repining. Poor Mary! it is hard for a young girl to be shut up, for life, in one room, and suffer such pain. That frightful accident! I have shuddered at the prospect of a railway journey ever since. Perhaps, if she was in a pleasant home, with some one always near to chat with her, she would become more reconciled; but in that lonely room in a boarding house, Godfrey away all day, and nobody to speak to but the nurse, her imprisonment is hard to bear. I will call often. Stay! that will not do, unless I decide to answer Godfrey's letter, as he wishes. If the other had not come just to-day. It is such a beautiful letter, tinted paper, graceful handwriting, and such a lovely seal. Norman Hart knows how to address a lady. Such easy grace in complimenting, and such poetical language are seldom written. He is so handsome, too, with such a graceful bow, and so courteous at all times. I never saw anything so beautiful as his estate, with its hot-houses and gardens, its superb furniture and pictures, and his carriage and norses are just perfection. And he has invited me—little me—to preside over this lovely place, and spend his large fortune; offers me hand, heart, and purse. Oh! which shall it be?"

"Shall I help you?"

Nellie started, for she had believed herself alone; but at her elbow stood a small figure, in a bright dress, such as she had read about, in fairy-tales, a thousand times.

"Shall I help you!" repeated the small woman, in a clear, silvery tone. "I am your fairy guardian! Oh! yes, you thought such dreams were over when you put on long frocks and turned up your hair, but we are not quite gone, yet, though locomotives and electric telegraphs are ruining our business. Come, my dear, and I will help you to decide which it shall be."

Somehow, she scarcely realized how, the little room faded, faded away, and Nellie found herself in the long dining-room of Norman Hart's palatial mansion. Dinner was just over, and three gentlemen, who were all acquaintances of Nellie's, were running the host on his known preference for the pretty Nellie Hartley.

"Come, confess," said one, "you have made her an offer."

"Pooh! nonsense!" was the reply. "I am not ready yet to put on the shackles! Bachelor life suits me, though, of course, one must marry some time! Pass the wine, Leo!"

And from her name the conversation glided into other channels, and Nellie's memory aided her in recalling various rumors and stories of rioting and dissipation, all confirmed by the conversation now ringing in her ears. As anecdote and story flew from lip to lip, she recalled the tales kind friends had told her as warning, and shuddered at the future of this man's wife. The evening shadows were closing in, as the four men, flushed and excited, rose from their wine, to adjourn to the library. There cards were produced, and the bets grew heavier, the talk more reckless, till she turned to her guide, sick and terrified, and begged to leave the scene. As she spoke, the room faded as her own had done, and a cosy bedroom, neatly fitted up, took its place.

Upon a low couch lay a fair, pale girl, whose face was drawn with lines of suffering, and whose twisted limbs told of the frightful accident that had crippled her. She was lying very still, with a listless, wearied expression; but as Nellie watched, the pale face brightened, and she raised her head to listen. The door opened, and the smile grew radiant as Godfrey Churchman entered the room.

"Dear, dear brother!" This was the greeting. With loving tenderness he carressed her, and sat beside her, while she wound his curls round her thin fingers.

"You are tired," she said, softly.

"Rather! I am working so hard for our home, Mary!"

"And Nellie's?"

"And Nellie, if she will share it. I wrote to-day to ask her if she would come to us, for I can dare to begin now to fit up a house. We must live quietly and economically at first, but I will work hard that you and Nellie shall have every comfort."

"Ah! here comes our tea!" said Mary, as the servant brought in a small tray with a service for two. "I do enjoy your pretty present, Godfrey."

"The tele-a-tete. Yes, it's very cosy!"

And then Nellie bowed her head too, as the young man, rising reverently, asked a blessing on the meal.

Two hours glided away, and still the young girl lingered. Lingered to hear the brother's words of love fall on the sufferer's heart like music, to hear her own name respectfully and affectionately uttered. Lingered to see the tender, protecting love of the strong man soothing his sister's pain by gentle changes of position; to see how carefully he studied her face to read every thought; and, as the room at last faded away, she stretched out her arms to the noble man before her, and woke with a start in her own room.

The letters lay still before her, as they were when she fell asleep, and, as she read them again, she recalled all that she knew of the writers. In vivid colors, her dream had presented the by-gone stories of Norman's dissipation, and Godfrey's high character, and she put aside the tinted sheet to read again the words from the heart of her true lover.

The little white-winged messenger she sent to the sister's care was opened and read with bright faces and hearts ready to lavish upon her a wealth of love, while Norman Hart tossed his into the fire with a muttered curse.—Peterson's Magazine.

A Girl Who Drives a Stage.

Jessie Carson, of Minnesota, is one of the pluckiest girls in America. She has driven the stage for a number of years between Osage and Park Rapids. She makes three trips a week, winter and summer, rain or shine. In winter the mercury sinks to ten degrees below zero occasionally, but it makes no difference to Jessie. She takes her stage through all the same.—Indianapolis News.

"The Advance Made by Woman."

In exact proportion to the enjoyment and employment by women of the facilities for higher education will be the disappearance of the distinctions between their thought-out work and that of men. Women are demonstrably as capable of eminence in languages, astronomy, mathematics and writing as men. There is no department of purely intellectual labor in which they cannot hold their own with their brothers. A large majority of them, however, do not, some because they do not desire to do so, others, because they have not the encouragement, others still, because they cannot get the opportunity. Women who excel have against them the hardly reserved opposition of the mass of men to their endeavor, and the not at all reserved opposition of the moiety of their own sex to such endeavor. The apprehension in both cases is "unwomanliness," as if knowledge, reason, strength and thoroughness were to be rated masculine, and half-knowledge, illogicalness, weakness and superficiality were to be rated feminine. By this rule the women of Turkey should be regarded as the most "womanly" in the world, and those of England and America as the least so. Christianity has coincided with or caused the doing of much for woman, but it has not yet wholly freed itself, regarding her from some of the misconceptions of the grosser religions which it seeks to displace. The last quarter of the nineteenth century has been remarkable for the advance made by woman. As thorough education as that of man is her possibility. Her capacity to acquire and use it has been demonstrated. The avenues of work opening to her have been broadened and multiplied. She is much more of a person and much less of a parrot than in periods past. Her success in business has been repeatedly attested. Her skill in organization and in executive directions has been forced on the realization of the world. There has been no loss to the finer qualities, if they can be so named. The best educated woman in Brooklyn is an unsurpassed housekeeper, a splendid wife, the exemplary mother of magnificent children. The best woman cooks are not in the kitchens, but in the cooking schools, where the art of preparation and the science of economy and hygiene in food are taught with a thoroughness which makes servants twice as serviceable as they otherwise would be. The duties of home are better performed by women who know a great many other things than by those who know nothing beyond the routine of indoor work or supervision. Knowledge is power for women as well as men, and the more of it the better for both.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Hardening the Brain.

HOW A DOCTOR SAVED AN ARKANSAS NEGRO'S LIFE.

While we were waiting at the depot in a small town in Arkansas, a colored woman came up and asked if any one of the six white men was a doctor. One of them proved to be, and she rolled her check apron in her hands in a fussy way and asked he wouldn't 'jist step ober to de cabin an' see what ailed her ole man." He found that he had time, and said he would go, and two or three of us went along to see what we could see. As we drew near the cabin the woman halted us and said:

"I'ze bin all de doctah he's had, an' I'ze willin' to allow dat I might 'er made some mistakes. When he was first tooken I gin him turnip seed tea. Was dat right, doctah?"

"I guess so."

"Later on I changed to a poultice of wild onions. Was dat right?"

"It might have been."

"Den I soaked his feet in hot water wid wood ashes in it, an' put a mustard poultice on de back of his neck."

"Yes."

"Den he 'lowed he felt wuss, an' so I changed de mustard to his stumick an' soaked his head. He dun complained all de mawnin', an' now I'ze got mustard on his feet, a poultice on de middle, horse radish on his neck, an' he's takin' sassafras tea to warm up de inside."

"Well!"

"Wall, ef dere has bin any mistake, doan' let on to de ole man. Jist skip it ober."

We went in and the doctor examined the patient and found he had a broken rib, and told him what to do for it. As we left the cabin the woman followed us out and exclaimed:

"Fo' de Lawd, doctah, but what a blessin' dat you dun come along! I was dun doctorin' de ole man fur softenin' ob de brain, an' if I hadn't cotched you to-day I was dun gwine ter try to harden 'em up by mixin' sand wid his porridge!"

Gen. Crook's Romantic Courtship.

The story of the courtship of Gen. Crook is romantic. Early in the war, Crook, then a captain, was stopping at the Queen City Hotel, Cumberland, Md. He was there assisting Gen. Kelly in organizing regiments and defending the State of West Virginia from invasion. Gen. Kelly was at the same hotel. The proprietor of the hotel was John Daily, who was also proprietor of Glade's Hotel, at Oakland, Md., a famous resort. Mr. Daily had two daughters, the eldest of whom,

Miss Mary, was a charming and pretty girl. She had Southern sympathies, for her mother was a member of a notable old Virginia family who lived at Moorfield.

During Crook's stay at the hotel, he was much attracted by the young lady, but she was a spirited girl, and refused to be gracious to the Yankee, although at heart she liked him.

The eldest of Boniface Daily's children was a son, James, who was devoted to the cause of the Confederacy. He took offense at the persistent and open attentions of Crook to his sister, and finally organized a band of about fifty young and spirited spirits like himself and saw that they were well mounted and armed. When everything was ready, about a dozen of Daily's band crept into the hotel after midnight, seized Gen. Kelly and Capt. Crook, gagged them, and in a few moments they were all on their way to Richmond. The Federal lines were passed without detection, and the prisoner's were safely landed in the Confederate capital. Afterwards they were exchanged.

Crook went into active service and was badly wounded. He was sent to Oakland, with other wounded officers, and singularly enough was quartered at Glade's Hotel. Miss Mary then showed her true feelings, and nursed her brother's late captive through what was at one time thought to be a fatal illness. When he recovered, he proposed, but was refused, her political sentiment being still in the ascendant. Twice after that, the conqueror of Cochise and Geronimo attacked the fair fortress, and at last it surrendered. The General has been happy in his married life.

Too Cheap.

"Pa," cried a little seven-year-old, "I want some money to get—"

"Don't go any further," he interrupted, throwing down a coin.

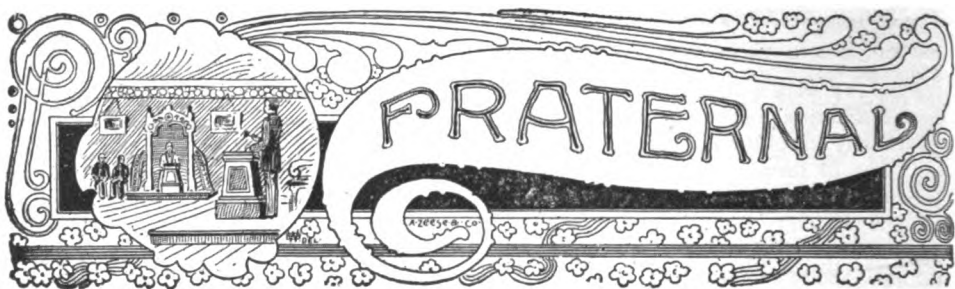

The child came slowly up to him, after pocketing the money, and barely touched his cheek with a kiss.

"Hump," ejaculated the parent, "from the kiss you gave I should judge that you don't appreciate it very much."

She caught hold of his hands, and looking squarely into his eyes, solemnly said:

HOUSTON, Texas, July 13, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Not being gifted in the way of writing for publication, I hope I will be forgiven for trespassing on your valuable space. I wish to ask a few plain questions in behalf of all concerned. I want to know if Brother Daniels or our Executive Committee knew ex-Grand Chief Conductor Wheaton guilty of making false expense accounts, why they did not stop it at once and not wait until as late a day as this and then vilify a man for things done, that I claim, all of them who knew about these matters and still let them go on, are equally guilty. Brother Daniels' excuse, I think a very poor one. It seems to me we would have been money ahead to stop all irregularities at the time regardless of scandal. How do we know there is not more of this somewhere? I do not accuse any one of dishonesty, but I think such things should have never been put in print after they have been approved by the Executive Committee and same paid, all knowing these bills to be fraudulent. As far as I can see, all are to blame, and it would be better to call a halt at once for fear there might be unsavory things arise that would not look quite right for others. Never kick a man when he is down, but strike when you are on the same plane. Now, I do not want anyone to think I hold Brother Wheaton, for such I shall call him until I have proof that he has withdrawn or been expelled, up for a martyr for this is not my desire, but as a lover of the Order, I do claim the right for any member to withdraw when done honorably, and join any other he may see fit; this is our privilege. Now, let us all work together, in unity we stand divided we fall. I believe in justice to all. Then let all dissenters who wish, go. We, I think, will show them they were mistaken in regard to our policy. I am sorry to see our members leaving our Order, and think they are hasty and have not given us the same support that we gave them when we were defeated.

I hope many of them will reconsider and be with us once again as a band of brothers, and now, in conclusion, I will say, I only want to see all who have left our Order honorably, be fairly dealt with. Don't anyone squeal now; it is bad policy; too late after the money is gone; when you know there is anything wrong, stop it at once and not wait until after the man is out.

Yours in P. F.,

J. E. ARCHER,

C. C., Div. No. 7.

Bro. Archer:

You started out, as you say, to ask a few plain questions but forgot your intent, and assumed several things to be true that are not, and from these assumed facts, draw deductions, that would be warranted if your premises were correct.

Before attempting to reply to your questions, I wish to add my testimony to your sincerity of purpose and your interest in the Order, for I have been a personal witness to that, but I can only infer from your letter, that you have given but a very casual reading to the matter to which you object being printed. In this reply, I may find it convenient to answer some of your implied questions by asking some myself.

You say first, "if Brother Daniels or our Executive Committee knew our ex-G. C. C. was guilty of making false expense accounts, why they did not stop it at once." Now I do not know to this day, that the bills referred to are "false," I believe that they are fraudulent and in asking the Order to pay such items, "Brother" Wheaton defrauded the Order, and in this view, the Executive Committee concurred. On presentation of the first bill that appeared wrong, I refused to pay it but I did not have the power to prevent the G. C. C. presenting another or as many more as he chose; as it was then nearly time for the committee to meet, I believed time and trouble could be saved by holding it until that meeting. Let me ask you, Bro. Archer, what more you would have done? When the Committee met, the matter was presented to them; they directed the payment of the bills and that nothing be said of the matter then. What would you have done then, had you been in my place? The Committee did put a stop to any such open attempts to defraud and "hailed the G. C.

C. over the coals," as the saying is in a "seance" of one entire afternoon; what transpired during that time, I have never learned but judging from the voices, matters were "warm" part of the time. One effect was that no more bills of that character were presented, and the other matters that have not yet been made public, were matters that appeared all right and no one suspected anything wrong until long after they had been paid; the whole amount of which the Order has been defrauded, so far as anything definite is known is so small and insignificant that it seems almost incredible that a man with common sense would stoop to it. Brother Daniels has made no "excuse" except for his failure to openly oppose Wheaton and for endeavoring to dissuade others from acting against him, and for that he now freely admits that he was mistaken, and those others, including Clark, Clancy and several others at Denver, were right. Charges were filed with the Executive Committee at Rochester, and I was summoned as a witness; the Committee decided not to press the charges, because they did not want to be charged with the persecution of a man who was "down," but he was distinctly informed that if he did not "walk straight" thereafter, he could expect no consideration. I told him myself, that he must not think that the decisions of the Executive Committee bound me to keep still, that while I did not wish to "persecute" him, if he again attacked either myself or the Order, I should make public these facts so that he fully understood the consequences. If anything that has been published is untrue, then Brother Archer is correct in his assumption that some one has been vilified and the person vilified has an excellent opportunity to "make it hot" for the vilifier: if, however, nothing but the truth has been told, there is no vilification. Had Daniels and the Executive Committee knowingly permitted anything wrong to continue that was in their power to stop, or any one to defraud the Order, they would be equally guilty but the fact is, that so far as in their power to do, they immediately put a stop to it and in every instance where I have known of any thing wrong, I have immediately made it known to the committee. I have not reported suspicions merely when I did not have evidence to corroborate them. In my opinion, the Committee made a mistake in allowing the bills referred to, but knowing something of the perplexities of the situation, I do not propose to condemn them for it. "How do we know that there is not more of this somewhere?" You don't know. Wheaton charged me with dishonesty; later retracted it and although the Executive Committee were satisfied, I was not, and insisted that they come here and make an examination; they did so, bringing with them a man that I had never seen or heard of before, as an expert to examine the books, papers, etc., and they came with the determination of finding anything that was wrong. The expert reported that everything was all right and that the only thing that he could find that was wrong, was that I had accounted for $6.23 on subscriptions, more than he could find I had received. The Committee went away thinking that they knew that there was nothing wrong. Whether they do know or not is an open question perhaps, but if there is anything wrong, had it not ought to be found out as soon as possible? And if exposure of one thing that is wrong is likely to lead to the discovery of others that are wrong, is it not better to make the exposition? Will not the knowledge of these things among the members, spur them up to look more closely after the affairs of the Order hereafter? Won't they be more likely to insist that thorough examinations be given, and if the proper officers do not make these examinations, will they not be more likely to call them to account? It seems to me that the very reasons that you give for suppressing the facts, are the strongest kind of reasons for their publication.

Then again, Bro. Wheaton left here with the reputation before the general public, of being an honest, honorable, truthful man; he went straight to New York and told that public that the Order was bankrupt; that it owed him money for salary that it would not and could not pay. Should we allow such malicious and false slander as this to go uncontradicted because proving it to be untrue would injure the reputation of Brother Wheaton, and thus "kick a man when he is down?" Are we not in very self-defense, obliged to show the public to whom he is telling such falsehoods, that he is utterly unworthy of belief and so far from the Order having defrauded him, he has defrauded the Order? You say you are in favor of permitting any member to leave the Order honorably who wishes to do so; can you find in THE CONDUCTOR or in any utterance of mine anywhere, anything that in any way resembles an objection to any one doing so? On the contrary, does not THE CONDUCTOR, since I have had charge of it, distinctly pronounce itself in favor of just that thing, and express admiration for men who have honorably and openly left the Order? I, too, am sorry to see some of the members leave who have left, but I am not sorry to see such intolerant and bigoted members as those who pronounced the whole Grand Division liars, and every member of the Order a perjurer, and who did not leave the Order honorably but left it dishonorably after appropriating to their own use, the property of the Order. Will an honorable member retain his membership in the Order while condemning it and while attending a meeting called for the purpose of injuring it all that is possible? Will an honorable member of the Order attempt to retain the benefits of the Order while not only refusing to aid in its support but engaged in an effort to injure it? C. S. Wheaton retained his membership in the Order during the time that he presided over the meeting held on the 22nd of June, and did not apply for withdrawal until the date of the last meeting when he applied by telegraph but found his withdrawal stopped by a notice from the G. C. C. that charges had been preferred against him. Would an honorable member retain passes that had been issued to him as Grand Chief Conductor of the Order of Railway Conductors after he had been elected "president" of such an organization as the "independent" seceders, and after having been particularly requested to return them? Some of those who have withdrawn from the Order have done so in an honorable, manly way, but so far as I know, none of them have attended the New York meetings. It is probable that some of the individual members of 168 who have joined this "independent" association, are innocent of any dishonorable intent or action, but we must judge them as a division and they have retained our property while in 201, it is an open boast that they have retained the property of the Order by the unanimous vote of every member. I join you in the sentiment, "let all dissenters go", and if they go honorably and in a manly straightforward way, I will bid them God speed, but I dissent from you if it is your opinion that we must sit quietly still and let them persuade the public that they are the "salt of the earth" and we the scum, and when they slander me, as a member of the Order, I believe it is my duty as a member, to let the world know the truth in regard to them, and as an officer of the Order, I believe it is doubly my duty to do so, particularly when as at present, the indications are that it is almost the unanimous wish of the membership. I do not propose to deal unfairly with any who have left the Order, whether they have left honorably or otherwise, but I must dissent from the inference in your sentence that any such have been unfairly dealt with, and certainly those who have left us dishonorably or who still dishonorably retain membership while trying to injure us, must not expect the same treatment that is accorded to others, and exposing their hypocrisy is not dealing unfairly with them. Was Wheaton honest when he wrote a member in your own state only a short time before the late Grand Division, that "the time has come when we must get rid of the strike clause," and "I have been working all the year as if there was no strike clause", or was he honest when he said

"on account of the change in principles I cannot be a candidate", and when he represents that he has left the Order on that account?

When the member who holds that letter reads this reply to you, I hope he will write you and tell you about that letter and I assure you he is in a position to tell you something about Wheaton's honor and his treatment of those who have befriended and defended him. Finally, in making these facts known through THE CONDUCTOR, I am only "obeying orders" and pursuing a course outlined by the Board of Directors, and approved and endorsed by all but two members. If in my place, what different would you do under the circumstances?

Don't for one moment think that this letter or anything in it is intended to injure your feelings or to prevent you from writing again nor from making any criticism of myself or of THE CONDUCTOR at any time. You and I, are too good personal friends for me to have the slightest feeling over anything you may write or any criticism you may make, either open or implied and I have had too many proofs of your personal friendship for myself and your candid interest in the association, to permit anything of the kind on my part. As I have said in THE CONDUCTOR, I don't profess to be above personal bias, and personal feeling against Wheaton may influence to some extent what I have to say of him for I have forgiven him more personal injury to myself than the injury he has done the Order, only to have it repeated as soon as he thought it could be done without my finding it out.

I believe, however, that what has been said, is enough to place him before the public in his proper character and after this number of THE CONDUCTOR, shall not waste space on him unless he or some of his injudicious followers make it necessary to discuss his actions further. I shall, however, always defend the Order and its members against the slander from him or any other, in the columns of THE CONDUCTOR if in a position to do so, if not in other ways.

With kindly regards to all of the members of Division No. 7, and the most pleasant recollections of the many courtesies I have received at their hands, and sincerely hoping to hear from you soon again, I am as ever,

Yours truly in P. F.,

WM. P. DANIELS.

MONROEVILLE, July 9, 1896

Editor Railway Conductor:

Since reading the communication in THE CONDUCTOR of June 15 and July 1, in regard to the action of some of the sixty-six in endeavoring to injure the Order, and being one of those who voted to retain the non-striking clause in our ritual, I desire to add my voice denouncing such action, and I can now appreciate your remarks made on this subject in the Grand Division at Rochester, although they seemed very harsh at the time. I am very much surprised at the action of Brothers Wheaton and Cross, and think, after being honored as they have by the Order, that if they could not work for its interest, that they should at least keep their hands off, but I venture to predict that they cannot hurt us.

I must admit that I am very much disappointed in Brother Wheaton, as I had formed a very different opinion of him. Division 166, by almost a unanimous vote, decided to advocate the retention of the non-striking clause, and some of our members were very emphatic in their opinion, but the Grand Division decided that it should be repealed, and every member of Division 166 accepted the will of the majority, and we are prepared to say from what we have seen and learned since the Grand Division closed that it acted wisely.

As to our Division, we are prospering and have had four additions since I returned from Rochester. Brother Clark's picture was hung in the Division room on the last meeting day, and he has no more loyal supporters than the members of Division 166, and if he will make us a visit I will guarantee him a royal welcome.

Yours truly,

W. H. BUDD, C. C. Div. 166.

July 12th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

There seems to be considerable notoriety attached to the famous 66 of the late Rochester Convention, and as one of that unfortunate number, I beg to offer one or two facts which in my judgment are sufficient to prove that the 66 were more divided in their opinions on the more important questions than the large victorious body.

In the 66 were men who were so enthusiastic that it was generally reported that they slept in their blue badge, while there were others who believed it to be the duty of a minority after a defeat to turn in and aid the majority in their effort to make a success under the new conditions, and who positively refuse to wear the blue badge, believing all these open displays of differences calculated to widen breaches and to attract too much public attention.

There came to the convention some of the 66 pledged to elect C. S. Wheaton for Chief, and this seemed to be their sole aim; there were others who were undecided and watched developments, while others, many others of the 66 (myself among the number) came with positive intentions to work first, last and all the time for a thorough and complete change in the executive chair.

The members of my own division who read this will remember that for a year I have held the opinion that it was imperatively necessary that we should change our leader, and I believe this to have been their main reason for sending me to Rochester.

For the strike clause, I asked for instructions, and getting them, voted accordingly. When I left home I was satisfied with the position, but before I had crossed the continent I found that Railroad Managers are not all inclined to treat their employes with the fairness that the officials of the S. P. Co. have ever displayed up to date, and it was very palpable that in some sections patience had long ceased to be a virtue and another proof of the unfitness of Bible teachings to modern railroading was furnished, for a too close application to the text reading: "Blessed are the poor in spirit" had just about made existence unbearable for a large number of our membership. All circumstances considered, after returning home and looking back calmly over the position, I am satisfied that the action at Rochester was as fair, as conservative, and as sensible as possible and more so than could have been expected.

I write the above as my protest against any claim to the 66 as a following that may be made by Messrs. Wheaton, Ostrander, Chittenden, Cross and others.

I have lying before me a complimentary letter from friend Levengoed, who spreads over me a very thick coat of very saccharine praise for the noble stand I took as one of the 66 and then endeavors to stick on it one of his famous insurance policies. I will say to him, for I suppose he reads THE CONDUCTOR, that he cannot be a very good judge of human nature, for I know that he was at Rochester, and I'll bet he was the only man there who would think of making a dollar out of me in that way.

I have just perused THE CONDUCTOR for July 1st, and cannot say that I have finished it with unmixed gratification, while I would not put the least difficulty in the way of any man who may have been put somewhat in a false position, it seems to me that it does not look any too well to let a man drop quietly out of office and laud him to some extent with expressions of appreciation, backed by a valuable diamond, and then burn him up in a public journal. I respectfully submit that every delegate at Rochester who was blessed with unbiased intelligence, got the measure of Calvin S. Wheaton on the last day of the convention, and I believe the whole membership of the Order is pretty well posted on the man, and I hope the future course will be to let him go with Judas Iscariot, Benedict Arnold, The Devil and others of that ilk, without notice or comment.

Being from the extreme west, and taking a very roundabout course as well, I presume I traveled farther than any other delegate, and I made it an express purpose from the start to learn so far as possible the views of the men I rode with. I had heard so much of the strength of the opposition Order, that I naturally expected in some sections to run across a good number of its membership, but I was surprised to find that in a ride covering about 8,000 miles I did not see a B. of R. C. man and fully 90 per cent. of the men I rode with were members of our Order. After leaving Rochester I did not find a single man who objected to the change of Chief and the opinion was just about the same regarding the much debated clause. The few men who were not of our body expressed very favorable opinions of our acts and nearly all volunteered the information that they should immediately join us. My experience may have been exceptional, but I am inclined to think not, but that throughout the whole country, the Quaker settlements excepted, there is unlimited satisfaction.

I fully believe the Michigan men are a unit, I saw a great number of the boys there, for it happens to be my wife's native State, and so I was coaxed up to Grand Rapids ostensibly for a day or two, to find that half the people of the state of Michigan, are my relatives by marriage and the other half intimate friends of the family.

For Oatle Division I can only say that they are a fine set of fellows whose hands, hearts and homes are open to a fraternal visitor to such an extent as to leave him lost for language. If we had accepted all the invitations tendered by Grand Rapids alone we would have been able to ride to the Pacific Coast on Bro. Butler's road.

To Bros. Flaherty, Oatley, Higgins, Jones, Rodgers, Cook, Shaunnassy, Volkert and others of the same locality who aided so much to make my visit a pleasant one, I can only say, come to California and give me an opportunity to get even to some extent, and in this invitation I must include that old Pioneer of our Order, Bro. Sam Gage, of the Flint & Pere Marquette, who can vouch for my dexterity in spearing fish by torch light, for he saw me coming back from the place where I did it.

Yours very truly in P. F.

W. V. STAFFORD,
Ex-Captain Div. 115.

ATCHISON, Kansas, July 15th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

As it has been some time since I have seen anything in THE CONDUCTOR from here, I thought it would be well in me to send in a few items. Our Division, No. 28, is in a pretty good condition at present. We have given the first degree to one Brother, the second to one, and the third to one, and have one candidate for next Sunday. Our Chief Conductor, Brother Kelly, is doing all in his power to make 28 second to none, and if the Brothers will only turn out and help him a little, he will succeed in his efforts. Our worthy S. & T., Brother Nesbit, is nearly always at his office, (219 South 5th St.,) and is always ready to welcome all who may call (to buy coal) to see him, and if he is not present when you call, you can leave your card with his silent partner, Mr. Frank Davis, (Frank is awful quiet) who will also welcome you, and be only too glad of the opportunity. Our S. C., Brother Geo. C. Allen, may be found following the C. & A. bridge engine No. 3 around, sometimes on the Kansas side of the river and sometimes on the Missouri side. Our J. C., Brother Coughlin, may be found lining up track on some point of the Missouri Pacific, as he is roadmaster. Our A. C. C., Brother Dodge, is running the Irish mail from Atchison to Edgerton, for the Rock Island Route. Brother Hansen, our I. S., is on the C. B. U. P. Div. of the Missouri Pacific, still handling the punch, and waking up the passengers on the night runs. Whoa! who would have thought it came very near leaving out our O. S., Brother Rody, who can be found on the C. B. Division of the Missouri Pacific transportation freight and drilling, for Henry runs the local from Atchison to Greenleaf opposite Brother McKinsey, alias Shorty. Business is not so brisk as it might be, but we are in hopes that it will pick up for there are some of the conductors, who have had to go back to braking on account of business being so slack. Some of the men, and I should say all of them, are a little dissatisfied in regard to their pay for the last two months, since the new schedule went into effect. The men are all right and so is the schedule, the fault seems to come from the superintendent's office. He says he don't understand it the way the men do, and is paying them straight mileage, and that no one hundred miles or less constitute a days work, and no over-time can be made. Well, if this don't stop your injector you can publish it in THE CONDUCTOR, but if you think that it is liable to corrode it in any way you had better leave it out.

Yours in P. F.,
MOULDOON'S BROTHER DAN.

THE "ROLL OF HONOR."

In referring briefly to the reports of the late farcical proceedings in New York and the persons who participated therein, we shall end the matter so far as the editorial department of THE CONDUCTOR is concerned, unless there shall be some additional slanders of the Order circulated. We shall as far as possible give our readers whatever news there may be in regard to the "independents," but shall not waste valuable time and space in commenting thereon.

We give on another page, the reports of the "proceedings" as published in several different papers in New York. The reports published by the papers in other places did not differ materially from these, except that they were condensed and the most of them repeated the falsehood that Wheaton resigned his office and declined to be a candidate for re-election because of the action at Rochester.

There were present at this "Grand Division" the following: C. S. Wheaton, of Division No. 9; E. D. Nash, J. C. Sweeney, M. Severance and Frank W. Flint, all of No. 24 and employed on the Vermont Central road; Victor Pidgeon and E. Richardson, of No. 75 and employed on the Grand Trunk; F. J. Griffiths, S. D. Chittenden, A. C. Gordinier, A. Ball, B. Dargavel, L. K. Wood, S. V. Smith, A. Vandervere, John Long, A. F. Stackhouse, W. S. Bagshaw and Amos Bird, all of 168 and employed on the D. L. & W.; J. Y. Levensgood, of No. 169 and employed on the West Shore; R. C. Mason, W. L. Thomas, S. H. Clark, F. A. Hermance, A. B. Murphy and A. S. Ostrander, all of 201 and employed on the N. Y., N. H. & H.; A. Holdridge, of 54 and employed by the United States Express Co., and Geo. M. Paugh, Wm. Bowen and J. H. Tarbush, not members of the Order, the two former D. L. & W. and the latter N. Y., N. H. & H. men.

cept himself, and it is more than likely that but very few outside of those actually present were represented by anyone. There are on the line of the Grand Trunk, twelve Divisions of the Order; eleven of these Divisions were represented at Rochester, and the eleven Divisions had fourteen votes, and, with one solitary exception, all were cast in favor of the elimination of the strike clause, the exception being Division 88, which was represented by Brother Kilpatrick, of Chicago. In this connection, we will say that in giving this information to our readers, we are not telling anything that is unknown, for while the seceders have carefully refrained from giving it correctly as the expression of the Divisions and the membership, they have given the names of those who voted "aye" in such a manner as to prejudice them with their employers as much as possible. Division 75 was represented at Rochester by VICTOR PIDGEON; in both instances where a vote was taken on this question, he voted in the affirmative, yet he now professes to represent the conductors on the Grand Trunk in a meeting of seceders, who give as their reason, the action of the Grand Division for which he voted, and he appears not only as a member, of the "independents," but accepts an office with them. Here is an opportunity for some conundrums. "A noticeable change from the old order, was the substitution of 'President,'" &c. It is evident that the criticism of THE CONDUCTOR on either the lack of originality or the manifest intent to deceive, has made itself felt even with the "independents," and that they have endeavored to break its force by a sublime effort, and in rising to the necessity of the occasion, have made a few minor changes in the titles of their officers, but they still retain their misappropriated title of "Order of Railway Conductors," notwithstanding that they now proclaim that they are not an "order" at all, but simply and only an insurance association. The brightest jewel in their crown is consistency; they proclaim with much sound and fury that the Order is going to the dogs, they are obliged to leave it from "conviction," and will immediately proceed to form an order that will be in accord with their convictions, and then as soon as they learn by experience that notwithstanding their proclamations "de sun do move," they decide off hand that they don't want any order or any labor organization, they just want insurance, and in order to get it must organize an association, although they claim they still have in the Order they have left, two and a half times the amount of insurance that they have provided for themselves, and that they are going to keep it. One report says: "the Eastern men have not rallied around the new standard as fast as Mr. Wheaton expected"; it is a fact, lamented by them no doubt, that Boston, Providence, Portland, Hartford, Bellows Falls and numerous other Divisions that were to drop like ripe cherries, were not represented by even a single member, and even from Springfield, where the original plans were laid and where it was reported the Division had, by a unanimous vote, resolved to surrender its charter, not a member came, and the Division has not only not surrendered its charter, but will go ahead with over half of its former membership certain, while it is probable that all or nearly all will remain with the Order. Again, surprise is expressed that no Western road is represented, and none of the delegates could explain it. This might lead to the inference that all Eastern roads were represented, and if the East is willing to concede that they have but four roads, we are willing to grant this.

The New York Herald intimates very strongly that the four roads have had more to do with forming the new organization than anything else, but we do not believe that there is anything but talk to this, except that minor officers like Griffiths have used their authority and influence with men under them in order to win favor for themselves with their superiors. We are satisfied that such men as Mr. Halstead and Mr. Reasoner are not the ones to interfere in any way with the personal rights and privileges of the employees nor would they permit subordinates to do it openly, but every one in railway service knows, while those unacquainted with it cannot appreciate, the opportunities that such men have for punishing those under them under false pretenses when they choose to do so, and that in this way they can exercise a very strong influence upon the employees under them without there being anything tangible that can be specified.

The statement in the World that Wheaton severed his connection with the organization last May, is untrue, and he made no attempt to sever his connection until he perceived that he was to be placed in the pillory, and then made the attempt, but unfortunately for him, just a little too late. Mr. Wheaton was one of those who were most vigorous in condemnation of Mr. Howard for retaining his membership in the Order while acting as an officer of the Brotherhood, but it did not seem to occur to him that he was subject to any such condemnation until after he was called to account for it.

One of those ingenious statements that while literally true, conveys a falsehood, is that made to the Post, that "Mr. Wheaton had not asked to have his salary increased." It is true that he did not but he did make a most abject plea for a gift of a thousand dollars and when the writer accused him of asking for a gift instead of an increase of salary because he knew that he would draw it for only a single year and then leave it for some one else, he admitted the truth of the accusation by his silence. The man who recommends that his salary be cut down, simply to get votes at New Orleans, as he has admitted and in the openly expressed belief that a reduction could not be carried, is an eminently proper person to complain of the high salary list of the Order of Railway Conductors. The Order is not in debt $6,500 nor 6,500 cents and no one knows it better than Mr. Wheaton and his followers.

The Post further says:

"The men who are especially attacked in this way are Mr. Wheaton, the President of the new Association, A. C. Gordiner, A. S. Ostrander, F. A. Hermance, and S. D. Chittenden. Mr. Wheaton, who, until last month, was considered good enough for the office of Grand Chief Conductor of the (old) Order of Railway Conductors, is now charged by some of the opponents of the new Order with having electioneered to secure another re-election, and with having acted dishonorably for a long time towards the Order of which he was the head."

Mr. Wheaton was considered good enough simply because there was no way to get rid of him without making trouble and scandal that it was then hoped could be avoided.

He was elected at New Orleans in 1887 simply and only because the opposition to him at that time was not organized and had no leader and up to within three hours of the time for election, had not decided on a candidate, and after Bro. Chapman had concluded to permit them to use his name, less than five per cent of those who were opposed to Wheaton knew anything of it; those who knew expected to inform others by the nominations, believing that to be the only practicable method, owing to the short time. Wheaton took advantage of this and in violation of precedent, and law, ordered a ballot without permitting nominations and as a consequence many members voted for him because they knew of no one else to vote for. That this is true, the members who so voted will testify if necessary.

The Executive Committee were several times within the past year, upon the point of removing him from office, and in January last, the only thing that saved him from removal was the natural sympathy felt for him on account of the death of his brother and the disinclination of members of the Executive Committee to take any action of that character while the remains of that brother were yet untombed; in other words, sympathy alone prevented it, although the matter had been considered so far as to discuss the matter of covering the hiatus in the term that would be caused by his removal without compelling the A. G. C. C. to sacrifice two years of his term as assistant, to fill the office of G. C. C. for a few months. Mr. Gordiner's name has never been mentioned in this publication prior to this number and he is now simply given a place on the "roll of honor." We challenge any one to show that anything has been said in THE CONDUCTOR of either of the others that is not true. They began the attack upon the Order and now when the truth is told them, they whimper about being persecuted.

The new Independent Order of Railroad Conductors, on the other hand, is going to be largely and warmly supported by the conductors throughout the country who do not believe in strikes. For instance, the conductors on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Road, on which the engineers struck recently, are earnestly in favor of our new organization, and will probably form a Division."

The only line in the west where there has been any withdrawals is the above named road, but it is untrue that the conductors on that road are in favor of the new organization. At the meeting called in Burlington to consider the matter of withdrawing from the Order and sending delegates to the New York meeting, not a single division was in favor of doing either, and of the members who have withdrawn from their own uninfluenced choice, none except perhaps Cross, Stanchfield and Drew are in favor of the "Independents," and while THE CONDUCTOR unqualifiedly condemns Cross for his actions while an officer of the Order and for using his position with the "Q." company to compel members to leave the Order, we believe he has too much good sense and manliness to stultify himself by favoring anything of which Mr. Wheaton is president.

NO APOLOGY TO OFFER.

The Western Railway and some of the officers of other associations are asserting that the Order did wrong to apologize for its action at Rochester, and profess to regret such action. The Order has made no apology to any one nor will it make any. We are not in the business of apologizing to railways or anyone else for matters that concern ourselves alone or at least, ourselves primarily, for we do not wish to be understood as claiming to be independent of our fellow laborers nor do we wish to be understood as saying to them or to any interested in train service that what we do is none of their business, nor do we wish to be understood as saying to them "mind your own business." We fully realize the fact that laborers in any service are to a certain extent dependent upon each other and that this is true of train men to a greater degree than in almost any other vocation. We are willing to listen to advice and do not object to criticism although we do object to dictation and to criticisms founded upon untruth. We reserve to ourselves the right to accept or reject the advice, heed the criticisms or not as we choose, and to legislate for ourselves and by ourselves. The assertion that the Order apologized for its actions at Rochester is based upon the adoption of the following:

"WHEREAS, There appears to exist among members of this Grand Division a radical difference of opinion in regard to the rights and privileges possessed by the minority; be it therefore Resolved, That the delegates of the Order of Railway Conductors, in Grand Division assembled, explicitly declare that in no case can any division or divisions, or any member or members thereof, compel any member to join in or engage in any strike under any circumstances, nor shall a minority of the members be bound by the action of the majority, or be required either by considerations of necessity or sentiment to engage in or support such strike, when so doing shall be contrary to their convictions or detrimental to their private or personal interests."

How this can be construed into an apology for anybody or anything is more than we are able to see. The preamble is a simple statement of fact. There did exist among many members of the Order and members of the Grand Division, differences of opinion as to just what their position was and in order to assure them that their rights and opinions would not be trenched upon, the exact position of the Order was defined in a concise and definite manner. It was feared by many members of the Order and of the Grand Division that the erasure of the strike clause would, and was intended, to plunge them into a causeless and eternal quarrel with their employers, that almost immediately upon the adoption of the resolution repealing it, they would be called upon to join a crusade initiated by the western men. They seemed possessed of the conviction that the western men were prototypes of the Irishman who declared that he "didn't come for a fight and wasn't going away without it;" that the west came with professions that they "didn't want a strike," but that if they could only prevail in their ideas, that they were not only "not going away without it" but were going to involve every other member in it with them; there was a very marked fear that there was something "underground," something that the minority could not understand and this fear was worked upon, and magnified by the "independent" members until, had nothing been done to explain and remove this groundless fear and apprehension of some mine that was to be sprung, it is more than probable that the first boasts of the "independents" would have proven true and not only would all the New England Divisions have "gone out" but possibly a considerable number of others. They were suspicious of the radical, cowboy west, and that the adoption of the resolution was wise and timely is now made manifest by the disappointment of the "independents" and the slimness of their side show. Conductors are possessed of considerable of human nature and some traits are possibly more fully developed in the average conductor than in almost any other class of men; perhaps the conductor more than any other, is likely to say "I don't have to" when told that he "must." Members of the Order are now indeed, free Americans; they are deprived of no right of citizenship by any kind of a bond, either real or imaginary; we believe that the present laws of the Order in that respect are ample and satisfactory, though it is not unlikely that experience will demonstrate the necessity of legislation to restrain the more impetuous and prevent their enthusiasm from confronting us with embarrassing situations. It is asserted that members will surely strike now that the prohibition is removed; there is no danger of a strike where members of the Order are fairly treated, but we are free to say that hereafter when a railway officer taunts members of the Order with their inability to strike and tells them that for that reason he is not under the necessity of treating them with common civility even, they are very likely to strike. They will not hereafter permit themselves to be used in times of trouble and thrown aside and forgotten as soon as trouble is past, because of a misapprehension of what their rights as members are.

E SEMPRE FURFANTE.

We had hoped that it would not be necessary to annoy our readers with anything further in reference to "Majah" Leflet and would not notice him any further were it not for the fact that if not denied, it would be loudly heralded that his falsehoods were admitted; we shall however make this as little of the "Majah" as possible and content ourselves with a simple statement of facts and hereafter, will not even deny the vagaries asserted by this convicted cheat.

The "Majah" never wrote a word to the writer derogatory to C. S. Wheaton. Anyone who will testify that "Daniels expressed the same opinion of Wheaton eight years, (or even three years ago) that it is expressed now" will testify to a falsehood. "The resolution to publish the proceedings in the Railroader," referring to the annual meeting of the Philadelphia Passenger Conductors' Association, did not carry unanimously, nor at all. The resolution was objected to on account of its singling out a disreputable sheet and the convention endorsed the views by striking out the name of The Railroader, and adopting an amended resolution to give the proceedings to the press. It is true that the secretary, Walter Lackey, furnished the proceedings to the Railroader and did not to others who were left to depend upon their own resources. Daniels and Wheaton did not withdraw from the meeting, although Wheaton resigned his position of vice-president. The association went to pieces simply because the Railroader and its friends attacked and insulted, not Wheaton but members of the Order generally, including Charley Ashton, Dick Fitzgerald and men like them. Members of the Order withdrew from it spontaneously and without any persuasion whatever and the result was that there wasn't enough left of it to make a showing inside of one year and "Japhet," otherwise Levengood is now "in search of a father" for it. In reference to the yardmaster's association, the years of its greatest prosperity were those following its election of Bro. J. C. Campbell, president and the adoption of THE CONDUCTOR'S MONTHLY as its paper. Its decline began when Bro. Campbell declined a reelection and the Railroader was readopted. The statement that "at Richmond when the association of yardmasters was on its last legs, a resolution was adopted condemning THE CONDUCTOR'S MONTHLY," is not unlikely to be true although we never heard of it and it requires better evidence to make it creditable; the "Majah" was there with no opposition and members of the Order had generally left the association. Col. G. J. Johnson can give some interesting history in regard to the yardmasters. J. C. Campbell can be reached at Derry Station, Pa. Mr. Sanger is somewhere in New York, we think, but his address can be procured from Miss Sanger, who is President Harrison's private stenographer.

At Buffalo, when earnestly soliciting the Order to adopt "my paper," the "Majah" claimed to be the sole owner of the paper and disclaimed all responsibility for letters written by Mr. Reed nearly a year prior to that time.

With this we bid the "Majah" a long farewell and leave him with his greatness. The man who has been convicted of the practices that have been proved against him, can injure no one, except with those who wish to believe falsehood, and with such no denial or proof will have any weight. We simply remind our readers that falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus and that everything asserted by any convicted falsifier, should be regarded with suspicion.

THE PHILADELPHIA MEETING.

We regret that owing to the late date of receiving the report, we are unable to publish in full the report of this meeting as given in the Philadelphia papers. We give a portion from The Press, and it will readily be seen that F. A. Hermance, is slightly mistaken in asserting that "the N. Y. C. is on the skirmish line," but much nearer correct than he thought or intended when he said: "New Jersey is in the Union." The Doctor (of pills) is also correct in his statement, that "no disloyal mutineer or violator of his obligation shall ever pass the 'dead line.'" The Doctor's error was in his application of self-evident truths, and the location of his "dead line," which is now shown to be a small and very obtuse triangle with New Haven in the obtuse portion. In fact, developments must before now, have convinced the Doctor, that the disloyalty is merely isolated, sporadic cases, and that it is neither epidemic or contagious while the severity of the attack as evinced by the symptoms of the Doctor himself indicate that it will run its course very rapidly and terminate fatally for those attacked. If this diagnosis is not correct, will the Doctor diagnose and prescribe again.

STOCK FOR EMPLOYEES.

As will be seen by the statement from the president, on another page, the Illinois Central has determined to aid its employes in becoming part owners of the road on which they labor. The proposition seems to be eminently fair and to give the employe every advantage; he can make a bargain for the stock at the market price by paying five dollars or more and will be credited with interest at four per cent. on all amounts so paid. If in the future, the price of stock falls, the company assumes the risk as the employe may cancel his contract and have all he has paid in returned to him and the same is the case with any employe who leaves the service of the company. It certainly seems like a very favorable proposition on the part of the company and if there is nothing more to it than is shown in the statement of Mr. Fish, we believe that the employes will not be slow to become stockholders. This experiment of the I. C. will be watched with great interest by employes all over the country and we shall expect and be glad to hear from members on that line in regard to it. That it will be regarded with suspicion by many, coming at the time that it does, is almost certain and for the success of the plan, it is to be regretted that the proposition was not made before there occurred anything to cause employes to think that there may be something more in it than a desire to benefit the employe. We do not care to comment further on the matter at present.

THE OTHER SIDE.

A Morris and Essex conductor said to a World reporter yesterday: "The principle on which Moses Taylor Division, No. 168, Order of Railway Conductors, was dissolved and its charter surrendered was highhanded and unjust, and was sufficient in itself to keep some of the conductors from entering into any movement toward organizing a new Order. They howl 'no strike,' and endeavor to make it appear that the old Order was going to plunge them into some ruinous turnout on the instant.

"The beginning of the troubles that led to the split in the Order dates back to the annual convention held in Rochester about two months ago. Moses Taylor Division was represented by Niram Devoe, of Newark, and S. Dudley Chittenden, who, having served as delegate to three conventions of the Order was by virtue of service a general delegate and entitled to a voice in the convention. The Western conductors had gone through a telling campaign of strikes during the year, the chief trouble being the great C. B. & Q. Railroad turnout. The delegates from the wild and woolly regions explained that, while they conceded that strikes should be discountenanced in general, it was absolutely necessary at times for the Western men to rise up and assert themselves. They asked that the anti-strike clause in the constitution and by-laws of the Order be eliminated. This would allow them to do as they pleased and need not interfere with the good-will and harmony existing between employers and employes in the East.

"Chittenden, of the Lackawana, and Ostrander, of the New Haven Division, at once scented a scheme to involve the East in a general strike. They opposed the abolition of the anti-strike clause, and when a resolution which they opposed was carried by a vote of 210 to 66 they left the convention. Calm and unimpassioned, Niram Devoe remained at Rochester to see the matter through.

"Delegate Chittenden did not sleep over the matter, and sober second thought could not get in an idea edgewise. A call for a special meeting was issued and the following morning at 10:00 o'clock the meeting was held; seventeen members, including Assistant Superintendent Griffith, of the Morris and Essex Division, being in attendance. Fourteen members caught Mr. Chittenden's infectious excitement and rebellious sentiments and voted to dissolve the Division and surrender the charter. The three who failed to vote with the majority felt that the story had two sides and contended that it was due Delegate Devoe, if only through courtesy, that no action be taken until he returned from Rochester and reported. While seated in convention Devoe heard of the dissolution of his Division. He felt hurt and was greatly embarrassed. He saw the thing out, however, and was well satisfied that the resolution substituted for the anti-strike clause could not be reasonably objected to.

"Its plain, and in no wise ambiguous. But certain men imagine that they can read strife and strike between the lines. But I can see nothing unfair or exacting in the resolution."

All indications point to serious internal discord in the ranks of the working conductors on the Lackawanna branches, as many of the old men have declined to join the independent organizations.—N. Y. World.

NOT A SECEDER.

As will be seen by the following from the Philadelphia Press, C. S. Wheaton has no "string" on Bro. Maxwell and Div. 162, as he claims.

William J. Maxwell, who presided, said that the secession movement would not amount to anything. He said: "The Order of Railway Conductors has a membership in the United States, Canada and Mexico of more than 16,000, while the secessionists do not claim more than 2,000 members. C. S. Wheaton, who is at the head of the seceders, was for many years the Grand Chief Conductor of our Order. His excuse for seceding is that we changed our constitution at our Rochester convention, by striking out the clause prohibiting strikes, but his real reason is that he was not re-elected as Grand Chief Conductor. I have no hesitation in saying that if Wheaton had been re-elected to his old position he would have remained with the Order notwithstanding the change in the constitution.

"He had, however, by his course so estranged his former friends that had he allowed his name to go before the convention he would not have received twenty-five votes out of more than 250. That is the man who is leading the revolt. He is trying to make it appear that we favor strikes. We do not. We simply leave the question out of our constitution altogether, and the Order is not committed, one way or another. It thus leaves each division free to act according to the best judgment of the majority of its members. Our Order was never in better shape, and we have never had a more harmonious or more enthusiastic union meeting than the one which has just adjourned."

Bro. Maxwell is mistaken in his statement of the "claims" of the "independents." Their latest "claim" is to 300 members only.

DENOUNCING SECEDERS.

The secession from the Order of Railway Conductors of ex-Grand Chief Conductor C. S. Wheaton and his friends was condemned in strong terms yesterday by a large union meeting of representatives of the Order, which was held in Dental Hall, Thirteenth and Arch streets.

Ten Divisions of the Order were represented at the meeting, which was one of the largest and most harmonious union meetings of the Order, ever held in this city. Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey sent delegates from these Divisions: No. 5, of Baltimore; No. 12, of Scranton; No. 32, of Meadville; No. 143, of Harrisburg; No. 147, of Easton; No. 162, of Philadelphia; No. 170, of Camden; No. 204, of Philadelphia; No. 224, of Wilmington, Del., and No. 229, of Reading. There were conductors from the Pennsylvania, Reading, Baltimore & Ohio, Lehigh Valley, Delaware & Lackawanna, and in fact, all the principal railroads of the states represented. William J. Maxwell, of Philadelphia, presided.

After a general discussion of the action of the seceders a preamble and resolutions were offered and adopted by a unanimous vote, reciting that "The members of this meeting view with indignation the unwarrantable action of a few former members of the Order in seceding and without just cause establishing a separate organization, at the head of which is placed the recreant, C. S. Wheaton, retiring Grand Chief Conductor of this Order, in opposition to his oft-enunciated principle of yielding cheerful compliance to the will of a legally constituted majority.

"There is not now, nor has there been occasion for secession from our ranks, and we deem it but proper that an expression of the members of this meeting be given in order that all doubts to their loyalty to the order may be removed, therefore be it resolved that:

"We will do all in our power to prevent the secession movement from gaining a foothold in our localities, and that we distinctly disclaim any sympathy with their movement."—Philadelphia Press.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., July 19, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR: Brother H. E. Craft of Monon Division No. 89, was on July 1st, appointed train master of the L. E. & St. L. R'y and branches with office at Huntingburg, Ind. It was a promotion from chief dispatcher, and gives universal satisfaction, as Brother Craft has become very popular among the employes of this company. Monon Division, also, is proud to have one of her members promoted.

Yours Truly in P. F.,

H. S. REARDEN, C. C.

July 6th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Have just read your "Calvin Selah" in last issue of THE CONDUCTOR, and will say I am glad you have opened up on him. To think that a man can so lower himself as to go back on an organization that has brought his bread and butter for him for nine years, is more than we would believe, but in his case it is true. Hope you will crack away at those eastern bubbles and make them sick. I did not hear what became of the property in those Divisions. Are we not entitled to it? Did those members surrender their charter—and withdraw in form or did they revolt?

I do not fully understand the situation, and would like to know for the benefit of several. You have acknowledged you made a mistake in not ventilating C. S. Wheaton, which I consider manly, and should be satisfactory to all members.

Yours in P. F., WABASH

It is hardly necessary for us to notice the silly assertion that "Daniels signed the Cross circular."

We are pleased to note the reinstatement of Bro. Tifts, of Div. 43, to his train, through the influence of the Order.

The secretary of 226 wishes the address of Bro. W. H. Gehman, who is supposed to be on some Texas road. Can any of our readers accommodate him?

Bros. Mounts, McVeigh, Burr, Pattengill and others whose names escape just now, have placed us under obligations for favors during the past few weeks.

Mr. E. P. Wilson, late general passenger agent of the C. & N. W., has been made commissioner of the Cincinnati freight bureau, with office at Cincinnati.

A. G. C. C. Garrettson wishes to express his sincere thanks to Messrs. Sargent and Arthur, for courtesies extended to him while in the city of Cleveland recently.

The expression that comes to us from the line of the Pennsylvania road, where C. S. Wheaton has always claimed to have the members completely under his control, is particularly gratifying.

Preliminary organization effected June 22nd, with 2,000 members and lots to hear from; permanent (?) organization effected July 13th, with 300 members. Such is the history of the "independents" so far.

A union meeting of all the associations of train employes will have been held at Toledo, before this reaches our readers. It is to be held on July 27th, and we wish the boys a successful and harmonious meeting.

It is said that Brother Honin's friend Wing, is a monomaniac on the subject of spotters and spotter's reports; if this is true Dan, why not send him to the asylum? Won't the U. P. furnish a special and the county pay the bills?

A vexatious error occurred in our last number by which we made the date of the Union meeting at Savanna August 13th. It should have read August 10th, as that is the date the meeting will be held. All interested please note the correction.

Our information in regard to Brother D. C. Brown located him in Newton, Kas., and we advised members when in that place to call on him. We are just advised of the error and he can be found on Commercial street, in Emporia instead of in Newton.

Brother A. L. Owen of Division 30, is now located at Brantford, Ont., where he is master mechanic of the B. W. & L. E. R'y. He says he has not seen THE CONDUCTOR since leaving Missouri and would like to have it once more. We hope it will reach him regularly.

Monon Div. No. 89, in connection with the other railway organizations of trainmen at Louisville, have arranged to give a mammoth picnic July 31, and August 1, and also make the occasion a vast union meeting. Officers of all the various organizations are expected to be present and all are invited.

Among the late changes on the Rock Island we notice that Brother W. S. Page of Division 3, late superintendent of transportation of the C. & I. C., has been appointed assistant general superintendent of the "Rock Island" west of the Missouri river, and Brother J. R. Blair of 226 goes to Kansas city as train master.

In all of the reports of the meeting held lately by the "independents," that we have noticed, the language used is "the — road was represented by —" and in no case is there anything said about the conductors being represented. Are these reports nearer the truth than they were intended to be?

The late difficulties on the C. L. & W. have all been satisfactorily arranged, and by "system federation," although no written agreement was in effect. The "Big Four" settlement is also satisfactory to all, and it also was brought about by "system federation" between the Supreme Council, the B. of L. E. and O. of R. C.

The prediction of THE CONDUCTOR in regard to Mr. McLeod, the new president of the Reading has been verified by his late action in recalling the obnoxious order that conductors must withdraw from the Order of Railway Conductors or leave the service of that company. Mr. McLeod says that neither members of the O. R. C. or the B. of R. T. will be disturbed.

**

Whether federation is for the best interests of employees or not, is, with some at least, yet an open question; but any railway officer who attempts to prevent or hinder it, by placing obstacles in the way of those who wish to attend meetings held to discuss it, are with many, advancing an unanswerable argument in its favor, and petty exhibitions of this kind will hasten instead of retard its progress.

Apropos of the Grand Trunk being represented in New York, July 13th, we copy the following extract from a private letter from a member of a division whose members are exclusively employees of the Grand Trunk R'y:

"We held our first regular meeting since the new law went into effect, yesterday. We had four candidates to work on and ten petitions to ballot upon."

The extreme hot weather or a fear of the waste basket, has seriously affected our Fraternal correspondence. We don't wish to monopolize all the space in THE CONDUCTOR, but wish the assistance of members generally, and we believe that a general interchange of opinions through its columns would be beneficial to all.

Any information as to the present address of George Adolphus Rohner, who was educated at the Gregory Institute, Hoboken, N. J., and who was injured on some road running out of Chicago, about four years ago, will be gladly received. Mr. Rohner can receive important information in regard to his family by addressing E. S. Hall, 1427 Spear street, Logansport, Ind. Railway journals are requested to copy.

Some time ago, a definite charge was made that C. S. Wheaton, when Grand Secretary and Treasurer of the Brakemen's Brotherhood, defrauded that organization of a considerable sum of money; this charge Mr. Wheaton proposed to meet in a "convincing and exhaustive manner" when the proper time came. The charge is several years old, but no one has ever seen any public denial.

We are pleased to learn from a communication in another part of this number, of the promotion of Bro. H. E. Craft, of Div. 89, to the position of train master on the L. E. & St. L. We do not remember that we have ever met Bro. Craft, but from the general average of the members of 89, have no hesitation in prophecying that he will fill the place satisfactorily, not only to his employers but to all employees who attend to their duties.

Permission is hereby given to any member of the Order, to make public in any way that he sees fit, anything that I have ever said or written, directly or indirectly, in connection with the mention of my name for the office of Grand Chief Conductor, at any time during my connection with the Order. This in reply to an inquiry.

WM. P. DANIELS.

We regret to note the sudden death of Bro. M. D. Hunt, of Division 48, who was instantly killed the evening of July 12th, while taking the numbers of his train preparatory to going out. A switch having been left wrong, an incoming passenger train ran through the "cut off" on which Bro. Hunt happened to be standing, killing him instantly, and crashing into the side of the train which he was preparing to go out with.

The union meeting held in Philadelphia on the 20th of July was largely attended, and adopted resolutions condemning the secession movement, and pledging the support of all present to the Order. Brother W. J. Maxwell presided over the meeting, and this fact alone contains cold comfort for the "independents," who have claimed Brother Maxwell as in sympathy with them and about to come to them with a large delegation from that section.

We are in receipt of a copy of Sights from the Towers of Boston, and have to thank the United States Hotel for it. It is a complete history of Boston in a condensed form, with illustrations of the principal buildings. We have pleasant memories of Boston and particularly of the United States Hotel; during our stay there, we were resident of "Texas," and found it a very pleasant place. We certainly won't forget the United States when in Boston again.

A. Holdridge "represented the U. S. Express Co.," as is stated by the press reports of the first annual Grand Division held on the 13th. We wonder how the western employes of that company will relish the idea of being represented without their knowledge by Mr. Holdridge. It is possible that Mr. Holdridge represented the company, but he did not represent any of its employes. In the meeting of June 22d, Mr. Holdridge said: "I will have 54 surrender their charter."

Contrary to the expectation of a number of the employes, Mr. G. C. Wilson, formerly superintendent of terminal facilities in Chicago, goes to Burlington as superintendent of the Iowa lines of the "Q"; we are unacquainted with Mr. Wilson, but can assure him that he has a hard place to fill; not that the employes of the Iowa lines are obstreperous or that there is anything wrong in any way, but it is always hard to fill a place vacated by such a man as Brown. Mr. F. A. Delano, succeeds Mr. Wilson at Chicago.

It is rumored that a number of passenger conductors have been dismissed from the Alton and the Santa Fe, but at this writing there is no confirmation of the rumor. One feature that makes it appear improbable is the statement, that the Santa Fe gave those dismissed some two weeks notice, advising them some days ago that dismissal would take effect August 1st. This is not the way railway companies do business and the victim receives no notice until he is relieved, some times after going to his train to go out.

In one of the accounts of the meeting of "independents," J. Y. Levengood is said to have "represented the West Shore." This information will be relished by the West Shore conductors, particularly those who are interested in the fund for caring for the conductor's room in the West Shore depot at Weehawken. For some time past, the friends of Mr. Levengood among his associates could easily be reckoned on the fingers of a one-armed man, and he has never represented a solitary person except himself.

It is reported that officials of the Union Pacific are either disregarding the late agreement made between the train-men and Mr. Holcomb, or are construing it to suit themselves and to the disadvantage of the employes. Train-men on the U. P. have suffered long and grievously under just such abuses as this at the hands of minor officers and the limit of their patience has about been reached. If it becomes necessary for a committee to meet Mr. Holcomb again, some of these petty tyrants will, in our opinion, join Mr. Russell in losing either their power or positions.

Train No. 48 on the C. B. & N. made the run from La Crosse to Savanna in three hours and forty-two minutes on the fourteenth ult. The train made nine stops, taking water twice and lost twelve minutes waiting for orders, leaving the actual running time, probably less than three hours; distance 154 miles. The train was in charge of E. J. Pollard with engine 4 and engineer Jas. O'Brien. The boys report a good business on this line and say that it took twenty-six coaches to provide room for the educators—those who went over that line to attend the educational institute.

We have a great number of letters, many of them with the sentence, "you can publish this if you wish," heartily endorsing the course of THE CONDUCTOR, and to date but three disapproving of or questioning it in any way, one of the latter is the letter from Brother Archer in this issue. We have published but few that were "on our side" for the reason that it has always been the policy of THE CONDUCTOR to be modest and not to publish anything in praise of itself. We are however, always ready to publish any criticisms and would publish all received if we had the necessary permission of the writers.

A correspondent says that "Gus" Holdridge who is a minor official of the United States Express Company, attended the meetings of the "independents" by the express direction of the president. We are inclined to doubt this very much, as we believe Mr. Platt to be a reasonably smart, shrewd man, and while, judging from the treatment of its employes by the U. S. X. Co., we believe Mr. Platt would not hesitate to take any action that would enable the company to make another "cut," we believe him entirely too shrewd to take any notice of the "independents" in any way.

"Man never is, but always to be, blessed," and "even a bed of roses" has its "crumpled leaves." It is rumored that all is not serene with the "3co", and that a cloud considerably bigger "than a man's hand", has already arisen on their horizon. There be those, so it is said, who object to Calvin Selah coming to the front and carrying off the place of honor (?) in the "independent" association after others have borne the heat and burden of the day in preparing for the organization. Ostrander, who, at Springfield was selected as the man for the first place, is thrown a sop in the shape of a place on the insurance committee, while superintendent Nash gets the place that Bro. Beals was to have. Superintendent Griffiths is chairman of the executive committee, and "under the grass," Hermance, is chaplain.

The case of Bro. Marshall Lafferty against the O. & M. R'y is still pending and will probably be tried at the next term of court. Bro. Lafferty's expenses in defending himself from the charges made against him and in prosecuting this suit have been heavy, and any member who will send to him for one of the copies of the arguments of his counsel in the former trial, will never regret the investment of the fifty cents and will beside, be aiding a worthy Brother in a struggle against a powerful corporation. His address is 1209 Government street, Evansville, Ind.

It is a fact admitted by the warmest supporters of general federation, so far as we are informed, that any general federation that does not include all organizations of trainmen, cannot be a complete success, and in the cases cited by its supporters, the Supreme Council has only won its victories by a "system federation" between the Supreme Council and the employes outside of it, including the engineers, and they admit this without hesitation themselves. That the plan of system federation has been a success wherever tried cannot be controverted, and it has been successful without calling to its aid the Supreme Council.

Once in a while, there occurs a typographical error that nearly drives ye editor crazy and makes him want to utterly annihilate from the face of the earth, the compositor, proof-reader and the fellow who points out the error. Again, occasionally there occurs such an error that is so manifestly a statement of fact, that it seems as though ordered by "the fates." Of the former class was the error that made "dirty socks" of "curly locks" in a tender little lay by a poetical writer to his innamorata. An error occurred in the last number of THE CONDUCTOR by the omission of the period and space between the initials of Mr. Ostrander's name.

We are in receipt of a communication written from Boston, Mass., and signed "B. R. C."; the writer does not give his name and as a general rule, we pay no attention to anonymous communications; this letter however, contains some information that is of interest and which is corroborated by others and by circumstances which entitle it to consideration. We would be glad to reply personally, and hope that if this shall meet the eye of the author, he will send us his name and address. He may feel sure of courteous treatment, as may any honorable man, no matter what he is a member of, and the name will be confidential if wished.

The B. of L. E. Journal for July, says: "The first ballot received at this office as to federation was in favor of the same, but from that day, when several other reports were received, until the present writing, the reports are, by a large majority, opposed to federation. * * From the reports that continue to be received, we judge the members of the B. of L. E. are not desirous of adopting the present mode of federation." If the B. of L. E. decide not to become a member of the general council, it may possibly cause a reorganization of the present federation.

"Frank S. Butler leaves to-night for Atlanta, Ga., where he will make his home in the future. He returns to his former occupation of railroading, but will engage in a department that will enable him to make use of his rare qualifications as a real estate man."

The above from the Sioux City Journal is news to us, and this seemingly sudden change of base on Frank's part, causes us to infer that he has good prospects before him. We hope so, at least, and we commend him to the Brothers of 180. Look out though, Frank, Latimer and several other members there are typical southern democrats and they are likely to shoot such a radical republican as you are, on sight.

To Bro. Stafford's mild criticism, we would say, that if it was merely a question of information to members of the Order, there would be no occasion whatever to say a word in regard to C. S. Wheaton in THE CONDUCTOR; members generally are well enough informed to make it unnecessary for anything to be said to them. If not, the 250 delegates who were at Rochester can give them the necessary information; but we owe it to ourselves to protect ourselves with the public from the falsehoods and slanders that are being spread in regard to us. We owe to the conductors who are as yet members of no organization to give them, so far as we may, information that will prevent them from being led astray. Bro. Stafford defines the position of the "66" exactly, but one thing has apparently been overlooked by all; the "66" votes did not represent 66 Divisions of the Order by any means; 13 of this 66 were either officers or permanent members so that but 53 Divisions were represented.

It is said that a communication from Mr. Howard of the B. of R. C. to the Grand Division of the Order, was sent by Mr. Wheaton. No such communication was presented to the Grand Division, and if it is true that any message was suppressed, THE CONDUCTOR wishes to disclaim all responsibility on the part of the Grand Division for failure to acknowledge it, as they were in ignorance in regard to it. No matter what Mr. Wheaton's opinion of the B. of R. C. or its Grand Chief Conductor, he had no right, legal or moral, to suppress a communication sent by him and intended for the Grand Division or the Order. Members of the Order and of the Grand Division are not lacking in common civility, and will not treat any communication with discourtesy. Should the "independents" address a communication to the next Grand Division, we guarantee them a civil acknowledgement at least, and if sent by the present Grand Chief Conductor, we guarantee that it will be delivered. If Mr. Wheaton did not wish to deliver a message, he should have so notified Mr. Howard at the time it was given him.

We are in receipt of a communication from M. Severance, on the "Sunday" question; as this question, which was originally as to whether or not trains should be prohibited from running on Sunday, has been changed entirely by the correspondents, first to a question as to what day of the week is Sabbath, and finally in this last communication, to a matter of personal abuse, we use the editorial prerogative and shut off the discussion. We welcome a fair discussion of Sunday trains, and will be glad to give all such communications space, but will not permit THE CONDUCTOR to be made the medium for personal quarrels arising from any discussion. In the opinion of THE CONDUCTOR, there should be no question as to Sunday trains; there should be no Sunday trains that can be abolished; at the same time, we believe the train that is run on Sunday to get a train crew home rather than have them spend an idle day away from home is a benefit, from a moral, christian, or pecuniary point of view. THE CONDUCTOR is opposed to legislation against Sunday trains, for the reason that it gives railway officers who feel so disposed, too much opportunity to persecute the employes by keeping them away from home, as has been amply demonstrated where such laws are in force.

It has been loudly proclaimed that every one of the 101 former members of the Order at New Haven were in favor of leaving the Order and endorsed the secession project, and that among the entire number, there was not a single dissenting voice. Now comes a personal letter from a member who says, "I met Bro. — of Div. 201, and he says that the majority of that Division are in favor of the O. R. C. as it stands." The Bro. who writes us, is reliable and what he says can be depended upon, and the question arises, did the former member of 201 express the truth in regard to the situation in New Haven, and if he did, how much pressure was brought to bear by the "five superintendents" to bring about the existing state of affairs there? The writer of the letter suggests that some officer should look after them. It is utterly impossible for any officer of the Order to hunt up individual persons who might prefer to remain in the Order, but find it expedient to conceal their preference, and apparently acquiesce with the majority, or as has been shown in some cases, with the minority, but if any such members will write to this office, they will be advised as to procedure, and any former member of either 24, 168 or 201, who wishes to retain his membership in the Order, can do so by writing to this office within the time prescribed by our law.

Owing to the declination of some of the railways to grant the slight courtesy of transportation to employes, the meeting at Logansport was not so largely attended as the committee expected, but in every other point, it was a success and to the full, fulfilled the anticipations of all in the way of removing misunderstanding, and creating a more friendly feeling than has heretofore existed. The principal discussion was general versus system federation; as a majority of those present were members of organizations which are already members of the Supreme Council, it is likely that a vote, had one been taken, would have shown a majority in its favor. We remain unconvinced to the general federation idea, and believe that where members of the Order find it best for them to form any alliance, that they will find that an agreement covering the line or system on which they are employed, will be found the most satisfactory in every way; such an agreement has already been made on several lines, and the matter is now pending on others. A mistaken idea in regard to system alliances, is that held by some, that it involves a number of committees; it does nothing of the kind, and if the agreements already made and those under consideration are carried out, it will be found that one small committee is all that is needed or provided for, and that there is no unwieldy body to consume time in discussion and differences of opinion.

The Story of Damon and Pythias, a souvenir to the Knights of Pythias on the occasion of their late meeting in Milwaukee gotten up and presented by the Pabst Brewing Company, has been received and while Pythian Knighthood is a sealed book to us, the souvenir is something that will find a place of honor in our library and certainly must be a pleasant reminder to every member of that order, of the story of friendship and honor upon which their organization is founded. It is beautifully illustrated by half-tone engravings, and while we are not authorized to say so, we presume any of our readers who are knights, can obtain a copy by addressing the Pabst Brewing Company, Milwaukee, Wis.

Carrier—Passenger on Freight Train—Injury. One who takes passage on a freight train rather than wait a few hours for a passenger train and is injured by a jolt caused by coupling cars, cannot recover, when the jolt was not caused by the negligence of the company's servants, but was usual and necessary in coupling the cars.

Crine vs. East Tennessee, V. & G. R'y Co., Ga. S. C., May 12, 1890.

Injury to Passenger—Receiver—Judgment. 1. Action for personal injury resulting to plaintiff while a passenger of a railway company operated by a receiver. It appeared from the evidence that after the brakeman had announced the name of a station at which a railroad train had been accustomed to stop, the train stopped at the station platform, but started up again almost immediately, and ran 50 yards further, where it stopped long enough to allow the passengers to alight.

Held, that the passengers bound for that station had a right to presume that they were to alight at the first stop, and that for any injury received, while attempting to do so, by reason of the insufficient length of the stop, the carrier was liable,

2. The fact that the defendant was, as a receiver, operating the train in which the accident occurred, will be presumed; but judgment should not be entered against the receiver personally.

McNulta Receiver, Wabash Ry. Co., vs. Eusch Ills. S. C. May 29th, 1890.

Carrier—Injury to Passenger—Evidence—Error. In an action by a passenger for personal injuries, where the evidence shows that plaintiff started into another car to get water while the train was moving slowly, but stopped a minute on the platform to talk with a friend, and, just as he was passing on, the coupling pin broke, and the cars parted, throwing him off, whereby he suffered injury. The trial court directed a non-suit on the ground that plaintiff disregarded all rules and warning and was not in the exercise of due care by tarrying on the platform.

Held, That where the immediate cause of a passenger's injury may be attributed to the breaking of a coupling-pin, and where the evidence tended to show that the pin used was light and unsuitable for heavy work, it was error for the trial court to award a non-suit. The cause should have been submitted to the jury Judgment reversed.

Cotchett vs. Savannah & T. R'y Co., Ga. S. C. May 17, 1890.

NOTE:—This cause is reversed for error, and remanded for a new trial, with instructions to submit the case to a jury.

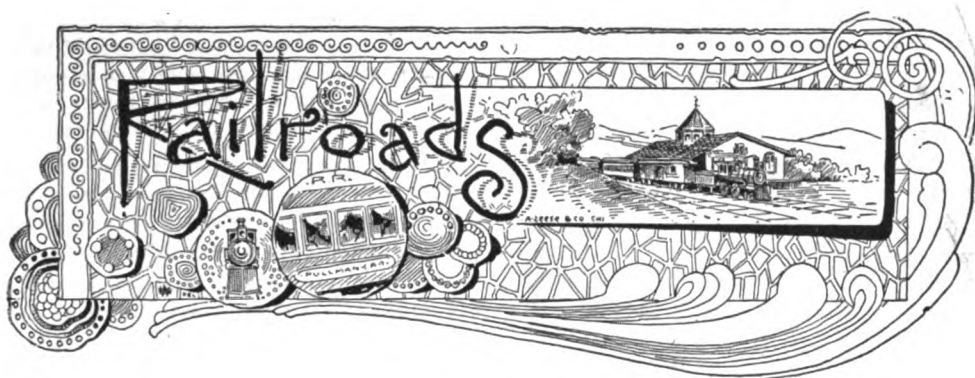

Carrier—Connecting Lines—Limiting Liability—Loss of Baggage.

1. Where a ticket is sold by a railroad company for a continuous passage over its own line, and thence over the lines of other companies, to the destination, the initial company may, by stipulation in the contract of carriage, limit its liability for injury to baggage to such injury as may occur on its own line.

2. In a joint action against three railroad companies, operating connecting lines to recover for baggage lost at some unknown point on their lines, the evidence showed that plaintiff purchased for a single fare from another company, a common agent of defendants a through ticket over its own and defendant's lines, with coupons attached, on each of which were the initials of all the defendants; that when plaintiff reached the end of the line of the initial company, which had expressly limited its liability to such injuries as might occur to plaintiff's baggage while on its own line, she received from the next company a through check for her baggage over all of defendant's lines, and was charged for extra weight; that the baggage was carried through to the end of the journey on the same train with plaintiff.

Held, That the evidence was sufficient to authorize a finding that defendants jointly undertook to carry the baggage safely through to the end of the journey.

Peterson vs. Chicago R. I. R'y Co., Iowa S. C. May 15, 1890.

SANTA FE AGREEMENT.

Lake Valley Run,	105.00	70.00

4. On all freight runs of less than 100 miles requiring more than 10 hours to make the run, over-time will be paid if the hours used on the trip exceed 12 hours, in which case all over-time exceeding 10 hours will be paid, 30 cents per hour for conductors, and 20 cents per hour for brakemen.

On all freight runs exceeding 100 miles train men will be paid over-time for all time used to complete the trip in excess of an average speed of 10 miles per hour at the above rates.

5. Train men required to remain on duty over thirty minutes with their train after arriving at a main line terminal station shall be paid at the rate of 10 miles per hour.

6. In computing over-time no fraction of an hour less than 30 minutes will be counted. Any fraction of an hour over 30 minutes will be counted one hour.

7. Any conductor or brakeman running less than 100 miles in 24 hours on freight or extra passenger service or special trains will be paid the same as if 100 miles had been run; and in addition for any over-time earned under Article 4.

8. Pilots on Raton Mountain and other helper service will receive $70.00 per calendar month. 12 hours constituting a day's work; over-time at 25 cents per hour after 12 hours.

Other pilots to receive conductors' pay according to the division on which they are employed.

9. Turn-arounds in stock service will be paid under Section 4 and 7.

10. Short turn-arounds made within 24 hours where mileage is less than 100 miles will be allowed 100 miles, and where more than 100 miles is made actual mileage will govern, except as provided under Article 9.

11. Freight or passenger crews making extra trips, in addition to their regular assigned runs, will be allowed extra time upon the basis of pay allowed other crews in similar service.

12. Crews dead-heading under orders will be paid one-half their regular rates.

13. Crews not assigned to regular runs will be run first in first out.

In ordering crews, the first crew will run the train, the next crew dead-heading when dead-head service is required, the dead-head crew being ahead of the crew with whom they dead-head on reaching the terminal of that run.

14. When crews run over more than one division the assignment of crews to the through runs will be made, as near as practicable, on the basis of mileage of each division.

15. Where crews are compelled to double hills as a regular service, such crews will be allowed the extra mileage made; for example, if a hill is 5 miles long, an allowance of 10 miles, in addition to the length of the division, will be allowed.

Mileage for doubling hills under any other circumstances will not be allowed, except at the discretion of the division superintendent.

16. Main line freight train men will be called at division or terminal stations by train caller, who will be provided with a book in which the men called shall enter their names, together with the time they are called. The district within which train men will be called will be established by the division superintendent, but shall not, in any case, exceed three-quarters of a mile from the calling office.

The working time of all train men will commence within one hour after they have signed caller's book.

17. When train men are called and for any reason, other than their own acts, do not go out, if held on duty less than 6 hours, they will be paid one-half day and stand first out. If held more than 6 hours, they will be paid one day and go behind other crews at that point.

18. Train men attending court at the request of an official of the company will be paid the same rate he would have been entitled to had he remained on his run, and, if away from his home station, in addition thereto his legitimate expenses.

19. When a change of divisions or train runs require train men to change their place of residence, they will be furnished free transportation for their families and household goods to their new place of residence.

20. Train men will be notified when time is not allowed as per trip report.

21. The assignment of brakemen will be made in accordance with the judgment of the division superintendent, subject to the provision of Article 23.

21. Conductors and brakemen will not be dismissed or suspended from the company's service without just cause.

In case of suspension or dismissal, if any employe thinks his sentence unjust, he shall have the right within 10 days to refer his case by written statement to the division superintendent. Within 10 days of the receipt of this notice his case shall have a thorough investigation by the proper officers of the railroad company, at which he may be present if he so desires, and also be represented by any disinterested employe of his grade. In case he shall not be satisfied with the result of said investigation, he shall have the right to appeal to the general superintendent and to the general manager.

In case suspension or dismissal is found to be unjust, he shall be reinstated and paid for all time lost.

23. All employes will be regarded as in line of promotion, dependent upon the faithful discharge of duties, capacity for increased responsibility, and term of service. Superintendents are keeping a record of the employes on their respective divisions, in which is entered their merits, demerits, and term of service. Upon such record promotions will be based.

Reductions in forces will be made at the discretion of the division superintendent in the order of promotions

Every employe should understand that it is his privilege and duty to make written appeals to his division superintendent whenever by promotions, reductions or assignments, he deems an injustice has been done him.

Any employe will be dismissed without hearing, in case of intoxication, in ubordination, and collisions.

Nothing in this article shall be construed as preventing the company from employing experienced men when the good of the service requires it.

24. Any employe believing himself to be improperly treated under these rules and regulations shall have the right of appeal to the general superintendent and general manager.

25. All schedules, rules and regulations in conflict with these now adopted are void.

No change will be made from these schedules and rules without reasonable notice.

Paragraph ten has been changed somewhat providing that 100 miles shall be allowed turn arounds made in a calendar day, and that if a portion of two calendar days are used, 200 miles shall be allowed.

AN IMPORTANT CORRECTION.

On page 548 of this number is a statement that president McLeod of the P. & R. had withdrawn the order issued by Whiskerandos Bonzano, to members of the Order employed on that road that they must withdraw from the Order or leave the service of the company, and that neither members of the Order or of the B. of R. T. would be disturbed. This statement was made from the partial report of a committee that had interviewed Mr. McLeod, and from the statement made in Philadelphia papers that it had been withdrawn. It now appears that this announcement was either premature or else Mr. McLeod has changed his mind again, under the influence of Whiskerandos, as July 21st, Bro. Hedley of 229 was dismissed from the service of the company for refusing to withdraw, and the dismissal was on an order direct from McLeod, to superintendent Cable. Several other members of the Order have preferred to sever their connection with this disreputable company, rather than to submit longer to their imperious and tyrannical dictation. THE CONDUCTOR is sorry to be obliged to announce that its estimate of Mr. McLeod was incorrect, and will hereafter give him a taste of that criticism from which he is said to shrink. We are also advised that the original order was by direction of McLeod, and that it did not originate with Whiskerandos. It is also said that no regular order has ever been issued or posted, and that some employes, for that reason, are inclined to think that the whole matter is imaginary. It is true that no written order has been issued, and that nothing of the kind can be found on any bulletin board of the company. A reason for this is given by an officer of the company who said, referring particularly to the "whiskers" order, "We have had enough of written orders for the public press to get hold of—and this one will not be put in writing but it will be enforced all the same."

McLeod is claimed as a warm personal friend by C. S. Wheaton, and a personal letter says that "he (C. S. W.) has been circulating around this vicinity considerably lately, but without any effect that can be seen." Whether this "circulation" had any effect in Mr. McLeod's final determination or not we do not know. McLeod, Whiskerandos and Wheaton make an excellent "three of a kind."

Bro. Hedley has been provided with a better situation than he left, and other members who lose their positions will be provided for as rapidly as possible. Members generally are requested to aid us in arranging for them as much as they can.

Editor Railway Conductor.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—For the third time in seven months death has entered our Division. This time we are called upon to chronicle the sad death of Brother E. W. Sornborger, who was struck by an over-head bridge about one-half mile east of Epworth, Iowa, on the line of the Illinois Central Railway, and instantly killed. The body did not roll off the car but lay perfectly still until assistance came. Brother Sornborger was running No. 13, Sunday, June 29th, and was over near head end of train coming into Epworth station; he was on his way back to the caboose when he met his death, at about 5:00 P. M. He knew the bridge was there, but for some unaccountable reason forgot where he was.

Brother Sornborger was buried at Waverly, Iowa, Tuesday, July 1st. The funeral was conducted by Howland Lodge, No. 274, A. O. U. W., of which he was an honored member. The pall bearers were selected from Johnson Division, No. 67, O. of R. C. Deceased was a member of the Order of Railway Conductors, of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and of the Iowa Legion of Honor. Members of the local Divisions of each followed the remains to the grave in a body, besides a large number of the friends and acquaintances. Members of the local Divisions of the A. O. U. W. and I. L. of H., of Waverly, met us at the depot and conducted us to the cemetery.

Our Superintendent kindly furnished us a special train to carry the remains, together with the sorrowing relatives and friends from Waterloo to Waverly. Brother Sornborger will be sadly missed by all who ever became well acquainted with him. No better father or husband ever lived than he, and to the grief-stricken widow and two little children we extend our heartfelt sympathy in this their hour of trouble, and can only say, look to God who does all things for the best.

Truly yours in P. F.

G. O. MILLER.

Editor Railway Conductor:

At a regular meeting of Terre Haute Div. 92 the following resolutions were passed:

WHEREAS, Our Heavenly Father in His infinite wisdom has summoned from our ranks our esteemed Friend and Brother Joseph M. Stolle; be it Resolved, That we convey to the family of our deceased Brother a sense of our bereavement. While yet in the morning of life and height of his usefulness, he has departed, leaving in the minds and hearts of the members of Div. 92 a shining reflection of his character as a man and a zealous member of our Order. From our memory time cannot efface the many noble, endearing traits that bound him to us.

To his family we offer our sincerest sympathy and mingle our sorrow with theirs in this hour of their deep affliction.

Resolved, That in memory of our departed Brother we drape our charter for a period of thirty days. That these resolutions be incorporated in the minutes of the Division and a copy be transmitted to the family of our lamented Brother. Also a copy be sent to the editor of THE CONDUCTOR for publication in that journal.

We are in receipt of the Lomb prize essay on Practical, Sanitary and Economic Cooking for which Mr. Henry Lomb, of Rochester, N. Y., paid the first prize of $500. It is a small volume of 180 pages, but in our humble opinion, though we are not a culinary professor, is of more value in the kitchen than all of the numerous and voluminous cook books that are in existence. Mrs. Ellen H. Richards, Instructor in Sanitary Chemistry, Massachusetts Institute of Technology says of it:

"It is not often that we find so much real knowledge, or the result of so much study condensed into one little volume of 175 pages. It is a truly fortunate circumstance that an American mother and housekeeper should have the great opportunity, and with the opportunity the desire and ability to weave the scientific knowledge of the laboratory into the daily food of the family. The great value of the little book lies in the clear statement of certain principles which lie at the foundation of all food preparation; so that if the particular recipe is not valuable for the housewife she may by a little study learn how to adapt what she has to the best advantage."

At the time of General Fremont's death he was engaged upon the manuscript of a paper for The Century's forthcoming series on the California Gold Hunters. It was to be entitled "Finding Paths to California," and was not only to deal with the several exploring expeditions, but to narrate the writer's intimate connection with the events which led to the conquest and occupation of the territory. The work will be promptly continued by Mrs. Fremont. A first draft of the article had been made, and the subject had been so recently and closely discussed by General and Mrs. Fremont that she will have no trouble in completing the manuscript, for which she had already written an introduction, as well as a supplement describing her life at Monterey in 1844. A fine portrait of General Fremont from a daguerotype of '49 or '50 will appear in the September number of The Century, along with portraits of Commodores Sloat and Stockton, "Duke" Gwin, and Governor Burnett, in an article giving account of "How California Came into the Union."

We are all curious—and it is surprising how curious we are—to know the way other people live, especially well known people. For several months we have been treated to glimpses into "Some Homes Under the Administration," in Washington, in a fine series of beautifully illustrated articles in Demorest's Family Magazine. In the August number (just received,) Postmaster General Wanamaker's mansion is thrown open to us, and we are charmed with its beauties. The handsomely executed illustrations give us every detail as accurately as would a personal view, and it is a great pleasure to stroll with the writer and artist through the elegant apartments of the famous picture-gallery, the latter containing some of the rarest works of art in America. This August number should be seen by every body, if for this feature alone; but it contains other features equally interesting, not the least of which is an account of "The Oberammergau Passion-Play," which is not only with a picture of the Bavarian village where the play is now being enacted, but also with many of the tableaux shown in this historical performance. There is also a complete novelette by Queen Elizabeth of Roumania ("Carmen Sylva"), preceded by her portrait and fine illustrations of her summer castle and her boudoir. The other articles and stories are all of the highest order, and beautifully illustrated, forming a Midsummer Number of rare merit, which is enhanced by a sea-shore water-color frontispiece of artistic value. CEDAR RAPIDS, IA., AUGUST 15, 1890.

NO. 16.

A RAILROAD ADVENTURE.

"No money! What in thunder'd you get on for? How'd you expect to travel on this road 'thout the stamps? Off with you, and no whining around me! I know my business and you know yours, may be. Any baggage?"

"No baggage," I muttered, dolefully; "but you can take my overcoat. I can get the money at Savannah."

"Dang your old overcoat! What you s'pose I want with your old rags?"

"Off with you, quick!"

"For heaven's sake."

"Shall I kick you off?"

"I'm a thousand miles from home."

"Dang your home! Off with you, or I'll sling you off."

"Try it, if you dare!"

Whop! thud! biff! biff! lick-to-whack! spat! scuffle-a-bangle! crash! thrash! whollop! and out we went together into a pile of cross-ties. As he clinched me I struck him a heavy blow in the face with my right fist, while with my left hand, I pulled the bell-rope. Toot! toot! said the signal whistle and off went the tra'n.

Do you quite understand what I had done? It's all very plain to me. I had stolen a conductor. Let me be explicit.

To tell you the truth I had just served through the war in the Confederate army, and only twenty-one years old at that. You know there was a conscription law, and when I was eighteen I had to go in. I was assigned to duty in Florida, and when the war ended I found myself suffering from a wound and a thousand miles from home. I stayed in Florida till the winter of '68, when, finding myself well again, and seeing no earthly chance of finding employment in that distracted state which would enable me to lay up money enough to pay my way home on the cars, I set out afoot. Not till I had walked a hundred miles or more did I fully realize the difficulty of my undertaking. In consequence of my wound I had for a long time been in-doors, scarcely taking any exercise at all, and now, although I was well, I was as tender as a woman. My feet swelled so that I had to split my boots all to pieces, and my legs got stiff and sore. I suffered from lack of food, too, at times, for the country through which I passed was thinly settled, with people so poor that they had nothing for me. Finally I reached the railroad, and as it was my direct route to Savannah, where I hoped to find some friends, I followed it. This railroad passes through the outlying marshes and cypress wastes of the great Oakefenokee swamp, and it was in the most dismal part of that wild barren that a happy idea entered my brain. It was that of stealing a ride. A freight train had just passed me going north, and I knew that in less than an hour a passenger train would follow. My plan was to stand near the track and leap upon the platform of the hindermost car. I did this without accident, and found myself, a moment after, whirling along very comfortably, seated on the platform steps. Ah! it was delicious to feel the cool night breeze fanning my feverish face. Night air? Yes, it was near midnight, and the full moon was shining gloriously. How sweetly I rested. How much pleasanter than walking!

But luck did not favor me. My ride was a short one. I had not been seated more than two minutes when something tapped me on the shoulder, I looked up. "Tickets!" said the man who leant over me.

"Got none," said I.

"Money, then," said he.

"Got none," I replied.

Then followed what is chronicled at the beginning of this sketch. He had reached up and pulled the bell-rope, bringing the train to a stand-still. I did not think of stealing him till the very moment he clenched me to throw me from the platform. Then, all at once the resolve came. As I have said, I struck him with one hand and pulled the bell-rope with the other. We had a short, furious fight on the platform, then rolled off into a pile of cross-ties just as the train in obedience to my signal, rolled away. I do not think the conductor heard the engine whistle or knew the cars had gone, so busy was he trying to lick me. I was too much for him, though I had not tasted food for three days past. I suppose that fever and fury of despair lent me strength, for I got him under me, there on the cross-ties, and thumped him till he bawled for help. By this time the train was roaring but faintly in the distance. I let him up and he gazed around.

"Wh—where's my train?" said he.

"Don't you hear it?" I asked, seating myself on a cross-tie, in an almost breathless state.

"What in thunder! Ding that engineer! What on earth made him leave me? I'll report him to——"

"Oh! don't get too blustery," said I, interrupting him. "I gave the engineer the signal just as you clinched me."

"Did you pull the bell-rope?"

"Yes, sir."

"The nation you did! What for?"

"O! just for fun," I replied, scowling at him out of the corners of my eyes.

"For fun! and how much is it?" he asked.

"Between a quart and a half-a-gallon," I replied.

"Have to walk at least ten miles through this infernal old swamp," he muttered.

"Better two of us than one!"

"But ding it, my train!"

"Just so!" said I.

"They may not miss me for forty miles."

"Nor me."

"Nor you! Ding you! Who are you, anyhow?"

"No matter," said I, "you'd better have let me alone."

"But, ding it, man, I must obey orders. The road-master would have me reported for dismissal if I'd 'a let you off without the money!"

"And now he'll report you for deserting your train."

"No; I'll hurry up to the next station and telegraph my situation."

"By no means," said I.

"Why not?"

"I'll not allow you."

"You won't!"

"That I will not!" said I emphatically, drawing from it's hiding-place underneath my coat-tail, a huge Colt's revolver. The conductor's face turned to just the color of the moonshine.

"Don't kill me," he suggested, "I was only obeying orders, indeed I was, sir."

"Maybe you'd like to pray a little?"

"Pray? Good heavens! You're not in earnest?"

"Oh, if you don't want to pray," said I, cocking my pistol and examining the cap.

He went down on his knees and prayed quite fervently. Just as he finished I heard the train coming back at full speed.

"Ding'd if they ain't backing down! They've missed me!" he cried, springing to his feet.

"They'll never find you," said I.

"Very easy," said he, "I'll wave my hat."

"Not at all," I rejoined.

"Why not?" I'll let you ride to ——"

"I do not care to ride," I interrupted: "let's take a stroll into the swamp."

"What for?" he said trembling.

"Oh, just to avoid being seen," I replied.

"For heaven's sake!" he cried.

"Move ahead!" I said, as I drove him back into the thicket swamp a few hundred yards.

"Now you just open your mouth," I remarked, as the train trundled slowly past with lights hanging on every side, "and I'll put a ball down your throat!"

He kept very quiet, and we could plainly hear the excited voices of the passengers and train-hands as they were borne along at a constantly lessening speed. Finally the train was brought to a stand-still half a mile below. After remaining there awhile it came puffing slowly back, the men running along beside it, beating the woods a few yards in either direction.

Meanwhile I was not idle. I bound the conductor's hands and feet with his suspenders and gaged him with my handkerchief. In this condition I sat him down against the root of a large pine-tree, and throwing my overcoat across my arm, left him there. As soon as I got out of sight of my prisoner, I took off my small coat and turned it. It was a small flannel sack made to be worn either side out. It was black on one side and white on the other. I hastily put a pine-knot in my cap and threw it into a pond near by, and put on a soft hat which I had been carrying in my pocket. This hat was white and very broad-brimmed. I now hastened to the vicinity of the railroad track, and as the train with its excited attendants began to pass I coolly joined the crowd of persons who walked beside the cars.

"Singular what's become of him," I remarked to the man nearest me.

"Tarnation queer, indeed," was the reply.

"He's sloped with the money," said a puffing fat man on my left, "bet my boots on that."

"That's my notion," said I.

Yes, yes," continued the fat man approvingly, "that's it 'xactly. I know a conductor out in Texas to do this very same trick once."

"You did!"

"Yes, sir; and he never has been found."

"Indeed!"

"So, sure's the world, and they said he had a pile of money on hands, too."

"Real sharp villian, wasn't he?"

"Was that, sure!"

"Hist, listen! Who's that?"

"Help! help! help!" roared a voice down in the swamp.

Everybody halted to listen.

"Help! help!"

"It's the conductor's voice," yelled a brakeman, and forthwith everybody rushed into the swamp. In a very little time we had found my man, who had managed to spit out his gag. I helped to untie him.

"How the dickens came you in this fix?" said I in an assumed voice, helping him to his feet.

"Ding if I can tell you; must 'a' been the devil. Great big black fellow sitting on hind platform. Asked him for ticket; said had none. Asked him for money, said he had none either. Stopped the train and went to kick him off. Ding scamp pulled the bell-rope and clutched me like blazes. Took me down in the swamp and tied me. Pistol two feet long. Ding if it 'twasn't!"

Well, after everybody had congratulated the conductor we all went back to the train and got aboard. I took a seat near the hindmost car.

Hoot! hoot! yelled the whistle, and away we sped. I leaned back in my seat and soon fell asleep. Everybody was excited and talking but me. Fact is I was exhausted.

"Ticket, check!"

Someone punched me in the ribs. I sprang wildly to my feet.

"Ho, ho; here, what ails you?" said the conductor laughing.

I rubbed my eyes and sat down.

"Thought that fellow of yours had got me," I muttered, coolly taking off my hat, as if looking for my check.

"Lost," said I; "must have fallen out when that infernal brush dragged my hat off."

The conductor rubbed the knots on his head, made by my fist, and said smiling painfully:

"You fellows must have torn about like one possessed, about one-half of you are minus your checks; but ding if I a'n't monstrous glad you found me! Awful beating that fellow gave me. He'd 'a' killed me if train hadn't 'a' come back just as it did! Bless my life, you ought to have seen his eyes. They had the devil in 'em!"

The conductor passed on. I rode to Savannah, where I found a friend who furnished me the means to get home. Such is the history of my first, last, and only highway robbery.—Sioux City Times.

King Corn at Sioux City.

HIS PALACE THIS YEAR GRANDER THAN EVER BEFORE.

More than twice as large as any of its predecessors, different in design and scope from anything ever before conceived, the Corn Palace of 1890 will be not merely a thing of beauty, but it will be a wonder, the three previous Palaces can claim to have any idea of what this Palace is unless they come here September 25 next to see it, and they will need to stay to the close, October 11, to see it all.

The executive committee got down to business at its session last night, and the magnificent design prepared by Architect Brown was gone over piece by piece, and the plans of the architect were found admirably complete, many original and attractive features having been worked out in the mind of the architect, assisted by even to the people of Sioux City. The strongest argument that anyone ever used against the perpetuation of this great festival was the fear that it might grow old, might get monotonous and fail to attract the necessary crowds because there were no people left who hadn't seen it. That was on the theory that all Corn Palaces are alike. But no one has ever seen the like of what the Corn Palace of 1890 is to be. None of the many thousands who have gazed with wondering admiration at the fruits of Sioux City genius as shown in the practical suggestions of the committee.

To begin with, the Palace of 1890 is to be 264 feet square, or more than twice as large as last year's Palace, which was 120 by 240. It will cover nearly the whole of the block cornering northeast on Pierce and Sixth streets, last year's location. The central building will run up to the imposing height of 172 feet, the upper 100 feet being a dome. This main building will be in the form of an octagon 166 feet across. In the center will be an open space 78 feet across, without a post or anything to interfere with a view of the whole interior decorations. This space will run up sixty-six feet with an artistically painted sky at the top, studded with stars made of incandescent electric light.

The gallery in this Palace will be clear around the interior of the rotunda, 44 feet high and will be 25 feet wide. Dispensing with the high gallery feature will be good news to nervous people, for it will entirely remove the danger that has been felt before from crowding them. For everybody wanted to get as high as possible. This gallery will give everyone an opportunity to see all there is to be seen, and it will be adorned with various exhibits as well as overlooking all the rest of the Palace. Five wide stairways leading to the gallery will remove all chance for a jam.

East of the main building, opening into it by two gates, will be an auditorium to seat 1,000 to 1,300 people. The band stand will be between this and the rotunda so that the music may be heard by everyone in the Palace, while those who desire can rest and listen to the music undisturbed by tramping feet. A sounding board will be erected above the band stand to throw the sound into the auditorium. This building will be about 40 feet high, and will be built back of the houses now standing on Sixth street. In front of them, covering the whole, will be a wall 40 feet high, giving the whole the appearance of a solid building.

At the north of the main building will be another lower structure running back 100 feet. This building will run around back of the main building to connect with the auditorium, and will be 100 feet deep clear around, roofed and concealed by a battlement the same as on the Sixth street side. All the buildings now on this ground, except the Spaulding house on Pierce street, will be removed and the space used by exhibits of all kinds, and some special features that, as entirely new, will delight and astonish those who have seen all previous corn palaces no less than those who have never seen one. There will be grottoes, beautiful and original ideas worked out in corn and showing the wealth of the great agricultural northwest as well as the ingenuity and artistic taste of her people. One of the wonders in preparation is a miniature Niagara Falls, located so that it will be the first thing to greet the eye of the spectator as he enters the building. Here he will look down to the farthest part of the great structure, 272 feet from the main entrance, with an uninterrupted view 48 feet wide and 44 feet high. The space of one side of the octagon, 48 feet, which is the entrance to the back part of the Palace, will be crossed at the gallery floor by a rustic bridge, from which all parts of the Palace may be seen.

The decorations this year, both interior and exterior, will be projected on a scale grander and more elaborate than ever before. Of course, all these things mean money, and lots of it—more than any previous Palace has cost; but it isn't the Sioux City way to stop to count the cost too carefully when the reputation of the Corn Palace city of the world is to be maintained.

The management has innumerable entertainment features in sight. It will be difficult to crowd them all into the fifteen days.—[Sioux City Journal.]

No Sympathy for Secessionists.

A TALK WITH CONDUCTOR EVERTS ON BROTHERHOOD MATTERS.

Nypano Conductor C. W. Everts returned from Philadelphia yesterday, where he attended a union meeting of the Order of Railway Conductors, and a Tribune reporter improved the first opportunity to interview him concerning the object of the meeting and what was accomplished. His reply, given in full, will be of general interest, especially to railroad men.

He said: "The meeting was called for the members of the Order in the State of Pennsylvania, but there were present members from West Virginia, Maryland, New Jersey and Delaware. It was one of the largest and most important meetings of the Order ever held in the State, and was also the most enthusiastic. The object of the meeting was to give the members of our own State an opportunity to advise together regarding the recent action of the retiring Grand Chief Conductor. Some Eastern papers have given glowing accounts of a 'new organization,' which (it was claimed) was fairly established with the ex-Chief at its head and claiming that they had already a number of working divisions—and that there was 'much dissatisfaction among the old members that would (in time) result in a stampede from the old organization to the new one.' In order to ascertain whether there was any foundation for their claims, and advise upon some other matters, we decided to call this union meeting and get an expression from the members themselves. There were over one hundred members at the meeting, and there was the utmost harmony throughout the whole sessions. The course pursued by the retiring Chief Conductor, since his defeat at Rochester in May, was most severely condemned by all, and when a resolution was offered denouncing the traitorous action of the defeated Chief and his 'chosen few' there was not one dissenting vote; the general expression from all was that the 'ex-Chief and his followers were unworthy of the respect of all true and honorable men.' The whole matter in a nut shell is simply this: The members of the Order of Railway Conductors had become sick and tired of Calvin S. Wheaton for Grand Chief Conductor, and he had held the office so long that he imagined his services were indispensable; the members thought otherwise, and they went to the Grand Division at Rochester in May last and elected Mr. E. E. Clark, of Ogden, Utah, in his place. Since then Mr. Wheaton has been working for the founding of another association, which he styles the 'Independent Order of Railway Conductors.' He has about 150 dissatisfied members who are in sympathy with him, and with their support he expects to accomplish the feat of annihilating the old organization of 16,000 members. His claims for recognition for the new organization are that the Order of Railway Conductors has become a striking organization, because they made a change in the ritual, and that he could not consistently remain a member of the Order, hence his desertion and desire to found a new association upon a strictly non-striking basis. I have this to say for Mr. Wheaton and his followers: If it is true that the change made in the ritual was the cause of his leaving the Order, he ought to have had better sense than to have allowed himself to become a candidate for re-election. The change made in the ritual was made on Wednesday, and the election of officers did not take place until the following Saturday, and three days after the majority of the delegates had decided to change the ritual, we find him posing as a candidate for re-election. We are, therefore, bound to believe that he would have taken the office gladly if he had been elected, notwithstanding his 'conscience' in the matter. During his administration he required always that the members should yield a cheerful compliance to the will of a 'constituted majority.' This same majority elected him to office three different times. It also changed the ritual, and at last it defeated him for its Chief. Now he refuses to abide by their decision and deserts the Order. I have no words to express my personal contempt for his action, which has been wholly without cause from first to last. If the Order did not desire him for Chief they had a right to elect another man in his stead, but he had no right to play the traitor's part he is attempting to do, and I doubt very much if he meets with any success. So far as my personal knowledge of the membership of the Order goes now, I believe things are in a better condition than ever before. We may lose three or four Divisions of the Order, but those who wish to go with C. S. Wheaton and his followers are a good riddance to us and we are better off without them. Our Divisions are open for admission to all good and true men of our profession, who are worthy and qualified—the country has many such men—and the Order of Railway Conductors possesses advantages that good men will not hesitate to avail themselves of. I have no fears of any encroachments of the new movement whatever. Its mushroom growth cannot give it either age or proportions, while its composition and tenor toward other labor organizations are of too doubtful a character to obtain for it many supporters.

"So far as the change in the principles of the Order are concerned, it is a matter that had been long considered, and had been brought up and voted upon at other Grand Divisions. It had many supporters, but they cheerfully abided the will of the majority and waited; they did not secede or quit the Order, or endeavor to hamper it in any way; they acted the manly and brotherly part. But the time came when they had the majority on their side and the change was made. It looks to me as though the defeated side would have been in small business (to say the least) to have deserted the organization on account of its failure to rule; and I firmly believe that it is for this same reason that the seceders left the organization—in other words, it was 'rule or ruin.' The first they could not do, and the future must determine how successful they are in accomplishing the latter. Serious charges have already been made against

Mr. Wheaton in the public press, and thus far no word of defense has come from him. They are of a nature that no man can treat with silence or contempt, and proof of them was offered as a challenge—but no reply. We are perfectly willing that the public shall judge our acts; but they cannot do so with any justice to the organization with their present knowledge of the facts in the case—facts that reveal a condition of affairs which only pave the way for the traitorous move made by the seceders.— [Meadville (Pa.) Wheaton in Rebellion.

Official corruption in labor organizations is too serious a matter to be treated lightly, to be ignored by the members or to be excused on the plea that it should not be mentioned within hearing of the public ear. A living example of this truth may be found in the Order of Railway Conductors. For a number of years some of its grand officers have remained silent under a mistaken policy of "preserving harmony," while they knew that others of the grand officers were corrupt schemers willing to sacrifice every principle of honor for the advancement of personal interests. But at last Grand Secretary and Treasurer Daniels has spoken, and spoken well. In an article occupying several pages of the O. R. C. official organ for July 1, Mr. Daniels makes charges against Grand Chief Wheaton so sweeping, so explicit and so damaging, that no sane man would publish them without knowing that he held the proof. Wheaton is referred to as a "leader of secessionists," as having made statements "absolutely false," and the assertion is made that "the indisputable evidence of his rascality" is a matter of record. Reference is made to the "Q" strike, and Wheaton's work in throwing the influence of the Order to help the company while the other grand officers insisted on remaining neutral, is shown up together with Wheaton's effort to shift the responsibility to innocent parties. One of the things charged against Wheaton is that of offering the services of the members in case of a strike. "Who has not heard him indignantly deny it?" asks Mr. Daniels, and then adds, "but proof that he has done so is on file here in his own writing." Numerous instances of treachery and perfidy are cited and dwelt upon in detail.

One very noticeable feature of the article is Mr. Daniels' regret that he did not speak out earlier. No less than half a dozen times does he refer to this mistake. He thought it to be the "best for the Order" and adds, "That I was then mistaken, I am free to admit." He speaks again of having "blindly and mistakenly" remained silent, and referring to the position of the executive committee says: "They, like myself, were wrong in the idea of condoning crime with the hope of preventing injury by its exposure." Mr. Daniels concludes by declaring that the only thing he is "heartily ashamed of" is ever having befriended the man and not having "promptly made public his treachery and dishonesty" at the proper time.

There is excellent reason for Mr. Daniels' regret. He did not warn the members until it was too late. Mr. Wheaton is now organizing the sorehead element and has actually succeeded in dividing the Order into two separate organizations. Had the truth been told in time Wheaton's influence would have dwindled to so small a force that his efforts at secession would have amounted to nothing. It is to be sincerely regretted that his disreputable efforts are now successful—regretted because the Order has at last passed into the control of representative men of the organization, whose administration will allow it to stand no longer in a false position, misdirected and misunderstood because its chief executive was a bigoted ignoramus and a conscienceless schemer. There can be no doubt that the reputation of the Order has suffered grievously through Wheaton's leadership. So grossly was it misrepresented by its executive that it is a common error to look upon the O. R. C. as the foe of organized railroad labor and to think of its members as standing ready to fill the places of strikers upon any and all occasions. Such an idea is, of course, a delusion, for the organization contains thousands of as true and loyal men as the country can boast; men who were never in sympathy with such contemptible work, and who, upon many occasions, have practically demonstrated their loyalty to labor.

For these reasons it is a real misfortune that Wheaton should be in any degree successful in disrupting an organization that seems to be just now entering upon its new era—its career of true usefulness; for with its new administration and its altered constitution, there seems to be no possible reason for feeling opposed to it.

The O. R. C. has learned a lesson, bitter and costly. Its officers, who remained silent when they should have spoken because they believed it best to preserve harmony, have lived to see the man they tolerated raise the standard of rebellion against the constitution he has sworn to support, and have learned when too late that any man who is treacherous at heart is liable to develop into a traitor at the first favorable opportunity. They see now, as they did not then, that peace may be purchased at too dear a price; that the idea that such matters must not be discussed publicly is a false one, used as a subterfuge by those who fear the light of day, and that official corruption which is not exposed will gather strength and flourish in the silence. In short, they understand now as they did not then that the matter of speaking out was not one of choice but of duty; that it was simply a question of choosing the lesser of two evils, a question of present exposure or future rupture, and that they should have courageously met the issue, patiently borne the criticism it caused, and relied upon the good sense of the rank and file to finally see the wisdom of such a course.—Railroad Trainmen's Journal.

Protection for Unorganized Labor.

Hon. Lee Merriwether, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the State of Missouri has issued the following circular:

STATE OF MISSOURI, BUREAU
OF LABOR STATISTICS, 108 N. 4th st.,
St. Louis, Mo., May 5, 1890. }

To Officers of Labor Organizations:

Since beginning the work of factory inspection in St. Louis, scarcely a day has passed without my receiving from workingmen, complaints of imposition on the part of employers, tradesmen and others. One case was that of a sewing woman who had bought a machine on time payments. She had paid $40 on a $50 machine, but being unable to make the last payment the machine was taken away from her, and the $40 which she had paid, was retained by the sewing machine company—this in spite of the fact, that under the law she was entitled to reclaim 75 per cent. of the amount she had paid on the machine. Another case was that of a man whose wages had been reduced, not only without giving thirty days notice in advance, as required by law, but were reduced dating back thirty days previous to the date on which he was informed of the reduction. These, mere instances of hundreds of similar complaints, lead me to believe that a large number of employers do not hesitate to unjustly swindle and withhold from their workingmen small amounts due for wages, trusting to the very smallness of the amount for safety. A merchant who has sold furniture on time payments, when the purchaser is unable to make the last payment, takes possession of the furniture, but seldom or never returns 75 per cent. of the amount received from the purchaser, as under the law he is required to do. He fails to do this because he knows the purchaser is unable to fight the matter in the courts. In the same way the employer who defrauds his employes of $4 or $5 does so because he thinks the employe will not be able or willing to go to law for so small an amount. Could a workingman say to his employes, "Although the amount you unjustly withhold is but a few dollars my Protective Union will fight it as a matter of principle no matter what the cost in time and money," the majority of employers and tradesmen would doubtless deter any attempt at imposition.

In several of the more oppressive cases of injustice reported to me during the past few weeks my brother, Mr. R. B. Merriwether, an attorney has at my request undertaken to bring suit for the injured parties without cost. No lawyer, however, can take all the cases that are reported to this bureau without charge, and unless some sort of protective organization is formed, I shall be obliged in the future to tell the workingmen who report cases of injustice and oppression that there is no means of helping them. I suggest the following plan for establishing a workingmen's Protective Union:

Let each labor organization elect a delegate to what may be called a Legal Committee. Workingmen having any grievance will give the facts to the delegate from their Union. This delegate will lay said facts before the Legal Committee, and should a majority of that committee decide that the injustice is one capable of remedy in the courts, they would vote to submit it to the Union's lawyer. In this way a lithographer, for instance, would report his grievance to the delegate elected by the lithographers, that delegate would submit the facts to the committee, who would turn it over to the lawyer. An injustice practiced upon a carepnter would be reported to the carpenter's delegate, who would lay the facts before the Legal Committee, and so on.

At a low estimate there are 8,000 organized workmen in St. Louis. A per capita assessment of 5 cents a month would bring $400, which would doubtless be ample to defray the cost of all legal proceedings that might be necessary, but in addition to the 8,000 members of labor Unions, a Protective Union on the plan suggested above could count upon a great many members, who do not belong to any regular labor organization; it would be advisable to permit any workmen, whether belonging to organized labor or not, to receive the benefits of the Protective Union's lawyer, upon the payment of the same monthly assessment as paid by other members of the Protective Union. The only restriction necessary in the case of the members not belonging to regular organized labor would be a provision that he should not be permitted to receive the services of the Protective Union's lawyer within, say, six months after he joined the Union, this to prevent his coming in with the specific purpose of availing himself of the Union's lawyer. It is not probable that any working man could foresee that an imposition would be attempted upon him six months in the future, and therefore if they were prohibited from receiving the services of the Union's lawyer for six months after joining the Union, there would be no danger of persons not belonging to regular organized labor Unions joining the Protective Union for the specific purpose of obtaining the services of the Union's lawyer.

There are thousands of miners throughout the state whose wages are withheld from 20 to 30 days, in violation of law, and who doubtless have other reasons for desiring a lawyer. These miners would undoubtedly join a Protective Union if established upon some plan as above suggested. The law committee composed of one delegate from each body of organized labor could elect a delegate at large to represent all the unorganized workmen who might join the Protective Union.

Should this suggestion meet with your favorable consideration a good plan to set the ball rolling would be to call a conference committee of the leaders of the different organizations in St. Louis. Let this conference committee draw up the details of the Protective Union and let each member of the committee refer this detailed plan to his organization for a vote of approval or disapproval, such organizations as by their vote approves the scheme will then elect a delegate to the law committee, and the Union will be in operation as soon as the committee makes its first assessment and appoints its attorney.

Please inform me what action, if any, you take in regard to this suggestion:

Very truly yours,

LEE MERIWETHER,
Commissioner.

A Great Order's Founder.

Among the men prominent in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, who will take part in the reunion which begins at Phoenix Hill Park this afternoon, is Mr. W. D. Robinson, of Washington, Ind., Past Grand Chief and founder of the order. Mr. Robinson is now sixty-four years old, but does not look so by twenty years. He is a rather spare built man, about five feet seven inches in height, has a long gray beard on his chin, and is a pleasing conversationalist. His hair is black, slightly silvered, and he is slightly bald in front. He began service as fireman in 1846, and he became an engineer in 1848. He quit railroading in 1883, because of physical inability to continue, but has retained his connection with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, being a member of Division No. 39, Seymour, Ind.

Mr. Robinson arrived here yesterday, and is a guest at the Fifth-avenue Hotel. He came as an honored guest, on the official invitation of the six organizations concerned in the reunion—the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen and the Switchman's Mutual Aid Association. He will deliver an address to-day.

Learning of Mr. Robinson's arrival, and of his distinguished position and services in the order to which he belongs, a reporter from the Courier-Journal last evening called on him for something concerning the foundation and progress of the Order. Mr. Robinson was rather disinclined to talk, but finally responded briefly as follows:

"In 1861 I went to run a locomotive on the Middle Division of the Michigan Central, between Marshall and Michigan City. From the time I entered the service of that road, until 1863, I continued to agitate the subject of organized action on the part of the engineers for purposes of protection and mutual benefit. I found many willing listeners among the engineers on that road. Correspondence ensued with men running engines on the Michigan Southern and Northern Indiana; also with men on the Detroit and Milwaukee. The final outcome was an agreement to meet in Detroit on May 5, 1863. I was a delegate from the Middle Division of the M. C. road to that little meeting, and when I went to Detroit, I took a draft of a constitution and by-laws, which I had prepared, and which was adopted with but little change. It was then proposed that we should have an obligation, which, after some discussion, I was chosen to formulate. I wrote the obligation and proceeded to administer it to a circle of ten to thirteen. This was accomplished on the evening of the 8th of May.

"The title of the organization was the Brotherhood of the Footboard, from the fact that firemen who were known to be capable of running a locomotive attached to a train were admitted to membership. It was agreed, that when five divisions were organized, a delegate should be sent from each division for the purpose of organizing a Grand Division. As soon as August of that year ten divisions were organized, and a call made for each division to send a delegate for the purpose named. The delegates met in Detroit, and on August 17 a constitution and by-laws for a Grand Division were adopted. I was chosen Grand Chief for one year. At the close of my term fifty-four divisions had been organized."

"These divisions were organized by you, were they not?"

"Yes. I was discharged from the Michigan Central as an agitator, and traveled, in my capacity as Grand Chief, and between October, 1863, and August, 1864, had instituted these fifty-four divisions. Yes, my actions in the premises was considered by the railroad companies as hostile to their best interests, and, as a consequence, I was proscribed by many of the roads throughout the northwest, and found it difficult to pursue my purpose, as the Brotherhood was without funds, and I found myself laboring under great disadvantages in consequence.

"The Grand Division met in Indianapolis, in August, 1864, at the close of my term, and Charles Wilson, of Rochester, N. Y., succeeded me as Grand Chief. Since that time I have occupied no official position in the Brotherhood."—Louisville Courier Journal.

The Bearing of Railway Officers Toward Their Subordinates.

We cannot too often and too earnestly impress upon railway companies the importance of employing in those positions embracing the government of employes, officers of intelligence, experience and ability, who are not only gentlemen at heart, but who also possess that other God-given attribute which can never be acquired, but may be improved with experience—the power to govern their fellow men, the brain to command their respect, the heart to win their esteem and the force of character to direct their wills.

It is not always an easy matter for the manager to learn who are his able and just subordinates, and who are not, but greater care, we believe, might be taken in this matter, than is exercised on many roads. There will, of course, be complaints of the very best superintendent or trainmaster, but there are acts every day in the life of the vain, bigoted and small souled tyrant each of which, when clearly shown, should mark him for the official axe. To leave him in his place may any day cost the company vast sums of money. A stinging and unjust reprimand to a train dispatcher who is an abler and better man, a burning curse upon the head of an old and faithful engineer or conductor, a punishment administered or threatened when no punishment is deserved; opinions that subordinates know are false, aired with an assumption of arrogance and superiority, or indeed any one of the hundreds of the exasperating acts common to the small souled, tyrannical official when placed in authority over abler and better men may cause the fire that has been slumbering so long to burst forth.

Chief Wheaton Not Alarmed.

Chief Cal. Wheaton, of the new order of railway conductors, stated last evening that he declined positively to enter into any newspaper controversy over the conduct of the old order during his regime. He said the executive committee were elected, not appointed by him, and there was no chance for collusion. He thinks Daniels is mildly insane. Mr. Wheaton says he paid his own expenses for the past three years, and if anything was wrong before that it would have been shown on the finance report of the order.—Elmira Star.

The writer adds that Mr. Wheaton is president, treasurer and secretary of the new Order, and the members are all employed on one or two roads and confined to two of the New England States. One of these roads, the Reading, refuses to employ organized labor of any kind, and the secessionist order has bound itself to hold no sympathy with the other railroad employes, no matter under what conditions it might be sought. The delegate sending the communication says the old Order is now stronger than ever.

The San Francisco Chronicle in its railroad column says:

The Chronicle recently published a paragraph stating that a secession of the conductors of certain roads had occurred from the ranks of the Order of Railway Conductors. A conductor who represented San Francisco and Oakland has written an intelligent letter to this paper giving the causes for the secession and pointing out the fact that the retiring members are few in number. He says the Order has been in existence for twenty years with a positive non-strike platform, and now has a membership of nearly 15,000. At the recent Rochester convention this law was modified to the extent that while the Order, as such, is still a non-striking one, the individual divisions are left free to follow locally any course that circumstances may render necessary. So far as the Southern Pacific is concerned there has never been need for any such change, but in other parts of the country the non-strike clause has been used by some roads to the injury of the members. This change and the fact that the former president, Calvin S. Wheaton, was believed to have used the old law to the injury of other organizations and to his personal aggrandizement, notably in the big "Q" strike, was the cause of discontent. Wheaton, after holding the presidency for nine years, was snowed under at the convention, E. E. Clark, of Ogden, U. T., was elected president, and the ex-chief gathering the malcontents to the number of 300 around him seceded.

Not long ago there were forty-three Philadelphia and Reading railroad conductors in Reading who belonged to the Order of Railway Conductors. With the exception of three all have relinquished their membership. One of these has been discharged and the other two have resigned rather than sacrifice their rights in the Order. In giving up the membership in the Order they have been obliged to relinquish insurance amounting to $2500 each, which they had provided for their families, together with sick benefits amounting to $5 a week, funeral benefits of $100, and other benefits. Every one of forty families, who had expected that in case the breadwinner would die or be killed in the discharge of his duty, they would get $2500 have now had the expectation cut off by reason of this order. The insurance which the conductors in Reading have given up amounts in round numbers to $100,000.

The conductors claim that this is very unjust and arbitrary, as their organization was purely beneficial, has no rules for strikes, never took part in a strike, but on the contrary gave the company valuable assistance when there were strikes. Their organization, they claim was one of the best of its kind, and its insurance was especially liberal. It only gave the full amount of the risk of death. They say that other railroad companies not only tolerate beneficial organizations, but also strike organizations, and that the plan of compelling employes to give up thousands of dollars of insurance, which they have been keeping up for years is unheard-of tyranny.—Easton, Pa., Daily Argus.

The Perils and Romance of Whaling.

From a beautifully illustrated article in The Century for August, on "The Perils and Romance of Whaling," we quote as follows:

"The whalemén especially have been the sinews of the American navy. Inured to danger by a calling in which the chances were as desperate as those of battle, they stepped from the whale-boat to the man-of-war simply to face a foe of a different kind. They needed no baptism under fire before they could meet an enemy without flinching, and when they responded to their country's call they grimly applied to each hostile ship the old whaling motto, 'Dead whale or stove boat.' Such was the spirit of the American whalemén, and it still survives not only among the veterans of the craft but also among their descendants, though the whaling industry itself has dwindled to insignificance.

'The Nantucket boy who ties a fork to his mother's darning cotton and then tries to harpoon the cat, yelling, as the latter makes its escape, 'Pay out, mother. Pay out! There she sounds through the window!' is certainly worthy of the 'boat-steerer,' who was his sire. Then, too, we find in the vernacular of the old whaling ports, even among the younger generations, delightful relics of the whalers' idioms. The railroad train 'ties up': a wagon is a 'side-wheel craft,' and you are requested to 'shift to windward' or 'leeward,' according as the sides need trimming; 'Where are you heading for?' is the question invariably asked of you if you are met out walking; you learn that your veteran whalemén neighbor of last summer died in the winter 'in a flurry'; the farmer 'lands' his produce at your 'quarter galleries' (meaning in this instance, the rear kitchen, but also applied to that modern accessory of feminine attire, the bustle); you are instructed to 'douse the glim' on retiring for the night; directed, if you cannot open the post-office door, to try turning the knob to the 'westward,' and if the door still refuses to yield are informed that probably the postmistress 'has battened down the hatches' and gone 'gamming.' To 'gam' means to gossip. The word occurs again and again in the log-books of the old whalers. The uninitiated might suppose it signified merely spinning yarns on the fo'castle. But to the old whalemén it has a far deeper meaning. When the whalemén met on the high seas thousands of miles from home they would lay to, sometimes for hours, captains and crew would exchange visits, letters from and for home be delivered, and the story of the voyages told. That was a 'gam.' One vessel often brought to another the first news from home in two years. Meanwhile, however, a year had elapsed since the vessel last from port left her moorings, and at least another year would pass before the homeward bound crew would sight their native shore. No wonder the young captain, as his home harbor hove in sight, eagerly scanned the crowd upon the wharf through his marine glass until it rested perhaps upon a fair young face full of anxious expectation. Gamming is indeed a relic of one of the most romantic, and perhaps pathetic, phases of the whaler's life. Every vessel that sailed carried messages to relatives and friends thousands of miles away, and every vessel that came to her moorings brought tidings of cheer or sorrow from the distant seas. A wife might have the letter which she had written to her husband two years before returned to her, because his vessel had not been spoken,—and alas! she had not been spoken by any of the vessels that had returned during the year. Time would only deepen the mystery of her husband's fate, and perhaps the wife would never know whether the ship was cast upon one of the islands of the Pacific and the crew massacred by the savage inhabitants, or split upon a sunken reef and engulfed with all hands; and so she would sit weeping in her lonely chamber while her neighbors made merry over the return of a son, father, lover, or husband, and the streets rang with the songs of happy Jack. Whalemén returning home were liable to find that many changes had taken place during their long voyages. An old whalemén told me that he was obliged to sail on one of his voyages just after his mother's burial, leaving his father bowed down with grief. His vessel was hardly at her moorings three years later before said father slapped him on the back and said, 'Alfred, come up to the house and I'll introduce you to your mother.'

A better illustration of their (the whalemén's) proud spirit cannot be given than the encounter in Halifax between Green, the mate of a Nantucket vessel, and the Duke of Clarence, admiral of the British fleet, and afterwards William IV. The dispute arose over the Duke's attention to a girl, and reached its climax in the Nantucket mate's seizing the future king of England and hurling him down stairs. An eye-witness of the affair was wont in after years to add as a decorative detail that the click of the duke's sword-hilt was heard on every stair. Greene at once went aboard his ship and refused to obey a summons from the admiral, who, it afterward transpired, had intended to make the plucky Nantucket man an officer in the English navy.

All the strategic resources of a quick, ready mind were often called into play during a whalemén's career, not only in weathering storms and in avoiding destruction of boats and loss of time when attacking whales, but also in escaping massacre from savage islanders and in outwitting pirates. In 1819 the whaleship Syren, while on a voyage to the eastward of Cape Horn, met with an adventure which would have proved fatal to all hands but for a quick stratagem of the mate. One fine day, off one of the Pelew islands, all the boats being after whales, and but a few men left aboard the vessel, a large band of armed natives suddenly swarmed over the bulwarks. The crew fled to the rigging, leaving the naked howling savages in full command of the ship. The mate, on coming alongside, took in the situation at a glance, and quickly ordered the men to open the arm-chests and scatter on deck all the tacks they could find. In a moment it fairly rained tacks upon the naked savages. The deck was soon covered with these little nails. They pierced the feet of the islanders, who danced about with pain which increased with every step they took, until, with yells of rage and agony, they tumbled headlong into the sea and swam ashore. Unfortunately in the struggle the mate received an arrow-wound just over one of his eyes, and was obliged to retire from the sea.

RAILROADERS FRATERNIZE.

FIVE GREAT ORDERS OF EMPLOYES OF THE RAIL ASSEMBLE TOGETHER.

The celebration and picnic of the Brotherhoods of Railroad Fraternities was commenced yesterday afternoon under the most promising circumstances for a successful meeting and for the future benefit of the railroad employes.

All during the morning and the night before delegates had been arriving, and at 2 o'clock in the afternoon there were fully 200 delegates in the park waiting for the inauguration of the celebration.

When it was proposed to confederate all the unions of railroad workers into one grand brotherhood the idea instantly took root. It was argued that what concerned one man should concern all, and what concerned one union should concern all, and the proposition was received most favorably except by those few demagogues who are continually trying to stir up differences and strife between employed and employers. The more the matter was discussed the more it grew into favor, and for the purpose of exchanging opinions and ideas upon this subject the meeting which will last through to-day, was commenced yesterday. Not only employers and employed, but the public generally is interested in the outcome of the present discussion; and, as was expected, the first public meeting of the discussion was a large one.

It had been announced that the entertainment would not begin until 2:30 o'clock in the afternoon, but at noon the people began arriving, and when Eichhorn's full orchestra played the opening musical the large dancing hall was comfortably filled. In that audience were the old and grizzled knights of the throttle, veteran conductors, hardy brakemen and sturdy firemen. What interested them, of course, interested their families, and wives, sisters, mothers and all were there. The weather was warm and sultry, but on the highest point of the highest eminence around Louisville, shaded by trees and grape vines and cooled by damp tan bark the gentle breezes blew.

The windows and large folding doors of the large dancing hall were thrown open, and consequently the afternoon was not ruined by the heat, which caused so much dissatisfaction and discomfort down town. The interior of the hall presented a bright and attractive scene. The stage was set with flags and bunting, and there were flags in every portion of the room. Across the center of the hall was stretched the handsome banner of the Lodge of the Switchmen's Mutual Aid Society.

Shortly before 3 o'clock the carriages containing the guests of the fraternities drove up to the Hill, and Eichhorn's orchestra played the first number on the card. Headed by Mr. E. L. Cronk, the guests walked upon the stage, where seats were provided. Among the prominent railroad men upon the stage were Hon. L. S. Coffin, of Fort Dodge; Mr. E. E. Clark, Grand Chief of the Order of Railway Conductors; W. P. Daniels, of the same fraternity; George W. Howard, Chief of the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, and Mr. W. D. Robinson, the veteran founder of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Among the other gentlemen upon the stage were Mr. Henry Watterson, Hon. Albert A. Stoll, Mr. Henry S. Tyler, representing the Mayor, Hon. James W. Bryan, Lieutenant Governor of the State; Chief Hughes, of the Louisville Fire Department, Col. Will S. Hays, and Col. Bennett H. Young.

In announcing the opening of the celebration, Mr. Cronk, paid a high tribute to the railroad organizations, and introduced Mr. Henry S. Tyler as the representative of the Mayor, who found it impossible to be in attendance. Mr. Tyler got a warm welcome from the audience. Mr. Tyler said:

"Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: On account of the absence of the Mayor the pleasure has devolved upon me to extend on behalf of the city of Louisville, a hearty welcome to each and all of you. We are proud that you have chosen this city as your place of meeting, and we wish from your meeting you will have successful results. A great deal depends upon you and much is expected of you. When such bodies of men as you all are meet together for such purposes the eyes of the railroad operators and railroad fraternities of the world are upon you. Be conservative and look to your higher acts in your plans and discussions that good results may not be looked for in vain. To my townspeople I say guard well the interests of your city, and in dealing with your brethren of the rail do not forget our reputation for hospitality."

Mr. Tyler received hearty rounds of applause, and when he had concluded Mr. Cronk introduced Lieutenant-Governor James W. Bryan of Covington. Gov. Bryan is a graceful off-hand speaker and his words were listened to with interest. He said:

"On behalf of the State of Kentucky it is unnecessary for me to state to the strangers here that they are welcome. It is known, or should be known, far and wide, that Kentucky's latch-string hangs outside the door, and is always out. You are welcome, not only because you are involved in a cause which can not but commend itself to all just minded and right thinking people, but because you are the representatives of a vast army of people beside which the armies of the olden time seem small and insignificant. Such an army as yours, when, day after day and night after night, the property and the lives of countless thousands are intrusted to its care, deserves not only the respect but the admiration of all right-thinking people. Higher courage is never seen on the tented field, and the fidelity and courage of the Knight of Arms does not exceed that at all times displayed by the Knights of the Rail. The safe transportation and the keeping of the lives of the people are in your hands. I assume that your meeting is for the purpose of devising plans for the better protection of your personal and official interests. Every one of you is a sovereign citizen knowing his equality as he discharges the duties intrusted to him, and when you band together and federate for the purpose of promoting your welfare you promote the welfare of the whole people.

"I am sure that those who send you here never had better champions. I trust that your proceedings will be harmonious and will result in good feeling and the creation of confidence in all the orders and unions of your fraternity. Employers and employed have common interests, and when the claims of either are asked by justice, right and equity, the right-thinking people should be found on the side of justice."

Lieut.-Gov. Bryan was often interrupted by applause. Master of Ceremonies Cronk next introduced Mr. Henry Watterson, whose words to the railroad men, he said, should receive consideration from railroad men all over the country, because of his almost world-wide influence. Mr. Watterson's few remarks elicited frequent and hearty applause. He said in substance:

"Didn't it ever occur to you as strange that this world existed some 6,000 years before the discovery was made that the laying of two bars of iron parallel constituted a railroad, and that it was left to one of the poorest of men, a poor miner in a colliery, to discover that principle and to apply the locomotive to it, which was the completion of the idea of speedy transportation?"

"Strangely enough all of this happened less than seventy-five years ago, and now the railroad service, although probably not the most numerous, is the richest and most powerful, not even excepting the great armies of the monarchies of Europe. As representatives of that great system every one of you, its members, should feel proud. To be a good railroader a man above all other things must be a man. (Applause.) In putting his manly qualities above all others, I have reference to the courage, the fortitude and the fidelity they show every minute during the twenty-four hours they have charge of the property of the people and custody and the safety of the lives of ourselves, our wives and our children.

"I never sit in the luxurious seats of a warmly heated and brightly lighted and comfortable sleeper, and look out of the window at the rain, the hail the snow skurrying by that my heart doesn't warm to the brave fellow in the cab who is watching through the night and the tempest while I rest and sleep. (Applause.)

"There is no man belonging to, or connected with your service, who has not my warmest sympathies. It was less than twenty-five years ago that the idea of trade unions was first brought before the people in England, and it was not over fifteen years ago that they were first organized in this country. I believe in these organizations. It is just as right for you poor men and all working men to organize in defense of your rights and of their rights as it is for the rich men and the rich corporations to organize together for their protection.

There is no moral principle or question of public economy that can show us that it is not right for trade unions to band together so long as they are just and in reason, for they, as well as the capitalists, must submit to the decrees of that God over both, for His decrees are always just.

"We should encourage trade organization by passing laws for their benefit, for the stronger and more responsible they are, the better they become able to settle conflicting interests. (Applause.) During these twenty-five years you have not had produced for you any greater men than Powderly and Arthur. To lead an army of workingmen requires just as high an order of ability as is necessary to lead an army of armed soldiers or to lead the deliberations of the Senates of nations. (Great applause.)

"When your committee waited upon me and asked me to come here to-day and meet you, I accepted, because I hailed with delight the opportunity to meet and shake by the hands those brave railroaders that heretofore I had only known in their official positions. I will attempt to make a speech nor address, but simply join with the Lieutenant Governor and the representatives of the Mayor in giving all strangers a welcome and in saying to them and my neighbors: 'God bless you.'"

Mr. Will S. Hays recited his poem, "The Faithful Engineer." He added two verses to the poem which is an old favorite. The new verses are as follows:

Here's to engineers and firemen,
Who daily risk their lives,
To their families—fathers, mothers,
To their sweethearts and their wives:
Here's to heroes of the throttle,
Who have gone to join the host,
Who in time of death and danger
Loved to do their duty most.
May you, one and all, be faithful,
That when earthly trips are done,
You'll be willing, brave and ready
For the final, farewell "run."
That will take you home to heaven,
In that bright and happy clime,
Where you're sure to meet with angels
If you make the "run" "on time."

Here let the gay conductor
And brakeman meet to-day—
The ever faithful switchman—
And let your hearts be gay.
For men who own the railroads
Depend on you for brains,
Requiring pluck, experience,
And work to run their trains.
So let this glad reunion
Result now as it should,
In meeting here together,
And in one common good.
So board the train of Pleasure,
In Phoenix Hill depot;
You've got two days to make the trip—
"All ready! Let 'er go!"

Col. Hays declined an encore, because he was on the same train himself, and, after some music, Mr. W. D. Robinson, the veteran founder of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, was introduced. Mr. Robinson is old and feeble and was compelled to read his speech from the manuscript. It was full of sound advice and encouragement. After calling attention to the revolution of public opinion, he said:

"Organized action on the part of labor twenty-five years ago was practically but an experiment looked upon with distrust by those not interested, and regarded with bitter hostility by the official agents of capital, accustomed as they were to dictate the terms and conditions of service to all classes of laborers, skilled or otherwise. Already, for many years, unconscious of impending peril, our people had encouraged and legalized aggregations of wealth, which had at last assumed proportions more colossal than the world before had ever known. At first the glitter, the parade and the grandeur of those vast combinations, tickled the fancy, allured the imagination and excited the applause of all beholders. The people, however, soon realized the fact, that centralized wealth meant centralized power, and that the power thus obtained was being employed to inflict upon the industrial interests overbearing domination and grievous wrong. Labor slow to arouse, awakened at last and stood appalled at the gigantic force of the off-spring of its own hand—for labor is the creator of all wealth—now arrayed with a pitiless purpose for its subjection. Confronted thus, labor appealed but in vain, even to be heard for the right. Centralized wealth and power had possession of all the avenues to the public ear and controlled the agencies which create and maintain public opinion and judgment—the pulpit, the rostrum, the press, and the courts.

"The wage-worker, dazed, bewildered and nearly overwhelmed by the magnitude of the forces which threatened the prosperity and happiness of himself and the loved ones at home, his cry for relief unanswered except with scorn, his faith and hope in truth and justice ebbing low, turned at last almost in despair and gazed with pallid cheek and eager inquiry into the face of his fellow workmen. The mute question conveyed in that wishful glance was this: 'Can you and I depend upon and trust each other?' And in the outstretched arm and open palm came the mute reply: 'We must and will now and forevermore.' Brothers and friends, I pray you believe this no sketch of the imagination, and well do we who have survived these things, call to mind the secret gathering, the strong, quick clasp of the friendly hand, the eager but suppressed whispers of faith and loyalty in the shadows of the night.

"All of the revolutions in public sentiment which have proven of value to humanity, and all of the measures which have ever been adopted having for their purpose the amelioration of the conditions of human life, have had their origin in the ideas embodied in the word, Excelsior, and in this one word is contained the essence of all the mottoes and teachings of our brotherhoods. Although the B. of L. E. came into existence past the high noon of the Nineteenth century in the midst of an intense and vivid civilization, yet it was assailed with calumny and misrepresentation, falsehood and sophistry. But these things when subjected to the white heat of the crucible of philosophic and truthful inquiry have perished, or failed of their purpose, while logic and truth, as they ever must have survived. A higher intelligence and knowledge, gained from observation and experience, and gleaned from study, have exerted their benign and elevating power over the thoughts and methods of men, increased their value as employees, and in the social scale have added to their importance and consideration. I can only ask you to remember that it has been your special privilege to have lived in an age and country, where the accumulated knowledge of centuries, stored in books, is thrown as it were broadcast at your feet, and presses close along on your every side; and so sure as you reach forth your hand and gather these fruits, and treasure them, and keep them alive so far as you are able, so sure will they elevate and ennoble your life.

"In whatever condition of life we may be found let it be known and said of us each and all that we are striving with patient and determined endeavor toward a higher knowledge, a higher and nobler life.

"The beneficial results of organized and disciplined action on the part of labor for the purpose of protection have long since passed into history as demonstrated proofs, and no longer occupy the field of speculative inquiry or debate. As this survey, of necessity, must be brief, to enter into an enumeration of these benefits and attempt to portray their various forms and magnitude at this time would, I believe, only appear as a work of supererogation, inasmuch as they are facts so plain that he who runs may read. I believe it safe to assume that 95 per cent. of all the goodly number present have their names already inscribed on the roll of the grand army of organized labor, and here I must state the fact that these organized efforts have not been entered upon by the children of toil for the purpose of amusement for them selves or the infliction of malignant mischief upon society. On the contrary, they are now and have been the legitimate outcome of haggard necessity, born of the cold-blooded, remorseless avarice of centralized wealth.

"With the history of the fierce struggles of the right against the wrong, the defeat here, the triumph there, it is not the purpose now to deal; our business is now with the present and the future. If we are only true to ourselves we must not close our eyes to the inexorable truth that we are in the midst of constantly increasing peril that we are confronted day by day with new conditions which threaten our prosperity and menace our overthrow. Let us strive manfully with such sagacity as we may possess to circumvent these agencies and solve the problem of our deliverance.

"I find one of the favorite arguments of anti-federation to be, that such a league must embody elements which would embroil a conservative majority in endless trouble for the defense of a restless and turbulent minority. If such an argument be worthy of serious consideration, I reply that a careful review of the constitution and by-laws of each and all these brotherhoods must establish as much confidence in the conservatism, prudence, sagacity and fairmindedness of any one of the organizations as of another. Further, I would also remind our opponents, that unworthy distrust is an end to logical argument, inasmuch as their premises are only conjecture or assumption. And yet another one formulates his objection in the plea of unequal representation. In the name of reason and common sense let us inquire if we are to pause at this juncture to calculate the number a man may represent, when it is evident to the most obtuse that his presence fills the last vacant space, closes the circle and completes the defense. I observe that the arguments of the opponents of federation are merely predicated upon the assumption that it must result in a condition of perpetual trouble between the employe and the employed. In the very nature of things, I believe it must result in exactly the reverse. When the railway magnate finds himself confronted by a power equal to any which he can command, will he not be ready in case of disagreement or controversy to call a parley and say, 'Come let us reason together?' Mutual agreement and arbitration must follow, and strikes be known only in the unpleasant recollection of past history.

"Let us consider for a moment one other objection which has been offered against federation to-wit: 'That a locomotive engineer should consent, even in his own interest, to ally himself with those so far beneath him in importance. When any man, no matter what his calling, comes to believe that he alone is indispensable to the consummation of any human purpose requiring the exercise of thought and skill, we can only commiserate him as being afflicted with an alarming case of big-head. The vocation of a locomotive engineer or fireman, the brakeman, switchman or conductor, calls into action the busy brain, the throbbing heart, the strong arm and steady hand, the quick perception, the mentality of human existence, and no one of the individuals engaged in the transportation, the carrying trade of the world, is more indispensable to the completion of the one grand purpose in view than another.

"Many years ago some politician announced that cotton is king, and all the world paid homage accordingly. Soon some statistician proved that hay was king; later we hear that corn is king, also of railway kings, and king of kings. Has it ever occurred to these gentlemen, with their pretty poll prattle, that there is a figure, as yet somewhat in the background, over whose bronzed and active form they have ever striven to cast the mantle of ridicule or contempt, that this figure is now breaking to the front and emerging, slowly, perhaps, but surely, from the smoke, and dust, and scorn of all the years; that he shall yet appear in the glorious sunlight of true freedom, with his honest brow encircled with a halo of justice and truth, and proclaim to all mankind that cotton, and corn, and all values gathered from the earth or wrest from the sea are his own legitimate offsprings and subjects, and thus compel the world to acknowledge at last, grudgingly though it be, that the only rightful sovereign of all this fair earth is labor?

"Brothers and friends, I truly thank you for your very considerate attention, and I will now close with a short quotation from a poem written by myself and published in the Engineers' Journal for June, 1888:

"By labor the granaries of the world are filled.
And the marts of commerce and trade.
Of what use were designs without labor to build?
The loftiest spire which the sunset doth gild.
Or this lowliest cot in the shade,
Where the artisans dwell in their poor, squalid homes.
Without whose strong arms earth's magnificent domes
In their grandeur could never be made.

"But centralized wealth has a fiendish delight
To see labor its fellow betray;
Yet let them remember we've passed through the night,
And found that disunion is mildew and blight,
Through long, weary years we've been learning the right,
And darkness is turning to day.
The light has revealed to the workingman's mind
His anchor of hope and safety combined

Lies in federate numbers, leaving discord behind;
This brings arbitration, and then we shall find
That daylight is coming to stay."

When Mr. Robinson concluded, Hon. L. S. Coffin, of Iowa, was introduced. He wants to see the accident rate among railroad men cut down by the adoption of safety platforms and new devices for railroad trains. He promised the boys that a good time was coming, and that that good time was nearly here. He made an argument for the safety and the lives of the railroad employes, and quoted some appalling figures to show that about 10,000 men are killed or crippled in this country every year. He spoke at some length, and while his views were rather those of a pessimist, his remarks were intently listened to. He took a stand for six days' work in the week, and his hearers were with him on that proposition.

Col. Bennett H. Young was down for the last formal speech on the afternoon's programme and everybody waited for him, sure that there was a treat in store for them with the announcement. Before his turn arrived, Prof. Knoll and Miss McNeil, assisted by Eichorn's orchestra, played several difficult solos. Col. Young was freely applauded during his remarks. He said:

"I have been profoundly impressed by some of the statements made by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, who has preceded me. That ten thousand men annually lose their lives by reason of defective railway coupling appliances is a thrilling announcement, and one which, when properly presented to the people, must create a public sentiment that there is a great and irresistible force in this republican land of ours, which corrects all wrongs, and will, in the end, redress all grievances.

"The time has come when in railway matters figures are so astounding that they lose their effect upon the human mind. That the railways of the world should have cost more than thirty billion dollars, one-half of which mileage is contained in the United States, gives one a conception of the magnitude, power and blessings of this vast expenditure. When we realize that they cost more than all the manufacturing concerns in the world, that one-third of all the money in existence is invested in these corporations, and that all the money in the world could buy only one-third of these systems, we can well understand that there is a grandeur and dignity of this confederation of men which has control and the government of these vast financial interests. America, with one-twentieth of the population of the world, has one-half its railways, operating now 190,000 miles—sufficient to extend around the world seven times, with a large fraction over.

"It is almost inconceivable that the railway construction in America has required the astounding expenditure of $1,118,906 per day for the past sixteen years, or $46,621 per hour. What country and what people other than America and Americans could show such a resistless tide of energy and conquest? When we realize, too, that the faithfulness and skill of the men engaged in these railways has reduced the number of fatalities to passengers, and the loss in proportion to the population is less than those killed by falling from windows, and that in England a man may travel 7,000,000 and in America an average of 19,000,000 miles without a railway accident, it is but natural and reasonable that the world should respect, honor and admire this vast army of men to whom has been committed the control of the lives and the wealth of the nation.

"The armies and navies of the world upon a peace footing comprise less than 3,500,000 persons. These destroy the wealth. The number of railroad employes of the world number more than 4,000,000, and these create wealth. It ceases to be a matter of wonder in this blessed country of ours that these 2,000,000 of employes coupled with this vast system produce wealth and make America the richest country in the world.

"I have been pleased, too, with what the distinguished gentleman from Iowa has said in regard to the necessity of a day of rest in each week for railway employes. Such a day of rest is not founded and cannot be enforced in so far as railway service is concerned, upon any divine command; it is founded upon the demand of nature itself, from which the decree has gone forth that man's brain, man's nerve and man's body require that one day in seven, he shall cease from active labor. It matters not for the purpose of this argument, how the man may spend his Sabbath, whether in worship or recreation; this is a question of individual choice and individual right; but, as a man, and as a free man, he is entitled to that legislation which shall give him this needed and wanted rest. Public sentiment has demanded, and that demand has been enforced by legislation, that all the most skillful appliances shall be used for the protection and convenience of passengers, and where public sentiment has been educated and the people of this country understand that only twenty per cent. of brakemen die a natural death, and that more than 10,000 men are killed or maimed annually in the United States, by reason of defective appliances in coupling in the conduct of freight business, it is not unreasonable to hope that the day is not far distant when all that the law can do will be done to enforce this just and humane protection to railway operatives. I take some pride in saying that I was the first president and general manager that enforced, so far as it was possible, the cessation of railways on the Sabbath day. This position, thus taken by me seven years ago, was discussed ably and fully at the time by the most prominent and experienced railway men of the country, and as an outgrowth of this discussion there has gradually gone on in this country a movement, increasing all the while, by which, as far as possible, the traffic shall be suspended on the Sabbath day.

"During the past fifteen years of my connection with railways, I have observed a remarkable improvement in the character and personnel of railway employes. This railway business is no longer mere employment; it has risen to the dignity of a profession, and as you cultivate an esprit du corps in this profession a higher railway service will be secured. Better citizens will be produced and the more thoroughly will be the public demand for this provision and this reasonable protection which should be drawn around this vast army of trained skillful workers.

"I need not say, gentleman, that I consider it a privilege and honor to appear before you this afternoon and to assure you that as far as I can in any sphere in which I can act, I shall be glad to do all I can to improve, dignify and ennoble and protect your calling."

The only informal speaker was Mr. G. W. Howard, of Terre Haute, and one of the best known conductors in the country. His subject was "Agitation," and he made an able argument, showing its necessity. Preachers are agitators, and without agitation crops wouldn't grow for the farmer, and without agitation good results would not follow any kind of organizations. He stirred up his hearers when he pleased and brought the celebration to an end as far as the afternoon part of it was concerned.

THE EVENING MEETING.

The interval between the completion of the afternoon programme and the commencement of the evening exercises was variously employed. Family parties, in a majority of cases including babies, scattered about and enjoyed al fresco suppers, while others entered the dining rooms and feasted there. Some spooney couples moved off into quiet corners and ate their rations, wondering the while if a similar proceeding three times a day for 365 days in a year would be as enjoyable or as much of a picnic, while a large number of people wandered aimlessly around, awaiting the hour for the evening's programme to begin.

The park was at no time deserted, and long before the band struck up the initial march at 7:45 o'clock, the pavilion was well filled and many had taken position on the esplanade. The atmosphere was oppressive, even in this park, which is known to be the most pleasant spot in the city, and fans, bats and programmes were freely used as atmospheric agitators.

The crowd rapidly increased, until by the time the speakers were ready the park was full. As soon as this part of the programme was reached, a large portion of the assemblage filled the esplanade, but those who had the nerve and the physique to endure dancing stuck to the ball-room, and danced and perspired while the speaking was going on, and made as many arrangements as possible for "special federation."

Mr. E. L. Cronk, as Master of Ceremonies, first introduced Mr. Wm. P. Daniels, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, the Grand Secretary of the Order of Railway Conductors, who spoke from the music stand. Mr. Daniels said he was only going to make an informal talk, and proceeded at once to advance arguments for federation and co-operation among all classes of railway employes. It was, he said, a fact that must now be appreciated by all that organization must be had in order to secure to railway trainmen the benefits assured other men. The railroad man has no Sunday, no time he can call his own, no time for rest. In fact Sunday is used as a general cleaning-up day, and instead of arranging matters so that as many as possible can get off, the idea seemed to be to put everybody on, no matter whether he had just come in Sunday morning or not. In regard to this matter, organization was better than legislation. Legislation will not stop Sunday work, but co-operation can remedy the matter. "Public opinion is behind us," said he, "and we must succeed. Legislation has failed because railroad officials, under the law can keep men out on a siding, where there are no houses or anything else, all day Sunday, because all work must stop at 12 o'clock Saturday night and begin again at 12 o'clock Sunday night. It would be better for the men to be allowed to complete their runs if it took half of Sunday, provided they could then remain the rest of the time at their homes."

Allusion was made to the differences between the Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and the speaker said that that difference had advanced the cause of federation at least ten years. He had, he said, been told that he would be called upon to defend himself, but he was not on the defensive. Under the same circumstances, and with no more information than he had three years ago, he would do as he did then, all he could against the engineers. He had acted from a sense of duty, but with present information and experience he would act differently. When the weather becomes oppressive thunder-storms come to purify the atmosphere. Such was the case with this trouble, and while it was to be deplored that any difference or trouble had existed, he believed that benefit had resulted to all railway organizations, believing that the organizations were nearer together now than they would otherwise have been in many years to come. That he freely acknowledged his own mistakes in the past and was ready in common with members of the Order generally, to forgive and forget, join in any plan for the general interest of all concerned that might be approved by the majority, with the sincere hope that the experience of the past would enable us to avoid trouble in the future, that while personally in favor of system federation, he did not occupy the position of an obstructionist, and if the general plan was chosen, would heartily and sincerely give it support.

Several bills now before Congress were touched on, among them one for arbitration, which he said should be entitled an act to enable railway companies to make slaves of their employees.

"The railroad men will not submit to any such legislation as will bind them hand and foot, and it is the duty of every man to write at once to the Congressman of his district and the Senators from his state and protest against the passage of such an iniquitous measure." Other bills were referred to and endorsed in strong terms particularly one introduced by Senator George, of Mississippi, to protect employes and do away with the idea that he could not obtain damages for injuries because an accident was the result of carelessness or neglect of a co-employee. The co-employee idea, he said, might almost be termed a relic of the dark ages. After some further argument in favor of federation in the railway fraternities Mr. Daniels retired amid much applause.

Mr. George W. Howard, Grand Chief of the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, was then introduced by Mr. Cronk. Mr. Howard began by saying that it was a self-evident fact that "we all are here and we live; but what are we here for, and what do we live for? Do you owe any duty to anybody, and if you do, do you intend to do it? I have been in the railroad business for a long time, and have had thirty years experience. I appear here to-night as a radical federationist, because I know that nothing can be accomplished without federation and organization. This has been demonstrated by the history of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and what that can't do nobody can.

At this point a locomotive passing over the connection below in the valley let off a prolonged, demonical shriek that effectually drowned the speaker's voice, as though exulting in what he had said, which caused Mr. Howard to remark "I'll bet that fellow heard me." He was answered by another shriek, which caused a great roar of laughter and a round of applause.

"I have had a good deal of experience with strikes, and have been in them, but I don't believe in them; but at the same time I believe that extreme conservatism is nothing but cowardice. Men must respect themselves if they expect others to respect them. I was once a division superintendent on the O. and M. I received a peremptory order to reduce my pay-rolls $1,500 a month. I examined the roll, but I could not find where any man was getting more than he ought to have. In fact, I had been for a month considering the advisability of asking an advance of my men. I did not know what to do. I asked some of the men—I don't care who knows it—and told them I had orders to reduce, 'but,' said I, 'you send a committee to me and refuse to accept the reduction.' They were afraid, and would not do it, and the cut was made. Pre-soon I got another order to make a cut of $500 more. Again I tried to get them to send a committee and refuse to accept the reduction. I thought I had them up to the scratch, but they again failed. I had either to make the cut or resign and let some one be appointed who would make it, and I made it." Then followed a powerful argument in favor of federation, bristling with strong points, which were enthusiastically received.

"Under federation a strike will never occur, unless you run up against a manager who hasn't enough brains to grease a gimlet. When a committee goes to obtain an audience it never fails to get it. If it fails to obtain its demands another step is taken, and so on, until the Supreme Council is involved, but all this time there is no strike; the men working right along. Finally, when arbitration fails, we are federated and know what we can do, and the manager with not enough brains to grease a gimlet refuses to do the right thing, then we pull every man off that road in a day; but there is no danger of a strike under a federation."

It was the duty of railway men to read the daily papers and keep posted. The officials never read labor papers; they would read the Railway Age, because that was their organ, remember that. Here followed more arguments in favor of federation, and Mr. Howard startled his audience by saying that "God Almighty is Himself a striker. When the Israelites were in bondage in Egypt, God Almighty sent a grievance committee to wait on Pharaoh." After detailing various scenes and methods adopted to get the Egyptian King's consent to let the Israelites go, the speaker said: "The same God will help you. Go and unite with some labor protective association. A man must protect himself." Mr. Howard's remarks were listened to with interest, and frequently applauded.

Mr. E. E. Clark, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, was next introduced and attempted to speak, but the confusion became so great that but few could hear him, and, after announcing that he would speak to-day, he withdrew, and the crowd sought other sources of amusement.

The dance hall was already crowded and the park was uncomfortably full, but the band began to play and soon each separate group was engaged according to the fancy of its members. The festivities were kept up long past midnight.

To-day an address will be delivered by Hon. Asher G. Caruth, at 2 o'clock. He will be followed by Mr. W. D. Robinson, founder of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, after which the wooing scene in "Richard III," will be given by Mr. Walter Mathews and Miss Belle Sutton. Hon. L. S. Coffin, John W. Headley and officers of the railway fraternities will also deliver addresses. All these will be interspersed with music. Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, will speak in the evening, on "The Objects and Aims of Federation."

Among the more prominent men in attendance at the Railroad celebration here is Mr. T. J. Van Wermer, of Detroit, who at present is a locomotive engineer on the Louisville, St. Louis & Texas railroad. He is one of the hardest workers for the cause of united labor, and, as Mr. Robinson puts it, has had more persecution because of his interest in the order than almost any other man in the country. He is a tall, broad-shouldered, fine-looking man, something past middle age, who has the confidence and respect of all the railroad managers he was ever stationed under. He, except Mr. Robinson, the founder, is the only surviving engineer who was present at the famous meeting in Detroit, in 1863, when the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was founded.

The celebration of this afternoon will probably prove to be the most interesting one of the series. For this afternoon the speakers will be Hon. Asher G. Caruth, who returns from Washington for the purpose; Mr. John W. Headley, and President Gompers. Afternoon and evening there will be an excellent musical programme, and Mr. Walter Mathews and his assistant will give some scenes from Romeo and Juliet, and will give the love-making scene from Richard III.

Mr. John Dyer, of the local Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, is much pleased with the first day of the celebration. Mr. Dyer is the general manager of the affair, and the chairman of the Brotherhood of Railroad Fraternities, and for the past month he has given his entire time to arranging for the celebration, and what credit there is belongs to him.

Insurance Commissioner Carey.

In the scramble for places on the state ticket it is well not to forget that Fargo's popular citizen—the faithful official who has held the position of Insurance commissioner during the past year—Hon. A. L. Carey. Mr. Carey was nominated by acclamation in the convention of '89, received a rousing vote at the polls, has proved loyal to his trust, is practically without an enemy in the state, and should go in "whooping" for the second heat.

We are not aware that any candidate will be offered against Mr. Carey, and certainly none ought to be. He was compelled to organize a new department when he took the office—has held it only a single year—a year that has brought deep domestic sorrow to him—but he has put the office onto a basis which reflects the highest credit on his ability and industry. The press of the state is especially indebted to Mr. Carey for reforms which give assurance that their interests are cared for, and will be vigorously protected while he is at the helm. In short, "Al." has made a model insurance commissioner, and we move that it is the sense of the "boys" that he have a whole term now, for being a good fellow, and because he has proved himself an honest, attentive and efficient public servant.—Fargo Republican.

Since the above was received, the wire brings the news that Bro. Carey was nominated by acclamation, and we congratulate the convention on its good judgment.

ATLANTA, Ga., August 1st, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Since the passage of our old ship through the breakers and whirlpool at Rochester, I have been quietly watching the effects produced, if any, and now having passed safely through, proving her seaworthiness and floating pleasantly and gracefully on her mission of protection and brotherly love, it is now my desire to impart some information to our Brothers as to the effects produced upon the Order in this section by the changes made at Rochester. While the course pursued by a few of our, then members, was not at all commendable, I think good results have been obtained in many respects. First, by those who were dissatisfied in so much that they were not willing to abide by or be governed by the will of a majority, but preferred, not only to jump overboard themselves, but used their best endeavors to take others with them. As to their success all are familiar. So much the better. The old ship has no room for dead weight. I now desire to say a word about the effect the changes produced upon Atlanta Division No. 180: While we lost our Chief and Assistant C. C.'s, and one other member, we have received into membership already, twenty-five, and have on hand five petitions. So you will very readily see by the healthy growth of our division, that the proceedings at Rochester met the full approval of the conductors in this section, and I predict by the close of the present year, that every conductor that can will be a member of the old tried and true, O. R. C. Consequently my sympathies naturally go out toward those who have cut loose and are now drifting with the hope of drawing others after them, but will only be able to pick up such as can not secure passage on the old ship. Upon the resignation and withdrawal of our C. C. and A. C. C., our division elected D. M. Vining, C. C., and a more earnest worker for the good of the whole Order never presided over the deliberations of any division of our noble Order, and is on hand promptly every Sunday afternoon and his gavel falls promptly at two o'clock; and all that I have said in behalf of our worthy C. C., I can cheerfully say for our C. C., W. N. Johnson, who we hold as one of the old veterans of Atlanta Division. The same praise is justly due to Brother Fairbanks, our model S. and T., whom we find as promptly on hand as the hour upon which the C. C.'s gavel falls, and in fact it is but seldom when we do not find every officer in his position promptly. Our attendance is very good, number running from twenty to fifty of our own members, and seldom ever a meeting that we are not blest with a number of visiting Brothers, and I am happy to say among our late visitors I mention our worthy Grand Outside Sentinel, Brother F. S. Butler, of Division No. 232. You all know Brother Butler, and our Atlanta Division are only too happy to know that Brother B. has cast his fortunes among us—in other words, he has come to stay. While we regret the loss sustained by Sioux City Division their loss will be our gain, as Brother Butler intends moving his membership to our division where we will have the benefit of his able counsel in our deliberations.

Before closing, I desire to extend, on behalf of the officers and members of our division, a cordial invitation to visit us should an opportunity present itself. Remembering that the C. C.'s gavel falls promptly at two o'clock every Sunday afternoon.

It was my intention to say something on insurance in this letter, but as I have already consumed as much of the valuable space of THE CONDUCTOR as I have cheek enough to ask for, shall close, with the promise, to deal with the Insurance Department in my next.

I remain, very truly yours in P. F.,

J. H. L.

TERRE HAUTE, August 3, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Perhaps a great many members may have forgotten who the "proverbial" "Vicar of Bray" was. I take this method of liberty of reminding them, that the reverend gentleman in question held a fat position in church in the county of Berkshire, England, during the 16th century. The said Vicar was a Roman Catholic, but in the early part of the reign of "Henry Bluebeard," he became a Protestant with that variable monarch. Remained so during the short reign of Henry 6th; became a Roman Catholic on the accession of Mary, known as "Bloody Mary;" on her demise his elastic conscience allowed him to again turn Protestant. When the good queen "Bess" came on the throne, rallied on his want of principle, this "gally" individual replied: "for although I have changed my religion, I am sure that I have kept true to my principle, which is to live and die Vicar of Bray." Has not the Order had in "Selah" Calvin, a modern Vicar of Bray, for the past six or eight years, for his every act shows the Vicar's principle. I, with a great many other members was in favor of Wheaton, simply I presume from the fact, we did not know him, he having been our Grand Chief for so many years we supposed about all of this talk was made up from his enemies.

Wheaton sealed his doom with Division 92, 89, 103 and 110, during the trouble on the Mackey system for it was there shown by him, that he was true to nothing. In the Union meeting at Terre Haute, Brother W. E. Murray, a member of 92, and a passenger conductor on the Vandalia line, asked him the direct question, if he had any notice of the trouble on the Mackey lines, when Wheaton answered "No, none whatever." There were letters in existence, and the parties holding them were in Div. 92, showing that the matter had been talked over by some of the chief officials with Wheaton, and he left the impression that he would give the case his immediate attention. Before shutting off this piece on the Vicar, I wish to say to any Brother, who at this time, has any feeling of kindness, love or respect left for C. S. W., that if he will send me his name and address, that I will in return give him the name of a gentleman in Terre Haute that has a letter from "Calvin," where the following appears under his well known "John Hancock:" "My own election depends upon the elimination of the strike clause. I am, and have been working for the past two years for its removal from our constitution. With that accomplished, federation is an easy affair, which meets with my hearty approval."

To the members of the Order, and especially those from the New England states, does it not begin to look possible, that this second edition of the Vicar of Bray, who was ousted from his snug vicarage before the gods think fit to call him home—was timely and appropriate.

Yours in P. F.,

C. H. ARTHUR.

JACKSON, July 30, 1890. }
DIVISION No. 182. }

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—You may think we are not doing any work on account of keeping so still. But you know what the old saying is, the still pig drinks the swill. We are working just the same, and since the meeting of the Grand Division at Rochester, every one of the members seems to have new life. We have better attendance at division meetings, and a good many of the old members who have not taken the new work are taking it now, and new members are coming in all the time.

Our A. G. C., Brother Wilkins, made us a visit on the 28th of July, at which time we called a special meeting to meet him. We had a good meeting, and I think we all feel benefitted by it.

Enclosed please find a copy of a few appropriate remarks made by Brother Cooper in presenting Brother Swidensky a token of our regards. The Brothers and their wives, as many as could attend, assembled for a surprise party at Brother Swidensky's for the purpose and also to have a good time and plenty of ice cream, and it was a complete surprise to him of course. His wife had known it for a week, but some women can keep a secret you know.

Yours in P. F.,

E. KINNEY.

BROTHER COOPER'S REMARKS.

BRO. SWIDENSKY: Human friendship and upright manhood are of too much value in these perilous times to be easily broken or carelessly overlooked by those who share with each other their vicissitudes and victories.

Loyalty to the principles of our Order and due appreciation of its matchless power and priceless value, is the golden cord which unites into one common sympathy the wealth producing hosts of the nineteenth century.

The most valuable jewel a man can possess is a character above suspicion, which draws to itself the confidence of all classes, is true to its friends and fearless in the rightful discharge of the sacred duties therewith intrusted.

Such character, girt with integrity and illumined with intelligent fidelity, is not with the idler, but is the exclusive heritage of the conscientious toiler. Such manhood, born of experience, is the coveted prize of the world, and so it becomes the admirers of such virtues to encourage its possessor with some memorial of appreciation, to inspire all to the attainment of the highest ideals of life.

For that purpose these friends have here assembled at this hour and informally made themselves the guests of your attractive home.

As their chosen spokesman, and in behalf of Wolverine Division No. 182, allow me, sir, to present you with this elegant solid silver water set, as a token of our esteem and the high regard with which you are held by your friends in your Division, which you so faithfully represented on every occasion when duty has called you as Secretary of our Division. It is a source of pride to us and the highest compliment to yourself that through your painstaking care and persistent toil you now rank as one of the highest on the records of our Order.

When we consider how extensive the Order has become and the skillful competitors eligible to promotion, yours is a standing of which we are all justly proud. This costly gift has been carefully selected from the purest of precious metals to symbolize the purity of motives and regard which prompts the brothers, and also to represent the solid elements which we believe makes up the character of the receiver, and furthermore it declares the life-giving element, to be always drank from the gold-lined cups, so promising to you and yours long life, peace and prosperity.

Trusting, my Brother, that death may not soon summon yourself or family to go hence, that by providential care as an Order we shall long be spared to serve the public in our official capacity and each other in strong and fraternal relations, I herewith present you with this token of our regards, with hearty good wishes for a long and happy future.

ATCHISON, Kan., Aug. 7th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I saw a few lines in THE CONDUCTOR of last month from my son Dannie, from our Division. Now Dannie is not much of a Boy with the quill, but still he does pretty well for a starter. Now there are some of the boys around here that ought to have made the start sooner, but they did not, for some cause or other best known to themselves. Now as for myself I am not much of a writer especially for conductor's or any body else's magazine. Since the Boy wrote to you, the little difference has been settled on the Western Div. of the Mo. P. R'y., by Mr. A. W. Dickinson, General Supt., and our Member of the System Grievance Committee, Bro. W. J. Brownson.

It seems that some of the Bros. on the Western Div., had the nerve to tell Supt. Rathburn that they were not represented in St. Louis at the time that the new schedule was drawn up. Now Div. 28 is about the only one west of Kansas City and most of the members that belong to the Order, belong to No. 28, that are working on the Western Div., and they were represented in St.

Louis as well as the men on the C. B. U. P. Div. and I want to say right here that Dannie ought not to have said anything about it in the first place, and as I said before, Dan is not much of a writer, but you ought to hear him make a political speech, and talk protective tariff. It might be that I am tiring you with this letter, but I hope not as I saw in THE CONDUCTOR that the Fraternal Department was falling off and that ye Editor had to exert himself a little in order to tell of the Wheaton, Horstrander and Co's. actions. Well all I have to say is, "Roast em." When you have them done on one side, turn them over and cook them a little on the other. Just make the dressing so that it will be a little palatable for I don't think there will be much of it consumed when it comes to be set out in front of the boys. Dan says for his part he don't want much of it in his. Well now for a few flashes and I will be through. One of our Atchison Dailies said some time ago that Bro. Brownson was sleeping with his clothes all in one place. Bro. Rody was out on the North Solomon District on passenger, in Bro. Collins' place for a few trips while Bro. Collins came in to have his front teeth filled. It is understood that Bro. Maher is going to lay off for a ten-day vacation. Bro. Magnault has left the C. B. Div. to seek a better position elsewhere. Once in a while Bro. Smith and Bro. Hulse get on their gilt edged caps and halloo all-a-board for a few days at a time, when some of the Western Div. men lay off. I think that Sunday, August 10th, will find us with a new candidate, and so the good work goes on. Well I will have to close. I have cautioned Dannie not to write any more as they will get on to him.

From yours in P. F.

OLD MAN MULDOON.

FARNHAM, Aug. 4th, 1890

Editor Conductor.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER. It is now some time since anything has been said about Div. 80, but she still lives and is true to her colors. Despite the changes made at the last Grand Convention I don't think we have any kickers or sore-heads in the Div; at least none to my knowledge. None of the members have so expressed themselves that I am aware of. Every one seems well pleased with the turn things have taken, and all hope it will be for the best. Of course time will decide that matter. Since my last letter to you, and during the Convention at Rochester, we had the misfortune to be burned out the hotel in which our hall was located, and all the contents of the lodge room were destroyed, also everything belonging to our secretary Bro. Moreau, who was a boarder in the house, and who with Mrs. Moreau were absent at the Convention at the time. But he (Bro. Moreau) being made aware of the fact had everything replaced before his return. We have now a very nice little hall fitted up in the Montcalm, where we held our first meeting on the 20th inst. a fair number being present. Everything passed off very satisfactorily with Bro. C. C. Vernal in the chair. I may say there is a favorable outlook ahead for Div. 80, and with a little snap on the part of the Brothers clear sailing can be easily obtained.

There are now five or six applications in for membership and I think by the next meeting or soon after, we shall have that many more. During the meeting some good resolutions were adopted of which our secretary will inform you. We are all much pleased to see Bro. Whitney again on duty, after an absence of two months on account of his wife's illness. She has been at the point of death for a long time, but is now somewhat better so that he can attend to his duties for a time, at least. This has been a trying ordeal to Bro. Whitney and he has our deepest sympathy, one and all, in his trouble. Our train master, L. W. Powers has been very ill for some time but is now convalescent, and we are in hopes to soon see him among us again, his place has been filled by chief dispatcher J. G. Merriman in a very able manner. Bro. C. F. Brady, and asst. supt. F. P. Brady and party have returned from a fishing trip in Maine, they report good luck, and a good time generally.

Bro. Cunningham has been absent a few days moving into his new house. This is John's first experience in house-keeping, consequently every thing looks colour de-rose.

Yours Truly in P. F.

F. G. MARTYN.

Editor Railway Conductor:

A grand reception was given the General Grievance Committee of the A., T. & S. F. railroad by the following popular young gentlemen of Topeka: J. Levi, M. Levi, Dr. Ashton, John Waters and H. S. Earley. The music for the occasion was furnished by the Oriole Quartette Club, consisting of Messrs. O. Scott, L. Pegus, C. Coldron and O. D. Hollis. The evening was spent in telling old-time as well as new and original stories, song singing by the Quartette Club, and an occasional toast. To say it was the most enjoyable evening spent by this committee during their session of five weeks, would not do the occasion justice. The members of the committee were in remarkably good spirits, the fact being that they had been granted by Mr. A. A. Robinson nearly all of their grievances. After spending three or four hours in pleasant conversation and song singing, the committee adjourned to a temporary dining hall, where a fine banquet awaited them, consisting of all the delicacies and luxuries of the season. After supper a few more songs were sung for the benefit of C. H. Branch, who, for reasons best known to himself and easily guessed by the members of the committee, did not arrive until late in the evening. He was, however, forgiven by all present, on condition that he give each member present a flower from the button-hole bouquet he wore as a souvenir of the occasion. After a vote of thanks by the committee to the host, the committee withdrew, to go to their several homes in different parts of the country, perhaps never to reassemble again, but with the warmest and most friendly feeling to all concerned.

J. S. SCOTT, Committeeman.

SUNBURY, Pa., July 28, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Having failed to see a communication in these columns from this section of Pennsylvania relative to the action of the Grand Division, I would briefly express the sentiments gleaned from the conversations of staunch members of the Order.

The action of the Grand Division is heartily approved and endorsed, and they have only taken a step that should have been taken years ago, namely, eliminating the strike clause. Strike is the last weapon an organization has to depend on, and when handled by an organization so conservative as ours its authority will not be overreached nor its power misused. Let us be men among men. Let us put protection on our banner and our progress will be upward and onward. We have lived to see two secessions from our ranks through the strike clause; the B. of R. C. because we nursed it, and the I. O. R. C. because we weaned it, and by all appearances with reference to the latter order it was not done any too soon. In reference to our late G. C. C. much has been said. Why was this man allowed so much authority? Why did not our representatives hold this man in check? Having received the highest honor that man can receive from an organization, and becoming dissatisfied because the Order's ideas have advanced to meet the requirements of this age more rapidly than his own, now hurls back his real motive, like a viper, on the breast that nursed him from almost obscurity. He has used the scepter of authority, given him to promote the welfare of the Order, to his own selfish good, and betrays the trust and confidence reposed in him. The position he assumed in the C., B. & Q. strike was of such a sufficient nature to comprehend his motives. He thought to demoralize the Order, that he might feather his own nest at the expense of others. Brothers, all this has happened through our own neglect. There has not been the interest taken by each and every one of us that the Order demands of us. Are we going to sit idly by and not do anything? Let us show in the year 1891 what good we have done in the year 1890. We compose the O. R. C. We must, we can make it an order that every railway conductor in the land will be proud to have his name enrolled among us. I am proud I belong to the O. R. C. and proud I am a member of its insurance. Are you, Brother? Much has been said about our insurance, with reference to its cost. It is true it costs; but they all cost, and when our insurance is compared to others, I think it is much cheaper. Look, Brother, at its noble cause; you are helping a Brother or his wife or children through it. Are you helping a brother by paying a policy in another association? It is the duty of every member who takes out a policy to take it with his own department. If you are not a member, recollect you owe it to your family to become so at once. I could accept no excuse whatever, but that every member of the O. R. C. should be a member of its insurance.

Yours in P. F.,

"PROTECTION."

MORISON, Aug. 13th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Having been a number of years an earnest advocate of the principle of the "Federation" of all organizations of R. R. employes in train service, and since the elimination of the famous "strike clause" from the constitution of our Order at its last convention at Rochester, an enthusiastic worker to accomplish that, to my mind, desirable end I wish with all due deference to the opinions of others who have made this question a study and who are doubtless much better qualified to pass upon its merits, to say a few words to the members of our Order in relation to the question. When last June a few of the members of the B. of L. E. and O. R. C. at Sanborn decided to call a union meeting for the purpose of devising measures to bring about this much to be desired result, I with many others, supposed we were in the position to enter into such an arrangement on this system. After conversations with various members of the different Orders, parties already to a system of federation now in existence, and having been assured by them that they believed there was nothing in their obligations which would prevent their entering into a compact with the only two Orders in the train service, not already parties to this system of federation, I supposed that all that was necessary on our part was to gather delegates from the different orders in a grand union meeting and there promulgate an agreement governing such members as became parties thereto, submit it to their respective Orders through their subordinate Lodges or Divisions and if universally approved, with the consent of the Chief officers of the different Orders declare it an established fact. What then, was my surprise, after the opening of the union meeting at Savanna, Ills., on the 10th of August, to learn that the four Orders, already parties to a system of federation, could enter into no arrangement with us on account of a defect in our laws which prevented us from taking the same stand in cases of troubles between R. R. Cos. and their train employes as that they would take. I say defect in our laws, because it became evident in the discussion of the question, that we could not, according to our present laws, enter into any arrangement which would be binding on the whole Order, and I consider they were perfectly justifiable in refusing to pledge their orders to any agreement to which we could only pledge ourselves as individuals. The O. R. C. has been in the past the most conservative organization in railroad train service, and it would ill become me to publicly question the actions of those who have made it so, believing that they were conscientious, in the course which they pursued, but I ask you is it safe to pursue that policy further? Our next regular convention is still a matter of the future, meantime the B. of L. E. will have held a general meeting at which they will so amend their constitution as to enable them to become parties to the agreement of federation now in existence and embracing all train employes except they and ourselves, and in my opinion they will at that meeting take such steps as will virtually make them a party to the federation. Where, I ask you and all the Order, will we stand then? In my opinion there is imperative necessity that immediate steps be taken to place ourselves in a position to take the same course as I believe and as I have been assured by some of their members they will take. The question of the expense is, in my opinion, not worth consideration in comparison with the necessity of the accomplishment of this object. Let us look the matter squarely in the face and not attempt to dodge the issue. If we are left alone outside the federation, how long will our Order stand? The protection we have depended on in the past is gone, and we have nothing in its place. What, I ask you is the sense in keeping up an institution to compel members to be loyal and support, (under all and every circumstance) each other, of what use would it be to say to railroad officials that we are not a striking organization when they call our attention to the fact that we have eliminated from our constitution, the clause prohibiting such action? or of what use is it for us as individuals: to assert to other organizations that we will "stay with them" in any trouble they may have, when they know and we know that we can only promise as individuals? Will any such argument with either railroad officials or members of organizations that are already federated and prepared to define and defend their position? I say emphatically that I think not, and I believe every member of the O. R. C. will agree with me if they will only try and imagine themselves on the other side of the question, and see how they would feel should an irresponsible party come to them and ask to form a co-partnership with them. The first question would naturally be, what security can you give that you will carry out the provisions of this compact? If we are asked this question by the Orders composing this confederation, I ask what will our answer be? I tell you I am of the opinion, and I believe there are many more in the Order of the same mind, that our Order as it now stands is useless, and the sooner we assemble and place ourselves on a platform declaring for or against, the better it will be for us. Let us call an extra convention to be held not later than the middle of October, 1890, and declare ourselves in terms that cannot be misunderstood, either for or against a constitution that will permit us to stand side by side, shoulder to shoulder, with the balance of the railroad employes in train service in the United States, Canada and Mexico. Let us no longer stand before the world in an uncertain light and an object of ridicule both to the officials and employes of railroad companies. As the matter now stands, while our intentions are good we cannot convince either one party or the other of our true position.

Yours in P. F.,

K. N.

[Our correspondent is mistaken in asserting that no alliance could be formed on account of defects in our laws. The "federation" at Savanna was prevented by an officer of the Supreme Council ordering members of the four organizations not to take any part, and thereby exceeding any authority given him by their published laws or orders.

System federations, including the Order, have been formed, are operating successfully, and the matter is being considered elsewhere with prospects of success, although meeting the energetic opposition of the Supreme Council.]—ED.

To the Members of St. Paul Div. No. 40, O. R. C.:

DEAR FRIENDS: I take this method of extending to you my sincere thanks and heartfelt gratitude for the many acts of true brotherly kindness to myself and child during the long illness and subsequent death of my beloved husband. I wish also to extend my thanks to all members of the noble Order of Railway Conductors; I acknowledge their true worth by the manner in which they have so liberally contributed to our support in time of need. May God bless and prosper the noble Order; and I trust that all of your good acts may be perpetuated in heaven and that the Judge of all will be as considerate to you all as you have been to me and my child is the prayer of

Yours most respectfully,

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—I desire, through THE CONDUCTOR, to contradict a rumor which has been circulated that Division No. 224 was to join seceders, and I now take the opportunity of saying that this rumor is a falsehood from beginning to end, as not a member of 224, to my knowledge, contemplates any such action, as the members of 224 are true and loyal men, who, if they desired to withdraw from the O. of R. C. would do so in an honorable and upright manner, and not in the dishonorable and disgraceful manner that some have done since the meeting of the Grand Division at Rochester. Our motto is, let us pull together and keep the good ship, O. of R. C., going.

FEDERATION.

W. V. STAFFORD.

There's a matter just now causing a tremendous agitation,
 A matter that for many has a wonderous fascination,
 A matter that is getting now a world-wide ventilation;
 It is the Railroad Brotherhood's new scheme of federation.

Some look upon it in the light of a dangerous innovation,
 While others are enthusiasts, and loud in their laudation;
 And some are sure that it is good if used in moderation,
 And others yet believe that it will bring us tribulation.

New schemes are characteristic of this present generation;
 There's always someone with a plan for working out salvation,
 And while we may not yet have seen extensive realization
 We get our satisfaction in our future expectation.

It seems to me that there should be a little hesitation;
 The subject is a deep one and requires some cogitation;
 The scheme appears a good one and is a great temptation,
 But a hasty move may wind up in a heap of desolation.

Which ever way we go there'll be a good vociferation,
 For some are always in a state of bubbling fermentation.

What ever course be taken to insure a reformation,

It's sure to meet on some side with a hearty condemnation.

We shall be entitled to sincere congratulation
 If we can choose a course that adds unto our reputation,

For working for the good of all of our occupation,
 And improve to some extent the present strained retation.

For hasty moves in any way I have no admiration.

A thing that grows a little slow oft has the best foundation.

Work that's wound up with a rush in mood of desperation

Is apt to rebound with a wreck and cause a devastation.

That minds of men shall differ is a foregone ordination;

And on this subject we can't get a vote by acclamation,

But the minority may show a decent resignation

And not abuse their privilege by insubordination.

We want no change that does not tend unto our elevation.

I'm not inclined to advocate a too wide separation;

But I would much prefer that we should hold our present station

Rather than lose our elbow room and die of suffocation.

Editor Railway Conductor:

The following was unanimously adopted and I am directed to request publication in THE CONDUCTOR:

WHEREAS, In view of the fact that some past members of the Order have taken exception to the will of a constitutional majority, and have severed their connection with this Order only to start a new organization in hope of carrying out their threat that if they could not rule they would ruin; therefore,

Resolved, That Division No. 162, at a regular meeting, by a unanimous vote, give the Grand Officers and members of the Order this their assurance of their hearty support, and that we stand loyal to the principles of the Order;

Resolved, That we condemn the the action of the retiring G. C. C. and of various members, and as a division and individual members of this division will do all in our power to counteract their movement, and we call on all conductors and men of principle to keep aloof from these unprincipled men.

GALION, Aug. 12th, 1890.

Editor Conductor.

This day L. McBane, sec'y Div. 109 O. R. C. brought me a check for $2500, for death of my husband C. F. Bunnison.

Permit me hereby to express my heartfelt thanks to the Order of Railway Conductors for having an organization, whereby their families are looked after when they are bereft of husband and father. I would advise all to become members of the insurance department as I fully appreciate the great good accruing from it in my case.

Yours respectfully.

MARY E. BUNNISON.

The Rhyme of Eppelin.

The wind from the south blew soft and free,
As I sat me down 'neath the linden tree:
And the rustling leaves which the branches bore
Repeated the story o'er and o'er,
That the mossy linden told to me.

Ages ago, in his castle tall,
Made strong and safe by moat and wall,
Lived the bandit knight named Eppelin,
In the gray old town of Sailengen,
Known far and wide and feared by all.

Scarce threescore knights his castle manned,
And yet so brave was the bandit band
That he lightly laughed with child and wife,
And he feared not death and he lived his life,
And no foeman's foot dared cross his land.

He watched from his towers with falcon eye
For train or caravan passing nigh;
And, like the falcon upon its prey,
He struck—and bore their wealth away,
And his red wine quaffed, as the "dogs" went by.

But the falcon fierce at last was caged;
In a king's dark dungeons he pined and raged.
And he who had scorned all earthly power Stood face to face with his own death-hour.—
Yet a hidden hope his grief assuaged.

They led him forth ere the morning sun
On Nurnberg's wall had the day begun.
He bared his brow as the sun uprose,
And shook the straws from his prison clothes,
As he dreamed in his heart of a deed to be done.

For unto one condemned, though knave
Or peer, the law a last wish gave,
'T was a custom old—too old to tell—
But Eppelin prized the custom well,
For by it he hoped his life to save.

He begged his white steed again to ride.
Ere he should die, round the walls inside
The prison yard: "I would try as of yore
The long, free stride of my horse once more,
While his willing speed I curb and guide!"

The warder brought him his brave white steed,
Which never had failed at Eppelin's need
And he neighed with joy at his master's call,
And proudly the echoing hoof-beats fall,
As Eppelin urged him to utmost speed.

Then Eppelin bent to the saddle-bow;
He patted the neck as white as snow,
Carressing his forehead and eyes and breast,
And called him the name he loved the best,
And stroked his long mane's silken flow.

Then the noble steed uptossed his head,
And faster and faster around he sped:
Till warder and soldiers, to give him space,
Crept close to the wall from his circling pace,
For his hoofs shot fire as on he fled,

And warder and soldiers looked on and smiled
Without misgiving—though never so wild
And gallant a steed and daring a man
Had their eyes beheld since their days began—
For the castle walls were closely piled.

But the steed uprose and the knight struck spur,
He thought of his child and he thought of her
The love of his life.—Then a gleam of light,
And high on the battlements fair and bright
Stood the fiery beast, nor seemed to stir.

Thus half the deed was bravely wrought
And quicker than glint of sight or thought
Down from the wall themselves they cast,
And safely both steed and rider passed
O're the turbid moat, with danger fraught!

And this is the story the linden told
Of the robber Eppelin, brave and bold,
How he road away to his castle wild,
And held to his heart his wife and child,
Whom he loved better than life or gold.

A Mysterious Gift.

"Time is a mysterious gift," so our Pastor said last evening in reference to the coming New Year.
Is time any more of a mystery than life? The life that lives in us, is given us at our birth, and may be taken from us at any moment? I remember when a child trying to study out how 'I came to be I'; and who would be 'I' if 'I' were to die.' Finally I carried my trouble to mother, whose reply was, "That is something mysterious, I can't tell you."

"I never have any mysteries", remarked a neighbor, of mine, a few days ago. Happy woman! When even our existence, our every action and all our thoughts are a mystery. A constant source of wonderment to an observing person, as to why we are, and why we do so. We cannot see the life when it comes to us, neither when it goes. Just to think if our mind could be spread out and made visible to the human eye. Think what a picture gallery would be unfolded to view! Such a variety of views! Tintings that no artist would dare aspire to reproduce with his brush. Such plainly wrought out tints of sorrow, joy, despair, rage, Ah! Even an average mind would present a rare, fearful and awe inspiring view. And to think that our Father in Heaven hath thought enough of one of his creations to bestow so rare a gift upon it, and how little some seem to value it. How thoughtlessly received and attended to, some of the tender minds intrusted to our charge. A responsibility that few of us seem to realize, judging from the hurry-scurry way some have of going through life. So many go fluttering along like the butter-fly, pausing here a moment, there a moment to taste of all the sweets and beauties of life. While to others seem given more of the snail's life, creeping along slowly, to be pushed hither and yon, anywhere, everywhere out of the way; hidden for days by the mud of the gutter, then thankful for a stray gleam of sunshine, that is all the brighter by contrast.

Oh, the phases of life are many and varied. And in them all, each one's sunshine is the brightest, and each one's cloud the darkest. But behind them all is the hand of the Father who "doeth all things well." And may He teach us to remember, no matter how alluring the pleasures of life may be, it is short, very short at the longest, and eternity is forever and ever! Such a weary time for those to look forward to, who have made no preparation for it, and perhaps sold their heavenly birth-right for a mess of sinful pottage to turn to ashes in mouth and heart. But oh, poor misguided ones, the bitterness must go on and on through all eternity.

Embarrassing.

Children sometimes tell the truth at the most inopportune moments, much to the discomfort of their elders, writes a correspondent, who relates that a lady of her acquaintance, whose home was charmingly managed, had two roguish, irrepressible boys.

One afternoon this lady had company. She was particularly anxious to produce a favorable impression and took great pains for this purpose. She prepared an elaborate supper.

The guests and family were gathered about the tea table, when one of the boys surprised his mother by exclaiming during a lull in the conversation, "Tell you what, ma, we don't have such a supper's this very often, do we?"

There was a momentary pause; the hostess blushed, and then said with a laugh, "No, Johnnie, this is a company supper." The reply and the little laugh prevented any feeling of awkwardness.

After supper the company retired to the parlor, where the lamps were lighted, and here that artless boy fired another shot at his mother's weak armor.

"Oh, ma!" he cried, "you've borrowed Aunt Sally's new lamps, ain't you?"

If annoyed, the mother did not betray it; but making a smiling grimace to her guests, she said, "It's no use trying to shine in borrowed plumes with my boys.—Youth's Companion.

A Dialogue.

LUI.

Oh, have you found the Fount of youth,
Or have you faced the fire of Kor?
Or whence the form, the eyes, the mouth,
The voice, the grace we praised of yore?
Ah, lightly must the years have sped,
The long, the labor-laden years,
That cast no snows upon your head,
Nor dim your eyes with any tears!
And gently must the heart have beat,
That, after many days, can send
So soft, so kind a blush to greet
The advent of so old a friend.

ELLE.

Another tale doth it repeat,
My mirror; and tells me true!
But Time, the thief of all things sweet,
Has failed to steal one grace from you.
One touch of youth he cannot steal,
One trait there is he leaves you yet,
The boyish loyalty, the leal
Absurd, impossible regret!
These are the magic: these restore
A phantom of the April prime,
Show you the face you liked of yore,
And give me back the thefts of Time!

TRANSPORTATION DEPARTMENT.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., 1890.

From and after August 1st, 1890, the following wages will be paid, except as specified:

1st. Passenger Conductors running passenger trains when their runs are 75 miles or more, will receive 25½ mills per mile, except on Cairo and Peoria divisions.

2d. Conductors running through freight trains will receive 29 mills per mile, and will be allowed the same number of miles that Engineers and Firemen receive. They will be paid 29 cents per hour for all detentions over two hours. When delayed over two hours, the first two hours will be included. Road overtime to be computed from current time tables of respective divisions. Running time of extra trains to be computed in like manner. The longest run on current time card (except local) on the division to govern.

3d. Local Freight Conductors on Chicago division will be paid $85.00 per month, or upon that basis for such portion of the month as they may work. Local Freight Conductors on Cairo division that run daily will be paid $95.00 per month. Should Local Freight Conductors on Cairo division run four days per week, they will be paid $85.00 per month. Local Freight Conductors on other divisions will receive an increase of $5.00 per month, or upon that basis for such portion of the month as they may work. They will be paid 29 cents per hour for all detentions over two hours. When delayed over two hours, the first two hours will be included. Road overtime to be computed from current time table of respective divisions.

4th. Conductors running suburban trains between Cincinnati, Harrison and Aurora will receive $85.00 per month.

5th. Branch Conductors running out of Greensburg to receive $70.00 per month. Conductors doubling between Seneca and Sheldon to receive $80.00 per month. Conductors doubling between Kankakee and Seneca to receive $75.00 per month. Conductors running connection trains between Lawrenceburg Junction and Aurora to receive $70.00 per month.

6th. Conductors running circus, work, wreck,

7th. or picnic trains will be allowed constructive mileage of 150 miles per day. Wreck or work trains working six hours or less to receive 100 miles; over six hours 150 miles.

8th. Conductors deadheading on company's business are to be paid actual time at the agreed rate per mile allowed for their branch of service. Full time to be allowed for light trains.

9th. Conductors attending court as witnesses, or attending to other business, when such duties are performed at the company's request, will be paid at the rate of compensation they would have received had they been in regular service, and actual expenses.

10th. When a Conductor is called for a run and the train is annulled, he shall receive the agreed rate per hour while on duty (see article 2d and 3d) and shall stand first out.

11th. Crews that have been on duty for 20 consecutive hours should have eight hours' rest before going on duty again, unless they go voluntarily.

12th. When crews are marked for any run, or are ordered by an officer in authority to be ready at a given time, and not released, if delayed over one hour, they are to be paid at the agreed rate for their services (see 2d and 3d article) from the time they were first marked or ordered to go out; except that no time will be allowed should train arrive at terminal, having made schedule time; such schedule time to be computed from the time Conductor was ordered out.

13th. If a Conductor is taken off his run for any cause, he shall be granted a full investigation, hearing and decision within five days, at which time he shall have the right to have another Conductor of his own selection to appear and speak for him, and shall have the right to appeal from the decision of a local to the general officers of the road. If exonerated he shall receive pay for lost time.

14th. Freight Conductors will, whenever practicable, be assigned to divisions and run first in first out in the service to which they were assigned. The right to regular runs and promotion will be governed by merit, ability and seniority. Other things being equal, the Conductor who serves the longest on any division of the road will have the preference of runs on such division.

15th. Conductors will not be expected to take charge of light engines in connection with their trains.

16th. Callers will be furnished to call Conductors living within a radius of one mile of the Yard Master's office, at all freight terminals;

E. A. PECK,

General Supt.

APPROVED:

W. M. GREENE,

General Manager.

Memorandum of Agreement Between the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Freight Conductors on the Main Stem First Division and Knoxville Division.

1st. Through freight conductors shall be paid as follows: between Louisville and Bowling Green, on fast freights $3.00 per trip, and on slow freights $3.25 per trip. Knoxville Division: 1st Division $3.10 per trip, second Division $2.90 per trip: other runs on Knoxville Division to be figured on same basis as rates paid Knoxville Division second division conductors, according to the miles run.

2nd. Local freight conductors shall be paid $85.00 per month with three crews for first division Main Stem. Should they be called for other than their regular runs, they shall be paid according to the run they go out on.

3rd. Allowances for light runs with engine and caboose will be paid at the regular rate for freight train service.

4th. At Louisville and Bowling Green conductors are to be called in the same manner as engineers. Arrangements are to be made with the superintendent as to what calling is to be done at Rowland.

5th. After continuous service of sixteen hours or more, conductors shall be entitled to, and be allowed eight hours for rest before being called to go out, provided they so desire, and give notice thereof, except in case of washout, wreck or other emergencies.

6th. Where a conductor is taken from his run for an investigation for an alleged offense, he shall if found innocent, be paid for time lost, no punishment to be fixed without a thorough investigation, ordinarily said investigation to be held within five days from the date of removal from service.

7th. All crews required to dead-head will be allowed half pay.

8th. Work train conductors shall be paid $85 per month, and if called up at night for extra service they shall receive extra pay for such time.

9th. When a train arrives at a division terminal after having consumed in making the trip more than two hours in excess of the time allowed for such train by its schedule, conductors shall be allowed delayed time at the rate of thirty cents per hour for each hour or fractional part thereof in excess of such two hours. The schedule of extra trains shall, for the purpose of computing delayed time, be based on the average time of slow freight trains between same points.

10th. Conductors on Louisville division will receive the same rates on wrecking trains as will be paid the L. C. & L. division conductors, that is conductors on wrecking trains will receive 35 cents per hour, for actual working time and 3 cents per mile for running mileage.

This agreement to take effect August 1st, 1890. Louisville, Ky. July 14th, 1890.

To all Divisions:

BROTHERS:—St. Louis Division No. 3 will hold a union meeting at their hall, corner Sixth and Walnut streets, Sunday, Aug. 31, 1890, at 10:00 A. M., and we hope that every division of the Order will be represented.

Questions of vital importance to our Order will be brought forward and discussed, and believing that an interchange of ideas and opinions will be of mutual benefit to all, we ask all divisions of the Order to send one or more delegates, and have them come to us thoroughly posted in regard to the wishes of their respective divisions. An invitation has been extended to our Grand Officers, and we have been assured that they will be present.

W. F. LEWIS, S. & T.

St. Nicholas has a charming frontispiece for August. It is an illustration by Birch to the serial story "Lady Jane," and shows the former dancing-master, who has become a greengrocer, recalling his triumphs in teaching the pretty heroine the elaborate steps in vogue during his youth. The story itself is delightful. Some of the summery features are "the White Mountain Coaching Parade" of decorated tally-hos in competition for prizes, described in a sketchy way by Hellen Marshall North; "A lesson of the Sea," by W. J. Henderson, a simple bit of strong descriptive writing; "A Remarkable Boat Race," wherein Walter Camp describes the Atlantic-Yale race and its sensational feature—the leaping from the boat of Yale's stroke after he had broken his oar; "The Sea Princess," a pretty picture described in musical verse by the artist, Miss Katharine Pyle; "Cupid and Crab," an odd little fancy of the sea shore, daintily illustrated by Albertine Wheelan Randall; "The Audacious Kitten," one of Oliver Herford's jests with pen and pencil.

The serials are continued effectively, and the African and Base-ball papers are of the usual interest and value.

Besides the features mentioned, there is an account of Miss Olof Krarer, the first native of East Greenland who has visited civilization. The sketch is illustrated by two photographs, showing Miss Krarer in native and in civilized costume.

The little ones will welcome "Fableland Stories" by John H. Jewett, the author of the Bunny Stories, and will enjoy the numerous jingles and pictures which always make St. Nicholas seem brimming over with richness—and they will also be interested in following the fortunes of the Brownies in the yacht race.

The contents are well varied, strong, and as usual, of a high order of merit.

It is because "The Anglomaniacs" presents a novel aspect of New-York life with uncommon pith and wit that the third part, in the August number of The Century, will be probably that portion of the magazine to which most readers will first turn. They will find a crisis approaching in the devotion to Miss Lilly Floyd-Curtis, of Lord Melrose, and look rather keenly for a solution in the concluding installment, in September. In the new chapter of Mrs. Barr's striking novel, "Friend Oliva," the heroine sets sail for America with her father, who goes in search of religious freedom and converts. The short story of the number, "The Emancipation of Joseph Peloubet," by John Elliott Curran, introduces a Frenchman who turns his back in disgust on the Second Empire, starts a newspaper in New York which advocates emancipation of the slaves, and collapses, and who then returns to his trade of baking, until the breaking out of the war, when he enlists, and his ideals are realized and his life is sacrificed.

Few readers will reach the end of the second paper by Dr. T. H. Mann on his experiences as "A Yankee in Andersonville," without being profoundly touched by the pathos of his helpless journey to his home in Boston. The realistic pictures, made from photographs, add to the interest of the narrative of life in the prison-pens at Andersonville and Florence. Another article bearing briefly on the history of the war, is Miss S. E. Blakewell's statement in "Open Letters" of "The Case of Miss Carroll," whose claims for services to the Union are still unconsidered by Congress.

In the tenth part of "The Autobiography of Joseph Jefferson," the comedian writes most entertainingly of John Brougham, Edwin Adams, Charles Fechter, George Holland, and of other favorites who have not long been absent from the stage. Another illustrated feature of the number that is pervaded by an artist's personality, is the fifth installment of John La Fargé's "Letters from Japan." There is also a decided literary quality in Mrs. Amelia Gere Mason's fourth paper on "The women of the French Salons," which treats more particularly of the salons of the Eighteenth Century.

John Muir, who writes too seldom in these days; contributes an important paper on "The Treasures of the Yosemite." The article is richly illustrated and there are maps to indicate the boundaries of the proposed enlargement of the Yosemite Park by the creation of a new national park to preserve the sources of the waters that are such an indispensable feature of the old park. Mr. Muir, who is recognized as qualified to give a weighty opinion in the matter, urges the attention of the public to the preservation of the Yosemite.

Other illustrated features of the number are W. J. Stillman's paper on the "Italian Old Masters," Sandro Botticelli, with three full-page engravings by Cole; an entertaining account, by Gustave Kobbe, of "The Perils and Romance of Whaling;" and the second part of Harriet W. Preston's "Provençal Pilgrimage," illustrated by Pennell.

President Eliot, of Harvard, contributes "The Forgotten Millions," a study of the common American mode of life, as typified by the permanent native population of Mt. Desert. In "Topics of the Time" there is a discussion of the "Distaste for Solitude," of "The New School of Explorers," as exemplified by Stanley; and a brief comment on Mistral and his poetic country of "Provence." In "Open Letters" the Rev. Alfred J. P. McClure describes the work of the "Siberian Exile Petition Movement of Philadelphia," and Abbot Kinney replies to Major Powell's article in the April Century on the arid regions of the West.

Besides the poems in Bric-a-Brac, the number contains a charming poem on Shakespeare, by Thomas Bailey Aldrich, entitled "Guilielmus Rex," and poems by Harriet Prescott Spofford, Frank Dempster Sherman, Edith Thomas, Bliss Carman, and Charles G. D. Roberts.

Scribner's Magazine for August is a Fiction number containing six short stories, five of them illustrated. As is usual in this magazine, a number of entirely new writers are brought forward with stories of striking originality. They show great variety of scene and subject, and include a Newspaper story, a tale of Army life, a California story, a Maine woods story, and a New York City story, besides Mr. Bunner's capital burlesque modernization of Sterne's "Sentimental Journey." There is also the beginning of Part Second of the remarkable anonymous serial, "Jerry," which brings the hero to manhood and opens his adventurous career. In this new phase of the novel the writer exhibits virile characteristics which were not demanded in the pathetic description of Jerry's youth. The fiction idea of the number is further carried out in the very richly illustrated article by the Blashfields on "The Paris of the Three Musketeers." The veteran London publisher and close friend of Stanley, Mr. Edward Marston, tells, with striking illustrations made at Cairo, "How Stanley Wrote His Book." There are also poems by Thomas Bailey Aldrich and Andrew Lang.

Among the notable artists represented in the illustrations are J. H. Twachtman, C. D. Gibson, E. H. Blashfield, Kenyon Cox, Joseph Bell and Frank Fowler.

The pictures in the leading article are among the best that Mr. Blashfield has made, reproducing the costumes, architecture, furniture, etc., of the Paris of Louis XIII.'s time (1627-1660.) The text is a spirited and picturesque description of the life of that epoch. The whole article reconstructs the background of Dumas's great romance with pen and pencil, and makes very real a distant period and people.

Mr. Marston's "How Stanley Wrote His Book," is a near view of the great explorer at work at Cairo, giving an intimate idea of his personality as it appears to one of his oldest friends, Joseph Bell, the English artist, who prepared many of the sketches for Stanley's book at Cairo, under his personal direction, illustrates the article with a number of pictures of Stanley at work. Several pages of the explorer's note-books are reproduced in fac-simile.

H. C. Bunner contributes a continuation of Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," writing in the quaint manner of that author, "A Sentimental Annex," describing a visit to modern New York.

Richard Harding Davis, a son of Rebecca Harding Davis, has written a newspaper story, entitled, "Gallegher," in which, for the first time, the much-abused "office boy" gets his dues, and turns out a hero. C. D. Gibson illustrates this story, as well as the tale of a New York City house in mid-summer which, by a curious misunderstanding, becomes the boarding-place of "A New England Ingenue." This is the beginning of a very pretty comedy of errors, which develops into a love-story. The author is John Seymour Wood, a New York lawyer.

The "enlisted man" has not often appeared as the hero of American army stories, though Rudyard Kipling has recently made him famous in his sketches of Anglo-Indian life, "Sergeant Gore," by Leroy Armstrong is, however, a very truthful sketch of life at a Western army post as it turns around the love affair of an enlisted man and the Colonel's Spanish-American nurse-girl. It is illustrated by W. L. Metcalf.

Miss Annie Eliot (whose "From Four to Six" in the last Fiction number of Scribner's will be recalled) writes the story of a summer flirtation in the Maine woods, with a woman of fashion and a country minister as the chief figures. The story is called "Decline and Fall," and is illustrated by Frank Fowler.

The beautiful Indian baskets of California, which have become the craze of collectors, furnish the motive of Grace Elroy Channing's romantic story of "The Basket of Anita."

Mr. Aldrich contributes a dramatic poem, "The Sisters' Tragedy," one of his most finished productions, for which Keuyon Cox has drawn head and tail pieces.

There are other poems by Andrew Lang, G. Melville Upton (illustrated by Twachtman,) and Emily Dickinson.

"The Point of View" discusses "The Tyranny of Things," "An Obsolete Distinction," and "The Passing of a Week."

A New Magazine.

The Polytechnic is the name of a new magazine to be published in Chicago, the initial number of which will be issued next month. Like the London magazine of that name it will be the organ of a Polytechnic Institute, which in this case has been lately started in Chicago, and will be modelled after the famous London institute of similar name, an interesting account of which was given in the "Century" for June. The first number will be largely descriptive of the work of the Institute, especially its Trade Schools, a peculiar feature of which is that students may earn their expenses while in attendance, and can learn almost any trade. As this promises to solve the vexed apprenticeship question, all Master Associations are warm supporters of the movement. An article on the new Evening Medical College of Chicago is also included in this number. The ladies will be interested in the description of the Cooking, Millinery and Dressmaking schools of the Chicago Polytechnic Institute. Published at the S. E. Corner Madison Street and Fifth Ave., Chicago, Ill. Sample copy, 10 cents.

The Grip Sack, published in the interest of the "commercial tourist," is chock full of readable matter.

If a "new dress" complete is any indication of prosperity, the Switchmen's Journal is prosperous for its last issue is printed from new type throughout, and is a credit to the association which publishes it.

Among the welcome visitors for August, is the Railroad Trainmen's Journal, and we can assure Brother Rogers that his kindly words and extremely mild criticism is appreciated, as well as the feeling generally evinced by officers and members of the B. of R. T. If the spirit evinced by the management of this publication since the last convention of the B. of R. T. was more general, it would be far better for all who have to do with train service.

Promptly as usual The B. of L. E. Journal comes to hand, and needs no words of praise from so much younger a craft on the journalistic sea. By the way, "its none of our funeral," but isn't the word "Journal" a little "frequent" in the nomenclature of railway publications? Wouldn't "The Switchman," "The Engineer," "The Fireman," or "The Locomotive Fireman," and "The Railway Trainman," be an improvement on the present titles?

Our good friend Debs, is still somewhat "vitriolic," and continues in the August number of the Firemen's Journal, to consign the Order to an untimely grave. We are sorry to disappoint Mr. Debs by declining to give up the ghost, and sincerely hope that he will feel better now that he has relieved his mind of a "weary weight of woe." The insinuation that THE CONDUCTOR dare not criticise Mr. Corbin until he retired from the presidency of the Reading has no force, from the fact, that a prior number of THE CONDUCTOR sharply criticised the newly promoted assistant general superintendent, and if Mr. Debs were disposed to be fairly honest, and is at all conversant with facts, he would make no such charge against THE CONDUCTOR with its present temporary editor. We had intended to quote his articles, but space prevents in this number. We may give them hereafter.

Hypnotism—mesmerism—by whichever name you choose to call it—is a subject of special interest to everybody at present, and everyone would be pleased to have ocular demonstration of some of the wonderful phenomena produced by this weird art or science. Opportunities, however, are few; but those curious to learn the modus operandi may do so by reading the description of "A Hypnotic Seance," illustrated with pictures taken from life, published in Demorest's Family Magazine for September. It is by thus giving special attention to timely topics, keeping "in touch" with the sentiments and new ideas of the day, that this ideal magazine has achieved its well deserved popularity.

Another timely paper is "On a Millionaire's Steam Yacht," the text and the fine illustrations giving a vivid idea of Jay Gould's "Atalanta," the floating palace in which he and his guests enjoy "life on the ocean wave." Every one cannot be a millionaire and own a steam-yacht, but one can read about it and imagine how it would seem.

Then read "Wings, Songs; and Stings;" and if you do not decide that the topic is timely, and feel a new interest in the mosquito, we are egregiously mistaken. The story matter is fully up to its usual high standard, every one who has "a sweet tooth" will be interested in "A Box of Candy," the housekeeper will be specially pleased with "A Normandy Kitchen," every one of "our girls" should read "Girl Bachelors vs Husband-Hunters," and the children will be delighted with the kindergarten amusements and the story of "A Dutch Doll." We have not space to enumerate all the other attractions; but there are nearly two hundred fine illustrations, and a lovely water-color that every one will appreciate for its artistic effect and truthfulness to nature. How all this is done for 20 cents a number, $2 a year, is a problem. Published by W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 15 East 14th St., New York:

WRIGHT:—In Buffalo June 7th, 1890, Mrs. Francis C., wife of Alonzo M. Wright, aged 47 years.

Brother Wright has the sincere sympathy of many friends in this affliction which shadows a once cheerful and happy home.

At a regular meeting of Palestine Division No. 77, Order of Railway Conductors, held June 22, 1890, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Supreme Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to remove from our midst our late Brother, W. C. Mangum, of the International & Great Northern Railway; and,

WHEREAS, The intimate relations long held by our deceased Brother with the members of this Division, render it proper that we should place on record our appreciation of his services as a brother and his merits as a man; therefore, be it, Resolved, That while we bow with humble submission to the will of the Most High, we do not less mourn for our Brother, who has been called from his labors to rest.

Resolved, That in the violent death of Brother Mangum, this Division loses a Brother who was always active and zealous in his work; as a Brother ever ready to succor the needy and distressed of the fraternity, prompt to advance the interests of the Order, devoted to its welfare and prosperity; one who was wise in council and fearless in action; an honest and upright man, whose virtues endeared him not only to his Brothers of the Order, but to all of his fellow citizens.

Resolved, That this Division tenders its heartfelt sympathy to the family and relatives of our deceased Brother, and hope that in their sorrow they may find comfort in Him who doeth all things well.

Resolved, That these resolutions be entered upon the minutes of this Division and a copy sent to the family of our deceased Brother, and also published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

At the regular meeting of Division 101, Order of Railway Conductors, which met July 20, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It was the will of the Almighty Ruler of the universe to remove from our midst Grover C., the infant son of our beloved Brother, Thos. Lawlor.

Resolved, That our heartfelt sympathy be extended to the family of our esteemed Brother in their irreparable loss, and that a copy of the resolutions be sent to the family of our Brother, and a copy sent to the RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

PINE BLUFF, Ark., June 29, 1890.

At a regular meeting of Cotton Belt Division No. 251, June 29, 1890, the following resolutions were adopted in memory of our worthy Brother, L. Cody, a member of this Division, No. 5251:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to permit death to enter the circle of Division 251, and remove from our midst our worthy and beloved Brother, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in his death we feel as brothers and members of the Order of Railway Conductors, that we have met with a loss that can never be repaired. Our Brother had endeared himself to us by his strict adherence to the principles of our Order, by the faithful discharge of his duties, by his pleasant and cheerful manner, and his kindness and sympathy in distress and sorrow. Though his death was sudden, we may hope that his is perfect rest. We shall miss him in our division room, as he always met with us whenever it was possible to do so. We shall meet him no more on earth, but we may hope to meet him in the presence of the Most High who doeth all things well.

Our beloved Brother had been afflicted for some time with rheumatism, but still continued in the discharge of his duties until quite recently, when he was compelled to go to Hot Springs for treatment, and while there it became necessary to perform an operation on him, from which he never rallied, and died June 16, 1890.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for thirty days, and that these resolutions be put upon the records of our division. That they be published in each of our city papers and a copy be sent to Miss Sarah McNalley, of Brinkly, and published in THE CONDUCTOR, and that a vote of thanks be tendered the ladies of Pine Bluff and Brinkley for their kindness in decorating the grave of our worthy Brother with flowers.

IN MEMORY OF OUR DEAR BROTHER L. CODY,

Dearest brother, thou hast left us,
Ere we breathe our last farewell;
Who can tell the grief and sorrow
That within our bosoms dwell?
We must give thee up, dear brother,
Whom we loved so long and well,
It is passed, the hopes are blighted,
O, our loved one, fare thee well.

HALL OF DIVISION NO. 40. }
ST. PAUL, Aug. 3, 1890. }

On July 24th, Brother P. T. Waters, of Division No. 40, after an illness of nearly two years, was called to that home on high where sin and sorrow are no more. On the 28th of August, 1888, Brother Waters had a paralytic stroke from which he never recovered. Unfortunately he forfeited his membership in the Benefit Department on the 31st day of July of the same year. He leaves a wife and one child without any means of support.

At a meeting of the above, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, Almighty God, in his infinite wisdom has taken unto himself our highly esteemed Brother, it is befitting for us, as members of St. Paul Division No. 40, O. R. C., that we should place on record our appreciation of him as a Brother; Therefore, be it Resolved, That in the death of Bro. P. T. Waters Division No. 40 loses a noble member and his wife a kind husband and his child a loving father.

Resolved, That while words of sympathy can not assuage the deep sorrow placed upon the bereaved family, we can only refer her to Him who doeth all things well, as her only comfort in this, her sad hour of affliction.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the bereaved family under seal of the division; also to THE CONDUCTOR for publication and to be spread on the minutes of this meeting.

At a regular meeting held by R. B. Hawkins Division, No. 114, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, God in his manifest wisdom has taken from us by death our beloved Brother, D. H. Phillips, who died in Pittsburgh, June 22, 1890, about 3 p. m.

Resolved, That in the death of husband and father, D. H. Phillips, the deep and heartfelt sympathy of this division goes out to the bereaved family.

Resolved, That in the death of our beloved Brother, R. B. Hawkins Division loses a faithful member.

Resolved, That while words of sympathy cannot assuage the deep sorrows placed upon the bereaved family, we can only refer them to Him who doeth all things well, as their only comfort in this, their sad hour of affliction.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for thirty days, in memory of him who has crossed the dark valley and entered into the brighter realms of an eternal home.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the grief stricken family under seal of the Division, also to THE CONDUCTOR for publication, and be entered on the minutes of the meeting.

"TOTE" FAIR.

We regret to note that publications and speakers who profess love for the Order and its members, continue to misrepresent it by asserting that the Grand Division or any member of it apologized for any action. Any one who reads the article on page 543 of the August 1st CONDUCTOR and thereafter repeats the assertion that the Grand Division apologized evinces a peculiar kind of friendship for the Order and its members. The whole trouble is, that with a few, nothing but the demise of the Order will be satisfactory, although they profess great regret that anything of the kind should be possible. The regret can be saved, for the Order and its members, while wishing to be as accommodating as is consistent with their own interests, will hardly give up the ghost merely to permit a few self-appointed prophets to say "I told you so."

It has been asserted that the Order of Railway Conductors did not make of itself a strike organization by its action at Rochester and it is true, at the same time, it placed itself in a position where its members can protect themselves when occasion requires, and any one who has the most superficial acquaintance with the membership, will hardly assert honestly and sincerely, that he thinks they will not do so if the necessity occurs. Geo. W. Howard, who in 1887 was train master on the Monon, knows that the members of the Order protected themselves on that road, and he also knows that they counseled with and acted upon the advice of the writer, although at that time it was the opinion of many that we were "tied up." Mr. Howard also knows though he may hesitate to admit it, under present circumstances, that it will not be entirely safe for any railway officer to treat members of the Order as some have been treated in the past, and he also knows that notwithstanding the fact that no member of the Order is obliged to obey any Grand Officer or Committee no matter what they may direct, that no member or number of members of the Order will fail to receive the full support of the Order in any just cause even if it should result in the extremity of a strike. He also knows that the Order is now on a protective basis, and that it can and does fully protect its members, although he may not, under the circumstances feel like testifying to it publicly. We believe with Mr. Howard that there should be but one organization of conductors in America, and we further believe that there will be but one, and that that one will be the Order of Railway Conductors. It is hardly possible that an association with the present standing and number of members the Order has, will yield its title or organization, particularly when we consider the fact that it is now growing more rapidly than at any time during its history, hardly a division in the entire Order reporting less than five accessions during July, while many of them report fifteen to twenty and among those that report the larger number is a New England Division, and there are also petitions for charters from something over twenty points, and organization of Divisions is only delayed by the requirement of our laws requiring some Division to pass upon each petition. With the B. of R. C. as with the B. of L. E., we believe the majority of the members of the Order are in favor of adopting squarely, fairly and without reservation the platform of the B. of L. E. as announced in the June Journal of letting "bygones be bygones" and we believe there will be no disposition on the part of any, to continue any of the feeling engendered by what we still believe to have been illegal and unfair action on the part of some of those who left the Order to join the B. of R. C.; we still think, as we did at the time, that Mr. Howard did wrong when he endeavored to retain his membership in the Order while deavoring to injure it, but we can again call that gentleman to witness that there has never been any personal animosity between us, and we believe the members of the Order generally, are ready to clasp hands "across the bloody chasm" with the B. of R. C. as well as the B. of L. E.; as ready to forgive any injury, real or fancied as they are to be forgiven; are willing to make mutual concessions to the end that the highest benefit for all may be reached, and simply request that we be not misrepresented. We will submit to much in the interest of peace and harmony but the golden rule cannot be made the invariable rule of our conduct if misrepresentations and jealous attacks continue.

THE IRON MOUNTAIN SETTLEMENT.

All differences between the Iron Mountain railroad trainmen at Little Rock have been satisfactorily adjusted, and the strike which threatened to stop the wages of employes on the one hand and reduce the earnings of the company on the other, is now a thing of the past, and harmonious relations have been restored. Word was received here yesterday by the railroad company fully confirming the Republic's dispatch, and adding that the terms of settlement have been reduced to writing and signed by all parties interested.

The Republic does not propose to fan the ashes of an expiring fire into fresh flames, but now that the danger seems to have been passed, will say that the Iron Mountain railroad company officials and a large number of its employes have been treading on very ticklish ground during the past month. On one or two occasions the ill-advised publication of half truths and so called "news" by "enterprising" afternoon papers have very nearly overturned the efforts which Mr. S. H. H. Clark, of the Missouri Pacific, and Mr. S. E. Wilkinson, the Grand Master of the Order of Railway Trainmen, and Mr. E. E. Clark, Grand Chief of the Order of Railway Conductors, were making on behalf of the several interests they represent, to find a basis of settlement which would be fair and just to all concerned.

On the occasion of Mr. E. E. Clark's first visit to St. Louis at the head of a committee of his Order he was seen by a Republic reporter, and at that time the situation was certainly serious enough to warrant alarm for the welfare of the corporation and employes alike. General Superintendent Ricker first took the matter up with the men, and afterwards Mr. S. H. H. Clark met committees of both orders and on several days patiently discussed with them the points at issue. The discharge of Trainmaster Flanders, which was demanded by the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, was vigorously opposed by the Order of Railway Conductors, who supported that official heartily. The demand for his discharge was finally withdrawn on condition that the complaints against that official should be investigated by Division Superintendent W. T. Kelly and the proper action taken to secure what the men called "a square deal" in the future. Mr. Ricker had gone to Louisiana on business connected with the extension from Dermott to Monroe, but Mr. Kelley's arbitration having proved satisfactory to the men, Mr. Ricker came back to Little Rock, and with the two chiefs of the orders mentioned, took up the matters in dispute in detail, and, after several days of hard work, the whole affair has been satisfactorily settled. Many a strike has been precipitated for reasons of far less moment than those involved in this instance, a little hot blood on the part of the men, a little impatience or superciliousness on the side of the railroad manager, and then—the fireworks. No earnings for the road and commerce at a standstill. No wages for the men and wives and children without food. As the matter stands now a serious strike has been averted by the diplomacy and square dealing of three men, representing three separate interests—S. H. H. Clark, E. E. Clark and S. E. Wilkinson. They have all done good and sensible service for the interests they represent, and in doing so have not only established a precedent which will be of use to them hereafter, but they have helped to educate each other along the lines of common-sense and mutual help.

As will be seen by the above from the St. Louis Republic, the difficulties on the Iron Mountain have all been satisfactorily settled. The Republic's account is a fair statement and the interests of the Order and its members were fully protected by Brother Clark, while his action was so eminently fair that the B. of R. T., at a meeting held in Little Rock, passed resolutions expressing their satisfaction and thanking him for his aid and influence in the settlement. The Globe-Democrat, in speaking of the settlement, expresses the opinion that Brother Clark and Grand Master Wilkinson of the B. of R. T. rendered valuable service to the railroad company and in this opinion we fully concur, and we further believe that in nearly every instance officers of these and other railway organizations, render more valuable service to railway companies than any are aware.

THE S. M. A. A. AND SYSTEM FEDERATION.

The Switchmen's Journal in its August issue, says that articles of federation that have been adopted on several lines of railway, are "frauds," that the S. M. A. A. were not represented at any of these meetings, neither were the firemen, conductors or trainmen." The Journal is certainly somewhat hasty in its assertion and is itself, badly mistaken. The "articles" are not frauds and while we have no doubt as to its statement that the S. M. A. A. was not represented, having reference to the association as a whole, switchmen, firemen, conductors and trainmen were represented at most if not all of the meetings referred to and the switchmen claimed to represent, not the entire association, but lodges of the S. M. A. A. In some cases they have signed articles of federation as representatives of lodges of the association, and in others they have said that owing to the action of the "Supreme Council" they did not wish to be a party to any system federation so far as to sign such articles, but that any such agreement made by other associations would have their full and hearty support in case of any difficulty. Members of the B. of L. F. and B. of R. T. have also become members of these system federations in some places and in others have taken the same stand as the switchmen. Whether the above members have exceeded their authority or violated any of their laws in so doing, we do not profess to know, and the Switchmen's Journal is undoubtedly entirely competent to decide as to that, but it should not denounce agreements made in good faith, as frauds, nor should it assert that members of the Switchmen's and other associations have not attended these meetings when it is a fact readily susceptible of proof that they have attended them. If members of the S. M. A. A. have exceeded their authority or violated law, it may appropriately call attention to the fact, if fact it be, that they have no authority to enter into any such agreement and that membership in the Supreme Council prohibits them from joining hands with any others and the proper officers of the association may and probably will take the necessary steps to compel those who are parties to these agreements, to withdraw therefrom. It would seem to us, however, that any such regulations or laws, are somewhat tyrannical and that any action which in effect says to members of the organizations in railway service, "we will have our own way or nothing," cannot conduce to the best interests and welfare of all. We fully recognize the propriety of the organizations which are now members of the Supreme Council, doing all that is within their power to advance the interests of the plan and believe to be the best and that their action in adopting a resolution reciting that "it shall be the duty of the chief executives of the several organizations represented in this council, to oppose the so-called local or system federation, * * * * and that all propositions relating to any other plan of federation be discountenanced by the members of all the organizations embraced in the Supreme Council," is all right and proper and probably any other organizations so situated would do the same, but we find nothing in this resolution, nor in any of the published proceedings that prevents any lodge or division or any members of any of the organizations which form the Supreme Council from also becoming a party to any other federation or agreement if they choose to disregard the advisory action of the Council, and we are of the opinion that unless there was some action that was not made public, or unless these organizations have some laws that are not known to other than their own members, the vice-president of the Supreme Council exceeds his authority when he tells members of those organizations that they cannot become parties to any agreement or alliance outside of the Supreme Council. That he can advise them not to do so and that it is his duty to so advise as an officer of that Council, there is no question, but in our opinion the Supreme Council invades the rights of the members and assumes a vulnerable position when it assumes to say "we are right, all others wrong," and that those others "must come to our platform or we won't play."

The Journal cites the C., R. I. & P., N. Y., C. & H. R. and Wis. Cent. as instances of the "frauds." As to the first two we have no knowledge. The meetings of the Wis. Cent. employees have been attended by members not only of the S. M. A. A., B. of L. F. and B. of R. T., but by members of the B. of R. C. as well, and while we do not know that any of these organizations have yet signed the agreement, we do know that all were practically unanimous in favor of it and would have signed it if they have not already done so, unless prevented by the influence or authority of their grand officers.

If, as is stated, the members of the B. of L. E. have decided by the vote lately taken by them, not to become a member of the Supreme Council and the Council prevents its members from making any alliance or agreement of any kind with organizations that are not members of that Council, it would seem to us that it must result in an alliance offensive and defensive between the B. of L. E. and the Order, and that the officers of the Supreme Council have practically, if not technically, violated their own tenets by entering into a system federation with the B. of L. E. and the Order as they have in several instances. So far as our observation and information goes, three-fourths of the members of the B. of L. E. are in favor of system federation as against any general federation, and we believe even a larger proportion of the membership of the Order favor the system idea and we do not believe the Supreme Council will be able to coerce either of these organizations, and that it will make but few converts if it attempts to do it on the plan of nonintercourse with organizations outside of its ranks.

AN IMPORTANT CORRECTION,

Mr. Wilkinson, Grand Master of the B. of R. T. has been quite generally quoted as having said that he "was glad to be able to state that the Order of the Railway Conductors had gone down to its death a few days ago." This language was said to have been used at a union meeting held in Indianapolis during the latter part of May and referred to the action of the Grand Division in repealing the "strike clause." As this was a union meeting of the members of all organizations of trainmen and members of the Order had been invited to be present, it seemed to us impossible that any person occupying the position held by Mr. Wilkinson could be so grossly discourteous and that there must be some error in quoting him. Nothing was said of the matter in THE CONDUCTOR for this reason, except a note of the fact that one of our cotemporaries quoted it with seeming satisfaction. It now transpires that we were correct in supposing the quotation an error. Mr. Wilkinson has corrected the misstatement and says that what he did say was that in referring to the former "strike clause" and the anti strike policy of the Order, that he "was glad to be able to say that the policy had gone down to its death." We are very glad to give Mr. Wilkinson the benefit of this correction, and hope that all members who have heard the error will learn of the correction. The position of the Order is now in opposition to causeless strikes, but the mal-administration of its affairs has been corrected and an imaginary bond that caused members in many instances to believe that they were prevented from asserting their rights or manhood has been repealed, and in that sense the former policy of the Order has "gone down to its death." Hereafter, if it becomes necessary to protect themselves from imposition, members will undoubtedly strike and they will receive the active support of the grand officers in any such instance.

This fact was demonstrated by the presentation to him, on the eve of his departure from Needles, of an elegant gold watch and chain, from not only all classes of employees under him, but from the citizens of Needles as well, and when he left "the whole town assembled at the depot to bid him farewell," as we learn from a press dispatch.

THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR for June 15th appears under the editorial charge of W. P. Daniels pending the recovery of Editor Belknap, whose recent affliction unfortunately totally disabled him. The issue by Mr. Daniels is a bright, interesting number, with nine pages of editorial matter of more than ordinary merit. There is a snap and sparkle that indicates a courageous spirit, backed up by excellent use of good, vigorous English. Courage, even to aggressiveness, is the most valuable characteristic that can be found in the editor of a class journal; for unless he possesses it, the very life will soon be trampled out of him and the publication he directs will amount to nothing.—Railroad Trainmen's Journal.

We are requested by Bro. Platt of Division 50 to note that his resignation of the office of secretary is not caused by any discontent with the Order, but simply and only because his run has been so changed that he cannot attend meetings. Being one of the "66" he feared that without explanation, he might be suspected of disloyalty by members who may note the change in officers. In this connection, we wish also to say that the officers of 180 who have withdrawn, did not do so through any dissatisfaction with the Order, but simply because they occupy positions which they think makes it inconsistent for them to retain their membership, and THE CONDUCTOR honors them for the manly and honorable action. Should they ever be again employed as conductors, their first move would be to renew membership in the Order.

One of the most popular engineers on the West Shore has passed to his rest from the toil and tribulation of this world. "Jerry" Foley was lately called by the Master, and his remains laid to rest by loving hands at St. Mary, Pa., where his childhood's days were spent.

The remains were taken in charge by a delegation of railroad men, who first cared for the dead and then looked after the comforts of the living remaining with them as a self-constituted committee until the sad rites were concluded.

The rosewood casket containing the dead engineer was on Thursday morning conveyed to the church of the Sacred Heart, where the funeral services were to be held. On the lid of the casket were numerous floral tributes, including one formed from lilies of the valley with the white dove surmounting the design—given by members of the Order of Railway Conductors on the West Shore Road. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers sent another piece, and a third was from the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen.

HARD LUCK.

FLAGGING.

Another feature which often involves the "stop" signal to the enginemen of any discomfort, and occasionally suffering and train that may be following. This rule is danger, is "going back to flag." When a sometimes disregarded in clear weather a train is unexpectedly stopped upon the road, the brakeman at the rear end must on straight lines, and is even evaded by lazy or unfaithful brakemen where the immediately take his red flag or lantern neglect is positively dangerous, but still many a faithful man has to go out and and go back a half a mile or more to give stand for a long time in a severe snow storm, or risk his life in walking several miles to a station. The record of individual perils and heroisms in the New York blizzard of March, 1888, are paralleled, or at least repeated, on a slightly milder scale by brakemen every winter. Even in the blizzard country of the northwest, where a half hour's exposure is often fatal. The system of train running is such that the stopping of a train at an unexpected place involves danger of collision if the brakeman does not at once go back and stay back. A "tail end" brakemen has various anxieties, which cannot be detailed here. Often there is a possibility that the advancing engineer will not see his red lantern. One brakeman in New Brunswick several years ago ignominiously deserted his post, leaving his train to look out for itself, because of a visit from a huge bear whose residence was in the woods near the point on the railroad where the brakeman was keeping his lonely night vigil.—From the American Railway, Chas. The Union Picnic.

The union picnic of the conductors and brakemen at Lake George Park Saturday afternoon brought together in a pleasant and social way at least a thousand people. It was a goodly company to look upon. The mature man with his wife and prettily dressed children were there and the young man and his coy, best girl, were not absent. The picturesque lake and hills were alive with people. The steamer conveyed the arrivals to the picnic grounds at the lower end of the lake. The scene there was an animated one. Some were swinging; some taking ariel trips; some dancing in the hall, the Ideal Orchestra furnishing music; some playing croquet on the new grounds; some racing and some playing base ball. Moving here and there and the recipients of pleasant greetings were Mr. S. E. Wilkinson, Grand Master of the B. of R. T., and Mr. Daniels, of Cedar Rapids, the Grand Secretary and Treasurer of the O. R. C. The various committees did everything in their power to make their numerous guests comfortable.

The boat race of the afternoon was between Harry Turner and C. Kenstler, representing the brakemen, and Conductors Boydston and Marshall. The brakemen won the race. The ball game was between chosen up nines and furnished ample amusement for the spectators.

The speaking occurred about 5 o'clock in the dining hall. Conductor Marshall called the audience to order and introduced Grand Master Wilkinson of the Trainmen's Brotherhood. Mr. Wilkinson began by saying that he had been placed in many awkward positions since he had been identified with the trainmen, but this was one of the most peculiar. It gave him great pleasure to meet on such mutual terms the members of the Order of Railway Conductors. Both organizations are learning the value of mutual concessions. Gatherings like this are the first steps that bring the societies nearer to one another. He hoped that there would be more of such pleasant occasions. He was of the opinion that all are realizing that the time is at hand when it is necessary that they should enter into closer relations. He had had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Clark, Grand Chief Conductor, and of working harmoniously with him during the past three months to secure the adjustment of difficulties. He had also met Mr. Daniels, the Conductors' Grand Secretary, and had read his articles desiring a closer union with the brakemen. At the conclusion of Mr. Wilkinson's remarks there were cheers. He then introduced Mr. Daniels, who spoke easily and fluently. He said that while he had practiced public speaking for many years of his life, that most of his addresses were made on depot platforms, and that he was not accustomed to speak at an occasion like this one. It gratified him to see railroad employes given the support and co-operation of the citizens. The general public is becoming the sincere and earnest friend of the railroad man. He believed that during the past the public has not appreciated the benefits arising from railroad organization, but it is now beginning to see that these organizations are accomplishing marked good. The traveling public has been quick to see these benefits. On the part of some of the organizations there was in the past a feeling that they should remain independent, and that they did not need the aid of sister societies. Now there are indications of the loyal support of all societies to a cause when justice requires concerted action. Mr. Daniels in closing thanked all cordially and kindly for the hearty reception accorded him and expressed pleasure in having been present.

After the speaking the crowd gathered on the hillside next the embankment to see the foot races. Chief of these was the race between the fat brakeman and the fat conductor. As a representative of the brakemen, who should step forward gallantly but Grand Master Wilkinson. Conductor Charlie Blum was pitted against him. When Charlie learned who his competitor was he began to make excuses. He urged that he had cut his finger. He wanted to run up hill. Mr. Wilkinson was all eagerness. Both men will tip the scales at 250. They finally took their positions on the level embankment. They were to run 50 yards. The signal given, away they went. The Grand Master was soon ahead and made remarkable speed for so heavy a person. He was presently two or three rods in advance of Charlie Blum, who was puffing and struggling for dear life. Suddenly the Grand Master fell flat with a thud that was heard over the hill. The crowd roared with laughter. Charlie put on steam and made a great spurt. With the agility of a cat the Grand Master regained his feet, and by quick sprinting beat his bulky antagonist amidst the applause of the amused spectators.

After this came a series of other races. Conductor Cass won one, beating R. Swain. Mr. Safford came in ahead of Mr. Weidenhammer. It was rare sport for the crowd, because one or the other of the runners was sure to fall down.

Supper was had under the trees about 6 o'clock. The hills were crowded with the happy groups, discussing the contents of the well-filled baskets. Later the Ideals struck up their irresistible dance music, and the numbers went merrily on. The boats were filled and the steamboat crowded. It was a late hour before the fun closed.—Galesburg Register.

When a man lacks honor, principle and decency, the only thing left for him to feed on is notoriety, and this a long-suffering public must give him. It is like the aroma of a polecat—there is no defense against it.—Cedar Rapids Republican.

After Mr. Webb has dispensed with the Knights and the Brotherhood, will he proceed to rid the Central-Hudson road of all Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias and United Workmen.—Albany Times.

Romance.

It is surprising how rapidly some of our brainy young men develop in the railroad field. Ten or twelve years ago I was out on the frontier of Nebraska, and riding one day in the caboose of a freight train I asked some questions of the conductor, who seemed to be a bright young man. Three years ago I again visited Nebraska, and found that young man, Holcomb by name, the general manager of all the Burlington lines in Nebraska, with probably 1,500 miles of road under his control.

A few months ago a boyish looking man appeared before the house committee on railways to give evidence in the matter of the proposed law requiring railway companies to equip their freight cars with automatic couplings. He was introduced to the committee as Mr. Brown, of Burlington, and as he began to talk a member of the committee whispered to one of his colleagues: "Don't believe we shall get much information out of that young fellow. He's a brakeman, isn't he?" But in a few minutes it was seen that the young man not only knew what he was talking about, but that he had a singularly clear and direct manner of saying what he had to say. A little later and he had the close attention of every man in the room, for it was apparent that he was a master of the science of railroading in all its branches. For an hour he talked and answered questions, and gave the committee a keener insight into the wonderful development the mechanics of railway have experienced than any of them had ever had before.

"You seem to know your trade pretty well," remarked Congressman Hill, of Illinois, after the final hearing was over; "have we not met before?"

"I think we have," replied Mr. Brown; it was thirteen years ago, in your town of Joliet. There had been an accident on the gravel train on which I was working, and you came up and asked me some questions."

"You were then working on a gravel train?"

"Yes, sir."

"And what are you doing now?"

Mr. Brown modestly handed the congressman his card. It read: "Superintendent of C., B. & Q. lines in Iowa." Since that day this young man, who went through all the stages of railroading, and who can make a coupling, run a locomotive, build a bridge or manage 10,000 employes, has been promoted to the control of the Kansas City lines of the great Burlington system.

The above from the Washington correspondence of the Des Moines Leader is a very pretty little story, but like many other pretty stories is largely imaginative. Mr. Holcomb never ran a train in Nebraska or anywhere else. Before the war he was employed as brakeman and fireman on the bit of road between what was then Sagetown, now Gladstone and Oquawka; the road was originally known as the Peoria & Oquawka, but for twenty years or more it has been a part of the "Q." Early in the seventies, Mr. Holcomb was employed on the Chicago & Iowa as station agent and remained there in various positions until he went to the O. R. & N., being general superintendent when he left. He has occupied an official position for the past seventeen years at least.

W. C. Brown not only never "worked on a gravel train," but never was employed on any road that runs through Joliet, and "thirteen years ago" was employed as a train dispatcher on the Iowa division of the "Q" with office at Burlington. "Walter Wellman" should either confine himself to political characters or else post himself a little better on the history of railroad men. About the only statement in the whole matter that is correct, is that Mr. Brown is now general manager of the "St. Jo" and Hannibal. Mr. Holcomb is not now and never has been general manager of the Union Pacific, but is its first vice-president.

Thanks.

At a meeting of the various committees who had charge of the recent railroad celebration at Phoenix Hill, the following report was unanimously adopted:

"At no time in the history of the railway fraternities of the Falls Cities have we felt so proud of our orders as at the present; and, feeling under lasting obligations to our many friends for the liberal patronage bestowed upon us at our First Annual Picnic and Union Meeting, held at Phoenix Hill, on July 31 and August 1, 1890, it would illy become the Brotherhood of Railway men if we did not recognize in some befitting manner the courtesies and favors shown us by the good people of Louisville and elsewhere; the undersigned committee, therefore, in joint session, acting for the different railway fraternities, return their thanks as follows:

"To the public press, in particular, for their impartial manner in giving publicity to our entertainment, and for the accuracy of their reports; to E. L. Cronk, chairman of ceremonies, whose services were of incalculable benefit to us in many ways; to Henry S. Tyler, for his address of welcome in behalf of the city; to Lieut-Gov. Bryan, who welcomed the delegates on the part of the state; to W. D. Robinson, of Washington, Ind., the founder and First Grand Chief officer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

"To Hon. Henry Watterson, Col. Bennett, H. Young, John W. Headley, G. W. Howard, of Terre Haute, Ind., Assistant Chief Organizer of the Brotherhood of Conductors, for two addresses on federation; to E. E. Clark, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Grand Chief Conductor Order of Railway Conductors; to the Hon. L. S. Coffin, of Fort Dodge, Iowa, for his two addresses and the extreme warm interest he takes in the prosperity and welfare of railway operators; to Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, for his addresses on federation.

"To Eichorn's Orchestra, to Prof. Knoll and Marie McNeill, the celebrated cornetists; to Walter Mathews, who portrayed scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet'; to Will S. Hays, Kentucky's famous song-writer, who delighted the people with selections of his own production.

"To Mr. W. N. Haldeman in particular, are we under obligations for the many extreme courtesies shown us through the columns of the Courier-Journal and Times, and for his otherwise valuable services.

"To Col. McNutt, manager of Phoenix Hill Park, do we return our thanks for the kind manner in which we were treated and the genuine hospitality shown our people.

The New York Central.

The discharge of some 50 or 60 trainmen on the New York Central road for the alleged reason that they were Knights of Labor led to a strike August 8 of all the trainmen running between New York City and Albany who were members of that order. The officials were asked to reinstate the discharged men, but they refused because they said they had been removed for good and sufficient cause, and a cipher message which was an order to strike was flashed over the wires at 7 p. m., Aug. 8. Every Knight of Labor employed on the Hudson River division between New York and Albany obeyed the order and immediately quit work. The statements disagree as to the number of men who left their posts. The leaders of the strike say 3,000, but the officers of the road place the number at 900. The strikers included firemen, conductors, brakemen, switchmen, etc., and both freight and passenger traffic were completely suspended for the time. On the following day the strike extended as far west as Buffalo, the Knights of Labor at various points between Albany and Buffalo quitting work. Vice President Webb made the following statement Aug. 9, as to the cause of the strike, etc.:

During the past three weeks some 55 or 60 employes of the New York Central road, consisting of trainmen, one or two engineers, yardmen, switchmen, were discharged by their respective superintendents; in each case for good and sufficient cause. The organization known as the Knights of Labor made repeated demands through their committee that these men be reinstated in the service of the company. This demand was on each occasion peremptorily refused. On Friday, Aug. 8, J. J. Holland, of the international board, called on me, requesting to be allowed to intercede and discuss the trouble between the company and its men. I declined to grant him an interview for this purpose. He thereupon retired, and at 7 o'clock in the evening of that day the Knights of Labor on the New York Central railroad were called out, the result being that the yards at the Grand Central station, Forty-second street, at Sixtieth street and North river and West Albany were tied up. Something like 800 or 1,000 men went out. There are in all about 22,000 men employed by the company. During the night the tunnel and the yard at Grand Central station were cleared. On Saturday sevenths of the scheduled trains on the Hudson River and Harlem divisions were taken out of the depot. Nearly as large a percentage of the trains scheduled to come south were brought into the depot. Probably 200 men who had gone out returned to service during the day and the company secured the service of probably 200 new hands, the result being that we propose tomorrow to handle the passenger trains from the Grand Central station in accordance with their printed schedules. The freight, such as live stock and perishable freight, has during the day been turned over to the West Shore railroad and handled on their tracks. No attempt has been made by the New York Central to move the heavy and bulky freight. If that were undertaken it might develop that a larger number of men than the above given had gone out on a strike. All the passenger business delivered to us at Buffalo from connecting roads, such as the Lake Shore, Michigan Central and the "Big Four," more especially the excursion business of the Grand Army of the Republic bound for Boston, has during the day been handled by the New York Central."

The delay to passenger traffic was of brief duration, and on Saturday morning, the 9th inst., passenger trains were moved without interference, the company issuing the following official announcement:

"The passenger department of the New York Central and Hudson River railroad announces the complete resumption of through and local service, both on the main line and the Harlem division. Through trains for the west will leave the Grand Central station as usual."

The following was issued on the same day by the general superintendent:

"Notice to all employes. It is the intention of this company to fight the present strike to the end. All employes who remain loyal to the company will receive all necessary protection. Those who do not go to work will be considered as having left the service and their places will be filled as rapidly as possible.

By order of the third vice president.

THEODORE VOORHEES,
General Superintendent "

In regard to this order vice president Webb is thus quoted:

"The company means to fight it out if it takes a month, and I estimate that the loss for that time wouldn't be over $100,- ooo to the company. That would be getting off cheap. We certainly can't afford to give in at any cost, and the battle gained is worth millions of dollars both to the Central and all the roads in the country. We don't expect, however, that any other companies outside our own system will help us fight the Knights. I know that a great many will surmise that we have gone into this too hastily, but I assure you that I have the full backing of the Messrs. Vanderbilt and all the other interests. They feel as I do, that we have got to win at any cost."

The strikers were orderly on Saturday and the leaders made the announcement that no violence would be tolerated. At 6 p. m. Saturday part of the switchmen employed in the West Shore yards at Weehawken quit work, because they said the road was receiving freight from the New York Central. This strike was of little consequence and did not spread farther than the Weehawken yards. Passenger trains suffered only slight delays on Saturday, and some freight trains were run. It was stated on Saturday that 200 of the strikers had returned to work. The company had many applications for places and some new men were engaged.

Sunday was a quiet day and passenger trains were sent out from New York on time, but incoming trains were somewhat delayed on account of the trouble at various points along the line. Over 200 men applied for work on Sunday, but only those who had had experience in railroad-ing were engaged. This class numbered about 50. John W. Hayes, secretary of the general executive board of the Knights of Labor, called upon Vice President Webb to try to induce him to submit the matter to arbitration, but Mr. Webb informed him that the company had nothing to arbitrate. It had discharged some 50 or 60 men for sufficient reason and they would not be taken back under any consideration. As the strikers demanded the reinstatement of these men it was useless to talk about arbitration. In defining his position Mr. Webb said:

"The position of the company is this: We will select our own men and we do not propose that they be designated by Knights of Labor or its committees. When men are dismissed we shall get rid of the inefficient, the most vicious and those least in accord with our interests. When promotions are to be made we will not be bound by the seniority rules promulgated by the Knights of Labor. A due consideration will always be given to length of service, but the first and most important rule will be the qualifications of the men for the place. If our men have grievances, the proper officers will be willing to grant hearings and see that consideration is given, but we will not allow outsiders to intervene or interfere between the employer and employee. For this reason alone I refused to allow Mr. Holland to discuss any differences alleged to exist between the company and its men, and not for the reason, as stated, that we objected to our employes being members of labor organizations. These are my views and I am satisfied that they are concurred in and approved by every official of the company, by its board of directors, and by the gentlemen who are the most interested in its securities. The strike is ill advised, cannot succeed, and we will put it down and maintain the position we have taken."

Another attempt was made on Monday to have Mr Webb consent to arbitration, but it was unsuccessful. Seventy-five new switchmen were put to work in the yards at New York Monday morning and two freight trains were promptly made up and started on their way north. The company stated on Monday that it had all the switchmen in could use at that time and that there were plenty of applications for places. So far as the company was concerned the officials stated that the strike was over, and they asserted that all trains would be running regularly in a few days. There were 138 trains on Monday's schedule at the Grand Central depot in New York and 120 of these left the depot almost on schedule time.

It was stated that the firemen would join the strikers Monday evening, but they failed to do so.

Things ran very smoothly on Tuesday, and vice president Webb in summing up the situation said:

"We may expect for the next two weeks spasmodic outbreaks and "goings-on" at different points. This is what they all tell me. A lot of disgruntled men will be around who will be out of the service. I suppose they will make a little trouble here and there at isolated points and we have got to be prepared for it. We will keep up the Pinkerton guards as long as it thought necessary.

'Some of the strikers are being taken back?'

'Yes.'

'But you insist that no new man shall be displaced to make room for a returning striker.'

'Most decidedly I do. If men come and show that they have been intimidated into going out, and so on, I will leave their re-employment to the discretion of the superintendents. All I ask is the enforcement of the rule about the new men. Not one new man will be displaced. These new men are good men. They are not green men. There are from 150 to 200 of them and we got them from Chicago, St. Louis, Pittsburg and all around. They were men who have been in the service there and who were laid off for different causes, and we pay better prices than any of these western roads.,'

No trouble was experienced in handling freight on Tuesday, and a number of freight trains were sent out from New York. An Albany dispatch stated that the strike was obviously at an end there and that freight trains were run without interference.

All trains, both passenger and freight, were run without interruption on Wednesday, and it is stated that the officials refused to reinstate a number of strikers who made application for work. Local assembly, No. 1,705 of the Knights of Labor, located at Dover Plains, surrendered its charter and the members made application to Superintendent Worcester of the Harlem division to be taken back unconditionally. Four old conductors and 12 brakemen were re-employed and the other members of the local assembly were directed to report at the Grand Central depot in New York.

It was subsequently denied that the above assembly had surrendered its charter.

The switchmen and brakemen on the Delaware & Hudson at Albany quit work Wednesday evening because they claimed to have knowledge that the road was attempting to handle New York Central freight, but they subsequently learned that they had been misinformed, and part of them returned to work Thursday evening and the rest Friday morning.

The New York Central continued to improve its condition on Wednesday and Thursday, and aside from a blockade in the yards at West Albany, little evidence of the strike remains. The blockade is being rapidly raised, however, and on Thursday thirteen freight trains were sent out.

A report that the firemen on the road would come to the aid of the strikers is emphatically denied by Grand Master Sargent, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, who says he has no idea of calling the firemen out.

Numerous applications for reinstatement by the strikers have caused Vice President Webb to give out the following statement:

"A large number of the men who have been out on a strike are making application at different points on the road for reinstatement, the application being coupled with assurances of loyalty and promises of good behavior in the future. The question being continually asked as to what the company's position with regard to those men I will say as follows: On careful inquiry I find that many of them are good employes, having been in times past faithful servants of the company, and many of them have been led into this difficulty through intimidation, misrepresentation or ignorance. I appreciate their situation fully, especially in those cases where the men have wives and children who are dependent upon them for support. I have given the matter very careful consideration and have instructed our officials as follows: That each case shall be considered separately and on its merits, and where the party has been a satisfactory and faithful employe and where the superintendent or official immediately in charge is satisfied or can satisfy the general superintendent that the man has left under the extenuating circumstances above outlined, that then if a vacancy exists he shall be taken on as a new employe; that where no vacancy exists the name of the applicant will be taken, and as the business increases during the autumn and winter, and when additional help is needed his application will receive all due consideration. It is, however, distinctly understood, and the rule will be rigidly enforced, that the new men who have recently and on account of this strike come into our service shall not be displaced unless their services are unsatisfactory, and that those men who were formerly in the company's employ and left in this strike, but who under the above instructions may be reinstated, will enter the service not as old men reinstated, but as entirely new employes; and hereafter with regard to promotion, discharges, assignments of work, etc., they will be regarded as new men. Those men who have been turbulent, inimical and detrimental to this company and its interests will not under any consideration be taken back into the service."

The above is a synopsis of the press reports of the strike, but are manifestly in the interest of the company.

Personal letters state that up to August 17, but two freight trains had been moved, one of the two being manned by the strikers, which would indicate that the claims made by the officers of the company that all freight is being handled without difficulty are untrue. A conference has been held between Messrs. Sargent, Howard, Sweeny and Wilkinson of the Supreme Council, and the executive board of the K. of L., and a meeting of the Supreme Council has been called, the result of which will be given in our editorial columns. The present outlook is, that unless joined by the railway organizations, the Knights will be defeated, though the condition at present is far from being as represented by officers of the company.

Mr. Webb admits that he has Mr. Powderly and other leaders shadowed by detectives, and Mr. Powderly has made the following statement to the public:

"For sometime the management of the New York Central & Hudson River railroad has been discharging employes who have been active in labor affairs. It happens that all of those who have been dismissed are members of the order of the Knights of Labor and have at one time or another been officers of the order or have served on committees which waited on officials with a view to presenting grievances. These discharges became so frequent and were so clearly evidence of a settled purpose on the part of the company to disrupt and destroy the organization of the Knights of Labor upon the Central system, that the executive board of District Assembly 246, in which the Knights of Labor upon the system are enrolled, found it necessary to call a special meeting to consider the situation. In the meantime the general executive board, being apprised of the condition of affairs, sent one of its members, J. J. Holland, to New York, with instructions to use all possible efforts to bring about an amicable adjustment of the difficulty. On his arrival in New York, Holland, after consultation with representatives of the District Assembly, in the course of which he obtained full knowledge of the trouble from the standpoint of the men, waited upon Vice-President Webb. Holland stated to Webb that he had called upon him to endeavor to adjust the unpleasantness existing between the company and its Knights of Labor employes. Webb denied that there was any trouble existing between the company and its employes. Holland told him he as a member of the general executive board of the Knights of Labor had come at the request of the men, made through the organization to which they belonged, District Assembly 246. Webb brusquely declared that he would not discuss the matter with anyone not an employe of the company and closed the interview. Finding all efforts to effect a peaceable settlement of their grievances impossible, and being convinced that it was only a question of time and the convenience of the company when they would one and all be discharged unless they forfeited their manhood and abandoned their privileges as citizens of a free country by renouncing their right to join their fellows in an organization calculated to protect their just rights without intruding upon those of others, the district board had no other alternative but to order a strike, which they did. The public is already acquainted with the details of the affair and repetition is scarcely necessary. Most earnest and sincere efforts of the general officers to secure a hearing for the discharged men were unavailing. Correspondence which passed between the general master workman and Webb has been published.

Wednesday morning, August 20, John Devlin, of the general executive board, and myself waited on Toucey, general superintendent, and endeavored to have the matter arbitrated or investigated. Toucey was emphatic in his refusal. On the afternoon of that day Webb was visited by the same gentlemen and he reiterated what Toucey had said in the morning. It was suggested to him that disinterested parties hear and determine. It was also suggested that during the investigation the strike be declared off, and the investigation be proceeded with. This was refused. The following proposition was then made by me: "Webb, could you not sit down with me in the presence of the men who are discharged and allow me to question them in your presence, so that I might know the facts in the case and be better able to arrive at a decision?" This Webb emphatically refused.

Devlin said: "Do I understand you to assume that the public and employes have no rights that you are bound to consider, and do you look upon the matter simply as though the railroads were your own property? Because if you take that view of it there is no need of our saying anything farther."

Webb hesitated and took refuge in silence. The public may have formed erroneous impressions of the positions of the knights in the controversy. We do not pretend to dictate to the company that it shall not discharge employes, but in all fairness the discharged men should be told why they are dismissed.

During the session of the last State legislature the Knights of Labor of New York were in favor of the passage of the weekly pay bill. A convention of the Knights, representing the employes of the New York Central were faced in the legislative room at Albany by the attorneys of the railways and brow beaten, questioned and terrorized. Some members of that committee who were at the time employed by the New York Central were discharged without cause or rather without any given cause. There exists not a shadow of doubt in my mind that it was the committee that these men singled out for endeavoring to secure the passage of the above law."

Don't Knock Down Fares.

RAILROAD CONDUCTORS WHO ARE BELIEVED
BY THEIR EMPLOYERS TO BE HONEST
STILL, SAFEGUARDS ARE EMPLOYED.

Nine times out of ten when a man gives money to a railroad conductor with whom he is not acquainted he thinks that he is simply adding his mite to that official's wealth.

Why the conductor's honesty and morality should be considered inferior to that of other men it is hard to conceive, unless it is in the consideration of the apparent ease with which the company could be robbed and never be the wiser. Perhaps it is due to the fact that nine men out of ten object on general principles to paying railroad fares, and deem them so exorbitant that the company ought to be robbed by some one. Again it may be laid to the fact that a conductor is occasionally convicted of robbery.

It is interesting to note what the most interested parties, the railroad officials themselves, think of the subject.

"Railroad officials are all pessimists on the subjects of their employes' honesty," said an Illinois Central official. "I do not say all conductors steal, but I really believe that we are being robbed of an enormous amount every day.

While I do not desire to create a bad impression about our conductors in the minds of the public, I must say that we have to keep a strict watch over them. Even then we are robbed. We must never waver in our watchfulness, but make our men feel that we have always an eye upon them. They do not know when they take up a cash fare whether there is a "spotter" in the car or not. They do not even know whether or not the passenger who pays the cash fare is in our employ. It is that more than all else that serves to keep the conductors honest. They simply do not know who is watching them."

"But your road has devices to protect it in some manner from conductor's dishonesty."

"Yes, we have a scheme. It registers the amount that has been received, but there is a cog in the wheel that renders it useless. The conductor may not use it. He may walk down the aisle taking fares, and if he does not use these registering slips we cannot tell how much he takes. He is instructed to use one of these printed slips every time he takes up a cash fare. He also has to account for each slip. That is all well and good, but who is to compel him to use these slips if he doesn't choose to? His own fear that some passenger may report him is one safeguard."

"Does your road employ 'spotters,' as they are called, to find out conductors who are 'knocking down?'"

"No, we don't do much of that business, for the simple reason that the detective will naturally seek to make out a case against a conductor in order to retain his own position. Our best safeguard is the public watchfulness and the conductor's fears of being reported. Yet we are being robbed every day."

A call at the office of the general passenger agent of the Chicago & Northwestern road, brought out the fact that there is a road whose officers believe their conductors to be honest.

"I think we have a very honest set of men," said the assistant passenger agent.

"In fact, we have conductors on whom I would be willing to stake anything that they wouldn't knock down a cent."

"I don't believe in this cry that passenger conductors are veritable highway robbers and would steal the train if they had a chance. It is true that some of them do steal, but they are sure to be detected sooner or later, and then they lose their places. The conductors we have are, as a rule, honest men whom we have long known and trusted. We wouldn't keep a man whom we thought was stealing from us. Of course, as is the case with all classes of men, there are conductors who have to be closely watched, and we have taken precautionary measures against just such fellows.

"This road has a check book that contains printed and numbered checks. When a passenger pays a cash fare the conductor gives one of these checks. They are numbered, and a corresponding number remains on the stub of the conductor's book. We are likely to call for that book any time, and it must tally with his reports. You have no idea how many people take the trouble to mail us their half of the check. The conductor does not know how many have been sent in, and consequently does not lie in his report.

"Even with this device conductors could steal, if they were so minded, until detected. They doubtless have many schemes, and do some sharp work, but detection is sure to follow eventually.

"The Chicago & Northwestern road does not make a practice of sending out 'spotters.' You can't always believe them. We have, however, some trusty men who occasionally do a little special work for us in this line, but that is all."

"Then you do not believe that you are being systematically robbed every day?"

"No, I don't. On the contrary, I believe we have conductors who are serving us honestly. Not all are, I admit, but then there are dishonest men everywhere."

General Manager St. John of the Rock Island road has a very good opinion of his conductors. So modest is Mr. St. John that an Evening News reporter could not induce the official to admit that anything like "knocking down" was ever indulged in.

"Having had considerable experience in railroading," remarked Mr. St. John, "I have learned that the great feature of successful work is to place confidence in your subordinates. Our conductors are good, honest, hardworking fellows. While I don't claim that they are angels, I will say that they are up to the average. Until June 1, of this year, we depended upon the honor of these gentlemen. Since that date, however, the company has requested every conductor to furnish bonds in the sum of $1,000 to insure us against frauds. There are many fidelity companies that make this business a specialty."

"Does the company employ 'spotters' to watch the conductors?"

"Not that I am aware of. We have no 'knocking down', hence there is no need of spotters."

"Has your road any special means of checking up the conductors?"

"Nothing but the regular ticket and cash fare reports, which are made for each trip and sent to the ticket auditor and treasurer every day."

"Has the scheme of employing collectors to attend to fares, while the conductor does nothing but run his train, any special advantage in the way of preventing fraud?"

"It is foolishness. I don't believe in it. A conductor is a man, and a man is a man, no matter whether he runs a train or merely collects fares."

The Burlington officials were found to be even more reticent. After fifteen minutes of diplomatic work the interrogator obtained an interview with the representative of Acting General Manager, G. B. Harris. The following is the amount of information that individual volunteered the newspaper man: "Don't have bonded conductors. Have none but honest men. They don't have to be watched, and I never heard of any 'knocking down.' We don't use cash fare checks, and I don't think any body in this building would say that we employ spotters even if the trains were loaded with them."

The St. Paul road dealt the Order of Railway Conductors a body-blow two years ago, when several of the best known conductors were dismissed for alleged shortages. "Insult was added to the injury," as one conductor has repeatedly stated, when the bonded collectors, mostly young fellows from the offices, were put on all trains to collect fares. Mr. Conductor had thus to content himself with carrying his lantern upon his arm as he walked through the train. Once in a while he could relieve the monotony by scolding his engineer. The collectors are frowned upon, but they are on the St. Paul to-day. Many conductors have not collected a fare since the advent of the collector. An official said at the time of the change: "The old conductors have got the 'rake-off' down so fine that we must break the combine at any cost. If we fail, then I guess it will be time to close up the shop."

Henry H. Peebles, who has been the superintendent's confidential aid-de-camp for years, said the road was free from dishonest ticket collectors. "There are but few runs on which the train conductors collect fares. We do not employ spotters to watch the collectors. Their daily reports act as so many checks. We can always tell when a 'run' is bringing in its accustomed amount of business. I think the days of 'rake-offs' and stealing are over."—Chicago News.

The Festive Burglar.

HOW I LAY AWAKE FOR TWO MONTHS TO HEAD HIM OFF.

What would you do if you heard a burglar in the house?

To me that question has occurred a million times, more or less. The first time it flashed athwart my brain I bought a bulldog revolver and a Spanish dirk. On second thought I added a baseball bat to the equipment, and then for six nights I lay awake planning how I would softly draw on some indispensable garments, seize the revolver in one hand, the club in the other and capture or otherwise dispose of the burglar. The dirk I would carry in my teeth—I saw no other way.

Strange to say, this armament and my well laid plans did not bring the peace of mind I had expected. The more I prowled around the more agitated I became. Twice I shot at the cat and once I gave the hall hat rack a wicked stab, taking it for a burglar.

Then my wife suggested in the interests of my health that I put up a burglar alarm and not get up until I had to. The blamed thing went off every time anybody came in or went out, day or night, and I got so tired of the eternal clatter that I cut the wires and substituted some unpatented devices of my own.

I hung a flatiron on the key of the front door so that it would fall into a dishpan placed underneath; two pokers stood against the back door, arranged so as to fall at the slightest touch, and at various out of the way places I placed baskets filled with cheap crockery, tinware and other articles, so that the burglar would step into or against them—at least I fervently hoped he would—and give me warning of his advent.

But these schemes didn't work much better than the burglar alarm. Everybody I knew got in the habit of calling on me after I had retired, and, of course, I would forget the flatiron and send it clattering into the dishpan, necessitating awkward explanations, and once it clattered down on my toes. The cat made a regular practice of knocking down the burglar warning pokers, and if my wife stepped into the alarm baskets once she did twenty times.

The result was that I fell back on my revolver, club and dirk. I also bought me a watchman's rattle. Two nights later I heard a noise, and looking out of the window saw a man trying my front door. I fired at him, and the answering howl informed me that I had missed my neighbor Brindle, who had been sitting up with a sick man—or, at least he said he had. Three nights later I sprang the rattle on my wife's aunt, who came from Poughkeepsie on a late train, and she was so angry that she wouldn't stay more than three weeks and my wife thinks we are cut out of her will. Things went on in this fashion for a month or two, until the neighbors began to circulate a petition asking me to move out of the ward.

So I told my wife that when I heard a burglar in the house the plan of campaign would be as follows: I would first raise the window sash, making as much noise as possible in doing so, and spring the rattle with a firm and determined hand. I would then give the burglar two minutes to leave the house. If he still remained among the silverware I would advance into the upper hall, beat the stair railing fiercely with a baseball bat and fire three or four shots down stairs. I was firmly convinced that no burglar could withstand such a determined attack, and after it had been clearly outlined beyond the possibility of a mistake I slept peacefully for the first time in three months.

The very next morning, when I went down stairs to light the fire, I encountered a bare sideboard, and further search revealed the fact that my domicile had been ransacked from cellar to garret. It was a clean scoop.

Well there was one consolation. Now I know what I would do if a burglar broke into my house.

I'd sleep.—New York World.

Pinkerton Comment.

Pinkertonism is growing into an unmitigated evil. The regular civil authorities are or ought to be strong enough to preserve order without the interference of mercenary troops hired by corporations.—Des Moines News.

* *

The first serious trouble as an outcome of the strike in New York Central railway took place yesterday afternoon, when a freight train passed through the yards in charge of Pinkerton men, who were stoned by roughs and hoodlums. The Pinkertons drew their revolvers and fired into the crowd wounding several persons, among them a woman. Later in the day another freight train came through the yards, and the Pinkerton men again fired into the crowd, wounding a boy. The police arrested the man, but his comrades rescued the prisoner and severely beat the officer.

Such proceedings will never win. The railroad made a serious mistake the day it engaged Bob Pinkerton to protect its property. The police authorities of New York are ample to keep the peace, and if any additional help was needed there is the state militia, and not far away are stationed several companies of regulars. The Pinkerton forces are made up of slugs and bums, picked up in Buffalo, Philadelphia and other cities, and given firemen's instructions to use them in self-defense. They are without a leader, and it is surprising to note that their riot was not more disastrous. It is a dangerous piece of business to place firearms in hands of undrilled men and turn them out to quell a disturbance.—Sioux City Times.

The work of the Pinkerton detectives at Albany, N. Y., was about what might be expected. Their simple presence there, in the employ of the railroad company, was calculated to stir up dangerous excitement. The strike of the employees of the New York Central road alone brought things to fever heat. To bring in bands of mercenaries at such a time, even on pretext of guarding the railroad property, could not fail to produce irritation and collision.

Such was the result. The so-called detectives, being assaulted or seriously menaced, proved to be too ready with the revolver. There was bloodshed and riot, and as always is the case, innocent men and even women and children were wounded and shot down in the streets. This serves only to raise the excitement to a still higher and more dangerous pitch. If the railroad company was justified in bringing in armed mercenaries in the first place, then it would be warranted in adding to the horde, and thus virtually appealing to force and fighting out a war on its own account.

But the method of government by Pinkerton mercenaries is not justifiable in the first instance. It is bad policy for the railroad company. It is bad because it inevitably leads to just such a situation as exists at Albany. The local sentiment is always powerful against the employment of outside force, even under the sanction of law. The men who can be enlisted for such work are invariably just such men as ought not to be permitted to engage in it even if it were otherwise legitimate. This fact is well understood, and it is one of the causes behind the intense prejudice against the employment of outside mercenaries. Railroad companies ought to have the good sense to appreciate this fact.

The reliance of proprietors for protection must be in the ordinary agencies of the law. The plea that these are inadequate is a ready one, and it can be made plausible. It is, however, really an indictment against our laws and against our system of government. It is a plea that would as well justify lynch law. It is the plea of the anarchist on the one hand and of the dictator on the other.

There is no reason why a railroad company should not rely, just the same as anybody else, on the ordinary instrumentalities of the law. The property of railroad companies is no more sacred than that of other citizens, and they should not be permitted to recruit and employ armies of irresponsible mercenaries. The evil involved in the promiscuous employment of armed mercenaries is far greater than the evils that it is intended to remedy.

Some of the western states have passed laws forbidding the employment of such forces as have caused the trouble at Albany, and it is probably only a question of time when all the states will have to adopt a similar policy.—Sioux City Journal.

An Anti-Monopolist's Views.

In Albany Journal.

To The Editor of The Evening Journal:

I desire to congratulate you on the manly stand you have taken in The Evening Journal in favor of popular rights and against the narrow and selfish policy recently inaugurated by the present management of the New York Central railroad. The Webbs, the Clarks and the Voorheesses, who seem to have supplanted Mr. Depew and Mr. Toucey, act as if that great highway were their private property, to be controlled and run exclusively in their interests and regardless of the public good.

"If I order my cook," said one of my managers, "to build a fire in my kitchen with shavings and she disobeys me and builds it with kerosene, shall I not be justified in discharging her?" And with this method of reasoning he satisfied himself that the public highway—the Central, Hudson railroad—was like his kitchen—the employes to be ordered about and dismissed as he would dismiss his cook, without regard to the traveling public; without regard to the shippers; without regard to the state which chartered the road on condition that it should be operated for the benefit of the people as well as for the profit of the Vanderbilts and their connections.

Notwithstanding the fact that one of this family thought so little of the people that he consigned them to a very torrid place, there are many persons yet here who are old-fogyish enough to believe that the people of this state have, and ought to have, something to say about the management of the railroads of the state. The state has granted to these corporations most valuable rights, privileges and franchises. Railroads are made by law public highways, and when they took their charters they agreed to operate their roads for the public. They owe the public this duty, and the public, which has no interest in Mr. Webb's cook, has a great deal of interest in seeing to it that these corporations fulfil the object of their creation.

Nothing short of the act of God, the public enemy, or superior force should prevent the operation of these roads; and if the Central Railroad Company had a wholesome fear of justice it would have all its trains running within a day. Through such sources and objectionable methods, however, as it so well knows how to reach and utilize, it is able successfully to defy public opinion and break its agreements without fear of punishment.

I regret that in pursuing such a course corporations often have the support of judges and courts. For instance, last year, the Atlantic Avenue railroad of Brooklyn shut out all its men because they insisted on living up to the law which prescribed 10 hours labor for a day's work. Not a car was run on the road for a week. Thirty thousand people had to walk every day or seek other conveyances. The attorney-general brought an action against the company claiming that it had violated its charter, which required it to run cars in sufficient numbers to accommodate the public and as often as it advertised to run them which was at least every ten minutes, and although the law expressly provides that the existence of a corporation may be annulled when it offends against any of the provisions of its charter, or fails to exercise its powers, yet the general term of the second department held that charter was not forfeited because the road had not suspended its ordinary business for one year. If this be good law, and I question it very much, the sooner the Legislature takes the matter in hand the better, provided the members be not elected by the railroads and other corporations.

I make this proviso because I notice a tendency on the part of these bodies to send out its controlling influence in every direction. I fear that even the commission now in session to propose amendments to the constitution is not free from baneful corporate influences. The proposition to elect General Term judges, not from the several judicial districts, as now, but by a vote of the people of the whole state, will, if it becomes a part of the constitution, enable the political bosses who are connected closely with railroads, express companies and other corporate bodies, to name the candidates of both parties for judicial offices, and whichever side loses at the elections, the corporations will always win. Again, the proposition submitted to the commission to elect judges for a term of eight years, instead of fourteen, as now, is unannouncedly opposed by the corporation lawyers in the commission, while many who are friends of the people favor it. To adopt it would compel judges to give an account of their stewardship to the people at least every eight years, and if faithful, they would be rewarded by a second or third term. To adopt it would in a measure subject the judges, like other officials, to the will of the people—just what the corporations fear, and what they will oppose; in fact, life tenure is what they want.

Of course, corporations are entitled to equal and exact justice, but not to much more; and their exactions from the people and infringements upon the law will sooner or later react upon themselves, unfavorably. JOHN T. McDONOUGH.

The Central Railway Strike and Its Lesson.

General Master Workman Powderly and his associates of the Executive Committee of Knights of Labor are in New York, making an effort to adjust the differences between the New York Central Railway Company and the strikers. In behalf of the strikers it is proposed to invoke the Arbitration act of the State of New York. But it is said of this step that it is wholly unnecessary, as the strike is practically at an end, and there is nothing to arbitrate. If such be the case, the railroad company would have nothing to loose in submitting to arbitration by the official board constituted for the purpose of settling disputes between employers and employees. The facts, however, do not justify the cheerful assumptions on the part of the company. The reduction of the number of local passenger trains and the accumulations of freight along the lines of the road indicate that the trouble is by no means at an end.

There is no doubt that the railroad managers dismissed certain employees for the sole reason that they were prominent members of the organization of Knights of Labor. At least, no other definite ground has been given to the public for their dismissal; and this is the only motive assigned by the strikers for their movement. Here, then, is matter for arbitration.

If it be conceded that railroad companies, as well as other employers, have a right to dismiss employees without assigning reasons for their acts, it is just as certain that workingmen have an equal right to defend by a strike, or by any other legitimate means, the labor organizations to which they belong. In France these organizations, or "syndicates" as they are called in that country, are recognized to the extent of making it a misdemeanor to discharge a workingman for the sole reason that he is a member of one of them. Were this law in existence in New York there is no doubt that Third Vice-President, Webb, and other officials of the New York Central Railway Company could be indicted under it. While there are no such laws in this country, there is a public sentiment which is alive to the principles of equity underlying them. If railroad companies make war upon labor organizations by dismissing their members as such, and refuse to arbitrate the question thus raised, there is no present alternative for workingmen but to submit to the annihilation of their labor unions or strike.

But as strikes have for the most part proved not merely ineffective but disastrous to labor, and as there is no disposition to submit to the destruction of the unions, what, then, remains for the protection of workingmen against the aggressions of corporate power? The answer is, a more perfect organization. Had the employees of the Central Railway Company been thoroughly organized and perfectly harmonious this strike would never have taken place; for there would have been no occasion for it. Vice-President Webb, would never have risked a conflict with a compact and thoroughly organized body of workingmen upon the grounds assigned for the present strike. Nor would workingmen, when fully organized for self-defense, offend public opinion and injure themselves by obstructing railroad intercourses because of the dismissal of incompetent or unworthy associates.

While the right of the railroad company to dismiss its employees and the right of the Knights of Labor to defend their organization come into collision, a third right has assumed itself in this strike. There has been little attempt on the part of the strikers to terrorize by threats or by violence those workingmen who entered the service of the company in their places. The right of workingmen outside the regular organizations to dispose of their labor on their own terms has been firmly maintained. The fact that the railroad company has been able to defeat the strike by drawing on a large force of irregulars only emphasizes the necessity of a more perfect organization of workmen. The more thorough this organization of labor for its own protection, the less the danger of industrial warfare, destructive alike of the savings of both labor and capital. Hence, the public has quite as great an interest in the success of labor organizations as have the workmen themselves.—Philadelphia Record.

Conductor "Tom" Garrity.

W. Lee Stiles, of Packerton, is furnishing biographical sketches of well known railroaders to the Easton Sunday Call. His latest sketch has Lehigh Valley Railroad Conductor Thomas H. Garrity for a subject and is as follows: "Mr. Garrity was born at Hazleton, in 1849. At the age of 9 he was employed as slate picker and as driver boy in the mines of A. Pardee & Co. Later he was engaged on the Lehigh canal, running between Mauch Chunk and Philadelphia. These were the days when boating paid. Then he secured employment on the Hazleton division as coal train brakeman. Soon after he went on the Lehigh Valley Railroad in the same capacity. In '67 he went on the Camden and Amboy as baggagemaster, running between Jersey City and Perth Amboy. Shortly after he took a position as passenger brakeman on the Central Railroad, but was soon promoted to baggagemaster, running between Jersey City and Elizabeth. In 1874 he returned to the Lehigh Valley railroad, commencing at the foot again as brakeman on coal and freight, sometimes acting as extra freight conductor running between Sugar Notch and L. & B. Junction. He was extra baggage master during the Centennial, after which he was given a regular run on a local train between Wilkes-Barre and Pittston, of which the late C. E. Marsh was conductor. He served in this position eight years. In May, 1884, he was promoted to conductor. Mr. Garrity was married at Pittston in 1880. Two children bless the union—a boy and a girl—aged respectively seven and four years.

He resides at 58 Lincoln street, Wilkes-Barre. He is still quite a distance from the half century post. He has a happy disposition; is a trusted employe, a genial companion, popular among his companions, who one and all wish Tom the fullest measure of enjoyment through life.—Wilkes-Barre News Dealer.

The Conductors' Clam Bake.

The annual clam bake of Millard Division of this city, at Livingston Manor, yesterday, was one of the greatest successes in the history of the Conductors' organization. The weather was all that could be desired, and the attendance at the grove, both afternoon and evening, was very large. It is estimated that there were over 1,000 persons present during the day, and half of the number were from the city. In the evening, many persons who could not be present during the day went to the grove and spent a pleasant evening, in dancing and other enjoyments provided by the conductors.

In the afternoon there was a game of ball between the Asylums of this city and the Livingston Manor club. As might reasonably be expected, the Sullivan county boys were no match for the Asylum's crack team and the score at the end of the game was 17 to 2 in favor of the Middletown club.

There was good dancing music, and those who delight in tripping the light fantastic toe had ample opportunity for enjoyment.

The "bake" was a success. There was an abundance of clams, chickens, fish and green corn, and all who were at the grove had a good dinner if they had the money to pay for it.

Those who were present last evening from this city, say that they never spent a more delightful evening. They had as much enjoyment as could possibly be crowded into the few hours they spent at the grove. They arrived home in good season and are looking forward to the next year's Conductors' clam bake as the most important event of the coming year.—Exchange.

Mr. Depew Is Not In It.

Who'd thought the like! His "boys" to strike
While Chauncey's o'er the sea;
They'll not have heard an unkind word
From such a "boss" as he!
But now hearts burn and blood is hot
The master hand's fine tact's forgot,
Webb's "in it"—but Depew is not,
That all agree!

Pinkerton's men are out again,
They're "down on" strikes, they say;
Their clubs are rash, their motto's cash,
They're out for corporate pay;
"No arbitration," Webb declares,

"I know best of my own affairs;"
But every man this feeling shares—
That wasn't Chauncey's way."

Now, if Depew were in it and
Were on the scene to-day,
And were to wave that graceful hand
And ask to say his say,
The strikers' faces would be sure
To break out into smiles once more—
"A story?" Half the battle's o'er;
That's Chauncey's way!

Only a Brakeman Killed.

FOR THE CONDUCTOR.

Over the length of the shining track,
Flinging its clouds of vapor back,
Rumbled the engine heavy and black.

Leans from his window the engineer,
Watching to see if the track be clear,
Forward and backward, far and near.

And over the valleys, green and still,
The long clear whistle resounded shrill,
Echoing fainter from hill to hill.

While swift as an arrow, in its flight,
Through heat of summer, and winter's blight,
Flew the great engine, by day and night.

* * * * *
Suddenly, out on the shuddering air,
The whistle shrieked with a wild despair,
And the long train paused on the desert bare.

Men in the smoker, raised their eyes.
With a gesture of indolent surprise;
And questioning found but vague replies.

And back in the sleeper, with faces white,
The women peered through the morning light,
With strange, uncertain, and nameless fright.

And the drummer sauntered along the aisle,
With his graceful, air and alluring style,
And then returned with an easy smile;

"Its only a brakeman killed," he said.
Went under the wheels: was picked up dead
Train'll move in a minute," he said.

Just for an instant, a sigh of pain,
Rose to the lips of women and men;
Then, jest and laughter went on again.

What did it matter that just ahead,
With a cruel wound in his boyish head,
A fellow creature was lying dead?

What did it matter to anyone,
Under the light of that Autumn sun?
From a world of men, it was only one.

The earth grows richer, and commerce thrives
And what do we care for the brakemen's lives,
Or the grey-haired mothers, or weeping wives?

Who that runs in this breathless race,
For a handful of gold, a name, a place,
Can pause to look in a dead man's face?

If one would climb to a gilded throne,
The way, perchance, may be thickly strown
With workmen, mangled and overthrown:

What though their spirits were choice and brave
We will spare them enough to buy them a grave.
Is this not all they can ask, or crave?

The world has little but bitterness,
For him who cannot achieve success,
From its own false standard of sordidness.

But God looks on with a lidless eye,
Our Moloch-worshipping souls to try;
And the scales will be balanced, by and bye.

Escanaba, Mich

Brother C. F. Wadleigh is a member of Division 146, and from the following item which we find in the Gazette and Courier, published in Greenfield, Mass., seems to be at home in other vocations than running the train:

Our popular local conductor, C. F. Wadleigh is running a Monarch buffet parlor car from Springfield to Newport, Quebec and Boston. Mr. Wadleigh has proved himself one of our most reliable railway conductors, and is already gaining a reputation in this new field. We wish him the success he deserves.

Of all the good hotels in the west, none can excel the Bates, of Indianapolis and the Louisville of Louisville, and the way-farer who finds himself in either of the above places will make no mistake if he sojourns at the caravanseries named. We are indebted to both for special courtesies, but our members who know say that just such courtesies are extended to every guest, and that they are not considered special by those acquainted with the managements.

Now that the Order of Railway Conductors is in line with the other organizations and in touch and sympathy with progressive ideas, let the new era be hailed with genuine good will and the past be forgotten. The new executive represents the ideas that were never responsible for the troubles of the past, and there is no good reason why the Order as it now stands should not be looked upon as a true and useful one to organized labor.

Sleepy-Time.

ROCKABY, rockaby;

A little daisy, pink and sweet,
Half shut its leaves, oppressed with heat,
And that it might to slumber go
The Zephyrs rocked it to and fro;

Rockaby.

Rockaby, rockaby;

A rose-tree near the daisy grew,
And that the sun was hot it knew,
And dropped its branches low, to spread
A shadow for the daisy's head;

Rockaby.

Rockaby, rockaby;

An oriole, like a golden flame,
Down from his swinging place came,
And in a warble soft and long
He sang a pretty cradle song;

Rockaby.

Rockaby, rockaby;

An hour the daisy slept and dreamed,
And then uncurled its leaves and seemed
As pink and fresh as when it burst
From out the tiny bud at first;

Rockaby.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Of late I have been very much interested in the Ladies' Department, and wish to add my mite.

Nearly every house wife has at some time or another tried her hand at dyeing, and but very few have met with success. As "dyeing" is one of my few accomplishments (?) I will give my way. If a garment is to be colored, it is best, unless it is heavy goods, such as coats, cloaks, etc.; to rip it up. Be careful to pick out all threads and to wash well in strong suds, rinsing well. All grease spots must be taken out of the cloth. The next step is to weigh your goods, and determine the color to use. I always use Diamond Dyes as they are so much easier to use than any others. Each package is marked with the number of pounds of goods it will dye. Do not try to dye any larger quantity than it says, as just here lies the cause of many failures.

Tie the dye up loosely in cheese cloth place in a bowl, and pour hot or boiling water over it according to directions. The dish you dye in must be either new tin or some sort of earthen ware; a well-cleaned tin coal oil can or a stone crock, are good. If one dish is not large enough, use two or more, dividing the dye between them. If one part of a garment is put to boil in the dye, note how many minutes it boils, and boil each part the same length of time. This will insure all parts being the same shade. Do not dye a part of your goods and then put the remainder into the same dye, in the hope that both will be the same shade, for if you do you will be disappointed. It is well to let the dye dissolve over night, and before adding it to the water be careful to strain it through thin cloth. It is best to strain twice, as then there will be no particles of undissolved dye to spot the goods. While boiling, the goods must be constantly stirred and turned over with two sticks using care to get all bubbles from under the goods, as they sometimes cause spots. After they have boiled until the desired color is obtained, by holding the goods up between you and a strong light, the color can be seen very nearly as it will be when dry. If you are dyeing woolen goods, and do not wish it to shrink, be sure to rinse it in hot water. Stir them in this water until it becomes colored, then turn off and pour clear hot water over the goods. It is well to put them through three or four waters. Hang up in the shade, without wringing the goods, as this causes wrinkles. When nearly dry, take down and press with a moderately hot iron until dry. In coloring hosiery or gloves, do not hang them up as they will look streaked, but wrap them up in clean cloths and lay in a dry place.

Ribbons should be first cleaned in suds, by holding the soiled places on a glass bottle and scour with a nail brush and soap. When rinsed fold up and squeeze; never wring ribbons as it breaks the grain. After being dyed and rinsed roll around a large bottle with cloth between. When dry place upon an ironing board, place a warm iron upon one end, hold the iron firm and quickly draw the ribbon through under it.

If this proves acceptable will give directions for "dry dyeing" men's clothes, felt and straw hats, also directions for painting with colors made from the dyes.

A Cobweb Party.

To present this entertainment successfully requires some little expenditure of time on the part of the hostess, but she may easily find willing aids at this season of leisure. Let her first request a dozen or more of her friends to prepare some simple, inexpensive article of fancy work, or a small gift which may be purchased in a small country store, and let this be wrapped up carefully in a paper parcel or box. The only other requisite of the game is a supply of rather strong cord in long pieces. Several balls of cord or twine may doubtless be found at the village store. Tie one of the prize packages firmly to one end of the cord, and, having secured a room which need not be opened until the entertainment begins, conceal the parcel in some easily-found nook, perhaps behind a picture or under the table, or underneath the chair seat, taking care to fasten it well in its place of hiding. Now, as your ball of cord slowly unrolls, wind it about chair legs, door knobs, to the chandelier, the tops of picture frames, to curtain cornices and lambrquins, anywhere at all, but let it extend to all parts of the room and when the line is of good length, fasten the end to the door knob, for convenience, until the others are arranged. If you have several colors of cord, so much the better. Treat each package, whether full or empty, in the same way. A half-dozen ladies will arrange the cords together, and when you have prepared as many cords as you have invited guests, twining and intertwining them in every possible and impossible way, the room will look like a labyrinth of strong cobwebs. Very great care must be taken to secure the cord to the package and to tie or otherwise safely confine it in its hiding place, otherwise your labor and the pleasure of your guests will be lost.

When a number of cords, twenty-five or thirty, we will say, have been arranged, they may be kept together in a variety of ways until needed. The room may suggest the best arrangement for each hostess. If each is, in turn, wound around a reel or large spool, or if all be wound together on one ball, they may be easily unrolled. When the door is opened for the guests, to each in turn is given the end of a cord, and he is directed to follow the line, winding as he goes, until he reaches the end. When twenty or thirty people are thus engaged in disentangling and uncrossing so many cords the room presents a lively appearance. Each is intent on finding his own prize and all sorts of amusing mishaps occur. When a package is found, all the seekers are allowed to pause in their task to inspect it and congratulate the finder. A player who has finished his own cobweb, is at liberty to pick up any other which may have been dropped inadvertently. Rules are flexible and may be greatly varied to suit the occasion and the age of the participants. Any one may intimate to the hostess to whom the cord leading to her prize shall be given. When the room has been arranged, the disentangling may occupy two or even three hours.—Helen M. Norris, in September Wide-Awake.

There Was One Present.

"Is there a man in all this audience," demanded the female lecturer on Women's rights, fiercely "that has ever done anything to lighten the burden resting on his wife's shoulders? Is there a man here," she continued, folding her arms and looking over her audience with superb scorn, "that has ever gotten up in the morning, leaving his tired, worn out wife to enjoy her slumbers gone quietly down stairs, made the fire, cooked his own breakfast, sewed the missing buttons on the children's clothes, darned the family stockings, scoured the pots and kettles, cleaned and filled the lamps, swept the kitchen, and done all this, if necessary, day after day uncomplainingly? If there is such a man in the audience let him rise up. I should like to see him!"

And away back in the rear of the hall a mild-looking man in spectacles, in obedience to the summons, timidly arose. He was the husband of the eloquent speaker. It was the first chance he had ever had to assert himself.

During a Domestic Breeze.

Husband (sarcastically)—Yes, you are a smart woman; you never did anything foolish in your life, I suppose.

Wife (placidly)—Yes, I did. I am not entirely free from weakness; I once did a very foolish thing.

H.—It's a wonder you admit it.

W.—What's the use of denying it when everybody knows it?

H.—What was it?

W.—Marrying you.—Boston Courier.

The Conductors' and Brakemen's Excursion.

About 500 left St. Thomas by the G. T. R. train and as many more by the M. C. train. The latter started at Ridgetown and picked up four coach loads on the way here. No stop was made between St. Thomas and Waterford, when several more were taken, ten coaches being filled. The G. T. R. train had twelve coaches, which were all filled when Brantford was reached. Another train also came from Cayuga on the G. T. R., conveying about a like number. On arriving at Brantford a procession was formed, headed by the 7th Battalion Band, and proceeded to the City Hall, where addresses of welcome were delivered by Mayor Read, J. K. Osborne, President of the Board of Trade; T. Elliott, Vice-President of the B., W. & L. E. Railway, and ex-Mayor Henry. Replies were made by Mayor Morse, Conductor A. Smith, President of the Committee; J. Haslam, Vice-President; Mr. W. E. Idsardi, President of the Board of Trade, and Mr. D. McColl, M. P. P. The Mayor, Ald. Doggett, McCully, King, McKay, Cole and Oill, and Messrs. W. E. Idsardi, President, and J. W. Stewart, Secretary of the Board of Trade, and Chief Fewings, were the guests of the city of Brantford.

The following programme of games was carried out in the Agricultural Park. Much amusement was caused by the race between "Jumbo" Jones, M. C. R. conductor, weighing 230 pounds, and Geo. Smith, G. T. R. engineer, weighing 230 pounds, Conductor Jones, it will be seen, winning:

Special race, between L. Jones, M. C. R. conductor, and George Smith, G. T. R. engineer, for 100 yards; prize, easy chair. L. Jones.

Conductor Alexander Smith, who was present, is a handsome fellow and looks well in his dark blue uniform. His popularity is such that when the band plays in his presence the programme always begins with "Little Annie Rooney."

Secretary Mackenzie and Treasurer Cowley are given a great deal of credit for the good work they did towards making the excursion the success it was.

The easy chair won by Conductor L. Jones was presented by D. McColl, M. P. P.

During the progress of the sports the 7th Fusilier's band gave an excellent concert in the grand stand, which was crowded.

The visitors, guests of the city, were driven round in the afternoon to see the different objects of interest in the city.

The lacrosse match to have been played between the Lisgars of Tilsonburg and the Beavers of Brantford was not played, owing to the very wet condition of the grounds.

The musicians were Ed. Farr, leader; William Martin, cornet, and S. Taylor, trombone. The dancing was entered into with much mirth and jolity. St. Thomas people gave the Brantfordites and others present some pointers on the art of "tripping the light fantastic."

The M. C. R. train was in charge of Conductors L. Jones and Alex. Smith, Engineer Kains. The G. T. R. train from this city had Conductors Teat and Thompson to Tilsonburg, where Miller relieved Teat; Engineer, William Pitt. On the train from Cayuga Conductor T. C. Jones handled the punch. Engineer, Ted Lowe.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: As it has been a long time since anything has been heard from Division 251, of which division your humble servant, the member from Arkansas with his straw hat, had the honor of representing at Rochester, I will drop you a few lines just to let the Brothers throughout the land know that we are still alive, as is the member, despite the hilarity and inclement weather of Rochester.

Our division numbers thirty-three members, with a goodly number of applicants on the anxious seat. I think by the next convention we will have fifty members. When you take into consideration that we have only one road to draw from, and that we have only been in existence ten months, and that we never fail to meet every Sunday night, I think is doing very well.

I had the pleasure of meeting Brother Clark at Little Rock last week, where he, to the satisfaction of everyone, adjusted the difficulty which at that time existed on the Iron Mountain. I went up to the Rock just to see how a Grand Chief Conductor looked and acted in a time of trouble, this being the first time a G. C. C. ever was close enough to this country for a long horn to catch sight of. Brother Clark was the recipient of so many compliments for the just and masterly manner in which he adjusted this trouble, that I fain would hold my tongue for fear of enlarging his head, but I must say that every additional day that passes over my head makes me a little prouder that I am one of the many that was not afraid of my superintendent and voted for elimination and Clark. There is now the very best of feeling between all the different organizations on the Iron Mountain system, which I can truthfully say extends, also, to this system. Everyone I have talked to about federation, and I have spoken to nearly all I have met, jump at it like a trout after a minnow. I want to say just this one thing, that we have as thoroughbred a lot of men on the Cotton Belt as marks the earth, and some day I will give their names, runs, ages and complexions, however, if you are at St. Louis on August 31st. you will more than likely meet some of them. Daddy Jack Neimeyer, our C. C., has put himself on record that he will be there, if he is the only man present. I also have a sort of a hankering to be there myself.

Now, Brother Daniels, with a reminder of your solemn promise to me that you would not print any of my bad spelling I will close, with kind regards to all, I am

Yours in P. F.,

WILL C. HAZELTINE,

Secretary and Treasurer Division 251.

CLEVELAND, O., August 10, 1860.

Editor Conductor.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: There is a great deal being said and written in regard to our late G. C. C. It strikes me that it is poor policy to keep picking at him all the time. We have got rid of him and I think we ought to consider it good riddance to, &c., and let him go. He can't hurt the old O. of R. C., for the simple reason everybody is "on to him" and don't pay any attention to him any more than they do the Toledo wind-bag. Let such people alone and they will hang themselves every time. If the step had been taken six years ago we would have been far better off than we are now. There are lots of good men that would have been members of the Order long ago, if it had not been for C. S. W. and his teachings. There is division not one hundred miles from here whose number is less than eighty and more than sixty, that three years ago was counted one of the best in the state; it had forty good live members. How is it to-day? You can count the members on your fingers and a quorum is hard to get. Why is it? Simply this, it was ruled by a strong C. S. W. man, and a man that went to the division superintendent and told him, "if he ever got into trouble with his men to call on him, he could, and would, furnish him as many men as he wanted to handle his trains." I understand this man has made application to the I. O. of R. C. What gets me the most is, where the "independent" part of the concern comes in. I never heard of a man being called independent that was not a sneak and a coward, and that would not come and go at a sign of a superintendent or trainmaster as some men do. Brother, these people are better out of the Order than in it, for it is the likes of them that have placed us in the light we stand in before all other organizations. (447)

LOGANSPOUT, Ind., Aug. 20, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: You have two letters from me, as correspondent of Division 110, as yet unpublished. We of course do not expect to see them in print at this late day, as they were written fully six months ago, and after waiting so long in hopes that they would come to the surface, finally concluded to try again.

Business on the Pan Handle is and has been rushing in both the freight and passenger departments; in fact, so hard and steady were we worked that several of the conductors were forced to take a rest. Brothers Vankirk and Hartsook laying off for thirty days, and others who were not so tired for two weeks only. The writer finding the latter period ample time to get in condition.

Mr. Chas. Watts, although general superintendent of the Northwest line west of Pittsburgh finds time to take a run over his former territory occasionally, and while he is with us we feel like the boy with his first pair of pants.

Division 110 is in very good shape financially, and composed of members noted for their energy, each one trying to out do the other when there is anything to do, and while it is proverbial that "many hands make light work," "too many cooks sometimes spoils the broth," so with best wishes for the future I remain,

Yours truly in P. F.,

L. M. D.

Correspondent Division 110.

FT. SCOTT, Aug. 18, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: As there has been nothing from this place in THE CONDUCTOR, I will try and write a few lines giving a few items. Our division (165) had a big turnout yesterday, the best meeting our division has had for years. We have work every regular meeting and call specials every other Sunday. Have taken in four new members and have three more applications balloted on and eight more to come at our next meeting. Division 165 is solid and true. The members of this division are all working to build up and make it the best in the state. We give great credit for the success of this division to our C. C., W. H. Churchill; he works early and late keeping us posted. We had three visiting Brothers of the right make at our meeting yesterday: Brother Talbot, of Division No. 11, Brother Brady, of Division No. 121 and Brother Hayward, of Division No. 9. They were well pleased with our division work. We bid them welcome to come as often as they could. Well, as this is the first effort to write you I will close for this time, and will try and do better next.

Yours in P. F.,

J. A. SLAUGHT.

CLIFTON FORGE, Va., Aug. 18, 1890.

Editor Conductor.

If you can find space in THE CONDUCTOR you can print this for the benefit of the Order.

July 1st, 1890, Division 184 had enrolled on its books thirty-one members, December 31st, had twenty-six, March 31st, had twenty-four, August 1st, had twenty-nine and one member who will take third degree next meeting, with four petitions in and several blanks out which will be filled up and handed in at an early date and two members of other divisions who are located here that have asked for transfers to this division, and others who are anxious to become members as soon as eligible. We have no seceders here. We have no conductors members of the Order, or not, that we could even loan the new order. We believe they would kick like wild fire if it was mentioned to them.

We have a corresponding secretary somewhere among us, but he must be indisposed as we never hear from him through THE CONDUCTOR, but can hear of the widower delivering a water melon occasionally at a certain town on the line, but think the trade will soon be over with him, as we hear Bob will take Miss Ella home with him before long. Bob do tell us it is time.

From yours in P. F.

TRAINMEN AND THE STRIKE.

The question involved in the present strike on the N. Y. C., is one that is of deep interest to the members of all organizations of men engaged in train service, and it is particularly so to members of the Order who are now standing upon somewhat untried ground for them and many of whom are in an exactly similar situation elsewhere to that of the knights on the Central. Members of the Order are proscribed on the P. & R., and while such proscription is in common with all other railway organizations it is somewhat different with us for the reason that with the exception of a spasmodic effort on the part of the Spanish autocrat, Whiskerandos, our members have not been disturbed until since the repeal of the strike clause. It is claimed that employes on the Central were dismissed because of their membership in a labor organization, and while it is denied by the officers, they refuse to give any reason for the dismissals, saying that it is no ones business, and that they have a right to dismiss employes without any other reason than their own sweet will. If the claim of the officers be true, and the men were not dismissed for their connection with the K. of L., but were dismissed without any definite reason being assigned, it still remains a matter of peculiar interest to all railway organizations, and in this case, too, it is of peculiar interest to conductors, who more than any other class of employes, are the victims of this practice, and with them, too, such a dismissal bears an added meaning for it is generally understood that when a conductor is dismissed without a reason, that it is because the employer suspects him of being dishonest, but dares not make the charge openly for fear of legal consequences. They profess that out of sympathy for the dismissed employe, the reason is withheld, but in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, this is simply an excuse and not the reason. We believe that it is not alone our business to see that this principle of "we can do as we please and its none of your business," is not enforced by railway companies, but we also believe that it is of interest to the public. The New York Sun which in company with most of the metropolitan papers is, as usual, on the side of the corporation, in commenting on the strike, said lately :

"Without disturbing the merits of the original controversy in the least, the essential nature of the relation borne to the public by such an institution as the Knights of Labor was forcibly shown night before last at the Grand Central Station and along the line of the New York Central Railroad.

A great and essential and teeming artery of human circulation is choked without a moments notice. Thousands of the people of this city and elsewhere are subjected to the deepest distress, inconvenience, and personal damage, and such is the detriment for the time being to business and property that the conspirators might as well have taken the torch in their hands at once and added pillage and destruction to their act.

The motto of the Knights of Labor is evidently "The public be damned."

To this a correspondent replies as follows:

"Without disturbing the merits of the original controversy in the least," please allow me to remark that the blue-envelope system, as applied to the employes of the New York Central and other railroads of this country, is the most despicable, cowardly, and dirty of any adopted since the advent of Christ. "Without a moment's notice" a faithful man receives a blue-envelope, and is "subject to the deepest distress, inconvenience, and personal damage". He finds himself black-listed, on a par with an ex-convict, and is ever afterward debarred from seeking employment as an honest man. "Where did you work last?" "On the New York Central, sir." "What did you leave for?" "I received the blue-envelope." "We have no use for you." A story quickly told, and yet as true as day and night. You brand a man "thief" when you send him one of these dastardly missives. The poor devil has little show after that. The motto of railroad autocrats is evidently, "The workmen be damned!" Gradually the good work begun by the martyred Lincoln is going forward, and may we soon see the last vestige of human slavery obliterated in free America. The provincial press may be muzzled by a free pass, but fair play and honest expression of opinion should be accorded the wage earner by the greatest of all papers.

TROY, N. Y. Aug. 10, 1890. JOHN JONES.

And from this the Sun deduces the proposition that the demand of the K. of L. is that "an employer cannot discharge an employe without trial." This is the employer's plea and is not true. What the employes of the Central ask is that employes shall not be dismissed on account of their membership in a labor organization, and if Mr. Webb will give any good reasons for the dismissals made, the strike will end at once. Mr. Webb says it is none of their business and none of the public's business what they were discharged for, and while this may in a sense be true, it is not true as a general proposition. If Mr. Webb or any other, attempts to control the private affairs of his employes, it is something that interests the public as that gentleman will perhaps learn to his cost. The interest and rights of the public and the employes are well stated in an editorial from the Philadelphia Record quoted in another part of this number. The contest is one which must be of interest to conductors generally, and the knights should have and undoubtedly do have the sympathy of the Order on the Central as well as elsewhere. So far as we are informed, no aid has been asked of them and it is not likely that they will take any part in the strike unless forced to do so by the action of the company. They certainly will not take the strikers places and will undoubtedly aid them unasked, to the extent of declining to take out any trains that are not properly manned by safe men. The prospects are that unless aided the knights will lose; should the federated associations of railway employes join them, it will make the result doubtful to say the least, with the odds largely against the company, and Mr. Webb will have to spend his "$2,000,000 to defeat the strike" if not more.

We believe that the employes of the Central could secure better results from affiliating with the different organizations of railway employes instead of with the Knights of Labor, but that is a matter for them to decide for themselves, and as the principle contended for is one that is of vital interest to all, there should be no question as to the side on which employes generally should be found. We also believe that the Knights were somewhat hasty in precipitating the strike without counting the cost or without fully realizing the odds against them, and that they would have been in a much better position now, if they had secured the co-operation of the other organizations before taking the final step.

One statement made by Webb is, to those who are at all acquainted with the facts so manifestly false that it does not deserve contradiction, except for the general public who are not posted and that is, that the "Central pays better wages than the western roads." The Central does not pay any class of its trainmen as much as is paid by the western roads, unless it is "emergency" pay just now and under present circumstances, as for instance it is said that the brakemen on one of the first freight trains run were paid forty dollars each for the trip, and this is rather more than the western roads pay, and in that sense the Central is paying more, but any statement that the Central regularly pays its employes more than is paid by western roads is false, whether it comes from the Vice-President of the road or any one else.

ARE CONDUCTORS DISHONEST.

We publish in this number, an article from the Chicago News purporting to be an interview with several railway officers in regard to the honesty of conductors, and comment thereon a little.

"Nine times out of ten when a man gives money to a railway conductor with whom he is not acquainted he thinks he is simply adding to that officials wealth." This is a rather broad assertion and if true would indicate that the general reputation of conductors with the public is rather low. The statement however is not true but on the contrary is notoriously untrue, and of those who do accuse the conductor of dishonesty, it is safe to say that nine out of ten, either have a little private grudge against them or are dishonest themselves. The man who has attempted to beat the conductor, failed and been left to his reflections by the wayside, will always denounce the conductor as a thief; and so also will the man who has tried to induce some conductor to accept about half the regular fare and failed. It is an undeniable fact that there are some dishonest conductors but if the News reporter will interview any number of reputable men who travel, ninety-nine out of every one hundred of them will tell him that conductors as a class are in their opinion honest men and that opinion is likely to be founded upon business acquaintance. The writer has often been accused by ignorant persons of trying to make ten cents when he has collected the "ten cents excess" in spite of opposition and has always replied to such an accusation in the language of the old story, and informed the passenger that the "ten cents was for the company and the dollar for me," and the person who is thus compelled to pay the ten cents will as a rule accuse conductors of being thieves. The large majority however of those who charge the conductor with dishonesty are those who do so with the intent of being humorous, and when it comes to a comparison with the general public we believe from experience that the conductor will be way ahead. The man who denounces the conductor as a thief is the very man who will make a proposition to the conductor to "divide," and if perchance in a crowded train, the conductor happens to miss him his attention is so fully occupied with something else that he can't possibly think to call the conductor's attention to it, and his conscience don't prevent him from riding again on the ticket that he has already used, yet it is a laudable action for him to defraud the company, while if the conductor does so he is dishonest. It not infrequently happens that a clergyman will be indignant if asked to show the conductor his permit to ride on a half fare ticket, and if he doesn't happen to have such a permit and the conductor collects the additional fare, he is often charged with dishonest motives in so doing.

The opinions of the majority of those interviewed by the News man, fully disproves the assertion made by an Illinois Central officer, who says that: "All railway officers are pessimists," on this subject and who believes that company is being "robbed of an enormous amount" and quite likely he is correct in his opinion in regard to robbery, but it is also more than likely that the conductors are getting but a very small share of the plunder; and we have found it an extremely good rule to watch very closely the man who suspects every one but himself of dishonesty. This officer refers to the well known duplex or excess ticket as a check on conductors, but says they may not use it; conductors do not object to any reasonable check or surveillance, and what they object to in regard to this duplex ticket is that they are sometimes expected and required to perform impossibilities. These tickets must be punched five times, some of them more than that; the conductor must punch the day, month and year, the points between which a fare is paid and sometimes the amount of the fare itself, requiring from one to three or four additional punches. The points, dates, etc., are indicated by small figures on a ticket that is crowded full of numbers and reading matter, and the conductor may and often is required to get through three or four coaches in five or six minutes, and if he should receive any cash fares he must do one of two things, postpone punching the duplex or let some of his passengers "get away"; if he does the first, he is liable to be reported and accused of dishonesty; if he does the second, the very man who gets a ride without paying is likely to report the conductor for not taking his ticket, and the conductor to be dismissed for incompetency. The dishonest conductor is almost absolutely sure to be detected sooner or later and in a way that permits of no room for doubt. The conductor has spotters enough after him all the time; every man who is made to pay "excess," every man who has a crooked ticket which the conductor detects, every one who attempts to ride on a pass that does not belong to him and is caught, and every individual who tries to tempt the conductor to dishonesty by a proposition to "divide" and is refused, as a rule immediately resolves himself into a "special agent" whose great aim is to procure the dismissal of that conductor, and when we reflect that not a day goes by that every passenger conductor running a train of any importance does not meet with one or more instances of these things, we may realize that there is a pretty general surveillance of conductors that costs the companies nothing, and every superintendent who will tell the truth will say that the number of complaints against conductors from the above class of travellers, are numerous.

This I. C. officer must credit the conductors employed on that road with an extremely small amount of intelligence if they "don't know whether there is a spotter on or not" when he publicly says that the company does not employ them. A reasonable inference is that when this officer said that "spotters" were not employed, he did so with a very slight regard for truth, and the News man may be certain that they are employed, but THE CONDUCTOR is glad to be able to say that from the results, we believe the I. C. officers employ reasonably honest men for spotters or else do not credit the reports that are usually made by this gentry, and we are further of the opinion that if the official interviewed had any authority, the conductors would need to look out, for they probably would all be dismissed within a short time, not because they were dishonest, but because this man believes they are, or more likely does not really believe it, but says so and would accept without question any report that might be made against them.

A C. & N. W. officer thinks that "you can't always believe" spotters and voices a truth that railway officers generally seem very slow to learn. Instances innumerable are on record where the absolute falsity of their reports are shown, while to our knowledge there is not a single instance on record where their charges have been sustained in court, and it is not a sufficient answer to say as the Pinkerton's do, that the enmity of the public to railroads and their sympathy with the employe precludes conviction no matter what the evidence. Some twenty years ago, the Pinkerton agency "worked" the P. & E. and, as a consequence of their reports, nearly all the passenger conductors were discharged and one of them placed on trial. The accused was acquitted very promptly by the court, and Pinkerton published an account of the trial, saying in a preface that the courts would not convict no matter what the evidence was. The evidence in this instance was first that every one of the Pinkerton employes were men of bad character, many of them having been picked up on the streets of New York and Chicago for this particular job, several of them were convicts and there was not a single man among them with a good character. They all claimed to have paid fares, and that the fares paid by them were stolen by the accused. On the other hand, it was proved that the accused knew the men and that they had been pointed out to him as Pinkerton spotters before they were on his train, and that he reported transportation for them, but not for the distances claimed by them. Space forbids giving extracts from the testimony given by some of these men, but much of it was on a par with that given by a spotter in a late trial at Buffalo, where he testified that he occupied an upper berth, placed his hat in a rack at the end of the berth, laid on his back and saw the conductor punch a white slip instead of the ticket, and that without raising his head. Anyone who has the remotest idea of an upper berth will at once understand what a falsehood was testified to by this scamp.

Numerous instances are on record where spotters report passengers taking the trains and paying fares from stations where the trains did not stop at all, and there are several cases where a conductor has been reported and discharged for stealing when investigation has shown that he was not on the road the day of the alleged occurrence at all. A recent case on the C., M. & St. P. is where a spotter reported paying a fare to a conductor of a freight train and investigation demonstrated the fact the conductor was on the engine the entire time that the spotter claimed to have been in the caboose; that if a fare was paid at all, it was paid to the brakeman, though the preponderance of evidence is that the man did not ride on the train at all. The conductor was dismissed on the report, and although finally reinstated, lost several months' salary. Railway officers are, with hardly an exception, very unfair in their manner of dealing with these reports against their conductors; they employ these sneaks, and the reports received are filed away. After from one to three months the conductor is informed that his "reports are unsatisfactory" and dismissed; often without any opportunity whatever to defend himself, or of knowing what there is charged against him, while if the specific charges are shown him, it is so long since the alleged occurrence that he is at a great disadvantage and can only assert his innocence while unable to particularly explain what might have been readily shown to be an untrue or mistaken report had it been brought to his notice when the occurrences of the trip for which the report was made, were fresh in his mind.

We wish also to call special attention to Mr.

St. John's opinion of "collectors" and to the idocy of supposing for a moment that calling a man a collector would make any difference with his honesty. The reference to collectors on the St. Paul road is so manifestly incorrect that it is hardly worth notice. Several of its best known conductors were not discharged two years ago and the Order of Railway Conductors on that road has not received any "blow" from anybody, but is stronger now than ever before on that road as well as elsewhere. That road does not now and never has employed collectors on all its trains, but employs one collector on each division, and if Mr. Peebles is a confidential employe of the superintendent and said "there are but few runs on which train conductors collect fares," he is either woefully ignorant of his business, exhibits a supreme disregard for truth or intended to say that but few fares are paid on trains, which is true, for if the conductors stole all the fares that are paid to them on the trains of all the roads, no one of them would get rich nor would the combined amount approach anywhere near the stealings of some railway officers. We have not the time or space now to take up the subject of collectors, but will hereafter have something to say on that subject, and will show conclusively to any unbiased person that the conductors on the St. Paul have good reason for being dissatisfied with the system in use there.

JOHN LIVINGSTON, "FARMER."

Our good friend John seems to be a versatile genius who can turn his hand to almost anything. He first appears in public as the champion of the railway stockholder, and as president of The Railway Shareholders Association, an association which, by the way so far as anything can be learned of it, consists of John alone, files a complaint with the inter-state commerce commission against a number of railroads for carrying free the wives of some engineers. Later, he amends his complaint and files additional ones as attorney for a railroad. We next hear of him soliciting fees from the B. of L. E. for his "influence" in procuring the passage of a law permitting railroads to carry families of employes free. Again he shies his castor into the ring as a lobbyist in behalf of the scalpers, and now, mirabile dictu, honest John arrayed in jeans trowsers, hickory shirt and brown denims "wam'us," a horny handed tiller of the soil and as president of the New York State Farmers' Alliance, "sounds the tocsin" and "out-herods Herod" in his denunciation of railroads and railroad officers. It might seem to some a little inconsistent for honest John to send his circulars as "president" of the alliance in an envelope bearing the card of "President" John of the Shareholders' Association, but then Farmer John is above such trifling considerations as that. Farmers who wish to become members of the Alliance will find granger John at Campville, N. Y., and when he goes to town after the mail, it is said that he goes bare-footed. In what character John will next appear we dare not attempt to guess. A charitable view of John would be that he is mildly insane.

A COMMENDABLE ACT.

While we are of the same political faith as Governor Hill of New York, we are not an admirer of that gentleman, and any word of commendation from us cannot be considered biased; notwithstanding our personal opinions we believe in justice to all, and although the charge is already made that the action referred to below was simply a sharp political move, we do not care what the object or the influence that brought it about, we shall commend what we believe to be right. Mr. Webb, of the Central, not content with the employment of Pinkerton guards, for whom there was no need whatever, appealed to General Doyle, for aid from the state troops, and a portion were immediately placed on duty by that officer, as it is now intimated, without authority and in violation of law. The request for aid was later supplemented by a call upon the governor for more soldiers, and the latter replied as follows:

"Your dispatch to Governor Hill at hand. He directs me to say that he has sent General Farnsworth to investigate the situation and report on it. It is desirable that official and authentic information should be obtained before action is taken. You may rest assured that the state authorities will act promptly and vigorously in protecting property and preventing violence. The functions of the military forces should not, however, be misunderstood. It is not their business to operate the railroad nor to interfere on behalf of either party to a labor controversy, but only when invoked to aid the local civil authorities in suppressing violence and protecting property. They are not expected to do mere police duty, nor to discharge those functions which more properly belong to a sheriff's posse comitatus. The powers of the civil authorities should be fully applied before recourse should be had to military forces. The governor desires that you keep him fully advised as to any further occurrences."

For his action in this respect, Governor Hill should have the commendation of not only the trainmen of New York and of the United States, but of all law-abiding citizens. There has been no disturbances whatever on the line of the Central, except what has been provoked by the presence of the unnecessary and dangerous element of Pinkertonism, and had they been kept away no disturbances of any kind would have resulted, the strikers being an exceptionally orderly lot of men, and there has been no disposition shown to use force or to interfere in any way with the rights of those who wished to work. If Gov. Hill will find some way to compel the discontinuance of the Pinkerton "guards," and compel the company to rely upon the civil authorities until that protection is shown to be inadequate, he will not only do common justice to the employes, but as well to the general public, who are being made the victims of the reckless use of firearms by the disreputable employes of this disreputable agency.

UNJUST.

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers who are the best paid body of workmen in the country, have little or no sympathy with other labor organizations. They are for the engineers first, last and all the time. This is shown in the present strike of the New York Central Railroad, when they would not lift a hand to help the strikers. It is quite different when the engineers themselves go on a strike. Then they want the railroader to lay down his tools and come to their assistance. The locomotive engineers are a selfish lot and they can't deny it.—Wilks-Barre News Dealer.

The above is not exactly just to the Engineers. The time has been when there was much truth in the above assertion so far as the organization was concerned. It gave no credit for the assistance that it always received, and became vain-glorious, just as any other organization would do. It is a fact that the Engineers never have won in a strike where they did not have the sympathy and assistance of other employes, and that they are indebted to others in part for the influence of their association and the wages they receive. They have however learned by experience and while there may be a few who still retain the old idea of isolation and independence, the great majority are insympathy with and give their support to, the principle of co-operation.

As to the Central strike, we do not see that the engineers are any more to be censured than any other organization. To our knowledge no application for aid has been made to the engineers. That they did not, without due consideration and in violation of their own laws, participate in the strike, does not seem to us to be good ground for censure, and if they deserve censure, why not all the other organizations, which as yet have taken no part?

"LICENSED OUTLAWS."

"Licensed outlaws" is the title of an editorial in the Sioux City Times on the employment of Pinkerton thugs by the New York Central, and the bloodshed resultant thereupon. Against the legitimate detective there can be no word of censure from law-abiding citizens, but when the title of "detective" is misapplied and perverted to indicate men who are themselves criminals and who by the shadow of authority conferred upon them by this misapplied title, are furnished with arms and permitted to shoot indiscriminately, it merits the indignation of all reasonable people and it certainly seems to us that the time is at hand when some legislation should be had that will effectually prevent the continuance of such mobs of law breakers as this Pinkerton agency and all like it, or at least confine them to the legitimate business of detecting crime and criminals. It is a peculiar situation that permits any body of men to assume the position of these Pinkerton employes, many of whom, as is well known are hired from the streets for each particular case of this kind, and whose actions have been such that the very name of Pinkerton is becoming a stench in the nostrils of the public generally. We are pleased to note that Iowa papers generally unite in condemning the railway for placing these men in a position to take human life.

EGOTISTICAL.

We have many times been charged with egotism and always plead guilty to the charge, but wish to add that it has always been our intent to keep that vice under a reasonable control, and sometimes flatter ourselves that we have succeeded reasonably well. We endeavor to be reasonably modest and do not ordinarily parade any kind or flattering expression that friends may make of or to us. We could fill several pages of THE CONDUCTOR with letters commendatory, that have been received within the past few weeks, and while there is very much egotism in this last sentence alone, it is a truth and a truth that we are proud of, and in consideration of the fact that we do not inflict them upon our readers, will they pardon us for permitting the bump of self-esteem to break out in a new place?

Some time ago, a republican correspondent of one of the daily papers, suggested the name of the writer as a candidate for the democratic nomination for congress from the fifth Iowa district; this suggestion was taken up by the leading democratic paper in the district, and later by a number of others in such a manner as to make it reasonably manifest that all that would be necessary to have the suggestion carried out, would be for us to say "Barkis is willin'," but owing principally to the fact that we are not possessed of enough lucre to make a debut upon the stage of congressional politics, we have informed all that an acceptance is out of the question. A late issue of The Standard, published a few days prior to the meeting of the convention, contained the following:

In fact there is but one man who stands any show of being named in case Hamilton should not be the nominee, and that is W. P. Daniels of this county. That Mr. Daniels would prove a serious competitor for the nomination if he should seek it, is absolutely certain; that he does not want it is also certain, but in the event of a failure to nominate Mr. Hamilton, or his possible declination, Mr. Daniels, would be the only name mentioned seriously. He is said to have warm friends in Jones and Tama while Benton would in all probability cast its vote for him in preference to Hamilton should the opportunity offer. As to Linn, either Hamilton or Daniels will have the solid delegation, as Daniels would not under any circumstances permit the use of his name in opposition to Hamilton, while it is reasonably certain that if Daniels wishes the nomination, Hamilton would not be a candidate and would support Daniels. This seems to us to be a fair presentation of the present situation. With either Hamilton or Daniels the democrats can carry the district.

That we should have received such an endorsement, not only from the home papers but throughout the district, is extremely gratifying, and we believe there are some readers of THE CONDUCTOR to whom it will also be gratifying.

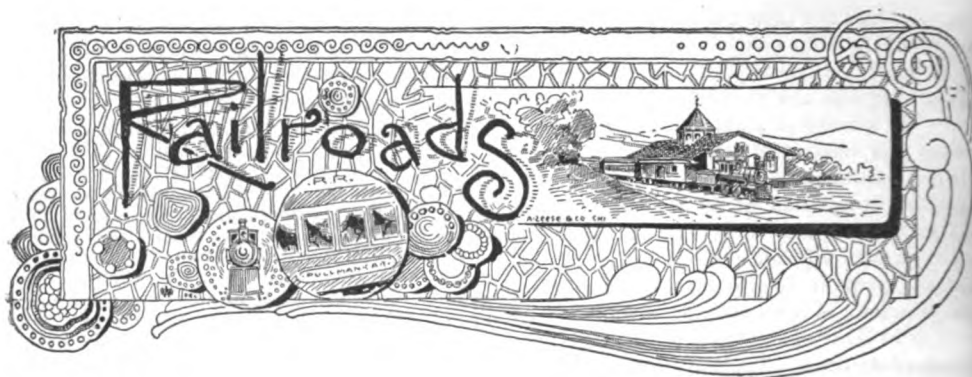

The many friends of Hi Hurty will be pleased to learn that he is running a passenger train on the new Pacific Short Line, west of Sioux City. Other passenger conductors on the Short Line are Bros. Skeel, Southwick and Wachob; we hope to be able to give the names of more of our worthy members in like position at no distant date as the construction of the line is being pushed as fast as possible, and the more railroad the more conductors. Bro. Millard, train master, says that all positions are filled at present.

Information from a source that cannot be questioned, comes to us from New Haven that a large number of the members of New Haven Division No. 1 of the Independent Order of Railway Conductors are very much dissatisfied and are considering the matter of making an effort to regain membership in the Order.

One of the well-known members of the Grand Division for several sessions past, is J. W. Wayland of Brookfield Division, and all our readers will be glad to know that he has lately been promoted to a passenger run on the "St. Jo." Division 194 will be the sufferer, as it will take Brother Wayland away from their meetings.

ARTICLE OF AGREEMENT

BETWEEN THE BALTIMORE & OHIO SOUTHWESTERN R. R. COMPANY AND ITS CONDUCTORS AND BRAKEMEN, IN EFFECT JULY 1, 1890. THE SAME TO REMAIN IN FORCE UNTIL ANNULLED BY MUTUAL CONSENT.

ARTICLE I.

Conductors running on passenger trains between Cincinnati and Parkersburg, Cincinnati and Chillicothe and Chillicothe and Parkersburg; are to receive $100.00 per month; fractional parts of a month to be paid at the same rate.

Conductors on local passenger trains between Cincinnati and Blanchester are to be paid at the rate of $85.00 per month, and $3.00 per day for Sunday work.

Conductors running on passenger trains on the Hillsboro Division are to receive $85.00 per month.

Conductors running on passenger and mixed trains on the Portsmouth Division are to receive $90.00 per month.

ARTICLE II.

Conductors running on through freight trains, with eight-wheel engines, will receive $2.75 per day; brakemen running on through freight trains, with eight-wheel engines, will receive $1.75 per day. Conductors running on through freight trains, with ten-wheel engines, will receive $3.00 per day; brakemen running on through freight trains, with ten-wheel engines, will receive $2.00 per day. Ten hours, or upward of 50 and less than 100 miles, to constitute a day's work, and five hours, or 50 miles and less, to constitute half a day's work. Over-time in excess of ten hours will be computed at the rate of 27½ and 17½ cents per hour, respectively. All mileage in excess of 100 miles will be paid for at the same rate per mile as for less than 100 miles.

Local freight conductors running between Cincinnati and Chillicothe, and Chillicothe and Parkersburg, are to receive $3.50 per day; brakemen running on local freight trains between Cincinnati and Chillicothe, and Chillicothe and Parkersburg are to receive $2.40 per day. Twelve hours to constitute a day's work. Over twelve hours, to be computed at the rate of 30 and 20 cents per hour, respectively.

Conductors running on local freight trains on the Hillsboro and Portsmouth Divisions are to receive $2.90 per day; brakemen running on local freights on the Hillsboro and Portsmouth Divisions to receive $1.90 per day. Twelve hours to constitute a day's work. Over-time to be computed at the rate of 27½ and 17½ cents per hour, respectively.

ARTICLE III.

Conductors of helping engines are to receive $70.00 per month; brakemen of helping engines are to receive $1.75 per day; fractional parts of a month to be paid at the same rate.

ARTICLE IV.

Conductors of work trains are to receive $2.90 per day; brakemen of work trains are to receive $1.90 per day. Twelve hours, or over six hours, to constitute a day's work. All time in excess of twelve hours to be computed at the rate of 27½ and 17½ cents per hour, respectively.

ARTICLE V.

Conductors and brakemen called to go to wrecks or wash-outs will be allowed 30 and 20 cents per hour, respectively, for the time on duty.

ARTICLE VI.

Conductors of coal and ore trains will be allowed $2.90 per day; brakemen of coal and ore trains will be allowed $1.90 per day. Twelve hours to constitute a day's work. Over-time to be at the rate 27½ and 17½ cents per hour, respectively.

ARTICLE VII.

In computing over-time it is understood that fractions of an hour less than thirty minutes will not be counted; thirty minutes or over will be counted a full hour.

ARTICLE VIII.

When conductors and brakemen are called to go out, their time will commence at the time specified for them to leave; and if the train is annulled they will be paid at the rate of $27\frac{1}{2}$ and $17\frac{1}{2}$ cents per hour, respectively, until notified that such train is annulled, or until they are relieved from duty.

ARTICLE IX.

Conductors and brakemen deadheading to any point on Company's business shall be paid one-half their regular rate.

ARTICLE X.

Conductors and brakemen called to attend court as witnesses on the part of the Railroad Company will be paid $2.75 and $1.75 per calendar day respectively.

ARTICLE XI.

Conductors and brakemen running light engines, or engines with only caboose attached, will be paid three-fourths of their regular rates.

ARTICLE XII.

Promoted brakemen will be termed second-class conductors, and will receive $2.50 per day for the first six months, $2.75 per day for the second six months, commencing from the date of promotion, and after the second six months they will receive rate of first-class conductors.

ARTICLE XIII.

Commencing with the date of this agreement, conductors and brakemen are to be promoted in accordance with their age on the road, the oldest man to be given preference when in every respect competent. Promotion to the position of passenger or freight conductor will be confined to men in train service.

ARTICLE XIV.

When freight traffic is light, and it is necessary to reduce the number of freight crews in order to allow conductors and brakemen to make reasonable wages, the conductors of crews thus taken off shall be given preference as brakemen, until such time as the increase of business warrants their being reinstated as conductors.

ARTICLE XV.

Conductors and brakemen reaching terminal points after continuous service of sixteen hours or more, shall be entitled to eight hours' rest before being again required to go out, excepting in case of wreck or extreme emergency.

ARTICLE XVI.

Conductors and brakemen suspended will be given a hearing within a reasonable time, and notified promptly of the result of the investigation; and if conductors or brakemen thus suspended are found to be not guilty, they will be paid one-half time for calendar time thus lost.

ARTICLE XVII.

Any conductor or brakeman feeling that justice has not been done in a decision rendered by the Superintendent, will have the right to appeal to the General Superintendent.

ARTICLE XVIII.

No fines shall be imposed upon conductors or brakemen for damage to Company's property or rolling stock; but if such damage occurs, and it is found that the conductor or brakeman is at fault for such damage, he shall be suspended or dismissed from the service, as the case may seem to require.

Railway Statistics.

We are in receipt of the advance copy of the report of Henry C. Adams, statistician of the Inter-state Commerce Commission from which we glean the following items that will be of interest to our readers.

The total mileage of the railways of the United States, June 30, 1889, was 200,949 miles of which 157,758 is main track exclusive of the second, third and fourth tracks of railways that have more than a single track. There are 8,084 miles of second track, 721 miles of third track, 530 miles of fourth track, and nearly 32,000 miles of sidings and yard tracks while the sidings, extra tracks, etc., on a few roads of which no report was made, are estimated at something over 2,100 miles. Thirty-three roads operate over 1,000 miles each and of the number, twenty-one are west of Chicago. The increase in railway mileage during the year ending June 30, 1889, was 6,848: There are 40,600 railway bridges in the United States of which 17,042 are wood, 11,838 iron, 8,185 stone and 3,535 a combination of wood and iron. There are 649 tunnels aggregating a little over 115 miles in length. Illinois still retains the first place in mileage with 9,829 miles; Kansas is now second with 8,770 miles; Iowa has dropped to third with 8,317 miles, while New York has gone to fifth place with 7,680 miles, Ohio coming fourth with 7,797. The increase in the five states has been Illinois 122, Kansas 333, Iowa 90, Ohio 273 and New York 192. California has gained the most, her figures being 537 miles; Georgia second with 498 miles, Colorado with 451 miles and Michigan next with 438 miles. The state showing the smallest increase is Rhode Island which built less than half a mile and the total mileage of the state is but 215 miles. New Jersey is best supplied in proportion to territory having a mile of railway to every 3.94 square miles of territory. Iowa has one mile to every 6.73 square miles. Illinois one to every 5.76, and Kansas one to every 9.36 square miles.

One of the items which will probably surprise most if not all of our readers and which certainly surprised us is the fact that taking into account differences of one eighth of an inch, there are thirty-one different gauges in use on different railways while there are twenty-four that vary an inch or more. There is a little over 59 miles of road with a gauge of two feet, the narrowest in use, which is owned by four companies. Of the three foot gauge, there is 9,484 miles or about six per cent of the total mileage, which is owned by 234 companies. Of the standard gauge there is 114,148 miles owned by 1,030 companies, while there is nearly a thousand miles that is but half an inch narrower than the standard. The broad gauge has nearly disappeared, there being but 22 miles left, which is owned by two companies while in 1880 there were 12,282 miles owned by 91 companies. As most of our readers know, the Erie was started as a broad gauge trunk line from the Atlantic to the Pacific and in connection with the old Atlantic & Great Western, now the Nypano, was for many years operated as a broad gauge line from New York west. If a gauge of five feet is called "broad" though, how shall we designate one of eight feet and four inches of which there is a mile and three quarters in operation.

There was in use June 30, 29,036 locomotives which if coupled together and allowing an average of 50 feet for each engine would make a string of engines 275 miles long; of this number only 222 were equipped with automatic couplers and 17,995 with automatic brakes, and of this number over 8,000 are engaged in passenger service.

25,665 cars were required to do the passenger business of which 23,348 were equipped with automatic couplers and 23,540 with automatic brakes; for freight, there were 1,071,926 of which 57,162, or about one-twentieth were provided with automatic couplers and 104,619 or something less than one-tenth had automatic brakes. There were thirty-nine different kinds of automatic couplers in use, of which the Miller, Janney and Ames take the lead, 18,941 of the Miller, 17,536 of the Janney and 11,808 of the Ames were in use. The average number of tons of freight moved per engine was 35,643, and the average number of passengers per engine was 58,444; it required 1583 cars to move one million tons of freight, and 54 cars including baggage and mail cars, to transport one million passengers.

The mileage of the United States was owned by 1,705 companies, though only 436 companies were operating railways.

4739 general officers were required or an average of three to each hundred miles of road. One would hardly think that the number of clerks in general offices is almost as great as the number of station agents, but this report gives 20,817 of the former and only 24,171 of the latter. It requires 20 engineers, 21, firemen, 14 conductors and 36 brakemen, baggagemen and flagmen for each one hundred miles of track, there being 30,217 engineers, 31,993 firemen, 20,953 conductors and 55,160 brakemen, baggagemen, etc., the total number of railway employes reaches the number of 704,743 or 459 to each hundred miles of road. In this respect we seem to be ahead of England where it requires 1,748, though no fair comparison can be made without the amount of traffic handled. Mr. Adams says: "It is a safe estimate to say that, independently of stockholders, the railway industry of the United States provides a living for 3,000,000 persons or about one in twenty-two of the total population of the country." This is a somewhat startling proposition but a little reflection will demonstrate the correctness of Mr. Adam's statement.

We now come to a portion of the report which cannot be contemplated with the pride and satisfaction that is called for by the vastness of the industry, as demonstrated by this report so far. It is a portion of the report that is in itself a strong indictment of some one for wanton sacrifice of life and limb. For the year ending June 30, 1890, 300 persons were killed and 6,757 injured coupling and uncoupling cars, a total of 7,057, almost thirteen per cent. of the total number of brakemen and baggagemen. By falling from trains or engines, 493 were killed and 2,011 injured, by overhead obstructions, 65 killed and 296 injured, by accidents to trains, including collisions, 481 employes and 161 passengers were killed, and 2,491 employes and 1,081 passengers injured. Of the total number of employes, 1,972 were killed and 20,030 injured; this shows that one out of every 357 employes is killed, and one out of every 35 is injured; while of those directly engaged in train service, one in every 117 was killed, and one in every 12 injured. Is not this something of an argument in favor of the legislation that is now being asked of congress?

Railway officers are very energetic in their opposition to such legislation claiming that they cannot afford to equip their stock with safety appliances and that the cost if compelled to do it within the next five years will bankrupt many of them. Yet we find that the gross revenue of the P. R. R. was $57,719,086 or $23,724 per mile of road, and the net revenue was $7,562 per mile, they operating a fraction over 2,432 miles. The So. Pac. comes next in gross receipts with the tidy little sum of $43,292,582, though operating nearly 6,000 miles the receipts per mile are but $7,217 gross and $2,350 net. The notorious Reading heads the list in net earnings per mile, operating 843 miles it received $22,588 per mile, and its net receipts reached the sum of $10,348 per mile; the Central of New Jersey, controlled by the P. & R. is next, with net earnings of $10,218 per mile on 627 miles. In a table giving seventy roads, there is not one that does not show a net revenue over operating expenses, the lowest being the Atlantic and Pacific with a net revenue of only $78 per mile for 930 miles, the next lowest being the M. K. & T. with $387 per mile. In this table only those roads are given whose gross receipts exceed three million dollars. In our opinion Mr. Adams would make his report more valuable if these tables were extended to show the receipts and operating expenses of all the roads that report to the commission. We also think that it would be a manifest improvement if baggage-men and train flagmen were classed separately instead of being included in "other trainmen" and the same is true of switchmen, flagmen, watchmen, operators and dispatchers. As a whole from the brief examination and comparison that we have been able to give the report, we believe it to be an extremely valuable one and that it has been compiled with care and painstaking. It will certainly be a valuable addition to our railway statistics.

Decision of the Supreme Council.

TERRE HAUTE, Aug. 25.—The official statement of the council as given to an Associated Press representative is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS SUPREME COUNCIL } OF THE
UNITED ORDER OF R. R. EMPLOYEES. }

To all Laboring Organizations, Men and Brothers:

On the night of August 7, a strike began on the New York Central and Hudson River railway involving about 800 men in the employ of the same road, who are members of the great labor organization known as the Knights of Labor. The reasons set forth by Powderly, chief of the executive board of the order may be summarized as follows:

Peremptory discharge of fifty or sixty men, employes of the road and members of the Knights of Labor, without giving them any reason whatever for their discharge. Prior to the strike the men involved, sought, through representatives of the order to have their grievances adjusted, but appeals being disregarded a strike was inaugurated. At this juncture, Powderly, general master workman of the Knights of Labor, entered on the task of adjusting the difficulty and making such arrangements as would result in honorable peace between the employes and the officials of the road, but his efforts were unavailing.

Powderly, comprehending the purpose of Walter Webb, third vice-president of the company, to make war upon the Knights of Labor and ultimately on all labor organizations represented on his road, sought a conference with the Supreme United Order of Railway Employees. This request of Powderly was granted to the extent, that four members of the council and the chief of the executive of federated orders met him in the city of Buffalo, viz: F. P. Sargent, grand master of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and president of the Supreme Council; George W. Howard grand chief of the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors and vice-president of the Supreme Council; S. E. Wilkinson, grand master of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and Frank Sweeny, grand master of the of the Switchman's Mutual Aid Association.

At the conference with Powderly at Buffalo, the members of the supreme council became satisfied that the officials of the road, by every fair and honorable treatment of labor organizations, should meet Powderly and adopt some just plan for the adjustment of the grievances of the striking employes. This conclusion having been reached the members of the supreme council, in response to the request of Mr. Powderly, extended their journey to New York to afford such aid as was in their power to bring about a settlement between Vice President Webb, the official having full authority on all matters pertaining to the strike, and Powderly, having authority to negotiate such arrangements for the Knights as might end that dispute.

The interview having been secured, Powderly sought to have the men discharged heard in their own defense in the presence of Webb and himself. This fair and honorable proposition was refused. Powderly proposed arbitration, which was also refused. There were other propositions made by Powderly, having for its object an honorable settlement of the existing trouble, all of which was refused on the part of Webb.

The members of the supreme council while at Buffalo and New York had ample opportunity to thoroughly inform themselves on all matters concerning the strike. They saw and heard both sides. They appreciated the gravity of the situation and comprehending the impending consequences to labor organizations, deemed it advisable to convene the supreme council for deliberation and such conclusion as the facts should warrant. In response to the order of Sargent, president of the supreme council, that body was convened at Terre Haute, Saturday, the 22d of August, 1890, and remained in session until noon of Monday, the 25.

In making their report to the council, the members who went to New York to confer with Powderly found all of the statements made by him fully corroborated by the facts. In an interview with Webb he refused to entertain any proposition looking to a settlement of the difficulty. He would not arbitrate any question or make any explanation or concession whatever in regard to the discharged employees. He claimed the right to discharge employees at will, without making an explanation or giving to the victims of his power any reason for his despotic action. He would manage his road to suit himself without reference to any rights claimed by the organization to interfere in the matter to protect their members. The council having heard the statement of its members who had visited New York for the purpose of ascertaining the true condition of affairs, exhaustively discussed every important proposition and arrived at a conclusion, as follows:

First—That the position of the Knights of Labor, as set forth by Powderly, general master workman, and general executive of the board of Knights of Labor, meets with our unqualified approval.

Second—The course pursued by Webb toward Powderly, and the Knights of Labor, notwithstanding his declaration to the contrary, evinces the purpose to disrupt and destroy labor organizations on the New York Central and Hudson River railway as done by Austin Corbin on the Philadelphia and Reading.

Third—The policy of Webb is despotic to an extent that outrages every principle of American citizenship, and if generally adopted, would if successful, reduce American workingmen to a degraded condition of affairs.

Fourth—Webb, by the employment of Pinkerton thieves, thugs and murderers, vile wretches from the slums and brothels of New York and other cities, to kill workingmen because they dared to protest against his rule, and strike for their rights, is a crime of such an enormity and will associate the name of Webb forever with those who, dressed in a little brief authority, have used their money to secure the power to degrade their fellow men.

Fifth—That the resorts now being put forth by Webb to destroy the Knights of Labor would, were circumstances changed in like manner, be made to destroy the organizations of the engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen and switchmen, and, if successful, it is only a question of time when a similar effort would be made to seal the fate of other labor organizations,

Sixth—Webb, by the course he has pursued toward the Knights of Labor and representatives of labor organizations, has shown a total disregard of the principles of citizen sovereignty desired by every American worthy of the name, and considering only his money power and the corporate power of the company he represents. His acts, which speak louder than words, say, in the language of W. H. Vanderbilt, once the autocrat of the New York Central: "The public be damned."

Seventh.—H. Walter Webb seeks the support of this arrogant attitude towards workingmen and labor organizations by assuming that the New York Central and Hudson River railroad is private property, and that his acts in the treatment of his employees is in no sense a matter of public concern; that he can with impunity discharge men and remand them to idleness and poverty and render them homeless wanderers, without giving any reason whatever for his conduct, disregarding the fact that the corporation for which he plays the autocrat is a thing created by the laws, in the making of which the men he seeks to degrade have the voice which, once unified, will bring his corporation to a bar of justice where his millions and the other millions he represents will cease to be potential in deciding questions of this kind.

In view of the foregoing facts the supreme council put upon record its unanimous and unqualified approval of the strike on the New York Central and Hudson River railway for the cause set forth by Powderly, as also the efforts made by Powderly to bring the strike to an honorable termination. In this general expression of approval of the action of the Knights of Labor, the course of Webb is as unequivocally condemned.

The power of the supreme council in the matter of the strike has been exerted to aid the Knights of Labor through their representatives to secure a recognition of their order by the rich and powerful corporation; to secure for workingmen, victims of autocratic power, a hearing, and to perform such other kindly offices as were proper under the circumstances, demonstrating sympathy and good will, thereby aiding the Knights of Labor to bring the strike to a close upon principles of right and justice.

In this, the council met with failure, owing to the aristocratic attitude of Webb. It now becomes necessary for the supreme council to say, that owing to the fact that the Knights of Labor is not a member of the federated order of railway employes, the laws of the supreme council do not permit its doing more than it has done to aid the Knights of Labor and its inability to participate otherwise in the strike is now known and appreciated by Powderly.

Referring to the laws of the supreme council relating to the strike, the matter is concisely presented as follows:

In the first place, if the members of either organizations, on any railroad, have a grievance it is to be submitted to the proper officers of the road by the local grievance committee; in the event of a failure to obtain satisfaction, the chief executive officer of the order having the grievance is called upon, and in connection with the committee seeks to amicably adjust the difficulty. If a failure still attends the efforts to adjust the trouble, then the supreme council is convened at the headquarters of the railroad officials, with whom a conference is requested and its influence is exerted to obtain a settlement, alike just to all parties. If a failure still follows their efforts to remove the cause of complaint and the council, by unanimous vote, decides that the grievance be of such gravity as to justify a strike, it is promptly ordered, in which event all of the members of the various organizations employed on the road where the grievance exists: Firemen, conductors, trainmen and switchmen shall abandon their work.

In conclusion the supreme council places upon the records its high appreciation of the manliness of the Knights of Labor employed on the New York Central in struggling to maintain the principle sacred to every working man on the continent, and to all who love justice and hope for their triumph of right over wrong, as flagrant as ever stained the pages of history.

FRANK SARGENT, President.

W. A. SHEEHAN, Secretary.

A Query.

Implicit obedience to all orders is in general the correct principle for the guidance of railway men as well as soldiers, and yet there are occasions when the railway man must use judgment even to the extent of violating instructions; as for example in the case of the locomotive engineer on the Union Pacific railway at Denver, who when a depot building was burning refused to move his engine and pull the general manager's official car from the structure without orders from the dispatcher. The dispatcher was not at hand to give the instructions and the valuable car was burned. The engineer, who is said to have been one of the oldest in the service, may have acted conscientiously, but he certainly displayed astonishing lack of judgment and it might be said of common sense, and was promptly discharged, because stubborn adherence to a rule in the face of extraordinary circumstances which evidently rendered the rule for the time being nugatory is a very dangerous characteristic, in view of the many contingencies to which the railway service is liable. Railway men must be thinking men, although it is true also that to some extent their duties seem to make them mere machines.—Railway Age.

If the above engineer had moved his engine to pull out the official car, met with some accident and been discharged for "disobeying the rules" and thus causing an accident, what would the Age say of it?

Superintendent Loomis, of the Louisville, New Albany & Chicago road, has resigned because he considers that the employes of that road are being worked to death. It is understood that Mr. Loomis had made several attempts at shortening the hours of the men; and after finding that he could not accomplish the object he chose rather to resign than continue in a position which was a burden entirely too distasteful for a man who has any regard for his subordinates. We admire Mr. Loomis for his action. This self-sacrifice will stand out in bold relief, a glittering mark in that gentleman's future life.—Railway News Reporter.

The above item probably gives the true cause of the recent collision by which several were killed.

A circular comes to us from the Central Railroad & Banking Company of Georgia that bears two familiar names. The first is that of Brother J. T. Johnson, who is appointed train master of the S. & W. Division, and the second is D. D. Curran, who makes the appointment and who is superintendent of the division. Members who attended the Eighteenth Grand Division at Louisville, will remember Brother Curran as the delegate from Montgomery, while J. T. needs no introduction to those who have attended the last four sessions. We hope his new duties will not keep him from attending hereafter.

Will any one that knows the address of Geo. R. Merritt, of Division 102, kindly send it to this office and oblige?

Mr. Powderly's reply to the manifesto of H. Walter Webb is a sensible, masterly document and completely refutes H. Walter's assertions and claims.

Lost—Two members of Division No. 13, E. B. Garver and Wm. Falkiner, lately employed on the M. C. Who knows where either can be found?

Brother E. T. Stockwell wishes through THE CONDUCTOR, to thank the unknown Brother, who kindly sent him reading matter on "Sunday" and other subjects. He states that it was thankfully received and carefully read.

Elmira, Aug. 25th.—C. S. Wheaton, president of the Independent Order of Railway Conductors, says that he has resigned his position and that the resignation has been accepted. He is to engage in other business.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

Born, to Brother and Mrs. F. C. Manly, Aug. 23d, a son, who as Brother Manly says, is a good democrat, and will help Minnesota to the right side in a few years, and this will inform Brother Manly that the political persuasion suits us exactly.

A movement is on foot for a readjustment of the pay of conductors and brakeman on the I. C., and from the names of the members of the committee having the matter in charge, we are satisfied that the interests of the Order and the B. of R. T. will be looked after.

Brother Thomas McLaughlin, chief conductor of Cincinnati Division No. 107, wishes the address of Thos. Smiley of that division and will be grateful to any one who can send it to him. Brother McLaughlin says that there are a number of members of that division who have not supplied the secretary with their post office addresses, and requests that any member of 107 who may see this notice, immediately send his correct address to the secretary in order that he may know where to address all.

One of the most faithful members in the Order is Brother F. C. Webb, who has been largely instrumental in bringing about the organization of Division 137 at Osawatomie, has lately been promoted to the position of train master at Council Grove. The new division will miss Brother Webb.

A very attractive programme is that given by Division 242 for their second annual picnic and excursion which is to take place on August 30th. THE CONDUCTOR acknowledges with thanks the receipt of complimentary tickets and regrets exceedingly that circumstances prevented our attendance.

Capt. James Lyttle died at Middletown, N. Y., Aug. 21, of paralysis, aged seventy-two. He was one of the pioneer conductors of the Erie railroad before the days of telegraphing, and often worked his way from Piermont to Binghamton, when the return trains failed to show up, sending a flagman ahead at every curve.

Some changes having been made on the N. Y. C. at Rochester, one of them which places G. J. C., Shults on the Charlotte passenger. If Jud can handle passengers as well as he can a Grand Division, he will make a success. He with Bro. Spellman will be remembered as active members of the committee of arrangements.

We are very glad indeed to learn of the honorable and manly action of E. D. Nash in the matter of Division 24. It is in strong contrast to that of some of his associates in the "Independent" O. R. C., he has not in any way attempted to influence those under him, but has given them positive assurance that continuing their membership will not affect their situations or treatment in the slightest degree.

The daily Republican of this city says in its issue of August 21st, that the Order of Railway Conductors has split. Our neighbor is about three months behind if it has just learned of the "split," if the secession of a score or so of members can be dignified by calling it a split.

**

On leaving the C. & I. C. R'y to go to his new position with the Rock Island, a diamond stud was presented to Brother Page by the employes, "Jim" Thacker making the presentation. Col. Page leaves an enviable record behind him, and his former employes will be disappointed if he does not make a good one at Topeka.

**

No private citizen or corporation has a right to bring into a state an armed body of men and set them up as preservers of the peace. These mercenaries are responsible to nobody, as has been shown on a dozen occasions. Instead of preserving the peace, the effect of their presence is usually to precipitate violence.—Chicago Times.

**

Brother Fitzgerald, of 122, has our thanks for Boston papers containing full accounts of the late terrible accident on the Old Colony near Quincy, which twenty-two persons lost their lives and a number of others were injured. From the best evidence obtainable, the accident was caused by a track jack carelessly left on the track by the section men.

**

W. H. Burns has resigned his position with the U. P. to become general manager of the Montana Union. Our acquaintance with Mr. Burns is confined to one brief meeting, but from that and his reputation with those who know him well, we believe the employes of the Union will be well satisfied and that the company will have an efficient officer.

**

R. Harvey Reed, surgeon of the B. & O. R'y at Mansfield, and treasurer of the National Association of Railway Surgeons, warns employes against the "Railway Brotherhood Hospital" scheme of Drs. Meisse & Thorpe, of Chicago, and says that the names of the doctors are not given in the medical and surgical registry of the United States. We did not publish the "prospectus" of the hospital because of some personal doubts as to its character and standing, as it seemed to us to promise a little too much.

As will be noted by the statement of the Supreme Council published elsewhere, the laws of that body prevented them from ordering a strike in support of the Knights of Labor on the Central, under the circumstances, but they express their approval and sympathy and offer any assistance that can be given short of a strike, and that means a good deal, for in many cases the active sympathy and tacit support of other employes in case of a strike of any class, is as beneficial as if all joined the strike.

**

A report is being circulated that a member of the B. of R. C. has a copy of a letter from E. E. Clark to Geo. W. Howard, stating that he (Clark) would withdraw from the Order and join the B. of R. C. if that organization would pay him the same salary that he is now receiving. Brother Clark has written no such letter to Mr. Howard, or any one else, and if any one claims to have a copy of any such letter, it is either a forgery or the person making the claim is guilty of falsehood.

One of the most malicious and despicable acts that it has ever been our fortune to chronicle was that of the conductors who went to the widow of the late Brother Wm. Kees, of Division 54, and told her that his insurance in the Benefit Department was no good and that she never would get it or any portion of it. Whether the object was to induce Mrs. Kees to sell her claim for a low price or simply to annoy and worry her because her husband had not seen fit to sever his connection with the Order, it is equally despicable.

**

Assistant Superintendent W. H. Burns, of the Nebraska division of the U. P. having resigned, Brother W. L. Park, of North Platte Division No. 35, is appointed to that position, taking effect August 19. We congratulate Mr. Barr on his selection of an assistant, and the boys on the fact that they will have to deal with a man so well qualified to understand the needs of the service and of the employes, Brother Park having made his way from brakeman and when the appointment was made was running the fast mail between Omaha and Cheyenne.

Mr. Webb has finally condescended to say that the Knights of Labor who were dismissed from the N. Y. C. were dismissed for drunkenness and insubordination. If this statement is true and Mr. Webb can demonstrate it, it will stop the strike on the Central immediately, but such a statement made at this late day, and after repeatedly declining to give any reason has lost what little force it might have had if it had been made promptly. Railway organizations have no trouble in arranging for a satisfactory investigation in cases of dismissal of their members with most roads, and the officers who meet so just a request in a spirit of fairness, never have cause to complain of its abuse, but on the contrary find themselves relieved of much importunity for the reason that the organization comes in and says to the dismissed member, "you have no cause of complaint." Under the circumstances Mr. Webb's statement cannot be unhesitatingly accepted as truth.

We have to thank the members of Indianapolis Division, No. 103, for an extremely pleasant visit, and for many courtesies received at their hands. The most we can say now, is that we will visit Indianapolis again the first opportunity.

**

We have been favored with a call from Bro. Wm. Woodruff of Division 198. He reports many of the original seceders in the New England States, as being truly repentant and anxious to return to the original O. of R. C., which if not "Independent" has lots of members competent to fill the office of "President."

We are in receipt of a model of a lever brake, invented by Brother C. W. Murray, and it is unquestionably the best thing in the way of a hand-brake that we have yet seen. The adoption of power brakes will not do away with the "Arm-strong," as with the best of machinery and the closest watchfulness, power brakes sometimes fail and then trainmen must rely on the old style. One simple motion sets the Murray brake, and on a train equipped with it, a brakeman can set three brakes while he would be "taking up the slack" on the ordinary hand-brake. The change from the present hand-brake to the Murray lever, can be readily and cheaply made, and in our opinion it will pay any railroad company to use it even if all cars are equipped with air.

Brother James Donlin, of Erie Division 64, was instantly killed at Conneautville, Pa., by being run over by engine 411 Aug. 12, 1890. Brother Donlin was engaged in staking out a car off the siding, and stepping back on the main track, directly behind the engine, (which was backing up) he was struck by the tender, and knocked down, the tender wheels ran over him cutting off his head and one foot. Brother Donlin at the time of his death was the oldest conductor in continuous service on the E. & P. Division, Pennsylvania Company's Lines; his wife died several years ago, and his mother an aged lady kept house for him up to the time of her death, two months since. Brother Donlin leaves five orphan children who are at present in the care of Sisters of Mercy at Erie.

Owing to a combine between the stenographer, the printer and the proof reader, Brother Shults was elected to the office of Grand Senior Conductor, and Bro. Weisz deprived of his membership in the Grand Division. Brother Garretson and the executive committee object to the promotion of Brother Shults by this combine just now, and Brother Weisz objects to being so unceremoniously dropped from the roll, so all that's left is for us to ask pardon for the untimely effort to make any such general change and blame it all on the printer. It is probably needless for us to add that the inadvertant omission of Brother Weisz's name from the roll of permanent members does not deprive him of his membership, nor does the error in giving the title of Brother Shults make him G. S. C.

It is stated that the officers of roads centering in Chicago have decided that if the present strike on the Central should be extended to all the Vanderbilt lines that all will shut down their roads, stop all trains and dismiss all employes, so that those who are not actively engaged in the strike cannot support those who are idle. From a purely selfish standpoint it is sincerely to be hoped that they will do so. Nothing that can be done would so surely solidify all railway employes and its immediate effect would be to give the active support of every employe in the United States to the knights, while it would also bring upon the heads of the roads, the enmity of employes who might otherwise be disposed to be friendly, and create a feeling on the part of the public generally, that the roads would be wise to avoid.

We have to report the organization of Great Northern Division No. 179 at Grand Forks, Dakota, by G. S. C., Garretson and McKees Rocks Division No. 201 at Chartiers, Pa., by A. G. C. C., Wilkins. The officers of the new divisions are 178, C. C., J. W. Hilby, Devil's Lake, Dak., W. H. Norrie, Crookston, Minn., 201, C. C., J. W. Wright, box 407, Secretary, D. H. Speer, box 407.

Brother Garretson and Wilkins, wish to extend sincere thanks for the aid given them by the Brothers, and Brother Wilkins wishes to specially acknowledge the kindness of Mr. Chas. Deitrick train master of the P. & L. E. R'y for arranging to have the members present at the organization. The organization at Chartiers was followed by a banquet at Schlosser's hotel in the evening. The links thus added to the chain of perpetual friendship, bid fair to be strong ones and the members are welcomed heartily by THE CONDUCTOR which wishes for them a long and prosperous future.

We are in receipt of "Irene and other poems" by "The Conductor" from L. W. Canady of Div. 57, who introduces himself in a brief preface by saying: "I do not claim for this work great literary merit, but I have tried to present Truth with Simplicity, and I hope everyone who reads may find at least one line that will strike a responsive chord in their own hearts." The reader who cannot find something in this little collection of half a dozen brief poems that will awaken thought, must indeed be deaf to the poet's song. Bro. Canady sentimentally sings of the charms of "Irene," brings back vividly the days of long ago in Fiddler Joe, and pays a tribute to faithfulness in Jim Bertram, but to our mind his muse is at its best in The Adventuress, and the pathos of some of its lines is seldom equaled.

"— Is now by fate's revengeful hand o'er-thrown,
And doomed to die forgotten and alone.
Nay, not alone. What man hath ever guessed
The depths of love within a mother's breast?
She, who thy nestling, infant form hath pressed,
Is of all friends the first, the last, the best.
Alone she kneels beside the dying bed,
Imploring mercy on that sinful head.
Her quiv'ring voice with filial love intoned,
Ascends where grace and mercy are enthroned.
O, surely, He who sits in Judgment there,
Will grant the sorrow stricken mother's prayer."

In taking up the September Wide-Awake, both the juveniles and the elders will turn at once to Mr. Ward's Andover serial; the chapter in this issue ought to be read in every college in the land. "Doc.'s death-bed is a fearsome warning to those students who think "hazing" a manly kind of "lark;" the dog "Calvin's" doings gives the necessary sunny relief, in these chapters. C. E. Garland has a capital story in this number, "The Last Base-ball of the Season." Preston Lee Otis gives a strong story, too, of Southern life, entitled "Rijane." "My Friend, Ah Ging," a San Francisco story by G. Adams, will interest the boys, and reads like a true tale. "The Quest of the Whipping-Boy" ends in this number. "Four Fire-Buckets," by Mary Bolles Branch, is a good lesson for officious little girls. An amusing

"Tragedy in Three Scenes," entitled "She did not go to Cooking-School," by Miss Pollock, the teacher of the cooking class in Washington, will be sure to be in demand for entertainments. There are several unusually fine illustrated papers in the number; among them "Helen's Tower," describing Lord Dufferin's beautiful devotion to his mother; "Capturing a Sea-Cow," by Dr. Hard; and "An Obscure Hero," by Edith M. Degen, giving an account of Mr. Hadley's work for the Indians.

The September St. Nicholas devotes the opening paper to Oliver Wendell Holmes, a visit to the poet being appreciatively described by Annie Isabel Willis. The illustration showing Dr. Holmes in his library is especially good. W. J. Henderson of the New York Times, shows that "Great Ocean Waves," whatever they may be, are not properly called "tidal waves." A very strong drawing by Taber skillfully depicts the appearance of an enormous head wave as seen from the deck of an ocean steamer.

Richard Harding Davis tells the exciting and clever story of the "Great Tri-Club Tennis Tournament," and another excellent story, by Kate W. Hamilton, describes the rescue of an Alaskan child from superstitious members of her own tribe who were about to put her to death as a witch. Ernest E. Thompson writes the "True Story of a Little Gray Rabbit," and explains by a careful diagram just how the hound was thrown off the track. Professor Roberts describes his experience in a lumber camp and incidentally explains the trick called "Chopping Him Down," which the lumbermen tried to play upon him, but to their own discomfiture owing to the fact that a panther joins in the game. Boys will enjoy the story of a sharp bit of base-ball strategy, "My Triple Play," by Thomas Worthington King.

Other amusing or bright contributions are: "A Little Contraband," by Charles McIlvaine, which is both humorous and pathetic; "Wooden Shoes," an article beautifully illustrated by the author, Anna Page Scott; "Two Suprise Parties," by John Clover, and a great number of clever bits of verse and artistic pictures.

Only the new pieces are mentioned, but there are serials and continued sketches as well. Of these we may remind our readers of "Lady Jane," "Crowded out o' Crofield," "Bat, Ball and Diamond," "Through the Back Ages," "The Brownies," and the departments.

Mr. Zogbaum's article in The September Scribner, entitled "With Uncle Sam's Blue Jackets Afloat," gives a vivid picture of life on a modern warship under very new conditions, describing the voyage of the fleet from New York to Lisbon. The illustrations are from sketches made during the voyage. Other articles in this series will describe naval life in port, with interesting glimpses of strange people and curious incidents of harbor life.

The series on "Homes in City and Country" has attracted wide attention by reason of the high reputation of the writers, and the practical suggestions which abound in both text and illustrations. Mr. Linn's article on "Co-operative Home-winning" (May), Mr. Russell Sturgis's on "The City House in the East" (June), and Mr. Bruce Price's on "The Suburban House" (July), have represented typical houses adapted to a wide range of conditions, both as to cost and situation. Mr. Mitchell, in "The Country House," writes on a problem very different from the preceding articles—the making of a home for the year 'round in the real country—far enough away from a city to be uninfluenced by urban conditions. Some of the oldest homesteads in this country, as well as some of the most modern, are pictured in the illustrations. The best architecture in important Western cities will be illustrated in the article which John W. Root, of Chicago, is writing for an early issue of this magazine.

Professor Shaler's paper on "Nature and Man in America," opens up a faithful field for the application of scientific knowledge to partial affairs. He shows that the surface of North America affords peculiar advantages for disseminating race characteristics bred elsewhere, and bringing them into interaction on a field favorable for their best development.

When Thomas Stephens was at Zanzibar, he met some of the most influential men engaged in African affairs, and acquired a knowledge of the industrial and commercial problems that are beginning to be worked out in Africa. His article on "African River and Lake Systems" shows the relations which the waterways of the dark continent bear to its possible development.

California topics occupy considerable space in the September Century. The paper by John Muir on "The Treasures of the Yosemite Valley," in the August number, is followed by another on "Features of the Proposed Yosemite National Park," which is illustrated by William Keith and Charles D. Robinson, the California artists, and Fraser, Moran and Davies, the sketches being made in several instances from sketches by Mr. Muir himself. The writer describes the wonderful scenery in the neighborhood of Yosemite—the Lyell Glacier, the Cathedral Peak region, the Tuolumne Meadows and Canon, and the Hetch-Hetchy Valley, all of which are included in the limits of the proposed park as defined by General Vandever's bill in the present Congress. In conclusion, Mr. Muir records his protest against the injuries done to the Yosemite Valley under the control of the present and preceding commissions. In "Topics of the Time," is an editorial in the same strain on "Amateur Management of Yosemite Scenery." The number also contains, apropos of the celebration on September 8th of the fortieth anniversary of the admission of the State, a paper by George Hamlin Fitch, entitled, "How California Came into the Union," illustrated by a large portrait of General Fremont from a daguerreotype of 1850, and by others of Commodore Sloat and Stockton, Governor Burnett, Senator Gwin, and J. Ross Browne, together with pictures of Colton Hall, Monterey—the scene of the Constitutional Convention—and the famous Bear Flag, hoisted at Sonoma in '46. This paper is a forerunner of the series on the Gold Hunters, and in the present number The Century begins a temporary department of "California," similar to the "Memoranda on the Civil War," and to be devoted to short articles on topics of special interest relating to the '49ers. This month these articles are "Light on the Seizure of California," by Professor Royce of Harvard, "The California Boundary Question," by Francis J. Lippit, Esq., and "The Date of the Discovery of the Yosemite," by Dr. Bunnell, of the Party of Discovery.

The frontispiece is an engraving by T. A. Butler of Nattier's picturesque portrait of the beautiful Princess de Conti, an attractive prelude to Mrs. Amelia Gere Mason's fifth paper on "The Women of the French Salons," which is further illustrated by striking portraits of the Duchess de Luxembourg, Catharine II in Russian costume, Madame Geoffrin and Madame d'Épinay. These portraits are accompanied by dainty decorative pieces by George Wharton Edwards. Mrs. Mason's text deals with the Salons of the Eighteenth Century.

A paper of timely interest, practically illustrated is Commander C. F. Goodrich's description of "Our New Naval Guns," detailing the process of manufacture and recounting their remarkable efficiency.

Now is my soul troubled.—John XII—27.

WHEREAS, In God's mysterious dispensation, a respected Brother of Buffalo Division No. 2, Brother John D. Horton and his faithful wife are called upon to pass under the rod of sorrow and affliction caused by the death of their only and well-beloved daughter, Flora J. Wilson, this division, in its heart throbs of sorrow and pity, desires to express to Brother Horton and his family, their loving friendship and tender sympathy in this, their dark hour of affliction. Death is never welcome, and especially is it unwelcome when the victim is in the prime of a useful and busy life, the light and joy of a happy home, a loving careful and confiding daughter, while human words are vain and empty in the presence of such grief. We can only offer our heartfelt sympathy together with these words of the Master, "Peace I leave with you, let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid, I am the light and the life."

E. J. R., Secretary.

At a regular meeting of Bartlett Division, No. 214, O. R. C., held in the Pythian temple, the following resolutions of condolence were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, God in his infinite mercy and wisdom has called away a beautiful child, eleven months old, from the home of our worthy Brother, Clifford Ayer, and has also taken unto himself two lovely children, (infants,) from the home of our worthy Brother, A. E. Brown, gone to that bourne from which no traveler ever returns:

Resolved, That we extend our untold sympathy to them and their wives in this their hour of affliction, urging them to be reconciled to Him who doeth all things well.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon our minutes and a copy sent to THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, and one each to the city papers for publication.

J. E. OLIVE,
JOHN BERRY,
P. E. HENIE, } Committee.

AUGUSTA, Georgia, August 23, 1890

At a regular meeting of this Division (Agusta 202) the following resolutions were adopted upon the death of our Brother, S. P. Harris, died at Atlanta, Georgia, August 18th, 1890.

WHEREAS, God in His infinite wisdom has removed from our midst our beloved Brother, Samuel P. Harris, be it Resolved, That we extend to his bereaved wife and family, the heartfelt sympathy of each and every member of this division.

Resolved, That in the death of our Brother, Division No. 202, has lost one of its best and noblest members, his family a loving husband and father, the public a true and faithful servant.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for thirty days in honor of him who has crossed the dark waters and entered his home of eternal rest.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this division, a copy sent under the seal of this division to his bereaved family, also, that they be published in THE CONDUCTOR, our official journal.

S. L. HOLLINGSWORTH,
J. A. HOBBS,
H. A. COLCOCK, } Committee.

Aug. 24, 1890.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the chief of all conductors to remove from our midst, by death, Brother Hugh Hawkins, of Parsons, Kans., and who was running a train on the M., K. & T.; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we extend to the wife and family of our late Brother our profound sympathy in their great affliction.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for 30 days in honor of our deceased Brother. Farther that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this Division; that a copy be published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, and that a copy be sent to his wife.

As train No. 2, on the St. L. A. & T. R'y (Cotton Belt), Bro. W. W. Alexander, conductor; was at Camden, Brother Alexander's father put his daughter on board the train, when the train started instead of getting off he remained on intending to get off at the crossing which is about one-hundred yards from the depot; but Mr. Alexander misjudged the speed of the train, and when he got off fell down and rolled under the train, having his leg cut off and otherwise injured, from which he died in about five hours. Mr. Alexander was over sixty-three years old. This accident is particularly sad as Brother Alexander, nor any one on the train knew of the old gentleman's accident until they had reached the next telegraph office which is seventeen miles. Brother Alexander has been very much afflicted as his only brother was killed a few months since while engaged in coupling cars. Therefore be it

Resolved, That Cotton Belt Division No. 251, extend to Brother Alexander and his family, our sincere and heartfelt sympathy in this their sad bereavment.

Resolved, That these resolutions be placed on the record books of this Division, and that a copy be sent to THE CONDUCTOR for publication.

At a regular meeting held by Erickson Division No. 5, L. A. of O. R. C. the following resolutions were unanimously adopted in memory of Thomas Moore.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Great Ruler of the universe to remove suddenly, and unlooked for, by death, the kind and loving husband of our Sister, Mrs. M. Moore, and

WHEREAS, We bow submissively to the will of a Divine Power. We know that our Sister has sustained a great loss, a loss which no earthly friend can fill; let each one of us act as sister's part and say a sympathetic word, and at all times show to this afflicted Sister, that we are willing to mourn with her in all her afflictions and trials, for we know not how soon we may be called upon to part with our loved one. So it is meet that we should do our whole duty to those we have promised to lend our aid and sympathy in their time of trouble and affliction.

Resolved, That we as sisters extend to her our heartfelt sympathy in her great bereavement, and be it further

Resolved, That as a token of esteem to our worthy Sister, a copy of these resolutions be spread on our minutes, and a copy be sent to our bereaved Sister. Also a copy to the RAILWAY CONDUCTOR for publication.

Resolutions of Respect.

At a meeting of Hiawatha Division, No. 249, Order of Railway Conductors, held yesterday, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the universe in His wisdom to call our late brother and secretary, James R. Lewis to eternal rest, on the 18th of August, at Toronto, Canada, and,

WHEREAS, By his untimely death his wife has lost an affectionate husband and his children the kindest of fathers, and this division a true brother

Resolved, That our sympathies are with the family of our late brother in their great affliction, that we commend them to Him who doeth all things well, who has taken our brother unto himself.

Resolved, That our charter be draped with the emblems of mourning for thirty days in memory of our departed brother, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his grief stricken family, that they be spread upon our records under the division seal and also be inserted in the next issue of the Daily Mining Journal and THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

NO. 18.

THE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

At the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, in the post office exhibit, was a double picture showing the postal service at the beginning of the century and as it is to-day. On one side was a postman, perhaps Franklin, on horseback, jogging over a corduroy road, "through the forest primeval," making a mile or two an hour, and on the other a representation of the fast mail train, the "catcher" taking a pouch from the "crane," as it passes at the rate of fifty miles an hour. Standing in the foreground is the pretty daughter of the village postmaster with the mail pouch just thrown from the car, in her hand, a group of rustics, with ill-concealed admiration in their eyes, watching her as the swiftly passing train goes on its journey. This picture is not, perhaps, a work of art, but it is an "object lesson," giving at a glance the progress that our country has made in a hundred years.

Of all the executive departments of the governments, the post office is the one nearest the people, and the one with which they are most familiar. In addition to its work of collecting, transporting and delivering legitimate mail matter, viz: letters, newspapers and magazines, it is the greatest express company of the continent, since it has an office at almost every cross-roads, even carrying merchandise cheaper (considering the distance) than its rivals. Its registration system affords a means of forwarding valuable packages, at a slight additional cost, with almost absolute security. It is the greatest banking institution on this side of the Atlantic. The transactions of its money order department, not only in our own country, but with almost every nation of the civilized world, (Russia and Spain excepted) run up to well nigh fabulous sums. Its drafts are easily obtained and cheap. Its notes are "gilt edged," and have never been repudiated. With the creation of the postal savings bank system, the working people's department in its organization will approach perfection.

The first mention of a travelling post-office occurs in a memorial addressed to congress in November, 1776, by Ebenezer Hazard, postmaster general under the Continental Congress, in which he states that owing to the frequent removals of the continental army, he was subjected to extraordinary expense, difficulties and fatigues, "having paid an exorbitant price for every necessary of life, and having been obliged, for want of a horse—which could not be procured—to follow the army on foot."

Directly after the inauguration of General Washington, in April, 1789, the organization of the post office department followed, and Samuel Osgood, of Massachusetts, was appointed postmaster general. That the people might derive the greatest possible advantage from an institution peculiarly their own, this gigantic monopoly—for it is nothing else—was created, and all competition forbidden. The postmaster general had then but one clerk, and there were but 75 post offices and 1,875 miles of post roads in the United States; the cost of mail transportation being $22,081, the total revenue $37,935; the total expenditures, $32,140; leaving a surplus of $5,795. From this time until 1836 the contracts made for the transportation of the mails do not mention any kind of service on post roads except stages, sulkies, four-horse post-coaches, horseback, packets, and steam-boats.

The growth of the railway mail service has been coincident with that of the railway itself, and the importance of both cannot be underestimated in considering the future development of the country. Almost as soon as a railroad is fully organized it becomes a mail contractor with the department.

The act of congress constituting every railroad in the United States a post-route, was approved July 7, 1838. Postmaster General Barry, in his annual report for 1836, speaks of the multiplication of railroads in many parts of the country, and suggests it as a subject worthy of inquiry, whether measures may not be taken to secure the transportation of the mails on them, and adds: "Already have the railroads between Frenchtown in Maryland, and Newcastle in Delaware, and between Camden and South Amboy in New Jersey, afforded great and important facilities to the transportation of the great eastern mail." At this time a railroad between Washington and New York was in process of construction, and Postmaster General Barry dwelt in his report on the importance of the facilities that would be afforded for speedy service between the two cities, predicting that the run between them would probably be made in sixteen hours. The service is now performed in about five hours.

At first the facilities for mail service were very limited. Postmaster General Kendal in 1835, suggested that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company might be asked to close in some portion of their baggage cars, a strong lock being placed on the apartment, to which only the postmasters at Baltimore and Washington should have keys. In the same report he adds: "If wheels can be constructed which can be used alike upon the railroads and streets of the cities respectively, the department will furnish an entire car containing the mail to be delivered at one depot, and received at the other, asking nothing of the company but to haul it." It was even proposed at this time that the government should have their own locomotives, everything else on the road giving the right of way to the mail train. This proposition was not adopted. The fear was expressed, however, that if the department did not have absolute control over the road, the people would have to depend on the stage or other horse transportation for mail service. All these early troubles in time passed away, and, through concessions on both sides, the railways soon became the most important agents of the post office department.

This, of course, was not accomplished without many trials and tribulations. It seems strange, in the light of the present, to read in an official report, a remonstrance of route agents that nearly every night dead bodies were placed in the mail crates between Philadelphia and New York, and the mails packed around the coffins. This breach of good order disappeared after that time, and with it came to an end the freight methods and the old stage coach ideas of dealing with the mails.

A separate compartment in a baggage car, fitted up with a few conveniences necessary for the distribution of local way mail, was the beginning of the system which has developed into the luxurious postal cars of the present time. As a matter of history, however, it is only fair to say, that the system which we then adopted had been in use for sometime by our northern neighbors of Canada, who had taken it from the mother country.

The credit of suggesting the first step toward the present system has generally been given to Colonel A. B. Armstrong, who, in 1864 was Assistant Postmaster at Chicago. This is incorrect; Mr. W. A. Davis, a clerk of the St. Joseph, Mo. Post-office, where the overland mail was made up, conceived the idea in 1862, that if the letters and papers could be assorted on the cars between Quincy and St. Joseph, the overland mail could start promptly on time. He was given permission to carry out this idea, and there are vouchers on file at the Department at Washington showing that he was paid for that specific work. In 1864 Colonel Armstrong was authorized and encouraged by the Hon. Montgomery Blair, then Postmaster-General, to undertake the difficult task of arranging and introducing the service. On August 31, 1864, he wrote: "To-day I commenced the new distribution." Subsequently Colonel Armstrong became the first General Railway Mail Superintendent, and held the office until ill-health compelled him to resign, in 1877. To Colonel Geo. S. Bangs, of Illinois, and his successors, Theodore N. Veil, William B. Thompson, and John Jameson, is due the excellence of the present system. Colonel Bangs was a thoroughly equipped Post-Office man, energetic, courageous and progressive. Brimfull of ideas he was always on the lookout for improvement. Never satisfied with old ways he was constantly striving to simplify and better the service. He forgot himself in his work and died a martyr to his duty, leaving the traveling Post-Office of to-day a monument to his memory. While to Colonel Armstrong is due the credit for the skeleton of the system, it was the genius of Colonel Bangs that clothed the bones with flesh, developed the sinew, put the blood in circulation, and breathed into its body the breath of life. Colonel Bangs found that, in 1871 everything was disjointed, disconnected and sluggish. There was no attempt at "certainty, security or celerity." It was a "go-as-you-please" condition of affairs. He grappled at once with it and brought order out of chaos. He introduced a system of emulation among the employes, rewarding those who displayed proficiency by promotion over the sluggish, and thus, in fact, was probably the father of what is known as Civil Service Reform. In 1874 he discussed the propriety of establishing a fast and exclusive mail train between New York and Chicago, this "train" (quoting his report to the Postmaster-General), "to be under the control of the Department, so far as it is necessary for the purposes designed, and to run the distance in about twenty-four hours. It is conceded by railway officials that this can be done. The importance of a line like this cannot be over estimated. It would reduce the actual time of mail between the east and west from twelve to twenty-four hours. As it would necessarily be established upon one or more of the trunk lines, having an extended system of connections, its benefit would be in no case confined, but extended through all parts of the country alike."

This report met with the approval of Postmaster-General Jewell, who ordered Bangs to negotiate with the New York Central and Hudson River railroad and the Lake Shore railroad for a fast mail train, leaving New York at four o'clock in the morning, and arriving at Chicago in about twenty-four hours. It was the old story of making bricks without straw. The postoffice department had no appropriation to pay for such facilities, hence it had to depend at first on the public spirit of the railroad authorities. Commodore Vanderbilt, the president of the companies whose lines were to be used, had had dealings with the department, and was perhaps, not altogether sanguine as to the practical issue of the experiment, or in respect to the countenance it would receive from congress; but Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, the vice-president, lent a willing ear to Mr. Bangs' proposition, and did his utmost to aid him in putting it into effect. There being no special appropriation available for the purpose in hand, "the devil was whipped around the stump" by Colonel Bangs stipulating that if Mr. Vanderbilt would have twenty cars built, and the service performed, all matter originating at or coming into the New York post office, which could reach its destination at the same time by this line, should be sent by this train, and that the railway companies could have the right to demand a weighing of the mail matter at will, all railroads being paid according to weight.

When the details of the plan were communicated to Commodore Vanderbilt, he is reported to have said to his son: "You want to do this, go ahead; but I know the post-office department, and you will too, within a year." Mr. Vanderbilt did "go ahead." He constructed and equipped the finest mail train ever seen on the planet, ran it for ten months, never missed a connection at Chicago, and was always on time at New York. He did not have to wait a year, however, for the sagacious old Commodore's prophecy. Within three weeks, despite the indignant protest of Colonel Bangs, the mails of three states were ordered to be taken from this and given to another route. A grosser and more wanton breach of plighted faith it would be hard to find, and its results were far-reaching and disastrous.

This train was a marvel of completeness and efficiency. It was manned by picked men, and the only complaint ever made against it was that it ran so fast that the clerks had not time to sort the mails for the post-offices between New York and Poughkeepsie. To obviate this Colonel Bangs requested the postmaster at New York to have two hundred mail bags dyed red, which should contain the mails for those post-offices nearest together, so that the crew in the train could distribute them first. There was no complaint after that. But when the dyer's bill was sent by the postmaster to the department, it was disallowed by a clerk of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who, in a letter announcing the fact, said there was no necessity for the outlay if the postal clerks did their duty. Bangs, who had just arrived at the postoffice from a day and a night's ride on his favorite train, was lying on a sofa half asleep in the postmaster's private office, as that official was opening the mail. When he came to that letter he handed it to Bangs. He was wide awake in an instant. "Mr. Postmaster," said he, "do you know the man who signed this letter? He is a wheezy priest, a fool, and a Baptist at that. Give me the letter." The bill was allowed as soon as Bangs reached the department. He was wrong, however, in crediting the subordinate to the Baptist faith. He was an ornament of another persuasion.—From The American Railway, Chas. Scribner's Sons.

William Ewart Gladstone.

Deeds, not words nor time, are the measure of greatness. The flash of a sword, the throb of a heart, the speech for a right may send a name ringing through the ages. Touissant L'Ouverture, John Howard, Patrick Henry, are immortal names. To-day, William Ewart Gladstone stands pre-eminent, not only in words and thoughts, but also in manly deeds, great as an orator, great as a statesman, great as an author, but above all as a man. His speeches and writings may soon be forgotten, but the results accomplished by his labors in behalf of his fellowmen will be imperishable. Other great statesmen have built up nations, strong and mighty; other public men have more apparent results, but no one so truly combines the best qualities of hand, of head and of heart.

Compare him a moment with Europe's other great statesman. Bismarck has made Germany a strong nation. He has increased her territory by fully one-half; he has raised her to a foremost rank, with full treasuries, a large army, a large navy, and a united people. But by what measures has he accomplished this? By his stern and unrelenting will, by the tyrannical enforcement of law. On the principle of the government for the government and not the government for the people. He has bound the state by bars of iron in the form of cruel laws. But iron corrodes, rusts, and drops into pieces. Unjust laws fall before the common right. On the other hand, Gladstone has built up a nation, not by tyranny, but by earnest and judicious measures. He has bound England by bands like the roots of a living tree, which, spreading farther and farther with age, secure a firm holding and although against the tree the storms and winds may beat, still it is only the thunderbolt of God that can move it. Bismarck's policy is: "Country before right;" Gladstone's: "Right before country."

Like all great reformers Gladstone is always in advance of thought, like all true leaders must be. Often because of this he has been retired to private life, yet he is ever in power even if out of office. Whether he be the Premier of England, or simply the great Commoner, his influence in English politics is never lessened. Just as the earth-born giant, Antæus, whenever he touched the earth, arose stronger than before, so Gladstone, after each defeat, arises stronger and more powerful in every way. He is ever ready to help the weak and oppressed, and to-day Ireland looks to him as her defender, the Irish people extend their hands to him in thanks and supplications, humanity sets its seal upon him for his noble advocacy of Irish freedom. Throughout his whole life Gladstone has been conspicuous for his fair and honorable dealings and his watchful care for the advantage of his fellowmen. The methods which he employs to accomplish his ends are frank and open. He is no trickster, and he wins the admiration of even his opponents by his undeniable integrity. Farsighted and intellectual, Mr. Gladstone managed the state affairs of the English empire in a way that rivals all comparison. During his administration there were few of those petty quarrels that arise so often between the powers of the world. He ruled with equity, and passed such measures as were just and right, not only in the judgment of his own but in that of the whole world. The rash schemes of the adventurer and the fallacious plan of the ambitious had no friend in him, but an impeachable foe who never rested until he had secured their defeat.

But his plans did not always meet the approval of the Queen. Anxious for the progress of England alone, the rule of Gladstone, "Right before country," had no champion in her, and this caused many a disagreement between them. During one of these Gladstone said: "You must do this." Angered, she replied: "Who are you that dares say must to the queen of England?" "Madam," he said, coolly, "You are the queen of England, but do you know who I am? I am the people of England and in this case the people say must." Such moral courage is characteristic of Gladstone. Looking neither to the right nor to the left, not watching to see who follows, but pointing straight ahead to justice and equity he moves onward. And who follow him? The fair minded, the generous hearted, the just and honorable, they follow him. It has been said of him:

"A long life, pure and spotless as the snow that falls on his own highland hills lies behind him; a life that has been accompanied all along its lengthened way by a great intellect and a pure heart; a life that has been conspicuous for its devotion to the best interests of his fellow countrymen and of mankind."

Finally we can do no better than to quote his own words, indeed worthy of so great a man:

"Walking in the path of justice we cannot err; guided by that light we are safe: every step we take upon our road brings us nearer to the goal, and every obstacle, though it seem for the moment unsurmountable, can only for a little while retard and never can defeat the final triumph."

THOMAS C. ROGERS,
June 27, 1890. Middletown, N. Y.

"Party Rate" Possibilities.

While the decision of the interstate commerce commission, which a federal court has just nullified, prohibiting railway companies from making reductions in their established passenger rates to theatrical and other parties no doubt proved a hardship to traveling shows it is a question whether it was not more for the interest of the railways than the order which now repeals it. The decisions of the court seems to have been based largely on the premise that the party ticket, like the mileage and commutation ticket, is an adaptation of the wholesale principle recognized in every business; and as under the interstate commerce law such tickets cannot as formerly be confined to theatrical companies and similar special interests but must be given to the public under similar conditions the principle evidently is equitable. But whether the party ticket is a profitable device for the railways is likely now to depend on whether or not it will be profitable for them to reduce their passenger rate to two cents a mile for everybody. The court in ruling in favor of the party rate declared among other things that "it is almost proof against fraud upon the company which issues it" to which declaration, however, we take leave to file an exception. On the other hand it looks as if the party rate offered an open door to extensive and continuous imposition upon the railways. That it is a cause of disagreement among the roads and tends to destroy rate agreements has been indicated in the past and is already, since the rendering of the recent decision in its favor, illustrated by the action of one of the great railway companies in announcing that it will sell tickets at the rate of two cents per mile to parties of seven or more, ten being the smallest number heretofore admitted to these privileges. The circular of the Pennsylvania company to ticket agents regarding the sale of "one way party rate tickets" reads as follows:

These tickets are to be sold only to parties of not less than seven persons traveling together, and one ticket should be used for the entire party. They are to be sold only for passage one way, and must not be filled for the round trip under any circumstances. They will be good for continuous passage only, and must be stamped and limit punched for the date upon which they are to be used. For example, if the party wishes to start on Aug. 14 the ticket should be stamped Aug. 14 and punched to expire Aug. 14. No stop over will be allowed. These tickets may be sold at the rates named, 2 cents per mile per capita, to any party of seven or more persons. They will be open to the public and not confined exclusively to theatrical troupes, base ball clubs, minstrel troupes, and parties of that kind.

Now what is to prevent any seven persons who chance to be going from any place to another given place from getting together at the ticket office and buying their ticket at two thirds of the regular rate for single tickets? It is not even necessary that all of them shall be going to the same destination, for it may be considerably cheaper for some of them to pay the two cent rate to the farther point and get off at intermediate stations than to buy their single tickets at the rate of three cents or more per mile. The wide awake ticket scalper, too, will hardly fail to avail himself of the admirable opportunity thus offered by the railways for beating themselves. It will be extremely easy for him to bring seven of his customers together so as to make use of a party ride ticket at such a saving to themselves that they can well afford to compensate the philanthropic scalper for his trouble. It is not even necessary that the full number of seven co-operate in this money saving scheme, as the fare to a given point for six, five or even four persons may be less in the aggregate at two cents per mile than it would be for the same number of single tickets at the local rate. Thus for a trip of 400 miles the party rate ticket for seven would cost $56, while at three cents per mile the single rate fare for five persons would be $60. The instructions above quoted of course do not require the ticket seller or the conductor to have evidence that the party actually consists of seven, and certainly a railway would not be justified in refusing to carry a smaller number of persons than it had received pay for carrying.

It is to be supposed that the general passenger agents have considered all these and other possibilities for the abuse of party tickets, and hence it would seem as if they were inclined to a voluntary reduction of rates to two cents per mile. Indeed it is already threatened by one or more companies to retaliate on the company that has reduced the party rate limit from ten to seven by further reducing it to five, which will of course be accepted with gratitude by the scalpers and the traveling public generally as still further facilitating the general use of the two cent rate. Hereafter when demagogues denounce railway officials as extortionate and grasping they need only to be reminded of the voluntary reduction of rates by the passenger department through the party ticket to be put to shame.—Railway Age.

That private persons should be permitted to organize and control an army of men, equipped with the latest improved breech-loading guns, to be sent by hundreds, or thousands if necessary, to great cities for the ostensible purpose of protecting property, but in reality to overawe striking workmen and to shoot them down upon the provocation such creatures always create, is an insult to every state government, and a menace to every free institution.

Such bodies of men have no proper connection with the law maintaining and law preserving departments of American governments. They belong neither to the militia, police or sheriff's posse. They are not selected with a view to public service under regulations fixed by any law, nor which prescribe the qualifications of those who compose them. Those who command them bear no official relations to the government; the whole scheme is a private one—entered into by the Pinkertons, because the men and guns they supply are in demand and will more willingly serve the purpose of those who hire them. No such body of men could exist under any other civilized government in the world. No other government would, even by inaction, permit a private citizen to equip an army with the equipments of war within its borders, to be held in readiness to move with celerity, for private hire, from one section of the country to another, whether to overawe bodies of its workingmen out on a strike, or for any other purpose.

Every government should exclusively control and manage organized bodies of armed men within its territory. When such bodies are necessary to preserve the peace and protect property, the government should supply them. The government may be that of the nation, state, county or city. In the framework of our governmental systems ample provisions have been made everywhere for such protection. If resistance to law cannot be controlled by the sheriff and his deputies, he may call upon the posse—which is every able-bodied man within his jurisdiction—and if they do not respond or are not efficient to preserve the peace, upon request the governor must send the militia of the state to aid him in maintaining the majesty of the law. These are the only rightful agencies to be used in such emergencies and any private army organized, maintained and equipped at private expense, to be hired out upon call to private persons or corporations because they imagine their property is threatened, is as lawless and dangerous to the peace of the community as the mob itself.

This attitude does not in any manner detract from the right of every person and corporation to protect their property. They may guard and defend it. They may resort to every lawful means and device to effect this end. They may employ guards if they fear surprises, they may call upon the mayor of the city for its police, the sheriff of the county for his posse and the governor for the militia, and if the law is observed they will be promptly forthcoming in all proper cases.

But the private army may not be organized and kept, to be hired out to them at will. Its very presence is necessarily irritating and often precipitates the trouble it is brought in to avoid. The men comprising it may possibly be enlisted from the dregs and scourgings of the earth; if they are not, it is but the will of a private person that has it otherwise. They are necessarily without the restraining influences of authorized authority to punish for disobedience of orders; all they have to fear is discharge from the service of their employer if they kill a man too soon or fire into a crowd of unoffending by-standers upon too slight a provocation, according to the notion of their employer. It may be said that the law will punish them if they transgress the law, but we cannot now recall an instance from the many in which unoffending men, women and children have been ruthlessly killed by this Pinkerton army in which the murderer has suffered for his crime. The fact that he belonged to that army, and the money of the company for whom the killing was done, have been potential enough to shield the slayer in every case.

Such organizations as these are unrepugnant. Their toleration would disgrace a despotic government. Their existence in the United States is a confession that this republic is unable, through its police, its sheriffs, its militia, its army and its laws, to protect its citizens and preserve their property.—Rocky Mountain News.

Webb's Position.

Mr. Webb, of the New York Central railway, is occupying as large a place in the public eye at present as did Mr. Hoxie, of the Missouri Pacific, a few years ago. There have been evidences that this is a place Mr. Webb has had some hankering after, if we may take the display he made on the occasion of his trip to Alaska a couple of years ago as a straw to show the wind's direction. He traveled in regal style on that trip, and took care that the people, whom his superior officer had previously damned, should be aware of the fact. We don't know who Mr. Webb was before he became Third Vice-President of the New York Central, but his action in the Alaska expedition, and in his treatment of the accredited representatives of the Knights of Labor in the pending strike, would furnish presumptive evidence that he was not long ago a sleeping-car porter, and is still feeling his oats.

Webb has refused to arbitrate the question in dispute between the company and the men, has declined, practically, to discuss the matter. He proposes to run his business as he chooses, and will not brook any interference by outside parties. Were Mr. Webb's business a private one, his position would be unassailable. Mr. Powderly, nor any other man, has no prescriptive right to intermeddle in any dispute that may arise between John Smith, factory owner, and Thomas Brown, factory operative. But Smith, he if be a reasonable and fair-minded man, and has reason to believe that Powderly approaches him in a sincere desire to mend the breach, and is, in a sense, a representative of the other party to the question, will discuss the subject with him, and possibly consent to refer it to the arbitrament of an unprejudiced court. But it can hardly be claimed that the New York Central stands in the position of a private individual or corporation. It is a company which has assumed certain obligations to the state, from which it has received large subventions. It has undertaken, for instance, to furnish regular trains for the transportation of passengers and goods. The state—the people—find that it is not doing this, because of a disagreement it has fallen into with the state—with the people in its employ. Under these circumstances, there would be no injuries done to Webb or his company were he compelled, by law, to refer the matter in dispute to a board of arbitrators.

The fact is, Mr. Webb has taken such an arbitrary, domineering, high-and-lofty course, that he has sent popular feeling veering around to the side of the strikers in a most decided manner. The events of the past three days, Webb's insolent attitude and Powderly's earnest and calm manifesto, have changed the face of affairs, and in place of the strike petering out it bids fair to become more general, and therefore more serious than ever. Mr. Webb has assumed a position he may find he is unable to maintain. In saying that he has no question he wishes to send to a board of arbitrators, he says that might is to be right, and that we may only expect a railway to arbitrate when it fears it is weak.

Mr. Webb is a type of a class of officials, happily rare, who do much to embitter Labor against Capital, and to create unnecessary and easily avoidable friction between employer and employe. The relations of the one with the other, based as they are upon mutual advantage, should be friendly and cordial, but when a man like Webb gives those beneath him in position to understand that he considers them merely pegs to be stuck in such holes as he pleases, or thrown out on the brush heap at his discretion, cordiality and confidence must vanish and hatred and suspicion take their place. The day is past, in this country at least, of lord and serf, of knight and vassal, and he is a fool who undertakes to play either lord or knight. The men who run our railroads are not to be treated as spoiled children, and are not fit subjects for the exercise of any puling autocrat's ill-temper.—St. Thomas Ontario Journal.

The Old Way the Best.

While you may not witness any direct act of cruelty toward the negro roustabouts on a Mississippi river steamer by the mate, you can't help but expect it every time the boat makes a landing. He is always provided with a stick or cane, and the way he flourishes it and curses the hands is enough to drive a nervous person to his stateroom. I was talking of this to a mate one day, and he told me of an incident that happened on the Robert E. Lee. One of the owners of the boat happened to see the mate strike a hand, and he made such a fuss about it that the captain promised a change of programme from Vicksburg down. The mate was told how to demean himself, and when the boat swung out he was as gentle as a lamb. Before she made her first landing he had on a plug hat, a dress coat, and gloves, and was smoking a dainty cigar. As the steamer swung in to take on 200 bags of cottonseed at a plantation the mate quietly ordered:

"Please get out them bow and stern lines. Please hurry up with that gang plank. Now, gentlemen, bring on them bags."

The hands looked at him in great astonishment, consumed double time in making fast, and when all were ashore went into convention to discuss matters.

"Here, you—what's the matter there?" called the Captain.

"Gwine to quit," replied one of them.

"Quit! What for?"

"Suthin' wrong wid de Lee on dis trip, Cap'n. She's gwine to blow up or strike a snag."

"What makes you think so?"

"Look at de mate, sah. Suthin' wrong dar'—suthin' mighty wrong. When a mate stop dat cussin' suthin' gwine ter break."

The owner was consulted, and he said it was possible he had taken a wrong view of the case. As a test, the mate might go back to old tactics.

"Here, you black devils," shouted the mate, as he peeled off his finery and grabbed a club, "get along now; up with them bags; hi! there, Kenben; walk your heels; tote that seed; cuss your livers, but don't be four minutes at this landing, or I'll murder every black devil of you!"

"Dat's mo' lik—dat's ole talk," shouted the crowd, and in three minutes and a half the boat swung out.—Louisville Times.

One of our most valued exchanges is The Office, published by David Williams, 66 Duane street, New York, and which is a paper that is of value to every one employed in an office of any kind from the messenger to the chief. The price heretofore has been $2 per annum, but the publishers announce that owing to the success of the paper and the encouragement they have received from the office men of the United States, they have decided to reduce it to $1 per annum, and at this price no office man can afford to be without it.

Southern Pacific Employees.

Instead of an agreement being reached yesterday between the Southern Pacific officials and employees, further complications arose which further separated the two sides.

The Grievance Committee of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, met the company's officials at Fourth and Townsend streets at 2 p. m. according to appointment, and expected to hear the proposition for a new schedule of wages which had been prepared in answer to that presented by the Grievance Committee. The conference was brief and adjourned without any conclusion being reached. The company was represented by General Superintendent Filmore, Assistant General Superintendent Pratt, Superintendent of Track Curtis, the division superintendents and some other officials. Mr. Curtis' account was as follows:

"The conference adjourned without anything being done. We had been led to believe all along that this general grievance committee of the Brotherhood of Trainmen was authorized to represent all of the men interested. We discovered to-day, and they virtually admitted, that they were acting in the name of their own order only; still they had presented demands concerning the salaries of all the conductors on the system, the switchmen and some of the baggagemen. Most of these belong to other orders. We told them that we could only consider demands from authorized representatives of all the men.

"We want to settle the whole matter at once. We do not want to go over the whole matter with one committee, and then go over the whole matter again with other committees, to which the arrangements made with one committee may not be satisfactory. We told them to get proper representatives of all the men together, and then we would discuss the matter. Some of them said that they doubted their ability to do so. I cannot predict what the next move or what the result will be. There are some hot-headed ones among them, but a majority seem cool-headed, and if the men do anything rash and inconsiderate I shall be much surprised. Whenever we can meet men with whom we can negotiate the whole matter at once we will be ready to present propositions which are just and fair. We are ready to modify many things complained of and have no objections whatever to the existence of any of the orders."

From leading members of the General Grievance Committee it was learned that the sudden hitch in negotiations was the result of an inside difficulty of apparently small importance among the men themselves. At 2' the time set for the conference a small committee from Oakland division of the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors called at Fourth and Townsend streets and had a conference with some of the officials by themselves. This committee said that the Grievance Committee of the Brotherhood of Trainmen had no authority to represent its order, and demanded to be allowed to act in conjunction with the Grievance Committee during the negotiations. The Grievance Committee asserted that it had ample authority to conduct the negotiations, and that it would not recognize the protesting committee. That was the cause of the hitch, and on account of this protest the officials of the company declined to proceed with negotiations. The committee left in a very hostile frame of mind and held a secret meeting elsewhere.

Several leading members of the committee made the following statement when interviewed by a Chronicle reporter:

"At the brief conference to-day our demands were not considered at all. All the company did was to refuse to recognize this committee, and we left. The cause of this trouble is just this. We fairly represented all of the men on the system for whom the demands are presented. Our brotherhood includes as many conductors as either the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors or the Order of Railway Conductors on this committee. The committee represents all divisions and all conductors and switchmen who do not belong to our brotherhood approve of our course and acknowledge us as their representatives.

"Now a few members of the Oakland division of the Brotherhood of Conductors only want to act with us, but we refuse to recognize them. We would have no objection to acting with the General Grievance Committee of their brotherhood. Their demands are just the same as those we presented, and all they want is to get some credit for doing something. For a little matter of form they are imperiling the interests of all the employees.

"The company merely seized on this protest to as an excuse for putting us off. We will not go to it again, but will go ahead and act as though it had refused our demands, and the road will probably be tied up. We have reported the situation to Grand Master Wilkinson, and either he or a representative will probably be out here at once.

"The result of the company's action to-day is that the matter has passed from our hands to those of the grand master's and now we are waiting for instructions from him. He may order a strike before calling the Supreme Council of the federation together, or he may not."

"The fact is," said one of the committee, "the company is looking for a strike and so are we, prepared for it."

The result is that the entire situation changed yesterday in a manner not favorable to peace, and no one can tell what the next move will be, though further steps looking toward a settlement will without any doubt be made by one side or the other. Very much depends on the action of Grand Master Wilkinson.—San Francisco Chronicle.

"Our Naval Guns."

From an article on the above by Commander C. F. Goodrich, in The Century for September, we quote as follows: "How very few persons, by the way, appreciate the latent power of a modern projectile when in motion. Those who have visited the Atlanta and have seen her smaller guns, of six inches caliber, whisked about by one man, will be even the less likely to realize that their shot can pierce an iron plate over eight inches thick at a distance of a thousand yards. Try to imagine for a moment the number of men who would have to pull on a line that, arranged in any conceivable way, could be made to throw the hundred-pound shot with force enough to make such a hole. Yet all of this power is stored up in a cartridge weighing less than fifty pounds. To contain and restrain such a power we must, it is evident, use the best material obtainable; the best at the beginning, best in the midst of firing, and best at the close. It must stand the sudden and heavy first shock; must yield a little, without rupture or permanent distortion, when the pressure is at its greatest; must return to its original shape when all is over; and it must offer, at all times, the greatest possible resistance to fracture. Technically our metal must be tough, elastic, and of great tensile strength. These qualities find their highest development in forged steel. . . . As in guns, so in what they throw, the tendency is towards larger masses, more perfect material, greater destructiveness. The cannon-ball of our grandfathers gave place to the eight inch and nine-inch shell of our fathers. To-day we are using elongated steel projectiles—weighing in some cases a ton each—that will pierce iron armor measured in thickness by the foot, or even the yard; we are charging some with melinite or other frightful explosives that will create untold havoc, or with noxious chemicals to suffocate a whole ship's company.

"Other weapons are experiencing the same development. Hotchkiss—an American of course—brought out his revolver cannon, then his rapid-fire guns. The largest of these was a six-pounder. Mounted on a swivel it could be fired from the shoulder like an old wall piece, delivering about twelve shots a minute. Presto! we now hear of 30-pounders, 70-pounders, and 100-pounders of this type. Imagine shoulder practice with a six-inch gun weighing five tons and three-quarters, at the rate of eight or ten rounds in a minute, each round capable of piercing fifteen inches of wrought iron! Such guns exist, and will constitute a large part of the armament of the most modern ships of war. Every one is inventing some new form of mounting to hold the gun that deals such rapid and powerful blows, or of breech mechanism to lessen the time taken up in loading. Electricity, steam, hydraulic and pneumatic power are used in our new ships to load and handle guns. Maxim—American again—utilizes the recoil of the piece to do all the loading and firing.

"The improvements in guns within the last few years have been so great as to amount to a revolution, and their constant end has been increase in the power of the gun and in the rapidity of its fire. In the first direction we appear to have reached a limit in the 110-ton gun, and there is a tendency to recede, for it is generally agreed that a smaller gun will do the work required for naval service. The largest gun contemplated for our new battle-ships is the thirteen-inch 60-ton gun, firing a 1200-pound shell with a velocity of 2100 feet per second. In the second direction we are making constant progress, but it is mainly by improvements in gun mountings and in the service of ammunition. The limit of the rapid-fire principle is reached when the ammunition becomes too heavy to be easily handled by one man, and it is believed that this limit has even been passed in the English six-inch rapid-fire gun. For the present at least we are content with a four-inch gun firing a 36-pound shell; and a large part of the armament of the ships now building will consist of these guns."

The Old War-Ships and the New

The old sailing frigate and the great line of battle ships, with towering masts and enormous squares of canvas, their long rows of guns, tier upon tier, their crews of several hundred men, have disappeared in the mists of the past along with the heroes of Cooper and Marryat. The smallest vessel of our squadron, with her six guns, her powerful engines, and all the appliances of defence and offence, that steam and electricity, in short, that modern science contributes to the safety and efficiency of a ship and a ship's company at the present time, would destroy a whole fleet of "saucy Arethusas." With the change in the ships, a change in the life and training of the sailor has come, a change so great, that one of Nelson's old sea-dogs, or even a Jackey of our late war, would be dumfounded at the manifold duties required of a modern man-of-war's man. Jack must be a soldier nowadays as well as a seaman. He must understand the intricate mechanism of the revolving cannon, the delicate sights and complicated breech apparatus of the heavy guns with their hydraulic mountings, the manual and care of his magazine rifle and self-cocking revolver, as well as how to go aloft in a gale of wind and "pass the weather ear-ring," to pull an oar in a boat, or to knot and splice a rope. In a man-of-war's crew of to-day, many of the men must be specially trained for the special kind of work falling to their share in the general tout-ensemble of modern scientific appliances necessary to insure the efficiency of the ship as an instrument of warfare, and to provide for the comfort and wellfare of those serving on board of her. For example, the Yorktown, which at the time of the writing of this article is probably the most thoroughly equipped with the newest appointments of any of the vessels of our new navy now in commission, comprises in its new crew of one hundred and eighty men—exclusive of her line officers, surgeons, engineers and paymaster—several expert electricians to run the dynamo and keep in order the electric appliances; machinists—one of whom is a boiler maker, and the others qualified for duties connected with running and repairing the complicated engines, the distilling of the drinking-water, the heating apparatus, and and the many uses that steam can be put to; an apothecary, several so-called yeoman as assistants to the paymaster, engineers, etc.; besides a blacksmith, taylor, painter, carpenters, sailmaker and others.—From "With Uncle Sam's Blue Jackets Afloat," by RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM, in September Scribner.

Collapse of the Railroad Strike.

As the general confederation of railway employes has refused to join the Knights of Labor the Central strike cannot be much longer maintained. The Knights confessed that they could not continue the struggle without the assistance of the federation in a "sympathetic" strike; and as this assistance is withheld, nothing remains but to abandon the conflict. Further resistance would only enable the New York Central Railway managers to fill up the places of the strikers with outsiders, and thus accomplish more effectually the object attributed to them—namely, a warfare upon the Knights of Labor organization. By continuing a hopeless struggle the Knights of Labor would, therefore, be playing into their hands. If it be the design of Mr. Webb to break up this organization on the New York Central Railway system he could not ask anything better than that the strikers should hold out long enough to enable him to supply their places with non-union laborers at his leisure. He would not be likely to find such another opportunity of carrying out his programme.

While expressing warm sympathy with the Knights and thoroughly convinced of the justice of their cause, the United Order of Railway Employes have what they regard as satisfactory reasons for not entering upon a strike and thus inflicting widespread disaster upon business interests. But their movement has not been without important consequences to the organization of labor. By their attitude they have extorted from Mr. Webb a reluctant and tardy explanation that the railroad employes in question were not removed as Knights of Labor, but because of drunkenness, insubordination and incompetency. Though they do not believe that Mr. Webb has given the true reasons for his acts, they take his declaration for what it is worth, as a concession to the rights of organized labor.

The plain meaning of the address from Terre Haute is that if Mr. Webb had acted in regard to members of the federation of Railway Employes as he did to the Knights of Labor he would have provoked a warfare along the whole line of the Vanderbilt system. Though not prepared to strike upon the provocation given to the Knights, the United Railway Employes, believing that their organization is also menaced by Mr. Webb, have assumed a waiting attitude, which may be turned into a hostile movement upon the first serious provocation. Henceforth the present management of the New York Central Railway will be regarded by them with profound suspicion and distrust. In order to allay this feeling an authoritative declaration by the officials of the company that they do not intend to make war upon labor organizations would be timely and reassuring. As for the railroad labor unions, the lesson of the hour is that they can accomplish nothing except by a thorough, compact, and harmonious organization, such as does not now exist. With such an organization in existence the danger of railroad strikes would be greatly lessened. Each side would be better able to estimate its own power and its responsibilities; and even though perfect harmony might not be established between employer and employe, each side would be careful not to provoke a conflict without seriousla weighing all the consequences.—Phila. Record.

Missouri Pacific Railway.

THIS MEMORANDUM, Made this first day of May, 1890, shall constitute a LETTER OF INSTRUCTIONS to all Division Superintendents, Train Masters and other officers in the service of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company, fixing the pay rates of all conductors employed on the said Railways, and their leased and operated lines.

1. Hereafter, in the employment of conductors in the service of the above companies, Division Superintendents are hereby instructed to employ none but sober, reliable, competent, able-bodied and experienced men for this service, and all conductors employed by these companies will be directly responsible to and subject to the orders and control of the Division Train Masters and Division Superintendents at all times and in all matters pertaining to their duties. No other subordinate officer will be allowed to interfere in the discipline and control of train conductors.

2. In the employment and promotion of train conductors and their assignment to train runs, these instructions shall hereafter be conformed to and carried out strictly in all respects, on all the railway lines owned, leased or operated by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company.

3. Conductors will be considered in the line of promotion by their seniority or term of service, dependent on their general good conduct, faithful discharge of their duties, and also their ability to assume increased responsibility. Whenever additional conductors are required in the passenger train service, promotions will be made from the list of freight conductors, as above, with the following exception.

4. The General Superintendents of these companies reserve the right to employ additional or new men for any positions in their train service, or other service, whenever they consider that the interests of the company require them to do so.

5. TRAIN CONDUCTORS WILL BE PAID THE FOLLOWING SCHEDULE OF RATES:

	Per month
Conductors of Passenger trains, - - -	$100.00
Conductors of Pusher Engines, - - -	75.00
Conductors of Work Trains, - - - -	85.00

6. All Conductors on through freight trains are to be paid by the trip, three (3) cents per mile. All runs of 100 miles or less to constitute a day's work.

7. The monthly pay rates of local freight and mixed train conductors are to include the 26 or 27 working days of each month. Road service rendered by local crews on Sundays, or other extra service, shall be paid as extra work, at regular rates for the class of service performed.

8. For all freight train men employed by the month, 26 or 27 days shall be rated as a full month, and fractional time or parts of a month shall be paid for as so many twenty-sixths of a month.

9. Conductors of all local freight trains and mixed trains for a regular run of 100 miles or less are to be paid for full time of 26 or 27 days, $90 per month. For fractional time they will be paid at the rate of $3.50 per day, excepting that on the several Branch Lines below specified, they will be paid the following schedule of rates:

10. ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN & SOUTHERN BRANCH LINES.

NAME OF BRANCH.	LENGTH OF LINE.	DAILY MILEAGE.	RATE PER MONTH.	RATE PER DAY.
Potosi.....	4	32	$75.00	$2.90
Jackson.....	16	64	85.00	3.25
Doniphan	20	40	85.00	3.25
White River..	42	84	85.00	3.25
Camden.....	34	68	85.00	3.25
Ft. Smith....	18.2	36.4	85.00	3.25
Warren.....	56	112	90.00	3.50

MISSOURI PACIFIC BRANCH LINES.

11. Monthly rates of pay of conductors will remain as at present on Missouri Pacific Branches named below:

Carondelet Branch; Lebanon Branch; Jefferson City, Boonville & Lexington Division; Boonville Branch; Sedalia, Warsaw & Southern Railway; St. Louis & Emporia Division, Crete Branch; Lincoln Branch, between Weeping Water and Lincoln; Central Branch Division, between Downs and Lenora; Republican Valley Branch and Pacific Railway in Nebraska; Burr Oak Branch; South Solomon Branch and Rooks County Railroad; Kansas & Arizona Division; Great Bend Branch; Ft. Scott, Wichita & Western Railway, between Wichita and Kiowa; Denver, Memphis & Atlantic (Eastern) Division; McPherson Branch; Grouse Creek Railway; Le Roy & Caney Valley Air Line Division; Kansas Southwestern Railway.

12. For running pay trains and special passenger and excursion trains, conductors and brakemen will be paid as follows:

Conductors for runs of 125 miles or less, $3.25 per day.

For runs of more than 125 miles, 2½ cents per mile.

Brakemen will be paid on same basis—$2.00 per day and 1½ cents per mile.

13. On all main line local freight and mixed trains, the train crews shall consist of a conductor and three brakemen. On branch roads where the service is light, the crews shall consist of a conductor and two brakemen, excepting that on branches where the trains are heavy enough to require them, three brakemen shall be employed, at the discretion of the Division Superintendent.

OVER-TIME AND EXCESS MILEAGE.

14. Over-time will be allowed and paid to all conductors of local and through freight trains and mixed trains as follows:

On all freight runs of less than 100 miles, which runs may require more than 10 hours' time, the conductors are to be paid over-time at the uniform rate of 30 cents per hour, deducting two hours for delayed time. When the delayed time on any trip amounts to more than two hours, all over-time in excess of ten hours to be paid for at the above rate.

15. On all through freight runs of over 100 miles, conductors shall be paid three (3) cents per mile for all mileage made on each run, and in addition to actual mileage, over-time shall be paid them on a basis of ten miles per hour. For example; On a run of 150 miles, they shall be paid three cents per mile for 150 miles run, and in addition thereto, for all over-time made in excess of 15 hours, at the uniform rate of 30 cents per hour.

16. On all local freight and mixed train runs of over 100 miles, conductors shall be paid, in addition to their regular daily rates, three (3) cents per mile for all mileage made in excess of 100 miles run, and over-time at 30 cents per hour, as above.

17. In computing over-time, no fraction of an hour less than 30 minutes shall be counted, but all over-time of 30 minutes or over and less than one hour shall be counted one hour.

18. Brakemen on all through, local and mixed freight trains will in all cases be paid for the same mileage and over-time as is paid their respective conductors.

19. No over-time will be paid to any passenger train men that are employed by the month in regular service. When they perform extra service, they will be paid for actual service rendered at their regular rates of pay.

20. Freight conductors and crews living within reasonable limits will be called for duty at all terminal or division stations (as nearly as practicable) one hour before the leaving time of their trains. The working time of all train men shall commence one hour after they sign the caller's book.

21. Any conductor who may fail to respond promptly after being called for duty, thereby delaying his train, will be punished by suspension from duty and pay for such time (not exceeding 15 days) as the Division Superintendent may determine. For a second similar offense the conductor will be liable to be discharged from the service of the company by the Division Superintendent, unless he can give a satisfactory excuse for his failure.

22. If any freight conductor is called for duty and his train is abandoned from any cause, he will be allowed pay for the actual time he is on duty at the rate of 30 cents per hour, and will be entitled to the first run out. The caller shall always have a call book, in which conductors and train men, when called, must enter their names, and also the time they are called.

23. When the freight traffic on any portion of the road is so light that all the freight crews in service are not able to make reasonable wages, a sufficient number of the crews shall be laid off (beginning with the youngest men) until the crews in service are able to make reasonable wages. Any conductors suspended from service under this rule will be given preference as brakemen, and they will retain their rights as conductors and will be replaced on their runs when the freight business requires an increase of crews.

24. Whenever a change of divisions or train runs requires a passenger or freight conductor to change his place of residence, he will be furnished free transportation for his family and household goods to his new place of residence.

25. When passenger or freight conductors make reasonable objections to the Train Master or Division Superintendent against any brakeman under their charge, such brakeman shall be removed and assigned to other duty; or dismissed from the service, according to the circumstances.

26. All instructions given to freight or passenger conductors by Train Masters or Train Dispatchers, relative to the movement of trains or disposition of cars, will be given in train orders or in writing.

27. All Subordinate Officers, including Division Superintendents, Train Masters, Dispatchers, and also all conductors in their daily intercourse, must treat each other civilly and politely at all times.

28. Whenever passenger or freight crews are required to make dead-head trips, they shall be paid one-half regular pay rates for the class of service which requires them to make such dead-head trips.

29. Any passenger or freight conductor may be suspended from duty for a reasonable time, for any alleged misconduct, or for violation of rules or orders; and if after proper investigation, he shall be cleared of the charges made against him and is reinstated in the service of the Company, he shall be paid one-half his regular pay rates for the actual time lost while suspended from duty.

30. No passenger or freight conductor shall be discharged from the service of the Company, except for good and sufficient causes. These causes shall include intemperance, incompetency, habitual neglect of duty, violation of rules or orders, dishonesty and insubordination. For any of these causes they may be suspended by the Division Train Master, and discharged by the Division Superintendent.

31. In case any passenger or freight conductor shall consider that he is unjustly discharged from the service of the Company, he may make a written statement of his case to the Division Superintendent, and within five days after the receipt of such statement he shall be given a fair and impartial hearing in regard to the charges made against him.

32. When any conductor is detailed to attend court as a witness on the part of this Railway Company, or for other Railway Companies, he shall be paid for such service the same rates of pay for the actual time absent from duty as he would be entitled to on his regular run.

33. Passenger and freight conductors and trainmen, after a continuous service of sixteen hours or more, shall be entitled to eight hours rest, if they so desire, before they are again called for service, excepting in cases of wash-outs, wrecks or other similar emergencies.

34. At terminal or division stations where no switching engines or crews are employed, if local freight train crews are called for switching service before leaving such stations, or if they are required to do switching at such stations after they arrive at the end of their runs, they shall be paid extra for such switching service, both before and after making their runs, at the rate of 30 and 20 cents per hour for conductors and brakemen respectively, excepting as specified in the next Article.

35. On all local freight or mixed train runs, that require less than ten hours time per day, no extra switching service will be allowed or paid for until the total time used in making such runs exceeds ten hours per day.

36. The actual time made by conductors and brakemen for switching service, as above specified, shall be kept by the yard master, or, where there is no yard master, by the station agent, in a book kept for that special purpose, and all such switching time shall be returned to the division office and made up in the pay rolls for the months in which the service is rendered.

37. Whenever the crews of through or extra freight trains are required to do switching work at terminal stations, they will also be paid the above rates for such service. No fraction of an hour less than thirty minutes shall be counted; thirty minutes or over and less than one hour shall be counted one hour.

38. The proper Officers of the Railway Company will listen to any reasonable complaints made by either individual conductors or by a committee of conductors, provided proper notice is given in writing as to the subject of complaint, and a special appointment is made as to the time and place to consider the same.

39. The Division Superintendents shall fairly, equitably and promptly decide all matters referred to them by conductors, both as to their seniority in service, and also as to their assignment to train runs, or in any other reasonable matters.

40. In case any conductor shall be aggrieved by his treatment, or by any decision of the Division Superintendent, he shall have the right to appeal his case to the General Superintendent, and his decision in all such cases shall be final as between the conductor and Division Superintendent.

CURRENT RIVER RAILROAD CO.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., August 26, 1890,

Commencing September 1st, 1890, and until further notice, the following schedule of wages and regulations will govern Train Men employed by the above Companies:

PASSENGER SERVICE.

MAIN LINE RUNS BETWEEN KANSAS CITY AND MEMPHIS:

Conductors at the rate of . . .	$125.00	per month.
Baggagemen " "	65.00	"
Brakemen " "	60.00	"
Porters " "	45.00	"

Conductors of trains 401, 402, 101, 102, 301, 302, 5 and 6 will be paid $110 per month. Brakemen on those runs will be paid $55.00 per month.

The current rate of wages will apply to all other passenger men, as well as to all Freight runs.

On runs of one hundred miles or less, over time will be allowed Conductors at the rate of 30 cents per hour. Brakemen 20 cents per hour on all schedule through Freights or Coal Trains which consume over ten hours to make the trip. On Way Freight runs the same rate of overtime will be allowed when the time consumed in making the trip is over twelve hours. On all through Freight runs exceeding one hundred miles, over time will be paid for all time consumed to complete the trip in excess of an average speed of ten miles per hour. On Way Freights over time will apply on time in excess of eight miles per hour. Time consumed by trainmen stopping for meals on the road will not be computed as over time.

In computing over time no fraction of an hour less than thirty minutes will be computed. Any fraction of an hour over thirty minutes will be computed as an hour.

Crews dead-heading under orders, will be paid one-half regular rates.

Crews not assigned to regular runs, will be run first in, first out.

All train men after a continuous service of sixteen hours or more, shall take eight hours rest before again leaving the terminal station in charge of a train, excepting in case of wrecks, washouts or other emergencies.

All employes will be regarded as in line of promotion, dependent upon the faithful discharge of duties, capacity for increased responsibility, suitability for particular service, and term of service.

Smoking, the use of intoxicating liquors or visiting saloons while on duty, will be met with dismissal.

Any employe will be dismissed without a hearing in case of intoxication, insubordination and collisions.

Cupola Cars.

CEDAR RAPIDS CLAIMS THE HONOR OF THEIR DISCOVERY AND APPLICATION—THE FATHER OF ALL CUPOLAS AND ITS DISCOVERY.

The cupola on the way car is a great convenience, but is not much of an architectural achievement. It has only within recent years come into general use and little effort has been made to discover the history of its creation. Unlike most contrivances for the benefit of any large number of people the way-car cupola has never been patented, and those whose lives have been made more agreeable by its advent never inquire when or by what chance the roofs of their cars conceived of the evolution that has changed their whole appearance. A Gazette man with nothing else to think about for a whole half hour, determined to make an exploration into this unknown field of knowledge. He was successful beyond his expectation, for while searching for the history of the invention, he ran upon the inventor. Like everything else of practical application the cupola owes its existence to chance rather than mechanical investigation. The first cupola ever used so far as revealed history is written was on a way car attached to a way freight, running between Clinton and Cedar Rapids in the fall of 1862. T. B. Watson was conductor on the run and Mr. Martin was in charge of a construction train working toward Belle Plaine. By some untoward event the caboose of Martin's train became disabled and he telegraphed in to headquarters at Clinton for permission to use Watson's caboose. This was granted and Watson after some very animated kicking was told to take a box car out of the yards, load his traps into it and run to Clinton when his train would be given a new way car. The supply of box cars at the disposal of the yard master was rather limited and the one he chose to put into commission had a ragged hole in the top perhaps two feet square. The economy of accommodating Watson and getting the car to the repair shop at the same time was an idea that should have secured the promotion of the yardmaster. However, the weather was fine, and a hole in the roof or a total absence of roof was a matter of little moment to a railroad man so long as the old trap had wheels. After more kicking, Watson proceeded to transfer the chests, boxes and other movables from his caboose to the "side-door Pullman," being altogether careless how they were piled up. After his train pulled out for Clinton he noticed that by standing on top of the boxes his head and shoulders reached above the roof. Piling the movables in the car higher, he constructed a seat, and with his head protruding like an ostrich in a low cage, he traveled across the prairies as the sole occupant of the father of all cupolas. When he pulled into the yards at Clinton he hailed Master Mechanic Wilson with: "See here, Wilson, I want a candle box put around this hole and a window so I can watch the engine." "Weel, noo, thacht wad be a gude thing," replied the hard headed old Scot as he returned to the shops. Two way-cars chanced to be in course of construction at the time and Wilson carried out the conductor's joke by building the first cupola cars used. From an ornery looking hole in the top of a reviled box car, the cupola has grown in favor and extended its sphere until a caboose car without a "sitting room" is in bad repute among railroaders. The B. & O. put them into general use in 1865 and other roads have followed its example. The inventor will very likely never have a four-story monument nor hold down a job in a dime museum, but in his way he has done a good work. But to Cedar Rapids must be awarded the honor of sending the first "cupola car" into the world, if it was only a hole in the roof.—Cedar Rapids Gazette.

With all his research, the Gazette man did not find out that in railroad parlance, there is no such thing as a "cupola." When Watson first had his "lookout" built on top of the old "side-door Pullman," the brakemen immediately invented a name for it which has clung to it persistently, and although Webster and Worcester and possibly even the new Century dictionary know nothing about it, the proper title for the elevated "lookout" on the top of a "way-car" or "caboose" is "cupelo," and not "cupola;" if the Gazette scribe will consult Webster, he will at once see that the structure described there as a "cupola," does not in the least resemble a "cupelo," and while it is quite likely that its derivation was by way of mispronunciation of "cupola," it's here to stay and our friend of the Gazette must recognize the fact if he wishes to pass for an "old-timer."

Crooked Roads and Fast Time.

LEXINGTON, Mo., Aug. 28.—It was a jolly crowd of railroad boys holding down the tool-box at Myrick, Sunday, waiting for something to turn up, and the subject ran to crooked roads—these jerk-water lines with right of way like a Tennessee cow-path, or the career of an Alderman, or a Democratic State Treasurer.

"You have all heard of the P. D. Q. line," said Tom Bolton. "Well, that is the crookedest road in the world. Many is the time the passengers have insulted me by putting their heads out of the car window and spitting in my face."

"Look here, Tom," said Engineer Adams, "that might be all right, but it sounds strange. I was on that road, and will acknowledge that I have had rear-end collisions with my own train, but your story is overdrawn."

"Not at all," remarked Chris Walk, "because I have heard Tom often say that when he fired on that road he would make a mistake at times and throw the coal into the headlight instead of the furnace door."

"Yes," interrupted Tom, "until the company gave us crooked-handled shovels to do our work with."

"That might do on that line," broke in Eph King, "but on the Mosquak road the company had to put their furnace doors on the sides of the furnace, as the curves were so sharp that they could double the engine up like a jack-knife, and one would have to stand—"

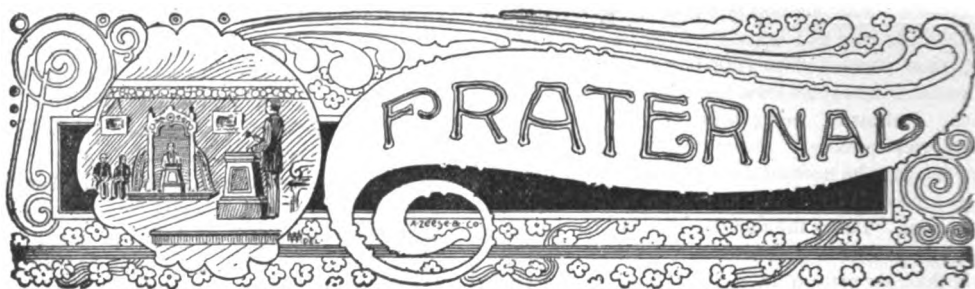

"Ring off!" shouted the crowd, for Eph is not very truthful.

"While we are on the subject," said conductor Lovett, "I must tell you of the trouble we used to have on the J. C. B. and X. At Lapaz we would have to pass a water tank three times before we got close enough to take water."

Engineer Adams said he was somewhat of a liar himself, and told how he backed up an engine so fast that the draw-bar on the cowcatcher stuck out straight and wouldn't come down.

"Backing an engine is nothing," said the colossal prevaricator, King, "but I can do the heavy running. My injectors wouldn't work one day. I acknowledge I was running fast, and I was compelled to stop to see what was the trouble. Gentlemen, believe me, I found the water all backed up at the rear end of the tank, and it was packed so hard that it had to be stirred before—"

But the crowd had fled.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Charlotte Division, No. 221, still lives and is true to its colors.

Despite the changes made at the last Grand Division, about which there has been so much said and written, I don't think we have any sore-heads or kickers in our division. All the members seem to be well pleased with the work of the Grand Division, and we all hope the changes made will be for the best. We have applications at every meeting for membership in the Order. Our chief, Brother Johnson, takes great delight in performing his various duties. We have a good set of officers and they are trying to make each meeting so interesting that none will want to be absent.

Our Order is a noble Order. I am proud that I belong to it, and I hope that at our next annual convention we will be able to show to the world that the O. R. C. has done such a noble and grand work, that the cry may be heard all over the land the O. R. C. is one of the noblest Orders in the world.

Our members are somewhat scattered and some of us seldom get to the meetings, but our hearts are in the work.

We are well pleased with THE CONDUCTOR, and wish it all the success possible.

Yours truly in P. F.,

C. B. GUTHRIE.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug 25, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor.

Being a member of West Philadelphia Division No. 162, O. R. C., and of late working for the tyrannical company known as the Philadelphia & Reading R. R. I thought it may be of some interests for some of the Brothers on other roads to know how they treat us here, and with what respect I have been treated after serving them faithfully for fourteen years in the capacity of fireman, conductor and yard master during that time, and giving entire satisfaction as I hold papers to that effect from Superintendent, Geo. Eltz, and Superintendent, R. B. Cable. No cause or charge against me whatever, yet I was ordered by Superintendent Cable, either to quit the O. R. C. or the service of the company at once. As I claim to be an American citizen and to uphold that claim, I have chosen the latter and will stand by the O. R. C. and hunt work elsewhere. There is no just cause whatever in the action of the Philadelphia & Reading R. R. Company; it is simply done to crush all organized labor. I had to leave the service of the company on August 16, 1890. Superintendent, R. B. Cable told me personally that he was sorry to see me go but that he could do nothing for me as it was an order from headquarters, and that if I applied any where for work and required reference I should refer to him, so you can see I have done my duty. You have my consent to publish part or all of this letter if you see fit, and use my name thereto in the Journal.

I remain yours very truly,

D. T. HIRLEMAN

Editor Railway Conductor:

Noting the communication in THE CONDUCTOR of August 15th, from K. N., and believing he has so squarely struck the key note as regards bettering the Order, that I must let you know (though THE CONDUCTOR rarely has a chance to publish anything from this quarter) there are a few Order men down here, and I doubt not that I voice the sentiments of that few in this state, when I say, we must be put in a better position to protect ourselves, and that too, soon, or we will lose what little we have gained. System Federation is good, but what we want is the best; and it certainly cannot be considered as such so long as there can be no guarantee on our part, to any Order or Orders with whom we may desire to federate, as to our unity of action with them. Let an extra convention be called. Like K. N. I think the expense is an entirely secondary consideration when we must realize how much is at stake and how much materially the Order will be benefitted when we can come squarely out as an Order and not as individuals, and say to Trainmen of other Orders, we desire to and will go hand in hand with them protecting labor from the many unjust abuses it has received in the past at the hands of autocratic capital. In my humble opinion it will come to this sooner or later. The Order not going into federation with the others voluntarily, will either be forced in or will die a quiet lingering death. Time is too precious and life is too short to waste in trying to pick flaws in the actions of other Orders in the past, had I the inclination, which happily I have not; prefer looking to our own interests in trying to strengthen these points where we must all admit we are weakest. Some think, should there be a general federation each Order would necessarily be subject to what might be detrimental as well as some of the arbitrary rulings of some one of the parties to the agreement, and possibly thereby be thrown into a strike where all would not be equally interested. I do not look at it in that light.

If the states of this great Union can enter into an agreement, such as is the constitution, whereby all are as completely federated as we all know they are, and yet each individual state retains its sovereignty, I cannot see why labor organizations should not become united, at least so far as the train service employees are concerned. To win we must have unity; unity of purpose in working for our moral, intellectual and financial advancement and unity of action in submitting cheerfully to the will of a legally constituted majority and pulling all together. This truly is "a consummation devoutly to be wished" and to bring about such we will, undoubtedly, in a great many instances, have to show almost unbounded charity. And charity, my Brothers, does not simply mean that a man must take a dollar out of his pocket and give it to another without receiving something in return for it! nor can I have any charity for a man whose ideas coincide exactly with mine. But to be charitable is to give willingly and cheerfully to those who are in need; and bear patiently with those whose opinions and ideas are contrary to your own. We are all certainly of one house and holy writ declares that a house divided against itself cannot stand, so let us unite, that our stand, when taken in the cause of justice and right, will be so firm it cannot be shaken.

To apply the words of a statesman when trying to bring about unity between the Farmers' Alliance and one of the present great political parties: I want to see a marriage in the Orders of train service employees. I want the O. R. C.

to be the groom and the B. of L. E. to be the bride, with as many of the others as attendants as will join the happy throng, and when the nuptial knot will have been irrevocably tied I want to see the divorce law repealed.

THE.

ATCHISON, Sept. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR:—As it has been about a month since I wrote anything for THE CONDUCTOR, I thought it would be a good time to drop you a line in our behalf.

Now writing for a journal isn't what it is cracked up to be. Of course it is very pleasant to pick up THE CONDUCTOR and see that someone has energy enough about them to say something in behalf of Order; that is, to write it up and have it placed in the columns of THE CONDUCTOR, such as federation and the principles of federating. If each one would give his views we might all of us gain a better knowledge of it.

Now, as for myself, I am in for federation; anyhow I want to be with the gang as long as I remain a member of the Order. Some of the members can write up such subjects as "What a Conductor has to Endure," and it would make a very good dime novel, such as is sold upon our trains daily. There are not many romances happen in this country, but, nevertheless, Brother Fletcher happened to have one on his train a few days ago where there was a lady in it. Of course, there has to be a lady in a romance, or else it won't be a romance. That's all there is about it. I don't think this one could have had much of a lady in it, or at least the language she used did not sound much like that a lady would use, according to the brakeman's report. Once in a while you can take a drummer and make a romance out of him, but not a very large one. In order to make a romance out of a drummer one would have to start out something like this:

"The heavens declare the glory of God, and the drummer drummeth where he sojourneth. Day unto day he uttereth speech and night unto night he drinketh beer and other very harmless beverages.

There is no line he cannot sell, and day unto day he uttereth knowledge. He goeth into all the dark places of earth and is the greatest enlightener and civilizer on the face of the earth. He has no place to lay his head, like the Son of God. He goeth forth like a roaring lion seeking what he can devour.

He works harder mentally and physically than a preacher, and catches trains at all hours of the day and night. Yet he never gets a vacation to go to Europe or Afghanistan or Kamschatka as does a preacher annually.

The drummer is a modern invention, yet God gave Satan a big surprise when He invented him.

You take and put a stale sandwich and a glass of beer in the cylinder of the drummer and his wonderful mechanism will pulsate and vibrate for many many long hours. He will tell lies, sell goods, catch trains, make love to the girls and all that sort thing you know. Oh, I tell you it is all really very remarkable, and the quicker you newspaper men get a move on you, and get on to all these solemn facts, the better it will be for you and for the rising generation."

Now, I think this is something of a romance and would sell very rapidly by news-boys on our trains. Of course, I might say a great many more things about the drummer, but I won't this time. I don't expect you will hear any more from the old man, as he has signed a contract for one year as western correspondent for an eastern journal.

Some of our Brothers went to Herrington, Kans., to organize a new Division, No. 257. They all report a good time and lots of good material for a good Division down there on the Rock Island. It is rumored that one Brother arrived there in a Burton palace car, but I will not mention his name as he came a good distance to help organize. Some one said that Brother Kelley wanted Brother Allen to blow out the electric light when they went to bed, but Brother Allen gave him the laugh and said they would have to go down to the power house and ask the engineer to "shut her off." Well, I will have to bring my "romance" to a close.

Yours in P. F.

DAN MULDOON.

FORT SCOTT, Kans., Sept. 1. 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BRO: Enclosed, please find copy of schedule in force on the K. C. F. S. & M. R'y, which I think ought to be published in THE CONDUCTOR, with the information that it was given unasked and is an increase of pay to every man in the train service.

Main line passenger conductors were receiving $110 per month; the brakemen $50, and the baggagemen $60. Branch and short run conductors were getting $100, and their brakemen $50. Through freight conductors and brakemen were getting on main lines an average of 3 and 2 cents per mile but were not paid any over time. Our local freight conductors receive from $3.25 to $3.60 per day and the brakemen from $2.25 to $2.60 per day, and were allowed over-time in some instances. The rates of pay now in force on this road are as good as on any roads in the country, and the company having made the advances in pay within the past year of their own accord, they should receive great credit for so doing. The management of the above roads is gaining a well deserved reputation for liberality and kind and courteous treatment of employes in all departments, as well as that of being the best equipped road west of the Mississippi. They are extending their lines in several directions and are equipping their freight engines and cars with air and other modern improvements and will soon have the latest improved air signal (whistle) in use on all passenger trains.

Mr. Geo. H. Nettleton, president and general manager, has had the management of the road for years, and has been largely instrumental in making the road what it now is, one of the most popular lines in the country. Mr. W. W. Fagan, general superintendent of lines west of the Mississippi, is an old and well known railroad man, who has the respect and best wishes of not only the patrons but every employe of the road. Mr. H. S. Mitchell, division superintendent of main line and branches between Kansas City and Springfield, Mo., and Mr. H. W. Diggins, division superintendent of main line and branches between Springfield, Mo., and Memphis, Tenn., together with their train masters, Messrs. W. H. Ellis and R. R. Hammond, are men who are seldom equalled or surpassed in kind and courteous treatment of men in their departments, and are extremely popular.

If you see fit to dig something out of this jungle and succeed in making sense out of it, I shall be greatly obliged. Yours truly,

W. H. CHURCHILL.

Wants to "Talk Back."

Wm. P. Daniels, Editor Pro Tem, Railway Conductor,

DEAR SIR: Under the head of "Mentions," in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR for August 1, you acknowledge the receipt of a communication from me, on the "Sunday" question, so-called, but decline to publish the same, giving as a reason that the subject has been changed entirely to a question as to what day of the week is the Sabbath, and finally to a matter of personal abuse. The first claim I frankly admit, but the second, I deny. It does make considerable difference where or how gored, and especially in this particular instance as you very well know. Stockwell's personal attack on me, in No. 8 of THE CONDUCTOR was published without any protest whatever, but when I desire to reply to him I am refused the privilege. Of course that is easily accounted for from the fact that I am not now a member of the "original" O. R. C., having associated myself with the Independent Order of Railway Conductors. I have the satisfaction of knowing that honorably withdrew from the O. R. C., a withdrawal card signed by Secretary of Division 23 in my possession attesting that much, at least.

Being in the position of a minister in "a coward's castle," you can say what you choose, but no one has a ghost of a chance to "talk back." Yes, it does make quite a bit of difference where or how gored. Put that down where you can't get it. The consolation still remains, and I do not know how you can prevent it, that I shall send T. Stockwell a copy of the communication rejected by you. It does not seem to occur to you that there is anything wrong or abusive in what is published concerning C. S. Wheaton, Ostrander and other members of the new order. "They are none so blind, &c."

By the way, what do you think of strikes? New Central, for instance.

Yours truly,

M. SEVERANCE

"A DASTARDLY ATTEMPT."

One of the inseparable evils of a strike, particularly one that is at all protracted, is the opportunity given and almost invariably taken advantage of, for worthless loafers to create disturbance and thus reflect discredit upon the organization that may be interested. It is also a fact that all organizations of men and particularly of railway employes should recognize, that a protracted strike is quite likely to bring about trouble caused by the members of the interested organization. Men who have been accustomed to a busy life, when idle for any length of time, become disheartened, discouraged and often ready to do that which the mere thought of would be repulsive in ordinary times. Thus a striker who sees no prospect of a victory before him and a likelihood of being left without a situation, is likely to brood upon what he considers his wrongs and to think of revenge, and occasionally the tempter gains the ascendancy. THE CONDUCTOR believes that in the interest of those who are engaged in strikes, no strike should under ordinary circumstances be continued longer than two weeks, and it is of the opinion that in nine cases out of ten, it is folly to prolong any contest longer than a few days. In a waiting game capital has the advantage. Under ordinary circumstances, strikes that are directed by organized associations are entirely free from any violence, the organization interested generally taking a special pride in aiding to keep order and to prevent outrage and assault by irresponsible roughs who endeavor to attach themselves to any organization in time of a strike, in the sight of the public at least. After a time, however, the interest of members grows weak and they relax their efforts to control lawlessness; a feeling obtains that if damage is done by others I am not responsible and I am under no obligations to protect the property and employes of a company that will not do me justice. It is a fact that just as pickpockets and thieves mingle in a crowd or are to be found at a fire in a city, so are loafers and thugs, including those not employed by the so-called detective agencies, attracted by a strike, in the hope that by expressing sympathy they may get a drink or may have an opportunity to create a disturbance of some kind. This is one of the things that should be guarded against particularly by any organization that authorizes a strike. From what we can learn from the press reports the New York Central strike has been remarkably free from any assaults or outrages of any kind and by any one, the knights having seemingly been careful themselves and have taken pains to prevent the bruisers from becoming connected with them. That there have been isolated cases of assault and injury is true, but in most instances the trouble has been occasioned by the irritating influence of Pinkertonism. It is reported that in one instance a member of the Order who was simply running his train when properly manned, was set upon and beaten, and if by the striking employes, it deserves condemnation, though no more deserving of censure than an attack upon any other would be, except that it is as a matter, of course, of more interest to us. If the assault was by other than the strikers, the strikers should not be blamed for it. We believe that no member of the Order has taken the place of or in any way used his influence against the knights while on the contrary, a few of them have individually joined with them. This long prelude brings us to the cause for the sermon.

The Albany dispatches of August 30th, spread abroad over the country a story of a fiendish effort on the part of the strikers to wreck the Chicago express on the Central near that place. The account in full being as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y., Aug. 30.—A dastardly attempt to wreck passenger trains was made at 2 o'clock this morning near Karners, about seven miles west of this city. By almost a miracle the Chicago express, heavily laden with passengers and going at lightning speed, was brought to a standstill within twenty feet of a pile of heavy ties and railroad iron placed across the tracks. The tracks at this point are supposed to be guarded by Pinkerton men, but somehow the train wreckers passed the guard and laid the trap behind the shelter of one of the numerous freight trains stalled at that point. The attempt was made in a most systematic way for both the switchman and Pinkerton guard were locked up very securely in their house. At about five minutes of the time the train is due the switchman started to leave his shanty but found himself a prisoner. While trying to get out he heard the thunder of the approaching train. Suspecting danger he cried for help and then burst the door down. As he got out the train came down at a terrific speed and then for the first time the switchman saw the pile of ties on the track. He had no time to get his lantern. The Pinkerton men who had gathered got on the track and yelled. The engineer saw them, and putting on his air brakes reversed his lever and brought the train to a standstill. Very few of the 200 passengers were made aware of the danger.

A day or so later, comes a passenger on the train who says that his statement will be substantiated by five others, and says that this story of an attempt to wreck the train is false from beginning to end and that the only foundation for it is that the train was stopped at Karners on account of something wrong with the air brakes.

ALBANY, N. Y., Sept. 2.—It looks now as if the story of an attempt to wreck the east bound Chicago express near Karners Saturday morning was not founded on facts. John Bosch, a reputable citizen of this city, made a statement to-night which tends to show that no obstruction was placed on the track. Mr. Bosch, with James Mahr, Thomas Patton, Edward Walsh, Frank Fisher and Eugene Gorman, was in the forward coach of the train. When the train stopped a short distance west of Karners Mr. Bosch and his companions got off and went ahead to the locomotive to find out what was the matter. There was no obstruction on the track nor were there signs that one had been removed. There was nothing near the track that could have obstructed it. No one was excited. Some one said there had been trouble with the air brakes and no further explanation was given. Nobody said anything about any obstruction on the track.

"I am not a Knight of Labor," said Mr. Bosch, "but when I read in the papers of an attempt to wreck a train I thought it no more than right to state the facts in the case in order that unjust suspicion may be removed from those upon whom it may have fallen." Mr. Bosch says his companions are ready to corroborate his statement.

If the few individuals, made desperate by the prospect of starvation and misery before them, not only for themselves but for wives and children, are to be condemned for permitting their passions to lead them into infractions of the law, what shall be said of a great railroad company or its Pinkerton employes that will thus deliberately endeavor to fasten upon these former employes an attempt to commit murder by wrecking a train with a load of passengers? What a valorous guard these Pinkerton men must make to be locked up in a switch shanty without knowing it? The story is an absurdity on its face and hardly needed the statement of Mr. Bosch to prove it false. The doughty Pinkertons were probably asleep in the shanty, were wakened by the unusual stopping of the train for which they could find no cause, and improved the opportunity to make heroes of themselves in their own minds, by breaking from their prison and saving a train by their lung power. A picturesque scene surely, gathered around the pile of ties on the track and emitting shrieks that reached the engineer above the roar of his own train in time for him to stop before reaching the obstruction. They must have had better voices than the one the Order lost by the recent eastern secession.

PROGRESS OF COUPLER LEGISLATION

The committee on railways and canals of the House of Representatives to whom was referred the Coffin bill, introduced in the House by Mr. Henderson of Iowa, have reported the bill recommending its passage with certain amendments made by the committee, and which to our mind bear the mark of corporate influence.

In section 1, they commence to legislate for the railways by a cunningly devised amendment that would permit the use of almost any coupler that may be called "safety" by the companies, and in section 2 they insert two words in the seventh line, (the last line as printed in the July 1st CONDUCTOR,) where not satisfied with the provision that "it shall be unlawful — to have in use — any car not equipped with the said safety couplers," they insert after the word "with" the words "one of," making it read, "any car not equipped with one of the said safety couplers which occasions the query as to whether it would be a compliance with the law if a company placed a safety coupler in one end of each of its cars and left the other end with the old style.

In section 3, the time limit is extended to 1897 and then by a coup de maître the committee proceed to nullify the whole bill by striking out section 5, leaving it without the slightest provision to enforce it if it should become a law. In effect they say to railways, please equip your stock with safety couplers and power brakes but if you don't it's all right. Any law that may be adopted by congress without some provision for compelling its enforcement and providing penalties for non-compliance, might as well be left to die in the hands of the committee. That a committee of congressmen should suppose that they can so easily hoodwink the employes of the United States by a little "taffy" in their report is not particularly to the credit of their discernment. They quote from the reports of the Inter-State Commerce Commission; from the reports of various state railway commissions; from the President's message and give in full the various resolutions and letters from the different associations of railway employes. In summing up they say that "the principal objection that can be brought against the bill is that of the cost it will be to railroads" and show that by comparison with the amount of insurance paid by the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen for death and total disability, the brakemen sacrificed are valued at almost $2,000,000 annually; think that it would be cheaper to equip the railways with safety appliances and say "this disposes of the money argument." Yet they deliberately sacrifice these lives by taking from the bill its entire life and value, for without a provision for enforcing it if it becomes a law it is entirely valueless. Not content with striking out this section, they go still farther to render it nugatory by adding a new section as follows:

It shall be the duty of each railway company to which this act applies to submit to the Interstate Commerce Commission a sample or description of the appliance with which it is proposed to equip the engines and cars operated by such company, and on application of any railroad company the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix a maximum price for any of said safety or automatic couplers and power-brakes, of which said companies shall be required to equip their cars and engines, and in the event of said approved appliances, or either, not being purchasable in market at a price not exceeding the maximum fixed by the commission, then and in that case the Interstate Commerce Commission shall certify, and such certificate may be used as evidence in the trial of any action under this act and relieve the railroad companies from penalties herein prescribed.

The farce of law-makers providing relief "from penalties herein prescribed," after carefully eliminating all penalties would be laughable were the matter a less serious one for the men interested.

In this as in the erasure of the section providing for the enforcement of the measure in case it should be passed, we find that the talk is for the employes and the acts for the corporations, but if the employes who are interested in this matter will in the interest of their wives and little ones and in the interest of their own lives and limbs, for once throw to the winds their political preferences and oppose with their votes and influence every one of those men who have thought to pacify them by a mess of pottage, they may in time learn that corporate interest is not always supreme, and that railway employes are possibly not entirely devoid of sense. The members who signed this report are H. C. McCormick, chairman, J. H. Sweney, Chas. S. Randall, Jno. A. Caldwell, C. A. O. McClellan, Rufus E. Lester, S. E. Payne, L. P. Featherston, William C. Wallace and P. G. Lester. We know nothing of any of them except J. H. Sweney, who was a member of the State Senate of Iowa for some time prior to his election to congress, and it is freely asserted that his record there with the exception of the last session, shows him to have been a "corporation man." His action in this matter would certainly seem to indicate that he still has no little regard for the railway company as against the employe, and the action of the committee would seem to indicate that the talk (?) of Mr. Brown and other railway officers against the bill had been of some effect.

The Budget is the title of an eight page, six column weekly that comes to us from Topeka, Kansas, bearing at its mast head the name of J. F. Daniels as editor and manager. The paper is a clean, newsy sheet, and typographically as well as otherwise, is above the standard of weekly papers. Perhaps the worst that can be said for or of it, is that its editor and manager is a relative of the writer. We will guarantee though, that he will make an interesting paper for the "Topekans," and we commend his paper to the consideration of railway employes there, and assure them that they will find The Budget on the side of their interests.

The new holiday, Labor Day, was generally observed throughout the United States, and of those who who made a special effort to do it honor, none were more successful than the Elmira Sunday Telegram, which issued a special "Labor Day Paper," which is as commendable on the part of the publishers as it is complimentary to the men for whom it was intended.

Opening with the proposition that "the only combine that ought to be encouraged in this country is one between capital and labor" it presents as its motto: "Put the poor man in public office and the practical politician in prison." Among the portraits are General Master Workman Powderly of the K. of L., President Gompers of the A. F. of L., Ralph Beaumont and the well known "Shady Maguire." Among the many articles written specially for this issue of The Telegram is a poem by the latter, entitled "The Heroes of the Time." Mr. Powderly writes of "The Work of Knighthood;" Mr. Gompers has an article on "Trades Unions Defended;" Ralph Beaumont and a number of other well known labor leaders also contribute. This paper should be seen by all who are interested in the welfare of the laboring man.

SENIORITY PROMOTIONS.

It is stated that in a recent agreement between the trainmen and the Atlantic & Pacific Company, the members of the B. of R. T. and the members of the B. of R. C. opposed a clause permitting the company to hire a part of its conductors, and threatened to strike if it was insisted upon. That the brakemen should without due consideration, insist on promotions by seniority in service without regard to any other qualification or without reference to former experience on other roads is not surprising, though we believe that every reasonable brakeman will upon reflection, see the unwisdom of such a course; but that members of an organization that announced as one of its cardinal principles that "once a conductor always a conductor," should take that position is somewhat astonishing, and can only be explained by the surmise that their intent was merely to gain reputation with and the favor of the brakemen on the A. & P. Those members of the B. of R. T. who are now braking and have any ambition for the future must certainly repudiate the doctrine of absolute seniority promotions; for the brakeman who has had an experience of years on some other road, is now employed on the A. & P. and must stand back and see the latest recruit from the corn field take a train, because he has been employed by that company a few weeks or perhaps days the longest, is not fairly treated. Members of the B. of R. T. who consider the matter, know that permanency in employment as a conductor after being once promoted is more desirable than hasty promotion with the prospect of returning to the wheel when any turn of fortune may cause them to seek employment on another road. They fully appreciate the fact that to obtain for themselves the benefit of the experience they have had, they cannot support any scheme of absolute seniority promotions, and that any such inflexible rule is unjust to them and discriminates in favor of the new recruit very largely. They, as well as sensible conductors, realize that a reasonable medium between such a rule and the hiring all conductors, and making no promotions from the ranks of the brakemen, is what both should unitedly labor for. That this is the position of the thoughtful members of that organization, has been the experience of the members of the Order in every instance where we have acted in conjunction with the B. of R. T., and while we are not informed as to the position of their grand officers on this point, we believe the above will be indorsed by them. The settlement was made with the A. & P. company, with the clause objected to, remaining and the agreement in full will be published in our next number.

A CORRECTION.

In the last CONDUCTOR, we quoted from the Chicago Daily News, what purported to have been an interview with various railway officers in regard to honesty of conductors and among those said to have been interviewed, was Mr. H. H. Peebles, of the C. M. & St. P., who was quoted as having used language that in our opinion, deserved comment from us, though with some little knowledge of the "interviews" that are sometimes published, we prefaced criticism of what he was reported as having said with an "if." It now seems that the interview with Mr. Peebles was wholly imaginary on the part of the interviewer, and employes who have known him long and favorably say, that he is the last man who would use the language quoted. We are very glad of the opportunity to place the gentleman right before our readers and to further add that conductors who run into Chicago are unanimous in their expression of the character and standing of the gentleman. THE CONDUCTOR will at all times resent any attacks upon conductors if it believes them to be unfounded, and official position will never prevent it from expressing its opinions, but in defending conductors it certainly does not wish to wrong any one even unwittingly.

Mr. J. E. Morris, Grand Secretary of the Brotherhood of Telegraphers says that N. H. Kirch, who claims to be "Grand Organizer" for the Order of Railway Telegraphers claims to be in possession of the sign of recognition, answer and grip of the Order of Railway Conductors. The fact that there is no "sign of recognition and answer" would seem to indicate that Mr. Kirch draws upon his imagination slightly if he professes to possess them. If he makes such a claim or if he is, as Mr. Morris asserts, reporting members of the Brotherhood for the purpose of getting them dismissed, the sooner the O. of R. T. "fire" him the better for them. Mr. A. D. Thurston, Grand Chief Telegrapher of the O. R. T., in a letter of recent date, says that Mr. Morris' charge is unfounded, and that Mr. Kirch has made no such claims or statements. It now devolves upon Mr. Morris to substantiate his charges or acknowledge himself in error.

The citizens of Wyoming seem inclined to give recognition to railway employes in making their laws, as we note that in two instances they have placed an engineer on the legislative ticket, Dan Brees and Perry Brickford, of Albany county, the first for senator and the latter for representative. We wish them both success and have no doubt but the boys will see that they are successful. The Railway News Reporter gives a good portrait of each in its last issue.

Useful Shoes.

The Hollanders make so many uses of wooden shoes, one is persuaded to believe the "Old woman who lived in her shoe, and had so many children she didn't know what to do," was a Dutch vrouw. The children turn shoes into boats, and paint them a rich deep brown, in imitation of the large boats which sail on the river Maas. As they trim the tiny sails of their ships, and launch them upon the waters of a sloot to some imaginary Van Diemen's land, not to be found in a geography, they seem possessed with the same spirit which inspired the Dutch navigators of earlier days.

There are many sloots (which are deep ditches full of water), used both to fence and fertilize the land; so the voyage of the shoe may be a long one, and the owner of the little vessel will have abundant opportunity to indulge in dreams of future wealth to be realized "when his ship comes in."

The boats that one may see on the rivers and the coasts of Holland are not unlike the wooden shoes in shape, and the same model may originally have served for both.

The school-boy, heated by play, stops beside the nearest stream, pulls off his shoe, and fills it with water, which he drinks with as much satisfaction as if it were a delicious draught from a silver cup.

Wooden shoes are ornamental as flower pots, and many a bright flower whose roots are firmly bedded in a shoe has graced the window of some peasant's cottage—a joy to the owner, and a pleasure to the passing traveler.

They are useful as hammers, and it is not uncommon to see a koopman (merchant) by the way side, with a few taps of his shoe mending his cart, piled high with yellow carrots or little round Dutch cheeses, while his dogs rest in the traces.

These shoes also take the place of the obsolete birch rod of our grandmothers' days. The good vrouw, in her quaint cap of spotless white, with gold spiral pins, called krullen, placed above the ears, does not look very much like such grandmothers as we have known, but her discipline resembles theirs in severity if not in kind.

During the week, after school hours, the little girls walk along the dikes in rows, knitting; and the clatter of their shoes, to an ear unfamiliar with it, is, except that it is without military regularity, like the sound of an advancing army.

Saturday is the great cleaning day in Rijsoord, when everything is made ready for Sunday, the day of rest. The houses are scrubbed inside and out, and among the pots and kettles, are seen the wooden shoes, these, scoured snowy white, hang upon forked sticks near the doorway to dry in the wind and sun.

The morning brings the sound of klumpen along the dikes, and rows of people are seen walking toward the kirk. At the door they leave their shoes, like faithful servants, to await their return later, after a three hours' sermon by the dominie.

In the afternoon, the young men and women stroll up and down the Promendijk, which is the "Fifth Avenue" of the village—its general promenade and meeting place. They exchange nods and friendly greetings until sundown, when the busy week begins again, and the wooden shoes soon take on their week-day coat of tan.—From "Wooden Shoes," by Anna Page Scott, in St. Nicholas for September.

A Conductor's Memory.

"I know," said the conductor, as he finished counting up and lighted a cigar, "that most people consider us a hard hearted lot, but we've got to be, or at least must appear to be. A railroad company has little to do with sentiment, and a great deal to do with business. I can't afford to let people ride at my expense, and so what am I to do?"

No remedy being suggested, he smoked away in silence for two or three minutes, and then continued:

"I didn't use to have so much heart about it, always excusing myself on the plea of duty; but one night about three years ago something happened which kept my heart pretty soft every since. It was on a run out of Buffalo, and when I came to take up the fares I came across a woman and child. She was pale-faced and thinly clad, and she had a world of trouble in her face. I saw that in a general way, but it was not my business to pity her. The child with her, a boy of seven or eight, was lying back on the seat, with her old shawl for a pillow. She offered me one full fare ticket to a point about forty miles below, but I demanded one for the boy.

"Please, sir," she said, "we are very poor, and he's only a little chap, and I'm taking him home to die."

"That was no excuse, and I plainly told her that she must pay for him or he'd have to get off. I thought she was trying to beat his way, but in that I was mistaken. It was a dark and rainy night, and she'd never have got ready to leave the train at the next stop if she'd had money to pay for the boy. I felt a bit ashamed when I saw her making ready, and it hurt me to see her lean over him and both cry together, but one of our men had been discharged only the week before for over-looking a one-legged soldier who only wanted a lift for ten miles.

"And no one offered to pay the boy's fare?"

"For a wonder, no. There was a full crowd in the car, but all seemed to look upon the pair with suspicion. I hated to put them off, and I hoping that the woman would make one more appeal and give me a show to back water, when the train ran into——, and she made ready to get off. The least I could do was to help her with the boy. I picked him up and started to follow her out, but I had scarcely taken notice of his white face, and tear-wet cheeks when he uttered a shriek of fear, straightened out in my arms, and the next instant I knew I had a corpse. Yes, sir, the life went out of him in that cry, and the mother turned on me with a look I can never forget, and cried:

"He's dead! He's dead! And you have killed him!"

"I didn't like to think of it," whispered the conductor after a long silence. "I had my month's wages in my pocket, and I gave her every dollar of it, and the passengers raised as much more, and when I left her with the dead at the next station I had done every thing I possibly could, but that didn't clear me. I had been too harsh and cold. She had told the truth, and I had doubted her. She had asked for mercy, and I had ordered her out into the night and the storm with the dying boy in her care. She has never forgiven me, and never will, and try as hard as I may I can never forgive myself."—Louisville Times.

All Alike—Except Conductors.

To my study by a thoroughfare where many shifting feet

Are ever going up and down the busy, crowded street,

A youthful toddler came one day, I gave him books to see

Wherein were gorgeous pictures, when he, smiling said to me:

"These things are quite amusing,

But they're hardly worth pursuing.

They soon grow very prosy and distressing to the eye;

If you think 'tis not a sin to,

I will sit here by your window

For I'm sure I'd so much rather watch

The Girls

Go

By."

A man of five and thirty came to make a little stay,

I piled him 'bout with literature to while his time away,

But of the books I offered not a single one was read,

They seemed to hold no charm for him and presently he said:

"These things are quite amusing,

But they're hardly worth pursuing.

They soon grow very prosy and distressing to the eye;

If you think 'tis not a sin to,

I will sit here by your window

For I'm sure I'd so much rather watch

The Girls

Go

By."

Good Grandpa Graybeard came. "Ah here," I said, "is one I know

Who'll love to meet within my books the wits of long ago,

Who'll share their mental banquet and partake of it with glee."

Imagine my complete surprise when he remarked to me:

"These things are quite amusing,

But they're hardly worth pursuing.

They soon grow very prosy and distressing to the eye;

If you think 'tis not a sin to,

I will sit here by your window,

For I'm sure I'd so much rather watch

The Girls

Go

By."

The secretary of Division No. 165 wishes to find B. R. Lemington. T. F. Tobin and John Hagerty. Who will aid him?

THE CONDUCTOR acknowledges with thanks, the receipt of papers containing an account of the Hartford Union meetings, from Brother P. H. Morrissey of the B. of R. T.

The state board of Meditation and Arbitration is investigating the New York Central strike, and have examined Webb with but little result so far as getting any information is concerned. Roger A. Pryor volunteered his services as counsel for the knights.

Railway employees will have no warmer friend in the fifty-second congress than Major Albert R. Anderson should he be elected as we hope he will be. His record in the fiftieth congress should procure for him the unanimous support of all employees.

Brother Clark desires to extend thanks to Springfield Division 206 for a complimentary invitation to their excursion and wishes to express regret for his inability to avail himself of it, joining us in the hope that it will prove successful both financially and socially.

It is said that a firm of contractors on the Denver & Rio Grande demolished almost an entire village by using over a ton of powder in a blast. No one was injured, the people having been notified to "get out," and the contractors are now engaged in rebuilding the town.

Allen Potter is no more. For some time past, Mr. Potter has been in poor health and has been for some time unable to run his train and while his friends did not expect his recovery, none supposed that the end was so near. On the 4th inst., came the messenger who released him from a world of pain. Mr. Potter was one of those who recently severed his connection with the Order, but did it in a quiet manly way and while we regretted his decision, no word of the censure that applied to others could come to him and among the many who extend sincere sympathy to the stricken widow, there will be none more sincere than his many friends in the Order including ourselves. "God's finger touched him and he slept."

Brother T. C. Pierce has recently had the misfortune to suffer a compound fracture of the left leg and in consequence is resting now. He speaks in very flattering terms of the care and attention he receives at the hands of the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph's Infirmary, Fort Worth, where he is located.

The train robbers have broken out again and this time in an old spot. Aug. 17th, the Mo. Pac. express was robbed at "robber's cut," near Otterville, Mo., the scene of the robbery by the James brothers in 1876. Reports of the amount secured by them range all the way from a comparatively small sum to $50,000.

Every member of the Benefit Department should have one of our receipt files. The most convenient way ever devised to keep your assessment receipts. Will hold the receipts for two years, and costs only twenty-five cents, or you can get one free, by sending us one new subscriber to THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

A division of the Order was organized at Taylor, Texas, on the 7th inst, and from present indications, many if not all of the older divisions will have to look to their laurels, or this Taylor infant will stand first when we assemble at St. Louis next spring. We acknowledge with sincerest thanks, an invitation and complimentary to the opening ball given by them on the evening of the 8th. The G. C. C. and the writer, held a little condolence meeting on our inability to be on hand and join in the mazy and partake of the hospitality for which Texas is noted, but consoled ourselves with the thought that probably Garrettson would fully represent the office and quite likely enjoy himself enough for all three.

Engine 190 in passenger service on the eastern division of the "Fort Wayne," made 10,282 miles during the month of August and was out of service by a break-down, by which she lost nearly 900 miles. This is said to be the greatest mileage that has ever been made by an engine on that road.

One of those little things that sometimes grow to big ones is a sprained ankle. Brother J. F. Patrick, of Herington, Kansas, has been laid up for two months with one. As we all know, two months without pay, is a serious matter for the average conductor and particularly so when the ordinary expenses are increased by physician's bills.

One of the most sensible utterances in the matter of the employment of Pinkertons on the slightest pretext by railway companies, that we have seen, is that of the Rocky Mountain News which is given in this number. It is a calm, dispassionate and impartial review of the matter and cannot but recommend itself to every thinking man.

The St. Thomas, Ontario, Journal thinks that Mr. Webb is occupying as large a place in the public eye at present, as did Mr. Hoxie of the Missouri Pacific a few years ago. This may be perhaps, so far as notoriety is concerned, but the brother of the son-in-law of Vanderbilt can never hold the place in public estimation that was held by Mr. Hoxie, who was well and favorably known all over the United States prior to the great strike on the Missouri Pacific.

The claim of the grievance committee of the B. of L. E. for the Atlantic system of the Southern Pacific, that an employe can use profane and abusive language while on duty and get drunk and create a public disturbance off duty, without being subject to any discipline by his employers because the rules do not specifically forbid, is one that the organization can hardly afford to endorse.

It's pretty tough for a "moss-back" to be obliged to say anything good of his political opponents, but hard as it is, we must congratulate the republican party of Missouri on its action in nominating for railway and warehouse commissioner, Brother J. K. Merrifield of St. Louis. For once we actually wish them success, and more than that, with the aid of the employes of the state, who will support J. K. regardless of political preferences, we believe they will be successful in electing their nominee for commissioner. If a resident of Missouri we would vote for Jim ourselves, and while about it, if in Pettis county we would vote for another "black republican," who is a candidate for county clerk, and that is Harvey Smith, of Division 60. Should he be elected, Pettis county will have a good clerk and when Jim gets there Missouri will have a board of commissioners that will average with any if not lead most of them. A locomotive engineer is now a member of the board.

We are in receipt of a circular mailed from New York City by some unknown party attacking an accident association of that city. We know nothing of the merits of the matter, but if the facts are as stated, it would seem that a complaint should be made to the proper authorities. Certainly THE CONDUCTOR will not aid any anonymous party in circulating matter of this character that is probably sent out by some rival company.

If Brother N. R. Shaffer, of Division No. 103 has any regard for the happiness of the secretary of his division she will immediately send his address to Brother Mounts. There is no member of this Order who tries harder or succeeds better in filling a difficult position than the secretary of 103, and the members should take interest enough in their own welfare to keep him advised as to their whereabouts. This also applies to other members and other divisions.

The secretary of Division 53, Denison, Texas, notifies us of the sudden death of Brother B. M. Daugherty of that division, who fell from the baggage car on a T & P. train while rounding a curve at a high rate of speed, striking his head against the side of a rock cut, and being injured so severely that he died in about twenty-four hours. This then is the end for one who but this morning started out strong and vigorous, expecting soon to return to loved ones and home. Let us hope that for him it is but the opening of a door to life eternal and happiness ineffable beyond the river of death.

We do not propose to question in the least, the truth of the proverb that "the pen is mightier than the sword," but we know a proverb that is just as true, "the shears are easier than the pen" and for this reason we use them on the Travellers' Journal, and recommend the following to our readers with the assurance that we can say "me too" with genuine earnestness.

Any person able to answer this question will confer a great favor on the editor: Why is it that members who write to this office expecting a reply, invariably neglect to give their street address? They seem to think that because we have it on the mail list that is enough. When your street address is not given the editor must stop writing, go to the mail room, find your state, then your city, and then hunt through the whole list of names in that lodge of yours. No other one thing causes so great a loss of time as this carelessness of our correspondence. Without exaggeration more than half the letters we receive have imperfect addresses.

Physically J. T. Marr, late P. M. at Hobsonville, Oregon, is not a large man, but like our good friend Steese, of Milwaukee, there are times when he "feels as big as anybody," and judging from a letter just received, Brother Marr has struck one of those times. He says we, (and that means wife and a little Miss, that if our recollection is correct is now about two years old) have just moved into our own home and the latch string hangs out for all friends of the fraternity. Brother Marr may rest assured that his castle will be assailed should we ever get to Oakland.

A private message from Pueblo brings to us the sad news of the death, on Sept. 1st, of Brother A. K. Waddell. By his death, a wife loses a kind and loving husband, the Order a faithful member, Division 36 one of its staunchest supporters and Pueblo a good citizen. A warm personal friendship with Brother Waddell gave us something of an insight into the noble qualities of the man and taught us to respect and honor, as well as to love him. Peace to his ashes. He has fought a good fight and kept the faith and ere now has heard the welcome mandate, "Well done good and faithful servant."

The funeral of the late P. J. Gaynor, of 515 North Lincoln avenue, Scranton, Pa., took place yesterday morning at 9 o'clock. At 9:30 the remains, followed by a large cortege of relatives and friends, were borne to St. Patrick's church, where a solemn high mass of requiem was celebrated by Rev. J. B. Whelan with Father Bergen as Deacon and Winters as sub-deacon. The full church choir were present, also Mrs. Wymbs and Miss Brown who sang solos. Pall-bearers were P. F. Duffey, John J. Murphy, Felander Sillsby, J. J. O'Hara, C. L. Weidner and Samuel Koener; flower bearer, J. J. Farrell. The many floral tokens of love and respect included a handsome pillow which bore the inscription, "Father," and a large cross. The deceased was 54 years old. 38 years of his life was spent in Scranton. He worked on the construction of the D., L. & W. railroad. He was conductor on the main line of the D. L. & W. and Bloomsburg Division for fourteen years. He watched Scranton street crossing and tended switches there. For the past five years he was in milk business. He was a member of Division 12, Order Railway Conductors, a delegation of which attended the funeral and acted as pall bearers. He leaves a wife and eleven children; six girls and five boys.

During the difficulty on the Central road, the freight men on the B. & A. have been forced to be idle most of the time, except the crews of regular and local freights, and when pay day came around there was not enough money in some cases to settle their board bills, so they appointed a committee to wait upon Mr. Gallup, the superintendent, who gave orders that the men enforced to be idle should be paid regular wages, with the conditions that they report themselves at the office every day for orders. If all roads had such a head, less growling and striking would be the result.—New York Dispatch.

It is stated, on good authority, that the bolting Grand Conductor, C. S. Wheaton, of the I. O. R. C., has severed his connection with the new Order. This is his own statement. Wheaton was the organizer and leader of the Independents. He was opposed to the elimination of the strike clause from the constitution, but it was carried at the annual convention in Rochester last May. A number of the eastern members followed in the wake of Wheaton, and a short time ago the CONDUCTORS' MONTHLY contained a series of charges against Wheaton, penned by the Grand Secretary of the original organization. He did not answer them in a direct way, and his resignation at this time is rather suggestive.—New York Dispatch.

A difficulty has arisen between the B. of R. T. on the Pacific system of the Southern Pacific, and the Division of the B. of R. C. at Oakland. It is charged by the general grievance committee of the former organization, that the members of the B. of R. C. at Oakland, through jealousy merely, have caused the discontinuance of what promised to be satisfactory negotiations with the company, and prefer to prevent anything being accomplished by the B. of R. T. because they will not get any credit for it. If this spirit has been manifested by any of its members they are open to criticism, though it is but fair to add that so far as we know, they have acted without the knowledge or sanction of their grand officers. An account of the trouble from the San Francisco Chronicle appears in this number, and if this account is correct, it would seem that the charge of the B. of R. T. is well founded.

Brother A. C. Dudley, formerly employed on the B. C. R. & N. and now located at Trenton, Mo., lost a thumb a few weeks ago causing him to lose considerable time. Hardly had he resumed work when another stroke of misfortune caught him in the shape this time of a stroke of lightning which struck his house on the night of August 13th, stunning his wife and two children so that they barely revived in time to escape burning with the house. It was a narrow escape and as it was they lost everything including clothing, Brother Dudley being away at the time saved the suit he wore and his lunch pail. Brother Dudley has many friends here and in the east, who will be glad to learn that his family escaped, but regret his loss.

Every body who has ever been in the Union depot at St. Louis knows Tom Riley, but it's now in order to say "Mister." He has lately been appointed assistant general superintendent of the St. Louis, Kanas City & Colorado railroad, and if he, with his experience, don't fill the bill, promotions from the ranks of conductors will be a failure. Brother Riley is a member of Division No. 30, and for lo, these many moons has run a train on the Frisco between St. Louis and Springfield. He is one of the kind that promotion don't hurt though, and while so far as his duties as an officer of the company go, he will be superintendent, he will still be the same genial Tom to his friends, and they are legion. A St. Louis paper says "no appointment that has been made for several years has met with such universal approval by railroad men."

A St. Louis dispatch tells of the experience of an express messenger with a wild cat on the Chicago & Alton, as follows: "About an hour out of Kansas City, while Express Messenger Taylor was busy in the end of the car, he heard a cracking noise, and turning saw the larger of the two wild cats coming out of the cage, the slats of which had been gnawed apart. Taylor seized a tarpaulin just in time, for the gray belly of the animal was dragging on the floor and an instant later came the spring. The wild cat struck the tarpaulin with such force as almost to knock the messenger down, but he recovered himself and struck the wild cat a fearful kick through the tarpaulin, in which its claws had caught. For some reason the second wild cat remained in the cage, or else Taylor would certainly have been torn to pieces. As it was he kept his back to the side of the car and fought. He knew that no help could reach him. The train was running and his car was locked to prevent robbery and he did not again did the wild cat spring.

would get it covered with the tarpaulin and then before it could get away he would kick the snarling, snapping beast beneath the tarpaulin with all his power. Finally the kicks began to tell and at last the wild cat no longer sprang at him but crouched upon the floor. Seizing his chance Taylor grasped a piece of gas pipe and protecting himself with the tarpaulin he attacked the animal. It turned arid with two jumps regained its cage and companion. Taylor stood guard over the cage with the gas pipe until the train stopped when he sprang from the car and gave the alarm. The animals were soon secured and safely caged.

There is war between the engineers and firemen employed on the Southern Pacific road at San Antonio, Texas. The trouble dates from last fall when a fireman named Ritchie was promoted to be a passenger engineer. The engineers objected to his promotion and demand his removal, claiming that one of their number should have been given the place. This the road has refused to do and the engineers have sent a committee to San Francisco to confer with the officials of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, or the members of that order employed on the Southern Pacific have decided to stand by Ritchie, and will also send a committee to San Francisco to look after their side of the case. If the engineers are sustained by the brotherhood it is said that they will strike unless Ritchie is removed.—Kansas Age.

Many of those who attended the last Grand Division will remember that A. D. Potter of Denver Division, No. 44, arrived at Rochester a week or ten days in advance of the rest, engaged all the rooms in the Livingston Hotel, borrowed a little cash from the clerks, made the acquaintance of several merchants who are yet waiting for him to call again, and finally left without bidding either Pierce or Harman farewell. Potter was at Crestline August 29th, and procured cash on some check that those who confidently accepted yet had to remember him by. He has passed over to L. S. & M. S. and claims to be a Knight Templar is about 45 years of age, dark complexion, and probably it is needless to say, is a "slick talker." Don't buy his checks nor contribute in any other way to his support. He is not a member of the Order.

After four years in the service of "Uncle Sam" as a special agent of the post office department and some experience as a Denver merchant, A. D. Frederick returns to railway service again. He has just been appointed train master of the

New Mexico division of the Union Pacific system with office at Trinidad, Colorado. Many old friends of his in this neck o'woods will be glad to hear of his welfare. In "auld lang syne" when Porter was yard master for the Northwestern at this place and the writer was running on the B. C. R., we used to skirmish occasionally for the "cut-off" to the depot, and once in a long time the engines would stand facing each other so near the frog that neither could pass while the "compliments of the season" were exchanged. Later on, Porter ran the train vacated by the writer to endeavor to fill his present position, but of the past that's gone beyond recall, there remains only pleasant memories of a warm friendship that will last through life.

The electric headlight placed on one of the passenger engines of the Columbus, Hocking Valley & Toledo railroad company several months ago has been used with satisfactory results. Master Mechanic Miller says the machinery operating the headlight has not required any adjustment or repair since it was put in place. Mr. Miller regards the electric headlight a complete success and likely to come into general use in the near future. It has not yet been decided whether the passenger engines of the Columbus, Hocking Valley & Toledo railroad will be equipped with the headlight, but it is safe to say President Waite will give the matter a careful consideration. The headlight has been adopted by several of the northwestern roads and is being given a trial on a number of large lines. The Pennsylvania railroad offered a large price of the exclusive right to use the headlight on its own locomotives, but the inventor preferred to give the public instead of a single corporation the benefit of it.—Ohio State Journal.

It is generally conceded that the strike of the N. Y. C. and H. R. R. R. employes is over, and as a natural sequence, disastrous to some men. It was confidently expected that more than moral support would be tendered the men who were out by the Federation of Railway Employes, but the tangible support failed to materialize, and in consequence, among some organizations a deep and bitter feeling is the result. There is no fault found by any of the men connected with the K. of L. in regard to the action of the Federation; that is, not openly; but it's a kind of "wait and see" feeling. If the chance presents itself the men of the K. of L. will strike back; and so it will be right along, a sort of shuttlecock arrangement, with the men the sufferers. Beyond the fact that men see the necessity for organization, strikes are productive of evil. Arbitration is the proper solution of this difficulty, ought to be the means adopted to bring differences to a speedy adjustment, and the quicker both men and employes recognize that fact the better it will be for all concerned.—New York Dispatch.

A little party of three had enjoyed a summer vacation to the utmost and were on the way home to resume the usual avocations and one of the party, fatigued by anticipations of coming labor, fell asleep; a comrade quietly appropriated the return ticket of the sleeper and soon after the two waking ones disturbed the peaceful dreams of the tired wanderer by a vigorous hunt for tickets in anticipation of the coming of the captain of the train. A hasty search failing to discover Tom's ticket he became thoroughly awakened by the gravity of the situation, several hundred miles from home, no money and ticket gone. Giving up the fruitless search finally, he appealed to his companions for enough cash to pay his fare, but both had enjoyed the outing so thoroughly that not enough remained between the three to make the necessary amount; the difficulties were further increased by the assumed fact, that the two friends had seen the conductor and discovered him to be a man to whom it would be useless to appeal for either charity or time, and as the only way out of the dilemma, it was decided that the man without a ticket should get down on the floor and the friends turned the backs of two seats together over him; it was hoped that in the dim light of the early morning he might escape the eagle eye of the watchful conductor. Our unfortunate friend occupied this somewhat uncomfortable position for what seemed to him an eternity, but finally had the extreme pleasure of listening to the following conversation between the conductor and one of the disinterested friends who had suggested the expedient by which Tom was to "beat" the captain.

Conductor.—You have given me three tickets.

Disinterested friend.—Yes, I know it, there are three of us.

C.—Where's the other?

D. F.—Oh, he's down on the floor between the seats. (Pointing him out.)

C.—What in blazes is he down there for?

D. F.—Oh, he prefers to ride that way?

Then ensued a tableau; bribes were promised and secrecy sworn, but the conductor must have told.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Supreme Ruler of the universe to call from his labors, suddenly, our Brother, James Donlin. And

WHEREAS, While we bow with resignation to the decree that has taken our Brother from his family and our fraternity; be it

Resolved, That in the death of Brother James Donlin, the Order of Railway Conductors has lost one of its brightest members and the community a good citizen.

Resolved, That we tender to the family of our late Brother our warmest sympathy in their sad bereavement, and sincerely join with them in mourning the loss of their father and our friend and Brother.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the family; also a copy for publication.

At a regular meeting of West Philadelphia Division No. 162, Order of Railway Conductors, held Aug. 17, 1890, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the universe to remove from our midst our late Brother, Thomas R. Moon; and

WHEREAS, It is but just that a fitting recognition of his many virtues should be had; therefore be it

Resolved, By West Philadelphia Division No. 162, that while we bow with humble submission to the will of the Most High, we do not the less mourn for our Brother who has been taken from among us.

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Thomas R. Moon this Division laments the loss of a Brother who was ever ready to proffer the hand of aid and the voice of sympathy to the needy and distressed of the Order, and a true member, whose utmost endeavors were exerted for its welfare and prosperity; a friend and companion who was dear to us all; a citizen whose upright and noble life was a standard of emulation to his fellows.

Resolved, That while submitting with human patience to the will which has deprived us of his presence in a way we cannot question, we deeply feel the absence of one who has been so long among us, and by his many noble qualities had become dear to us.

Resolved, That in his sudden departure we recognize the slight thread that binds us to earthly things, and that the dangers of our calling should make us more firmly united by those ties of friendship which bind us together.

Resolved, That our hopes extend beyond this life for happiness, in a firm belief that there exists a better state in the long eternity toward which we are progressing.

Resolved, That to his bereaved wife and children our sincere sympathy extends more especially in consideration of the sudden manner of his removal.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the wife and children of Brother Moon, recorded in the records of the Division, and published in THE CONDUCTOR, and that the charter of Division 162, O. of R. C. be draped in mourning for sixty days.

"DOING TIME" ON THE BRANCH.

BY E. B. PERRY.

The longest-to-be-remembered year of my life was spent in the employ of the Michigan Central Railroad Company. In 1873 I was forward brakeman on one of the company's freight trains, and at the time of which I write was employed on the western division of the road, with headquarters at Michigan City, Ind. A day's work with our crew consisted of the run from this point to Chicago and return each twenty-four hours, for which service I received the munificent salary of forty-five dollars a month. But I was somewhat romantically inclined in those younger days of mine, and the pleasurable excitement derived from "a life on the rail" seemed ample compensation for anything in the way of meager pay.

The company owned or operated the Jackson, Lansing and Saginaw railroad, the northern extension of which was then in process of construction through the heart of the vast wilderness which stretched unbroken by scarce a settlement, from Bay City to the Straits of Mackinaw. A small village named Welch, some seventy or eighty miles north of Bay City, was the terminus of freight and passenger traffic, though the line was built a considerable distance northward of this point. The region of country traversed by this road was lonely and desolate in the extreme. Once in each eight or ten miles a logging camp, with "store" attachments for the sale of lumbermen's supplies, would in a manner relieve the monotony of the seemingly endless forest of gigantic pines which stretched away in the distance and from every point of the compass. It was the next thing to impossible for the company to induce men to stay for any great length of time in this inhospitable desert, despite the triple allowance of wages paid. Hot weather came on, and so frequent were resignations and desertions from the "Branch," as the road was termed by us "main-liners," that heroic measures were resorted to by the company to re-enforce the depleted force of "Branch" trainmen, and the five men comprising our crew were, I believe, the first victims of the novel expedient.

We were returning one night from Chicago to Michigan City, the end of our run. We were over eight hours late, owing to a "wash-out" a short distance east of Chicago, which had delayed all trains on that end of the line. This, together with the fact that none of us had slept a wink the previous night, combined to make us feel not only irritable and careless but sleepy as well.

We approached the junction of the "Joliet cut-off" at Lake Station at a moderate rate of speed, came to a full stop as required, and then proceeded onward. The road here was a dead level, and I was in the habit of remaining in the engine instead of going back over the train to set the brakes, as was customary at stopping places where the road was up or down grade.

I have always believed the engineer was asleep during this part of the performance, and that he simply acted automatically in stopping and starting the train. You see, he was used to it; had, in fact, performed the same identical act at the same identical spot once each day for years, and, in his drowsy condition of mind and body, was scarcely more animate than the big locomotive beneath his feet. Be this as it may, the fact remains that he crashed into a car of live stock which formed part of a train which had just arrived from Joliet via the "cut-off." I shall not attempt to depict the scenes of the next two hours. They were laid amid splintered cars and broken, twisted machinery, and set to the music of hissing steam, dark-blue profanity and the frantic bellowing of maimed and mangled Texas steers. The debris was finally removed from the track, and another engine towed our battered outfit to Michigan City.

The day following the accident we were ordered to report in a body to the Division Superintendent, a chronic old dyspeptic named Moran. We responded, and not without considerable anxious speculation as to the fate awaiting us. After adjusting his "specs" and glaring at each one of us in turn, he began questioning us as to the cause of the accident. Each question and its answer was taken down in writing by a subordinate, and the investigation consumed the greater part of the day. At its close we were dismissed with the injunction that we report to the office the following morning. We complied, and were told by Moran that after careful consideration of the matter he had concluded that we were each and all of us guilty of gross carelessness and negligence. He then, after berating us for about fifteen minutes, bade us choose between two evils: Either discharge from the company's service or three months at running a log train on the "Branch."

My partner, the rear brakeman, chose the former as the more preferable mode of punishment. The conductor, engineer, fireman and myself accepted the latter alternative, and next day we were sent to Jackson, thence to East Saginaw, where we were placed in charge of a train and started northward. Our division extended from East Saginaw to Welch, and our train was so timed that our nights were spent at the latter place. The hotel was conducted by a big, double-jointed, red-shirted Canadian named McCoy. It was a rough board structure, the lower story being divided into four rooms, viz. bar-room, dining-room, kitchen and family sleeping-room. The upper story was guiltless of division or partition of any kind, and contained some forty or more "bunks" for sleeping purposes. The room was, not inaptly, christened by its occupants "the morgue." Lumbermen, railroad men and teamsters were the principal guests of this primitive hostelry, and the effects of copious "jags" of vile whiskey from the bar-room was marked by brawls which averaged at least two each night.

But the agonizing feature of our life in that wilderness of pine and sand was the mosquito. These insufferable pests swarmed by millions into every nook and corner of the building. They thrust their bills into the quivering flesh of their victims through woolen blankets a quarter of an inch in thickness. They deluged the air above and the earth beneath, and from their merciless attacks there was no escape. The only moments of partial relief for us was when the train was in motion. The moment a stop was made we were compelled to tie about our face a sort of oil-cloth cap which we carried for that purpose. And there was, also, a peculiar sort of insect known as the "sand-fly," so small as to be scarcely discernable with the naked eye; but what they lacked in size was thrice made up in vigor. They were never idle, and their plan of attack was eminently successful. The hair and beard seemed to be their favorite stamping grounds, and from these points of vantage they fairly reveled in human gore.

I endured the sickening torment for a trifle over five weeks—not quite half my sentence—and then one hot afternoon I asked permission to go to Lansing "to see a sick sister." It was grudgingly granted, and I went to return no more forever.

A couple of weeks after that I met the fireman in Chicago. He, too, had succumbed and his face resembled that of one suffering in the last throes of the barber's itch. He informed me that the conductor and engineer would endeavor to "do full time" on the "Branch" rather than lose their positions with the company. I have never seen one of them since, though I have often wondered if it were possible for civilized white men to remain in that miniature shoe for three months and still preserve the semblance of sanity.—Sioux City Times.

Grand Annual Excursion and Picnic of Div. 242.

A GRAND SUCCESS IN EVERY PARTICULAR—A LARGE NUMBER IN ATTENDANCE—A A GOOD PROGRAMME OF SPORTS.

The second annual demonstration of the Nipissing Division, Order of Railway Conductors, was even more successful than the one held by them last year. The weather was not as fine as might be expected, a drizzling rain having fallen from early morning till about ten o'clock in the forenoon, and though it stopped then dark ominous clouds still hung over the town and far out on the lake, continually threatening a downpour.

The town was well decorated with arches and bunting and wore an altogether holiday appearance. Though there are more hotels than are usually found in places the size of North Bay, large numbers of the excursionists found it impossible to secure accommodation. From Pembroke alone there were about two hundred and fifty excursionists and the other stations turned out goodly numbers, the larger number being attracted by the lacrosse match between the Pembroke and Barrie teams which was to be played off, they having played a draw last year.

The Conductors were determined from the first to make the demonstration a success, and did not fail to advertise thoroughly along the line and best of all they advertised nothing that they did not carry out so far as lay in their power.

By one o'clock the procession, composed of the North Bay and Sudbury Bands, the Berry and Pembroke Lacrosse teams, and the North Bay and Sault Ste. Marie Base Ball teams formed at the Pacific Hotel and marched through the town to Lake View Park on the banks of Lake Nipissing. The park, if properly fitted up, would be admirably fitted for the purpose, but as it is, for good lacrosse the ground is too rough and the sod seems rather soft.

When the crowd to the extent of about 3,000 had succeeded in gaining admittance the lacrosse match was called. Mr. James Barrett, of Ottawa, having been agreed upon as referee, while Messrs. Wilkinson and J. C. Stewart were chosen as umpires. The teams lined up as follows:—

BARRIE.		PEMBROKE.
McCurry.....	Goal.....	W. McKay
Penson.....	Point.....	Williams
Lennox, J.....	Cover Point.....	Mulligan
Patterson.....	Defence Field.....	Irving
Vansickle....	do.....	Bonner
Hunter.....	do.....	Supple
Burton.....	Center Field.....	Halpenny
Burns.....	Home Field.....	Reynolds
Moore.....	do.....	Bailley
Lennox.....	do.....	Carleton
Smith.....	Outside Home.....	McKay, A.
More, J.....	Inside Home.....	Airth
Sidsworth.....	Captains.....	McKay, M.

At 20 minutes to 3 the ball was forced by Halpenny and Burton and Billy got it down on the Barry goals in an instant. Here the rubber hovered, presaging illluck to Barry for a time, when by dint of hard play the Western boys succeeded in getting the ball to the other end of the field. It was however but a momentary advantage. It was soon returned and returned to stay, till after 12 minutes close and exciting play the sphere was kicked through from a scramble by Supple, and the first game was scored for Pembroke.

2nd Game.—When this game had been started many realized that Barrie was altogether out of it, yet the more sanguinary Westerners were still hopeful of an awakening from the lethargy. It was hoping against hope, for Halpenny again proved too fast for Burton and had the rubber on the Barrie flags in a moment from the start. Three times during this game did the ball come down to the Pembroke defence, once to Mulligan and twice to Irving. During the rest of the game the Pembroke home and Barrie defence had the ball to themselves, till at length A. McKay secured the game for Pembroke in eight minutes.

3rd Game.—This time Halpenny did not secure and things from the start looked well for Barrie. But alas their fond delusion was soon vanquished, for though Supple had forgotten that they had changed goals, the Pembroke home players had secured the ball and tried for goal. McCurry made a clever stop, but before he could recover his balance Airth had scored for Pembroke. Time, 3 minutes.

4th Game.—If at any time the Barrie's were in the contest it was in this game. They secured the ball from the face and immediately got it down on the Pembroke flags, and for the next five minutes the Pembroke defense was compelled to play lacrosse for all they were worth and by doing so they succeeded in giving A. McKay a chance to try, which, however, was cleverly stopped by McCurry. Though McCurry stopped the ball he did not have time to send it out, and consequently the defense was thrown into a bit of hard labor, and more than once did McCurry's excellent play in goal count for the Barrie boys. At length the sphere travelled down, but Mulligan sent it back again, when Vansickle secured, and after some very artful dodging, by which he passed four men, he lost to Halpenny, who sent it hot upon the flags. A. McKay secured it and being tightly checked passed to Airth, who made a wide try. McCurry secured it and put it for the time out of danger. Soon however Mulligan had returned it to A. McKay and he tried and was again wide. The ball having gone over the ropes a scratch behind the Barrie goals was in order. Airth secured the rubber from the scratch, who tossed to Reynolds who scored for Pembroke after 20 minutes' hard play.

Fifth game—The Barrie contingent had again received a ray of hope, but it was a hope only of not being whitewashed. The Pembroke team had the advantage from the face off, and seldom did the ball pass centrefield. A. McKay scored for Pembroke after seven minutes' play.

Sixth Game—There was still 20 minutes to play. The Barrie boys were now thoroughly disheartened but they were determined on scoring one game at any rate. Halpenny again secured the scratch and sent the rubber down on the Barrie goal. The defense got it out, however, by as pretty a piece of team play as would be seen on any field in Canada. Their play however was ineffectual. Though the defense was playing a strong, determined game of good lacrosse, the Barrie home was weak. The improvement in the Barrie defence is patent when after the lapse of the 20 minutes no game had been scored. It is noteworthy that during the whole of the game not one unpleasant word was uttered among the contestants, and not a single objection was raised to any decision of either the umpires or referee. Dr. McKay, the genial captain of the Pembroke team, brought home with him the trophy, which is now on exhibition in the confectionary window of Mrs. R. A. Denison.

Immediately after the lacrosse match the base ball match between Sault Ste. Marie and North Bay was called, Messrs. Saunders, of Sault Ste. Marie, and Sanderson, of Pembroke, having been selected as umpires. They, however, played but two innings each, when the rain began again, and so put a stop to the sports for the day. The score then stood 4 to 2 in favor of North Bay.

In the meantime the sporting committee had been hustling the sporting athletes and the following events were carried out:

One hundred yards race—1st Whalley, Almonte; and Broughton, Orillia; 3rd Towers, Sault Ste. Marie.

Trainman's Race—1st H. Wilkinson, 2nd J. Nidds, 3rd A. Torrance.

Running Long Jump—1st Whalley, 2nd Wilkinson 3rd Donnelly.

Running Hop, Step and Jump—1st Whalley, 2nd Donnelly.

The La Belle Brothers in their graceful slack wire performance were no small part of the attractions of the day, and everybody was highly delighted with the ease and confidence with which they performed the most difficult feats. The Rinaldo Brothers were very good in their acrobatic feats, considering the condition of the ground which was wet and slippery, and apt to produce forebodings of disaster to an acrobat.

In the voting contest Miss Tess Mackey was the winner. Miss Mackey may well be complimented on securing such a victory. The contest was for a handsome gold watch, and the contestants procured about $700 as a result of their canvass.

In the evening a grand ball was held in Victoria Hall, which was gaily decorated with Chinese lanterns, bannerettes and bunting. A large number of guests assembled, there being at least 75 couples among the notables being Mr. Mrs. and the Misses Doran, of North Bay, Thomas Reynolds, Esq., D. J. McEwan, Esq., G. J. Jury, Ass't Supt., and Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson, of Sudbury. The floor was under the management of Prof. McGregor, of Ottawa, and he clearly demonstrated that he had lost none of his old time ability or tact. Prof. Barrett's excellent orchestra dispersed the strains to which the guests tripped the light fantastic and they may well be complimented on their ability to play music that is music.—Pembroke Observer.

Where Drink Is Outlawed.

The business of operating railroad trains, with its tremendous responsibilities of property and life, requires a clear head and a steady hand. These are not compatible with the use of strong drink. The presidents, managers and superintendents of railroads, alert, bright business men, the farthest removed from the usual conception of a one-idea fanatic or temperance crank, generally realize this fact. While it has been known in a general way that some of the railroads prohibited their employes drinking, the universality of the inhibition will be a surprise to many newspaper readers. The New York Independent addressed a letter of inquiry on this subject to the various railway officers of the country. Replies were received from seventy high officials—presidents, vice-presidents, general managers and superintendents—of as many companies. The answers were practically to one effect—the drinking of intoxicants by employes is either prohibited by practice or by expressed rule—in the large majority of cases by both.

James T. Furber, vice-president of the Boston and Maine railroad, does not regard it as necessary to publish orders in regard to sobriety more than it would be to publish anew the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal;" for "it is understood by everyone that any misconduct insures immediate dismissal, and in no event is reinstatement made."

H. G. Young, vice-president of the Delaware and Hudson Canal company, says the general rule is that "no person in the employ of this company will be allowed to use intoxicating liquors as a beverage while on duty." He says that "practically this rule has a much wider application and significance, as we do not retain in our employ anybody known to use intoxicating liquors whether on or off duty."

J. H. Olhausen, general superintendent of the Central Railroad of New Jersey reports the following rule on his road, and that it is rigidly enforced:

As the habitual use of intoxicating liquors is incompatible with the duties of railroad employes, those who abstain from their use will be more favorably considered for promotion. The use of such liquors by employes on duty is positively forbidden, and the penalty for disregard of this order is dismissal from the service.

The Philadelphia and Reading road has identically the same order as that just quoted.

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe has a published order that "drinking when on duty or frequenting saloons will not be tolerated."

"Intoxication or the use of intoxicating liquors" is sufficient cause for dismissal on the Lake Erie and Western railroad.

The use of intoxicating liquors by trainmen is prohibited by state law in Vermont, and the Central Vermont railroad supplements the law by the rule that "preference will be given to employes who abstain entirely from its use."

Wm Tinkham, president of the Providence and Springfield railroad, says: "I do not employ any drinking men on the road."

The Missouri Pacific prohibits the use of intoxicants while on duty, and orders the dismissal of men who habitually use them on or off duty. Beer is specified as an intoxicant in the rules "for the reason that a great many people do not consider it so."

This prohibition of the drink habit by railroads is, so far as this great interest can go in that direction, a declaration of outlawry against the saloon, for it is a discountenancing of its product and a blow at its support. There can be no doubt that everyone, without exception, who trusts life and limb on a railroad train is glad that these rules exist and hope for their strict enforcement.—Sioux City Journal.

Twenty Drunkards.

Last year a party of twenty Drunkards was enroute to the general conference, via St. Louis, says the Nashville American. No agent accompanied them, and a telegram was sent to Union Depot Passenger Agent Bonner to "meet twenty Drunkards."

The religious education of the telegraph operator who received the message had been neglected. He had never heard of the Drunkards, and, supposing a mistake had been made, he just inserted the letter "r," and when Bonner received the message it read: "Meet No. 4. Twenty drunkards aboard look after them."

Bonner was somewhat taken aback. He did not know but that an inebriate asylum had broken loose, but any way prompt action was necessary. The twenty drunkards must be desperate men or the dispatch would not have been sent, and murder might have been committed on the road.

Bonner posted off to police headquarters, and his story did not lose in the telling. The chief of police, alive to the exigencies of the situation, made a special detail of ten policemen and a patrol wagon.

The policemen were drawn up in a line at the depot, and intense excitement prevailed among the numerous depot loungers, a rumor having gained currency that a desperate band of train robbers was on the incoming train.

In due time the train arrived, but no party of roystering drunkards alighted. The party on the train was composed of several pious looking gentlemen with broad-brimmed hats who stood around as though expecting some one.

Bonner approached one of them and said interrogatively:

"Had any trouble on the road?"

"No, brother," said the gentleman, "none that I know of. And now I'll ask you a question: Do you know a gentleman named Bonner?"

"Yes, I am Mr. Bonner," was the answer.

"Well, these brethren and myself are Dunkards, and you were to meet us and put us on the right train. Didn't you get a telegram?"

Bonner was completely done for. He excused himself, and, calling the sergeant of police aside, he told him that it was all a mistake and he and his men could go back to headquarters. Then he disposed of his religious friends, went around and cussed out the telegraph operator, after which he had to "set 'em up" for the whole police force on the promise to keep mum.

The Way It Works.

The way it works in New England is told by the New York Standard as follows:

A New England cotton manufacturer, who has large works, was talking recently with one of my acquaintances on the question of ballot reform. This master of men did not feel any too comfortable at the thought of a change in methods. Things as they are please him well. He said: "They have ballots now that are supposed to be got up so that no one can tell how a man votes. But we get around that. No man in my employ votes more than once against my interests. I'm around about election times. I sit on the platform at meetings and I know who are present. I know, too, how things are going on election day. When a ballot falls into the urn we know who puts it there and know what ticket it is. We've got to look out for our interests. This infernal free trade racket of last fall cost me more than ten thousand dollars. I'll tell you, Phil, there's nothing for keeping workingmen in their places like a good strong monarchy."

The Standard has a national reputation for telling the truth, and we invite workingmen to read the foregoing paragraph and then ask themselves, if from the days of the helots, there ever existed a more damnable slavery than the "New England Manufacturer" discloses? The "good, strong monarchy" which the New Englander so much desires, is coming as certainly as that rivers flow to the sea, with all the crushing, degrading appliances of a "good strong monarchy," if workingmen do not organize and federate to crush out the last lingering hope of monarchists.—Locomotive Firemen's Magazine.

They Deserve to be Hanged.

The recent damnable and outrageous wrecks and attempted wrecks on the New York Central railroad cry aloud for the immediate bringing to justice of the perpetrators. If ever desperadoes deserved to meet an ignominious death at the hands of lynchers these are the ones.

Had these fiends incarnate succeeded in their hellish designs, men, women and innocent children would have been hurled into eternity without a moment's warning, or maimed for life by jagged iron and splintered wood, or cremated alive in burning cars.

If these men were or were not strikers they should be dealt with summarily, and the Knights of Labor owe it to themselves individually and their honor and standing as an organization to do their utmost to assist in ferreting out the brutes in human guise who have made these dastardly attempts on the lives of innocent people.

We believe the Knights see the matter in the proper light and will, so far as possible, work for this consummation.

It is a great responsibility that is thrown upon their shoulders, and they should strain every nerve to cast it off. If they can do so they will stand out before the world in a brighter light than ever.

The Central officials naturally lay the terrible and devilish work at the door of the strikers, while thousands of others believe that it was simply the fiendish deed of thugs bent on robbery.

Which ever it may be, we repeat it is the duty of the great labor organization to at once take a hand in this work and help hold up to public gaze and scorn these despicable whelps, who are really unfit to ornament telegraph poles, assisted by neckties of the strongest hemp.

Out upon such rascals. The world is better off without them, and their deaths should be a cause for congratulation.—Elmira Sunday Telegram.

The Sympathetic Strike.

~ The same idea gave birth to combinations of labor and to combinations of capital—the idea of self protection and the advancement of their own interests. Every offensive or defensive argument which may justly be applied to the one may be employed by the other. On this subject the Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

“The evil of the sympathetic strike would seem likely to be parent of the not less evil of the sympathetic lockout. We are free to speak of one and the other as unmixed evils. Had not the tyranny of the sympathetic strike excited resistance on the part of the employers, the tyranny of the sympathetic lockout would have wakened universal indignation; as it is it excites universal regret. The prime evil of the strike and the lockout is that it makes the innocent public suffer in order that the interests of a class of wage-earners or a class of capitalists may be advanced. The public has suffered so much from the wars of these two factions that it will be a matter of no surprise if some day, and suddenly, it exclaim “A plague on both your houses!” and proceed to make laws by which the interests of the people may not suffer by the contentions of factions.

The sympathetic strike proposed to paralyze the whole volume of trade and industry until the employers in one industry, or it might be until one employer in one industry, should comply with the demands of the workmen. The sympathetic lockout proposed to close all the factories, employing 60,000 men, and more men if more factories join the dangerous confederacy, until the proprietors of one factory can compel their workmen to comply with the demands of the employer. In either case the public suffers by the stagnation of trade. If the strike or the lockout be of long continuance the cost of goods is increased by the diminution of production, or by the difficulty of transportation, and the volume of currency suddenly is limited by the cessation of wages, while the volume of public expenditure is increased by demands for special police or military protection, and by the vastly enlarged demand for relief to paupers. It matters not whether a dozen rich trading corporations combine to close their establishments until one of them conquers its workmen, or whether a dozen strong trades unions combine to prevent the transaction of business until the workmen in one establishment conquers their employers; in either event it is the public that suffers”.

We submit and protest that such conditions as these are illegal in view of the common law, and criminal and dangerous in relation to the commonwealth. Neither labor nor capital is king in this republic, and neither should be allowed to usurp kingly functions.—Sioux City Journal.

State Ownership of Railroads.

The workingmen of England in their Trades Union Congress last Tuesday gave proof of robust common sense by refusing to indorse a proposition in favor of an eight-hour law. Though the President of the Congress in his opening address expressed the opinion that such a law would not injure British trade, a resolution in harmony with his views was rejected. The workingmen of England maintain that this matter can be more effectually regulated in their own interests and in the interest of trade through their labor unions than by act of Parliament.

The President of the Congress also spoke in favor of another scheme of State Socialism—Government ownership and control of railroads. On this as well as on the other side of the ocean State ownership of all the means of transportation by land and water is urged as the final and only practicable solution of conflicts between labor and capital, such as the New York Central Railroad strike. In support of this policy the argument is made that the great railroad corporations in their eagerness to secure dividends upon watered stocks have small regard for the lives and limbs of their employés. The report of the Interstate Commerce Commission shows that out of 704,743 persons employed in railroad transportation last year 1972 were killed and 20,030 disabled in the service. This is a heavy list of casualties, showing the risks that railroad employes daily incur in serving the public.

There is no doubt that the number of these casualties might have been greatly diminished by the general adoption of modern means and appliances for coupling cars and running trains. But is it likely that the railroad employes would be in less danger if the railroads should be owned and controlled by the General Government? The State can, in the exercise of its police power, compel railroad companies to make proper provision for the security of the lives of employes and passengers, and juries can and do inflict heavy damages for neglect. But with the railroads under the ownership and management of the State, who would compensate the employes and their families for injuries? It would be necessary to set up another Government Pension Bureau to pay for the loss of life and limb in railroad service.

The example of the State-owned railroads of the Continent of Europe affords no encouragement in this respect. In England there is more security for the lives of railroad employes than in this country or on the Continent, because of the careful supervision which the State exercises over the transportation companies. While leaving these corporations in private hands, the English laws hold them to a strict responsibility for injuries to passengers and employes. This is far more advantageous to all concerned than Government ownership of the means of transportation. In spite of complaints the same policy is gaining in this country; as is witnessed in the laws of most of the States.—Philadelphia Record.

The House that Jack Built.

Behold the mansion reared by Jack.

See the malt stored in many a plethoric sack,
In the proud cirque of Ivan's bivouac.

Mark how the rat's felonious fangs invade
The golden stores in John's pavillion laid.

Anon, with velvet foot and Tarquin stride
Subtle Grimalkin to his quarry glide

Grimalkin grim, that slew the fierce rodent
Whose tooth insidious, Johann's sackcloth rent.

Lo, now the deep-mouthed canine foe's assault
That vexed the avenger of the stolen malt,
Stored in the hallow precincts of the hall
That rose complete at Jack's creative call.

Here stalks the impetuous cow with crumbled horn,

Whereupon the exacerbatng bound was torn,
Who bayed the feline slaughter beast that slew
The rat predacious whose keen fangs ran through
The textile fibres that involved the grain
That lay in Hans' inviolate domain.

Here walks forlorn the Damsel crowned with rue, Lactiferous spoils from vaccine dug who drew
Of that corniculate beast whose tortuous horn
Tossed to the clouds, in fierce vindictive scorn
The harrowing bound whose braggart bark and stir

Arched the lithe spine and reared the indignant fur
Of Puss, that with verminicidal claw
Struck the wierd rat in whose insatiate maw
Lay reeking malt that erst in Ivan's courts we saw.

Robed in senescent garb that seemed in sooth
Too long a prey to Chronos' iron tooth,
Behold the man whose amorous lips incline,
Full with young Eros' osculative sign,

To the lorn maiden whose lact-albic hands
Drew albulactic wealth from lacteal glands
Of the immortal bovine, by whose horn,
Distort, to realm ethereal was borne,
The beast catulean, vexer of that sly
Ulysses quadrupedal who made die
The old mordacious rat that dared devour
Antecedaneous ale in John's domestic bower.

Lo', here with hirsute honor doffed, succinct
Of saponaceous locks, the priest who linked
In Hymen's golden bands the torn unthrift
Whose means exigious stared from many a rift
Even as he kissed the virgin all forlorn,
Who milked the cow with implicated horn,
Who in fine wrath the canine torturer skied
That dared to vex the insidious muricide
Who let the auroral effluence through the peat
Of the sly rat that had robbed the palace Jack had built.

The loud, cantankerous shanghai comes at last,
Whose shouts aroused the shorn ecclesiast
Who sealed the vows of Hymen's sacrament
To him who, robed in garments indignant,
Exosculates the damsel lachrymose,
The emulator of that horned brute morose
That tossed the dog that worried the cat that kil:
The rat that ate the malt that lay in the house that Jack built.

The Scranton Meeting.

The Railway conductors held a grand union meeting in this city yesterday. A more fraternal set of men it would be difficult to find. If they are troubled with dissensions among themselves, it was certainly not noticeable yesterday. They were orderly, chatted in groups about the streets about their business, and attended the meetings, and when night came repaired in numbers back to their posts of duty again.

Two secret sessions were held yesterday in the German Odd Fellows' Hall on Lackawanna avenue.

THE AFTERNOON ENTERTAINMENT.

The entertainment given by the Order yesterday afternoon was, indeed, a feast of reason. It was interspersed with excellent vocal music rendered by the "Shubert" quartette.

P. F. Duffy acted as chairman and master of ceremonies. The audience was large, and composed principally of railroad men and their friends. Mr. Duffy opened the exercises by a few remarks. He said it was with much gratification that he noticed so many present who felt interested in the Railway Conductors. "I hope that when you leave here you will carry away with you pleasant recollections of the entertainment. In the name of the Order, I bid you welcome.

The entertainment will be begun by the "Shubert" quartette. The singers mentioned were Messrs. J. T. Watkins, H. Davis, D. M. Davis and M. B. Morgan. They sang "The Power of Song," by Stuzel, in a pleasing manner.

Mr. Duffy then introduced Mayor J. H. Fellows. He said that the Mayor could hardly say aught against railroad men, as he had a brother who was a railroader, and if he spoke disparagingly of railroaders, he would be speaking ill of his own brother.

MAYOR FELLOWS' SPEECH.

Mayor Fellows—It has been said by the Chairman that I cannot say aught against railroad men, because if I did I would be speaking disparagingly of my brother. This is true. I have a brother a railroader. I think your calling a noble one. Noble, because you have grave responsibilities. If you neglect these you are not only morally responsible, but you are legally punished. I have been more or less familiar with railroad men all my life. I have found them to be industrious, temperate, and honest men.

To you who come here from other localities I would like to say that this city is a place of recent development. If you had come here twenty years ago you would not have found a place like this to meet in. We were in many respects a primitive city then.

I regret that in your department of life there is considerable trouble between capital and labor.

Capitalists and business men should act so as to command the respect of their employes, and the employes should do their duty so that their superiors will be bound to respect them.

I extend to you, as chief magistrate of the city, a hearty welcome, and assure you that whenever you come to this city the latch string will be out, and you will receive a hearty welcome. I thank you for your attention, and as there are speakers to follow me I will not longer tax your time.

Mr. Duffy then introduced Col. F. J. Fitzsimmons, who said:

COL. F. J. FITZSIMMONS.

Mr. Chairman, Railroad Conductors, Ladies and Gentlemen:

When invited to be present and say a word on this occasion, I was admonished by the gentlemen who extended the invitation to be brief in my remarks, because the audience it would be my privilege to address, he said, would be largely composed of persons who did not believe in "losing time," and who had no more respect for a long-winded talker than they had for a fireman who was unable to keep up steam, or an engineer who was never known to run on schedule time. I gladly consented to be here, and cheerfully agreed to occupy your attention but a very few minutes. I have a fondness for railroad men that is akin to affection. My boyhood and early manhood were spent in handling brakes and battling with the elements that make the rails treacherous, unsafe and slippery. I have experienced the hardships and pleasantries of railroad life. There is much about it that is interesting, if not fascinating. The anecdotes told in the plain caboose surpass in humor and originality any narrated in gilded palaces, where the æsthetic nabobs of creation indulge their social appetites. It affords an avenue to the laudably ambitious. Many of the distinguished men of the nation began on the gravel train, and by perseverance, energy and merit received promotion until they finally reached fame and fortune. A man who wins distinction in that way deserves all the honor his fellow citizens can give him. He is no accident. He is a man who never falters in his devotion to duty or is unfair in his dealings with his fellow men. His success proves that he was faithful to his employers, respectful to his superiors, courteous to his colleagues and intelligent in the performance of his work. Railroad men are not sufficiently known to the general public. They are not properly appreciated. Their daring deeds and unselfish heroism in the cause of humanity equal any on record on the field of honor, or found even in the pages of romance. Meetings like this have a tendency to make them better known and appreciated. No class have a stronger claim on the friendly consideration of the whole people than have the railroad conductors. Their duties are of the most exacting kind and their responsibilities are manifold. Their positions indicate that they command the confidence of their employers. It is a guarantee that they are esteemed as men of fine intelligence and strict integrity. It is an evidence of politeness and trustworthiness. These are some of the attributes of the conductors of this country. I indulge in no fulsome flattery in saying that the Order of railroad conductors deserve the respect of all and the great moral support of the public. I will close my remarks with the hope that wisdom may always prevail in their councils, and that none of them may ever bring discredit upon their splendid and undeservedly popular organization. Whether ascending to the mountain's summit or descending to the valley's level—whether whirling around curves or shooting through tunnels—in storm or in sunshine—in light or in darkness—may the careful watchfulness of the heroic conductors always receive from a generous public words of true kindness, and from their employers that tangible appreciation which makes tie-ups impossible and strikes a thing of the yast. Then will unselfish services be duly valued, and true heroism kindly rewarded. And when he reaches the last depot on the journey of life, may a berth of unalloyed comfort await him and convey him to the realms of perpetual summer, where the flowers of love forever bloom and where angel's music gladdens the good and faithful, is my earnest hope.

The "Shubert" quartette then rendered another selection, and the chairman introduced Mr. E. E. Clark, Grand Chief Conductor, of Utah, a delegate to the convention.

BROTHER E. E. CLARK, OF UTAH.

Mr. Clark began by saying that he came as a representative of the oldest, strongest and most influential order in the State. It was organized in that State in the spring of 1868, and reorganized in the 1878. With a very meagre beginning the Order now extends all over the State. Mr. Clark then gave a brief outline of the history of his organization. He pictured the advantages to be derived from the organization. The family of an injured man were taken care of, and in case of death, members had the satisfaction of knowing that the money went toward relieving the distressed families of brother conductors and not into the coffers of rich insurance companies.

Mr. Clark also pictured the trials of a railroadman's wife. How much more in danger she was of losing her husband and provider than the average woman.

He touched upon the difference between capital and labor and said although all was not quiet and in such condition that the lion could lie down with the lamb, yet there was this advantage in organized labor that the lamb was transferred into a lion and could lie down without fear of being eaten up.

Morgan D. Morgan then sang a solo "Crown Him Lord of All." It was well received.

Mr. Duffy then introduced as he put it, "A Soldier, Statesman, Orator and a Prophet," Col. J. A. Price.

COL. J. A. PRICE'S SPEECH.

Mr. Price said the flattering introduction almost took his breath away. Railroad conductors were entitled to much credit. He had been with them a great deal in his travels, and found them entitled to all the courtesy and generosity the traveling public could bestow. He would say, however, they needed education. A few days ago he had met a conductor of fine educational attainments. It was on a passenger train. A lady came in and immediately began tussling at a car window. She told the conductor she would suffocate if that window was not put up. The conductor raised the window. At the next station another lady got aboard and took a seat directly back of the lady with the open window. She began to shiver, and when the conductor came around told him if that window was not put down she would freeze. The conductor put the window down. A gentleman who was in the car and had noticed the trouble over the window called the conductor over and said to him: "I hope you will learn a lesson from to-day's experience. When a person comes into your car and is going to suffocate put the window down; when another in the car is going to freeze to death, put the window up."

"If there is an abomination on the face of the earth," continued the Colonel, "it is the car window, and if I were a Mayor, and had the power, or if I were a congressman the first bill I would introduce would be one nailing down all the car windows. If there is anything I detest about the Pullman cars, or about the D., L. & W. cars, which my friend Bogart here represents, it is the window nuisance. It is an abomination. But I cannot dwell as long on this subject as I wish to. It is one of my 'isms.'"

The Colonel then turned to the subject of organization and the inequality of labor. There was an inequality in conductors, as he would prove. He had once heard a trial in which two wives were suing for damages for the death of their husband. The cases were settled. One of the widows ubraided her lawyer and said the amount received was not enough. He told her the other widow settled upon the same basis. "The cases," he said, "are identical." Your husband and her husband were both conductors. They met with similar accidents and both were killed instantly. You see both men and cases were identical. The widow protested. "There was a difference," she said, "My husband was a conductor on a lightning express, and her's only a conductor on a way-freight." So you see there is a difference.

In speaking of organization the speaker said, I believe thoroughly and heartily in organized labor. I am glad to see labor come to the front, and hope it will progress and push onward until it stands side by side with capital. I think I can read between the lines the object of your meeting. When I see the great problems that are daily becoming more intricate, I tremble for the future. There was never so much need for intelligence as in the term through which we are just passing.

I can almost hear the clash of arms in the near future. When that time comes I hope you will fight as intelligent men.

C. H. WILKINS.

C. H. Wilkins, Assistant Grand Chief Conductor, was then introduced. He said in substance:

The five men who laid the foundation of the Brotherhood of Conductors, did better than they knew. Out of their humble efforts has grown an organization which is powerful in its influence—not so much in its strength through union, but in its power for the moral good of its members. It makes men better fathers and better citizens. It is advantageous, too, to the employers of men. A union man who does his duty indifferently is not a good railway conductor. Mr. Wilkins then spoke of the difference in the action of railroad officials toward the men, and discussed the present tie-up on the New York Central road.

HON. LEMUEL AMERMAN.

Chairman Duffy then introduced Hon. Lemuel Amerman as a prominent lawyer and a candidate for Congress. Mr. Amerman stepped before the audience with the remark that he was not present as a lawyer, or as a candidate for office, but as an invited citizen who had been asked to say a kind word to the Railroad Conductors. He said in substance:

It affords me great pleasure, indeed, to meet with you on this occasion. Your order, as I understand it, is founded upon the great principle of the brotherhood of man. A principle that calls into activity the cardinal virtues of the heart.

Pure religion and undefiled is, we are told, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep ones self unspotted from the world. This is your purpose and resolution, and thus you will be a blessing and be blessed. The greatest thing in time is not to cease to do evil, but to do good. In this you are engaged. Any organization or order that puts selfishness under foot and extends a brother's helpful hand must prosper, and deserves and should receive the sympathy and support of all right-thinking and right-hearted men.

I have often thought that, and am now more impressed than ever with the thought, that the great body of railway operators of this country are not appreciated and held in that high esteem which their merits demand. The traveling public, which now embraces almost our entire population, seldom stop to think how much they owe to the intelligence, the vigilance, the conscientiousness and the constant devotion to duty of the railway operators. As they are carried safely and comfortably over mountains, through tunnels, upon bridges and trestles along precipices, they have no thought of the man in the cab, careless of his own comfort, unmindful of the storm, peering into the darkness, that they may be safe. Of the man who makes it possible for them to get there in time, to keep their engagements, to seize the opportunity for success by his intelligent and laborious feeding of the fires, knowing no night or day, no storm or sunshine. Of the man who looks out for their every comfort, of heat and light and ventilation who keeps you informed as to the progress of your journey from station to station who has a general care for you by his devoted watchfulness and thoughtfulness; watchful of time careful to get and obey orders ever courteous in his answers, patient under all provocation helpful to the weak and ignorant, a gazetteer of information as to geography, time, distance routes, hotels, and all the multifarious things that anyone can cudgel his wit into asking.

The American conductor has not a peer in Europe or anywhere else that I have ever read of. His executive ability, judgment, decision, wit and omnipresent courtesy and intelligence, in my judgment, is not excelled or equalled anywhere.

During my absence I frequently thought what a transformation would be wrought in European railroading could they be placed under American management. How I would like to see our Hallstead, with his his trained operators, conductors, engineers, firemen and trainmen run a continental road. It would astonish the natives.

Among the numerous things we Americans have to be thankful for are our railroad facilities for travel, which to-day is made a pleasure and success in a great measure by the American railway conductor, engineer, fireman and trainman.

May heaven bless you gentlemen of the Order of Railway Conductors. May you always be true to principle, true to duty, true to yourselves, and true to God.

L. C. YOUNG.

L. C. Young, supervisor of passenger trains on the Central road and Banking company, of Georgia. Mr. Young is a former Pennsylvanian, and a veteran. He has a soft spot in his heart for the conductors of the Keystone state. He knew by experience the life of a conductor, and delivered a sincere and taking address, which lack of space prevents giving in detail.

Several hundred delegates were present, some of them coming from the Southern and far Western States.

NOTES.

Mrs. Garrett Bogart and her daughter, Mrs. Geo. Fowler, presented Lackawanna Division, No. 12, with a handsome bible, through Grand Chief Clark, which was accepted in a few well chosen words by Mr. Duffy.

Mr. W. F. Hallstead, Garrett Bogart and family, Mr. James Merrill and Geo. Hallstead were among the auditors at the entertainment.

Nearly the entire delegation of visiting conductors stopped at the St. Charles during their stay in the city. A large number returned home last evening.—Scranton Times.

A Noted Conductor.

Yesterday a great deal of attention was given a beautiful life size crayon portrait, the work of Mrs. J. W. Metcalf, wife of our City Marshal, which was placed in the window of Peeble's drug store. The portrait is that of Edgar E. Clark, Grand Chief of the Order of Railway Conductors, and was presented by Mrs. Metcalf to the Wasatch Division, 127, Order of Railway Conductors.

Mr. Clark, Ed. as he was familiarly known among the "boys," is an old Utah conductor, and has ever been loved and respected by all who have known him.

He came West a number of years ago and served as brakeman on the Central Pacific, was promoted and for some time acted as passenger conductor. He has also been connected with several other roads.

In May, 1889, he was elected to the office of Grand Senior Conductor for the term of two years, and before half of his time had expired, he had given such satisfaction that he was elected Grand Chief, the highest rank of the Order.

His headquarters are at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and he has 18,000 conductors under him.—Ogden (Utah) Standard.

A Good Move.

Railway men of all grades have hitherto taken comparatively little part in politics in this country except as individual citizens, affiliating with the different political parties according to their personal preferences. The possibilities of influence by combined action in a political way have received more attention of late and it is now stated that in Illinois the Brotherhood of Locomotive Fireman, the Switchmen's Mutual Benefit Association and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen intend to co-operate this fall for the election of members of the legislature. Steps have been taken to organize a "Railway Employees' Independent Political association" and a state convention is to be held in September. It is claimed that this organization represents 25,000 votes in Chicago alone, and a much greater number throughout the state. Whether or not, when it comes to a state election it can really control votes enough to accomplish anything, as against the two great political parties, is a question, although there is no doubt that at many places railway men could have important influence in local politics by combining for that purpose.—Railway Age.

To Mr. Geo. M. Hallstead.

 Here's at you, my boy, in a jingle of rhyme,
 Whilst the sun of the Sabbath is gloriously shining,
 And the bells in the steeples melodiously chime
 Their Te Deums to lift us o'er mortal repining;
 If this life has its ills, it has mountains of joy,
 Where the veriest slave on occasions may rally,
 But you, fortune-favored, and dear worthy boy,
 May reside on their summits high over each valley.
 You may quaff of the nectar which Fortune bestows
 In her choicest of measures all full to o'erflowing,
 You may breathe of the perfume distilled from the rose,
 Or the richest of flowers perennially blowing;
 And yet, you've a heart that is foreign to pride,
 Full of kindest thoughts for subordinates ever,
 Where all virtues beloved in officials reside, Binding men with a grasp that no power can sever.
 I have heard them for years most endearingly speak

Of your kindness, in language refined and pathetic;
 Ere the dawn of bright boyhood appeared on your cheek
 They were won to your side by your bearing magnetic;
 And, as time sped along, till in stature a man,
 Now you actively stride in this world's great Battle;
 With your army inspired from the rear to the van,
 And endowed with abundance of conquering mettle.
 Call it "tact," what you will, 'tis a gift from above;
 Every stockholder knows what 'tis worth to possess it.
 When men find an official to honor and love,
 Where his footprint is made they could kneel and caress it.
 Not a man but will spring with alacrity forth
 To obey such a leader through deadliest peril, Mid the hot suns of summer or snows of the north,
 Though he issues commands in the voice of a girl.
 Martinets in their place—tho' God knows where it is—
 May be fruitful of good, yet I very much doubt it.
 The true leader men love wears a smile on his phiz
 When he meets them, like you, and that's all there's about it.
 They will follow you close through the deadliest breach,
 Or the red gates of—well, I'll not name the location,
 'Tis a place where your father in eloquent speech Tells the boys to avoid when they run by a station.
 Do not think, sir, my muse is a hireling that sings
 For the sunshine of favors bestowed or expected;
 If you were not well worthy she'd never spread wings,
 And the hints which were made me would all be rejected,
 By those who are daily beneath your keen glance,
 As often they said to me evening and morning;
 "Dear Shandy, whenever your muse has a chance,
 Send a rhyme to George Hallstead without any warning."
 Here it is. Mid the wreaths of a fragrant cigar,
 I have written it out full of fanciful notions;
 While the pulpits declared declarations of war
 On old sinners like me who neglect their devotions.
 If it gives you one-half the enjoyment to read
 Which it gave me to pen it I'm more than rewarded;
 And "the better the day, sir, the better the deed"
 Is a maxim, tho' old, by me always regarded.

DOWN GRADE TO DEATH.

TRAVELING AT A SPEED OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILES AN HOUR—A CONDUCTOR'S HEROISM.

TRUCKEE, August 22.—A terrible accident occurred this morning at Cascade, instantly killing four men and seriously wounding another.

Freight train 19 reached Summit at 3:40 a. m., seven hours late, being followed by freight train 23 and passenger train 1. While the engines were taking on some cars the brakes gave way on the main portion of the train, and seventeen cars and the caboose began backing down the mountain.

Conductor Frank T. Kingsley was flagging in the rear of the train, and seeing the cars moving climbed on top and began setting up the brakes.

A shed carpenter named Jacob Schaab was riding in the caboose, and noticing that the train was backing down with great velocity, went on the rear platform and saw that the engines were uncoupled and that the train was running away.

Half a mile west of the summit, while the train was going at a speed of forty miles an hour, Schaab jumped, and two hours later was found unconscious by a track-walker.

No. 23 reached Cascade siding and started to sidetrack for No. 1.

Meantime the runaway was tearing down the grade with constantly increasing speed, the frantic efforts of the heroic conductor having no perceptible effect in checking it. A track-walker at Summit Valley, three miles from Summit, thought only two cars passed him, and says he only heard a rushing sound and saw the dust.

The engineers of No. 23, who were on the sidetrack at Cascade, say that the flying train passed them at the rate of 150 miles an hour.

Only the rear car and caboose of No. 23 remained on the main track when the crash came.

There was a mighty roar as of a prolonged peal of thunder, and in the twinkling of an eye 352 feet of new snowsheds and as many feet of railroad track, with the telegraph section and twenty cars, were swept into a broken, confused, indescribable mass, portions of which extended far down the steep bank toward the Yuba river.

Telegraph Operator J. B. Dorsey was asleep in the rear of the station and awoke to find his house being thrown fifty feet down the bank. A caboose was directly under his bedroom and four freight cars were huddled together in the front of the office. There was a clear space just large enough to hold him and his bed right in the midst of the horrible debris.

Climbing out of a rear window, he found himself unhurt, except that he was a trifle bruised and had two toes crushed. He soon spread the alarm among the 200 carpenters and bridge builders who are stationed within fifty yards of the spot, and who had come rushing out to see what caused the crash.

The engineers of No. 23 had no idea that their train had been struck, the velocity of the runaway being so great that it had torn away the caboose and one car and knocked the hind end out of a third car, and yet there had not been the slightest jar at the head of the train. It cut like a sharp knife.

At Summit the telegraph operator, J. W. Fitzgerald, had been notified that the train had broken loose, and while the men were telling him the fire-gong clanged out sharply. The breaking and crossing of the wires at Cascade thus gave the alarm by causing the gong to strike. Fitzgerald found that every wire west was down and forthwith telegraphed by way of Chicago and New Orleans that an accident must have occurred at Cascade station, for at no other point were all the wires inside the shed.

At the wreck an immediate search was made for the men who were known to be under the debris. The wreckage was piled twenty feet high.

Cars were crushed to fragments, and trucks, axles, wheels and steel rails were twisted and broken like pipe-stems. The strong shed timbers were ground into splinters and freight of every conceivable description was mingled through the entire mass.

At 6 o'clock the body of Vic E. Veara was found. He was far down the bank, and had a dreadful gash in the back of his neck and severe cuts on the head. Veara was the rear brakeman, and was standing on the ground ready to turn the switch when, like a flash of lightning, the runaway struck. He was about 26 years old, and had a sister living at Napa.

Soon afterward the body of Oliver Beaver was discovered. His face was scarcely marred, but his arms, legs and entire body were crushed and mangled out of all semblance to human form. He was almost naked and fairly crushed to pieces. He was about 29 years old and had relatives at West Point, Calaveras county, and an uncle at Penryn.

At 8 o'clock the body of Frank T. Kingsley was discovered. His head was torn entirely off, only the skin of the face remaining. He was about 50 years old and leaves a child in Massachusetts. He was one of the most trusted and popular men on the road, and when it was known that he had voluntarily taken that wild ride to death in order to try and save his comrades, hundreds of men shed tears over his lifeless remains.

It was nearly 10 o'clock before the mangled corpse of William Connelly was found. George Hurley was the regular conductor of No. 23, but half an hour before leaving Rocklyn he was taken suddenly ill and Connelly had taken his place. It is thought that Connelly and Beaver were in the caboose at the moment their train was struck. Connelly's head was fearfully crushed and his body and limbs were shockingly mutilated. He was an experienced railroader, highly esteemed, aged about 26, and leaves relatives at Newcastle.

Trainmaster Alger and the Hayes wrecking crew started for the scene of the wreck as soon as news reached Truckee; and with the assistance of G. G. Comstock, bridge inspector, and of the bridge and carpenter crews, cleared the wreck by 2:30 p. m.

The new steel bridge is being erected at Cascade, only a few rods below the wreck, and the steam pile driver was brought in to play in removing the awful mass of timbers and iron.

It was the worst wreck which has occurred on the mountains in twenty years. The rails and ties were torn up and the tracklayers were brought from Truckee and a new track laid, so that the trains began to pass at 4:30 o'clock.

Assistant Superintendent Burkhalter, with Special Officer Ben True, J. Fulton, deputy coroner of Placer county, and the Sacramento wrecking train arrived at 3:20 o'clock.

A coroner's jury was summoned, but as important witnesses had gone to Truckee the inquest was postponed until to-morrow at Auburn.

Special Officer F. T. Burke was at the wreck at 6 o'clock and took charge of the packages of freight. More was saved than would be expected.

Schaab and the four dead men were taken to Sacramento on No. 4. Schaab will probably recover, though he is badly hurt about the head, body, legs and sides. He has a family living at Omaha. It is seven miles from Summit to Cascade, and it is wonderful that a runaway train could have made the distance and remained on the track.

In half a minute more No. 23 would have been safely side tracked and the eighteen cars of No. 19 would have dashed on into the eastbound passenger train. L. P. Ladd, Kingsley's rear brakeman, had been accidentally left at Emigrant Gap, or else there would probably have been another victim.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Conductor Kingsley was a member of Sierra Nevada Div. 195 at Sacramento.

Resolutions of Thanks.

To the Officials of the K. C., F. S. and M. R'y.

Fort Scott Division No. 165, Order of Railway Conductors, in regular session, Sept 7th, 1890, unanimously adopted the following preamble and set of resolutions:

That whereas, The K. C., F. S. and M. R'y Co. through its officials, did, on Sept. 1st, 1890, put in force, a new schedule of wages, by which the pay of every man employed in the train service was materially advanced.

And whereas, Said schedule came to us unasked and unexpected, prompted and brought about, we believe, through a manly sense of justice and right on the part of said officials.

And whereas, Said schedule is equal to any and far superior to many now in force, which were obtained only through persistent requests, and in some instances, demands of thoroughly organized orders of railway employes. We feel that said schedule should meet with the approval of every man affected by it, and that the officials who were the instigators, and those who so readily approved and endorsed it, should be the recipients of our most heartfelt thanks for the same.

Therefore be it resolved, That the members of Fort Scott Division No. 165, Order of Railway Conductors do hereby tender their most earnest and heartfelt thanks to the officials of the K. C., F. S. and M. R'y Co., individually and collectively, for the schedule of wages put in force Sept 1st, 1890, by said officials, by which the pay of every man in the train service of said road was materially advanced.

Resolved, That as said schedule was adopted and put in force by said officials without so much as a request from the employés affected by it, to do so. The action of said officials is almost without parallel in railroad history and should meet with the approval and commendation of every employé of said railway, as well as that of all other railway employés.

Resolved, That we do hereby pledge ourselves to renewed vigilance and faithfulness in the discharge of our duties as conductors, keeping ever in mind the golden rule; believing as we do, that the action of said officials was prompted by a sense of the justice of this precept.

Resolved, That we fully appreciate the fact that we, as conductors, employed on the above named railway, are the recipients of kind, courteous and lenient treatment to an unusual degree, at the hands of the several officials of the said road; that we hope, by faithful attention to our several duties, as conductors, to repay to some extent, our debt of gratitude.

And be it further resolved, That the above preamble and resolutions be engrossed, and a copy of the same be delivered to the several officials of the K. C., F. S. & M. R'y, also to THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR and to the Railway News Reporter for publication.

Respectfully submitted,

W. H. CHURCHILL, C. C.

Schedule of Pay.

FOR ATLANTIC & PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.
(Western Division.)

GENERAL MANAGER'S OFFICE.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., September 1st, 1890.

The following schedules of pay and regulations will govern trainmen in the service of this company on and after this date.

PASSENGER SERVICE.

Passenger Conductors, $130.00 per month.

Passenger Brakeman, $75.00 per month.

It is understood that while two through trains daily each way are run as at present, there will be six crews for the New Mexico Division, six crews for the Arizona Division, and five crews for the California Division.

FREIGHT SERVICE.

The pay of freight conductors will be as follows:

Between Albuquerque and Winslow, \$95.00 per month, for 3,000 miles or less, and $3\frac{1}{6}$ cents per mile for all excess mileage.

Between Winslow and Mojave, \$105.00 per month, for 3,000 miles or less, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per mile for all excess mileage.

The pay of freight brakemen will be:—

Between Albuquerque and Winslow, \$70.00 per month, for 3,000 miles or less, and $2\frac{1}{3}$ cents per mile for all excess mileage.

Between Winslow and Mojave, \$80.00 per month, for 3,000 miles or less, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per mile for all excess mileage.

WORK TRAIN SERVICE.

Work Train Conductors will be paid $100.00 per month.

Work Train Brakemen will be paid $75.00 per month.

26 or 27 days per calendar month will constitute a month's work on work trains—12 hours or less to constitute a day's work.

Conductor with Helper Engine between Williams and Ash Fork will be paid $100.00 per calendar month. Twelve (12) hours to constitute a day's work, the hours to be regulated by Division Superintendents. Overtime to be paid as per Article 1.

REGULATIONS.

ARTICLE I. On all freight runs of less than 100 miles requiring more than 10 hours to make the run, over-time will be paid if the hours used on the trip exceed 12 hours, in which case all over-time exceeding 10 hours will be paid at freight rates.

On all freight runs exceeding 100 miles, trainmen will be paid over-time for all time used to complete the trip in excess of an average speed of 10 miles per hour at freight rates.

On all through freight runs between Winslow and Williams and between Peach Springs and Williams, where Williams is made division terminal, over-time will be paid for all time used to complete the trip in excess of 10 miles per hour.

ART. 2. Train men required to remain on duty over 30 minutes with their trains after arriving at a main line terminal station, shall be paid at the rate of 10 miles per hour.

ART. 3. In computing over-time no fraction of an hour less than 30 minutes will be counted. Any fraction of an hour over 30 minutes will be counted an hour.

ART. 4. Any Conductor or Brakeman running less than 100 miles in 24 hours on freight or extra passenger service or special trains will be paid the same as if 100 miles had been run, and in addition for any over-time earned under Article 1.

ART. 5. Freight and passenger crews making extra trips in addition to their regular assigned runs will be allowed extra time upon the basis allowed other crews in similar service.

ART. 6. Crews dead-heading under orders will be paid one-half their regular rates. The first crew out will run dead-head, and the second run the train; the dead-heading crew being first out on reaching terminal of that run.

ART. 7. Crews not assigned to regular runs will be run first in first out.

ART. 8. All train men after a continuous service of 16 hours or more, shall, upon a written or telegraphic notice upon Division Superintendent or Train Master, be entitled to 8 hours rest before they are again called for service, except in case of wrecks, washouts or other emergencies, and provided also that where bulletin notice registering their arrival in a Call or Register Book that an entry therein to the effect that 8 hours rest is needed before the signer is able to go on duty again, will be sufficient notice to the Division Official.

ART. 9. Where crews are compelled to double hills as a general service, such crews will be allowed the extra mileage made; for example, if a hill is five miles long, an allowance of 10 miles in addition to the length of the Division will be allowed.

Mileage for doubling hills under any other circumstances will not be allowed, except at the direction of the Division Superintendent.

ART. 10. When crews run over more than one division, the assignment of crews to the through runs will be made, as near as practicable, on the basis of mileage on each division.

ART. 11. Train men will be called at Terminal Stations by Train Caller, who will be provided with a book in which the men called will enter their names, together with the time they are called. The district within which the train men will be called will be established by the Division Superintendent, but shall not in any case exceed three-quarters of a mile from the calling office.

The working time of all trainmen will commence within one hour after they have signed the caller's book.

ART. 12. Train men when called, if for any cause or reason other than their own acts, do not go out, if held on duty less than six hours, shall be paid one-half day and stand first out. If held more than six hours, they will be paid one day and go behind other crews at that point.

ART. 13. Train men attending Court at the request of an Official of the Company, will be paid at the same rate they would have been entitled to had they remained on their run, and if away from their home station, in addition thereto their legitimate expenses.

ART. 14. When a change of divisions or train runs require train men to change their place of residence, they will be furnished free transportation for their families and house-hold goods to their new place of residence.

ART. 15. Train men will be notified when time is not allowed as per trip report.

ART. 16. The assignment of brakemen will be made in accordance with the judgment of the Division Superintendents, subject to the provisions of Article 18.

ART. 17. Conductors or Brakemen will not be dismissed or suspended from the Company's service without just cause.

In case of suspension or dismissal, if any employé thinks his dismissal unjust, he shall have the right within 10 days to refer his case by written statement to the Division Superintendent. Within ten days of the receipt of this notice his case shall have a thorough investigation by the proper officers of the Railroad Company, at which he may be present if he so desires, and also be represented by any disinterested employé of his grade. In case he shall not be satisfied with the result of the investigation, he shall have the right to appeal to the Superintendent Transportation and to the General Manager.

In case suspension or dismissal is found to be unjust, he shall be reinstated and paid for all time lost.

ART. 18. All employés will be regarded as in the line of promotion dependent upon the faithful discharge of their duties, capability for increased responsibility, and term of service. Superintendents are keeping a record of the employés on their respective divisions, in which is entered their merits, demerits and term of service. Upon such record promotions will be based.

Reduction of forces will be made at the direction of Division Superintendents in the order of promotion.

Every employé should understand that it is his privilege and duty to make written appeals to his Division Superintendent whenever by promotions reductions or assignments, he deems an injustice has been done him.

Any employé will be dismissed without hearing in case of intoxication, insubordination and collisions. Nothing in this article shall be construed as preventing the Company from employing experienced men when they deem that the good of the service requires it.

ART. 19. Any employé believing himself to be improperly treated under these rules and regulations, shall have the right to appeal to the Superintendent Transportation and General Manager.

ART. 20. All schedules, rules and regulations in conflict with these now adopted, are void.

No change will be made from these schedules and rules without reasonable notice.

ANDREW SMITH,

Supt. Transportation.

D. B. ROBINSON,

General Manager.

Wm. F. Rand.

Conductor William F. Rand, of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, one of the best as well as the most favorably known men on the road, is confined to his home at Easton, Pa., suffering from an incurable disease, which necessitated his quitting work last April. The four physicians who have been in attendance on him say that he will never again be able to do active duty, but may prolong life by remaining quiet. Mr. Rand's case is a very sad one, as he is but forty-five years old and has always been an active, energetic man. From the time he first entered the service of the Central Railroad Company, at the bottom rung of the ladder, his success as a railroad man was assured. He is best known to the commuters of the road as conductor of the Somerville and Easton express, and so well liked was he that he frequently receives friendly letters from many of them who still hope to see him back to work again. When the Woodruff Palace Car Company operated over the Central system Mr. Rand was given a call to become superintendent at this end of the route. He filled the position in a most satisfactory manner to his employers, and at the same time was widely known for his kindness and impartiality to the men subordinate to him. He was obliged to resign his position, however, when the Pullman Company gained control of the Woodruff system. He then resumed charge of his old train and ran it until prostrated by sickness. He holds a number of flattering letters from the Central and Woodruff Companies and from others who best knew his standing as a railroad man.—New York World.

Bro. Rand was a charter member of Div. 54 and is now a member of Div. 169.

Old Things and Dear.

ROSA B.

There is no song like an old song
That we have not heard for years;
Each simple note appears to throng
With shapes that swim in tears.
It may have been a cheerful strain,
But 'twas long ago
That glee, grown old, has turned to pain,
That mirth has turned to woe.

There is no friend like an old friend,
Whose life path mates our own,
Whose dawn and noon, whose eve and end
Have known what we have known.
It may be when we have read his face
We note a trace of care;
'Tis well that friends in life's last grace
Share sights as smiles they share.

There is no love like an old love;
A lost, may be, or dead.
Whose place, since she has gone above,
No other fills instead.
It is not we'll ne'er love anew,
For life were drear if so.
But that first love has roots that grew
Where others can not grow.

There are no days like old days,
When we, not they, were young;
When all life's rays were golden rays
And wrong had never stung.
Dear heart! if now our steps could pass
Through paths of childhood's morn,
And the dew of youth lie on the grass
Which Time's fell scythe has shorn!

Old song, old friend, old love, old days;
Old things, yet never old;
A stream that's dark till sunshine plays
And changes it to gold!
Through all winds memory's river on,
'Mid banks of sore regret,
But a gleam's on the peaks of long-ago
That softens sadness yet.

The Residence of Senator Hearst of California.

The stones which preached to the Bard of Avon delivered their silent eloquence beneath the shade of green trees and to the musical rhythm of running brooks. With the picture of the forest of Arden before us, it is easy to enter into the poetic spirit, and to find "sermons in stones, and good in everything"; but in the light of Nature's masterpieces, man's handiwork seems clumsy at best, and while the broad teachings of mountain and valley are readily accepted, the lessons taught by the work of human hands are apt to be ignored.

Nevertheless, along the crowded and confined thoroughfares of a city, there are also "sermons in stones"; and in their way, I know of no more eloquent brownstone and brick than those which have gone into the construction of the home of Senator Hearst of California.

The Hearst house is unquestionably the finest private residence lately erected in Washington and stands a veritable triumph of refinement of style in architecture and decorative art, preaching a rousing sermon of good taste, from its massive foundation to the fluted red tiles of the roof. There were art, fine workmanship, and money unstinted; but above all there was an absolute deference to the laws of the "eternal fitness of things," so, with all its costliness and elegance, this interior shows no ostentation, no display, nothing incongruous to mar its rich and quiet harmony. This feature is the more striking, as we live in a luxurious age when people of wealth have nothing to influence the choice of their belongings but prevailing mode, which is many-sided and capricious, or their individual taste, which is not always discriminating.

In point of location, this notable establishment leaves little to be desired, occupying, as it does, one of the triangular building-plots peculiar to the plan of the city, and fronting upon as well as facing down the long stretch of New Hampshire Avenue, at the intersection of Twentieth and O Streets, which is the center of Washington's most fashionable residence-quarter, and a very beautiful section of the city.

With its porticoes, balconies, and its swelling lines, it is difficult to realize that this house, now so ornate and irregular in shape, was remodeled from the square, roomy, and old-fashioned structure built some years since by Mr. John Field, a wealthy retired merchant of Philadelphia. The Field house faced the street squarely and solidly, its every room an absolute rectangle, while there was only a mild suggestion of frivolity in the long, enclosed verandas which jutted out, extending the length of the southern wall. Mr. Field, who was a remarkably handsome and accomplished gentleman, was a confirmed invalid; yet so cheery and winning was he in his misfortune, that his low couch in the bright little library was the popular center of the neighborhood. Nobody thereabouts had a rare flower, a choice bit of fruit, or any other trifle that was dainty and desirable, that Mr. Field was not called upon to share it in some way. The picture of this sick man, who by his magnetism drew the outside light and life about him, into what was, at best, his prison, is a tender, lovable memory, which, to those who knew the invalid, still seems to belong to the place.

For some time after Mr. Field's death the house was occupied by his widow, from whom it was purchased by Hon. C. S. Fairchild, who succeeded Hon. Daniel Manning as Secretary of the Treasury. Mrs. Fairchild, a woman of great charm and refinement, brought down from her New York home any number of heirlooms in the way of antique furniture and rare old plate, and enhanced the old-timey air of the mansion by fitting it up somewhat in colonial style. Under the genial sway of Secretary and Mrs. Fairchild, this home was made so attractive that the close of President Cleveland's administration brought a wide regret that political change should deprive Washington of such charming hosts. Upon retiring from official life, Mr. Fairchild sold the property to Senator Hearst, and the alterations were at once begun which have recently reached such successful completion.

By careful study, it can be seen that the old square lines of the original house have, in a measure, been left untouched; but so much has been added at various corners and angles, that it is not easy to discover any trace of the former building. The house, as it now stands, is an impressive structure of red brick relieved by a handsome decoration of brownstone, carrying here and there gracefully carved designs in relief. The exterior follows the Byzantine style of architecture, which fine touch of orientalism is especially noticeable in the porticoed entrance. This is built almost entirely of brownstone, but a series of short fluted columns support two massive arches of brick, over which rises the delicately wrought stone parapet of the stone balcony above.

So inviting an approach is sure to quicken the desire for a glimpse of the inside; but the unwary person who visits the Hearst house for the first time is almost certain to mount the easy steps in supreme unconsciousness of the iron trap hanging at the doorway, and to find, to his amazement, that, however much he may wish it, there is apparently no means of notifying the occupants that he is without and would like to be within. Absorbed with the details of the entrance, he soon arrives at the doorway, and, in the tight grip of the conventionalities, mechanically puts forth a finger to touch the electric button. It is only when it dawns upon one that there is no button, no knob, not a sign of a handle of any kind visible anywhere, that one becomes possessed of a sort of helpless dismay; for it seems very absurd not to be able to know enough to ring a front-door bell.

If you do as every one else does under the circumstances, you return to the outer side and carefully inspect the wall, inch by inch, back to the doorway; in an unavailing search for the button that must be there, because houses nowadays always have electric buttons; it is a sign of the times. But the closest scrutiny fails to reveal any trace of a button; and as you are beginning to feel that the neighbors across the way may be quietly enjoying your discomfiture, your eyes wander in desperation up and down the portal, and by the merest chance rest upon a bit of ornamental ironwork which hangs at the right of the doorway. It is an iron rope, up which clammers, in dainty but imperishable filigree, the graceful runners of a blooming wild-rose. Above is suspended a bell, and, in fact, this is a bell-rope. With the utmost humiliation you give it an apologetic pull, and do not recover your equanimity until you discover that each new-comer is sure to undergo the same experience, and are told that the Senator himself, equally unsuspecting, approached his own domicile shortly after the artistic bit of iron was put in place, and was literally forced to storm his own castle. The Senator did not see the bell-rope, and did not get in until a vigorous tattoo on the door-panel announced his arrival. After you know it is there, it must be admitted that the bell-rope is a delightful and highly artistic innovation; and you never return to give it a pull without a sense of complacency and superior knowledge.

From the portico the entrance is direct into an outer lobby, on the right of which a wide, draped doorway opens into the reception hall. The lobby is almost entirely of heavy polished oak, relieved here and there by satin hangings, and by a fine tapestry portière which falls in front of the arch leading to the dining-room. Near some carved hall-chairs stands an old Dutch clock, which as the hours come round chimes forth, with great dignity and deliberation, a series of quaint German airs. The hallway is also wainscoted in oak, and has a beamed ceiling with panels decorated in rich colors overlaying a gold ground, their design following closely the Byzantine character of the woodwork. A massive carved chest occupies a corner near the single wide window of stained glass, and at the right is a stone fireplace capped with an oaken mantel. On the left the staircase mounting to the upper stories is partly hidden by a carved oak screen, underneath which is a most inviting wooden bench fitted up with luxurious cushions.

Except a narrow gilded frieze and the panels in the ceiling, the decorations of this room are confined to the very beautiful carvings of woodwork, which are delicately graceful, and in intaglio rather than in relief. The candelabra and fireplace belongings are in wrought iron, while the furniture is of oak, to correspond with the rest of the room. Several pictures adorn the walls, and a notably good portrait of Senator Hearst hangs over the first landing, at the head of a short flight of steps.

The ante-room leads, by a door on each side of the mantel, to the music room, an apartment unique in the richness of its coloring and artistic decoration. It is very large, but somewhat irregular in shape, has a timbered ceiling supported by a heavy cross beam, which in turn is carried on two graceful columns. Purely Byzantine in its character, the entire scheme of decoration is as effective as it is unusual, the prevailing tones of cool olive and warm brown blending in soft harmony, and relieved throughout the woodwork by frequent touches and tracings of gilt. The musicians' gallery overhangs an exquisite bit of reproduction in the quaint Byzantine mantel over the fireplace. This, as well as the rest of the woodwork, is enameled in soft olive shades, while the walls are hung with rare Italian tapestry in olive and brown.

The furniture, carved and elaborately gilded, after antique models, is upholstered in a superb trecht velours, of a repousse pattern, in brown on a gold ground. The several doorways and deep-set windows are hung with rich portières of brown, Louis XIV, velvet, overlaid with braid in intricate design. A score of fine pictures are on the walls, any number of rare curios occupy niches and corners, while two tall gilded binets, on each side the central window, hold a really bewildering wealth of bric-a-brac. Among the pictures, the most striking is a powerful marine by Schönleber, which shows that Italian skies are not always smiling, for here, under leaden clouds, a furious surf dashes angrily against a rugged strip of Mediterranean coast. A few well-authenticated paintings by the "old masters" have their peculiar interest, while the art-lover gains an added pleasure in the wider range of subjects and fresher coloring of the more modern canvases near by. Carl Marr has a most charming bit in "The First Communicant," while a splendid study of "The Old Bishop" is by Orrin Peck, the college chum and intimate friend of young Mr. Will Hearst. Between the doors, an airy group of Boucher's Cupids disport themselves upon a piece of choice tapestry from the famous Aubusson looms, forming a very decorative panel; while across the room, entirely covering the side of the wall from floor to ceiling, is a great stretch of ancient and almost priceless Gobelins, "The Rencontre," after a design by Salvator Rosa.

Anything short of a descriptive catalogue would fail to do justice to the embarras de richesse found in the room. Here by the mantel are miniatures of Monroe and Jackson, by Peale; while next them is a Russian icon, a sacred image of the Madonna and Child, only the faces and hands showing under a metal sheath of exquisite workmanship. This is a very rare curio, and possibly dates back to the time of the Emperor Constantine. An ancient Hebrew lamp in repousse brass hangs from the gallery, in front of the fireplace, and at one side of the room stands an East Indian teak-wood cabinet, a marvel of delicate and lace-like wood-carving. In the window embrasure is a Louis XV. sedan-chair, which, curiously enough, is decorated in the same tints as those of the room, —olive, brown and gold; and with its gilding and painted Cupids, the queer old conveyance readily conjures up gay visions of era of powder and patches. Near by is a Spanish jewel or money chest, ornate with Moorish decoration, and grim with an array of quaintly wrought bars, bolts, staples, and locks.

With all its wealth of ornament, the music-room still owns an elegant simplicity, and as an artistic interior would seem difficult to rival, did not the first glimpse of the rest of the suite plunge one into a pleasurable but complete uncertainty as to just where to bestow the palm. The two long drawing-rooms on the right of the lobby are simply perfection! The first of these, the reception-room, follows in every detail the style of the time of Marie Antoinette; and such is the exquisite daintiness of its appointments that a sudden entrance brings one the sense of having stepped into an apartment canopied with fleecy clouds where gleams of a cerulean sky shine through, and the sheen of soft gold and chaste silver is over everything. The ceiling is frescoed in ivory white, carrying a delicate design in faint blues, silver, and gilt; the woodwork is carved, and enameled in white and silver relief; while the walls are hung in azure satin demask. The furniture might have belonged to Marie Antoinette herself; but it is, nevertheless, modern, in carved and white enameled wood, upholstered in azure satin brocade daintily sprayed and garlanded with roses. The portières are of exquisitely embroidered cream satin edged with a broad band of azure plush, and the carpet is a square of cream velvet, reproducing in soft blue the design of the ceiling. The mantel here, as in the adjoining room, is a poem in white enamel and silver gilt, the facings, fender, and fire-dogs being of Mexican onyx mounted in gilt, while the mirror above is flanked by two branching candelabra. Portières of azure plush partially screen an alcove hung in the same material, where stands a beautiful statue by Leopold Ansighioni, a veiled Flora, who almost seems to float above her pedestal.

The salon beyond the reception-room is in a kindred line of decoration, and its belongings have all the dainty elegance which characterizes the style of Louis XVI. In point of historical reproduction both apartments are absolutely correct, as every design used either for furniture, woodwork, ceiling, carpet, or the wonderful embroideries, has been faithfully copied from antique models. The woodwork of the salon is a continuation of the carved and white enamel, and the walls are hung in satin brocade of fresh rose-pink, which delicious tone with the rich lustre of the ivory satin hangings, suggests the coloring of a sea-shell. The furniture is lavishly gilded and carved, with a center-table and corner cabinets of holly-wood inlaid with mother-of-pearl. The feature of the room, however, is the marvelous embroideries, which in shades of pale pink and tender green are wrought in borders, panels, and medallions of exquisite design, upon the shining folds of the hangings and the lustrous ground of the upholsterings. This silken film, trailing so gracefully over the background of white satin, produces, in its purity and richness, an effect almost indescribable, and seems the climax of the artistic and costly in decoration.

It is pleasant to know that Mrs. Hearst, with a true artist's appreciation of these rooms, yet finds her keenest pleasure in the fact that all her belongings were manufactured in the United States. It is a patriotic boast with her, that she brought none of her furnishings from Europe, but readily found the most perfect fulfilment of her ideals in the fabrics and workmanship of America.

The drawing-rooms open direct into the library, which in its appointments is a symphony in sapphire and silver. The ceiling is frescoed in pale blue, with a foliate design in white and silver. Silver candelabra stand upon the bookcases, and a silver lamp lights a pretty writing-desk in one corner. The wainscoting and bookcases are of white mahogany, and the walls are hung in blue India velvet bordered with silken fringe. The window draperies, as well as the covering of the "sleepy-hollow" chairs and lounges, are of uncut blue velvet brocaded in white, which looks as if powdered with hoar frost. The richness of the decoration here is enhanced by two fine statues by Ansighioni, one a hunter-boy with a bound, and the other a coquettish scrap of maidenhood, who pulls the petals from a daisy and smiles as she murmurs "He loves me!" Near the latter, another charming little woman smiles out of a white-and-silver frame, in the painted rosiness of baby Phœbe Elias, Mrs. Hearst's namesake and very particular pet. In the adjoining alcove are two marble busts, also by Ansighioni, one a portrait of Mrs. Hearst, and the other, that of her only son.

The library has two vistas: a long one into the music-room, through the reception-room and hallways; and a second, through the Louis XVI salon, which ends in the dinning-room. This splendid apartment is in the style of the early Dutch renaissance, and in its somber richness possesses an imposing and stately beauty that is, perhaps, without a rival in this character of interior decoration. The woodwork, elaborately carved, is of polished black oak, which also constitutes the general furnishing and the quaint lattice-work of the Dutch window-shutters. The ceiling is of black oak, and is supported by three massive over-beams, with cross-beams intersecting the large panels between. In the intervening squares is an effective and peculiar decoration, of a slightly raised design, laid on a canvas in gold, which is glazed down to rich tones of old copper and bronze green. The walls are covered in Venetian leather, the same material serving to upholster the oaken chairs. Hanging Dutch shelves are loaded with fine china, which is only a modest selection from a store in the butler's pantry near by.

In a deep and windowed recess is an irresistible old Dutch fireplace, of red tiles with steel mountings and andirons, the same material forming the candelabra, and odd standard lantern, and the massively wrought central lamp which swings from the over-beams to light the table. Some imposing old plate stands upon the carved dressers, there are a few fine pictures and bronzes, and many odd shelves hold all sorts of quaint jars mugs, and pictures, which are decorative, if not always strictly beautiful. The dining-room completes the suit of apartments on the first floor, which owns such a wealth of artistic detail in form and color, that any word-painting must be inadequate to describe what connoisseurs consider one of the finest interiors in the country.

From the reception-hall a winding stairway to the basement leads on one hand to the Senator's private office, and also to the supper-room, which is in a similar form of the early Dutch style, and is fitted entirely in California red-wood, and has a mosaic floor, a deep fireplace, and well-filled hanging shelves. Adjoining the supper-room is an ample and perfectly appointed kitchen, where two Chinese cooks—moving in noiseless preparation—are masters of the refined art of gastronomy.

Above stairs, all the apartments show the same admirable taste, Mrs. Hearst's room embodying the essence of simple elegance. The furniture is in white mahogany, carved and inlaid; and the wall-coverings and hangings are of the palest primrose satin brocade, while the enameled mantle and lace-covered toilet-tables are ornate with the many dainty trifles so dear to the feminine heart. The bath-room is in harmony with everything else, the oblong marble bath being sunk deeply beneath the floor, and tiled in cream enamel with a broad facing of pale sea-green onyx. On the other side of the house, in the southern extension, is a pretty morning-room with books, pictures, and a piano, convenient to the neighboring guest chambers.

The Senator is well provided for in a cosy "den," next an equally cosy bed-room, both furnished in terra cotta and rich-toned mahogany. Over the head of the bed in the latter room, a prim little old lady—the Senator's mother—beams down upon a luxurious couch, but sees, in place of the usual satin spread, an old-fashioned patchwork quilt, a sample of her own handiwork. Next to his father's apartments is the bright room devoted to the comfort of young Mr. Hearst. Here is a very pretty combination of café au lait coloring with a relief of moss-green and gilt, while all about are many of the belongings which adorned the young man's college quarters.

One characteristic that prevades this fine establishment is often unaccountably lacking in many others which money and art have rendered palatial. The striking thing about the Hearst house that, with all its costly elegance, it not only seems built to live in, but it is lived in and enjoyed: in short, it is homely, in the truest sense of the word.

September.

We made ourselves a castle
Once after school was out;
We raked the leaves together
To wall it all about.

We made a winding pathway
Down to the school-yard gate,
And there we worked with might and main
Until the day grew late;

Until one bright star twinkled
Above the maple tree,
And lights shone down the village street
As far as we could see.

We planned that every recess
We'd come out there to play,
But the night it blew so hard
Our castle blew away.

No. 5, L. A. of O. R. C.

DEAR FRIENDS:—Permit me in this manner to extend to you all the thanks of a bereaved wife for your kind attention and tender sympathy during my recent affliction by the death of my husband. I thank you also for your beautiful floral offering and for the words of sympathy and respect in the resolution passed by you in his memory. My husband's sudden taking away brings to myself and children a crushing load of sorrow. It was hard to part with our dear one, but as you have shown your love and kindness to me so may you all be rewarded, not alone by earthly friends, but by one who is mightier by far than all the earth combined. May His blessings ever rest on our Order.

Yours in P. F.,

A Letter to Heaven.

In the Cincinnati postoffice yesterday, in the general deposit of mail gathered at noon was a much thumbed and tear-stained postal card. The writing upon it was in a child's hand, trembling and uncertain. The address was, "My dear mama in heaven." The letter was as follows:

"home"

dear mama—I am so lonesome since you went to heaven, I want to go to you, the time seems so long. you said I could come to you, Mrs. Clark is kind to me but not like you. you sho this to God and send for me sure, my arm hurts me so and you sed it would be well in heaven. I send you a kiss, from me, little Dora."

Cold, indeed, must be the heart that does not moisten the eye that looks upon that touching and pathetic letter, with its baby love and unquestioning faith and illustrations of the love between child and mother that passeth understanding. The whole world of pathos is in the child's cry, "Mrs. Clark is kind to me but not like you." No, little one, nobody could be to you what your mother was.—Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette.

A Code of Morals.

BY RUDYARD KIPLING.

Now Jones had left his new-wed bride to keep his house in order,
And hied away to the Hurrum Hills, above the Afghan border,
To sit on a rock with a heliograph; but ere he left he taught
His wife the working of the code that sets the miles at naught.

And love had made him very sage, as nature made her fair;
So Cupid and Apollo linked, per heliograph, the pair.
At dawn, across the Hurrum Hills, he flashed her counsel wise;
At e'en, the dying sunset bore her husband's homilies.

He warned her 'gainst seductive youths in scarlet clad and gold,
As much as 'gainst the blandishments paternal of the old;
But kept his gravest warnings for (hereby the ditty hangs)
That snowy haired Lothario, Lieutenant-General Bangs.

'Twas General Bangs, with Aide and Staff, that tit-tipped on the way,
When they beheld a heliograph tempestuously at play.

They thought of border risings, and of stations sacked and burnt,
So stopped to take the message down, and this is what they learnt.

"Dash dot dot, dot, dot dash, dot dash dot," twice. The General swore.

"Was e'er General Officer addressed as 'dear' before?"

"My love, 'i' faith! 'My duck,' Gadzooks! 'My darling popsy-wop!'"

"Spirit of great Lord Wolseley, who is on that mountain-top?"

The artless Aide-de-camp was mute, the gilded staff were still,
As, dumb with pent up mirth, they booked that message from the hill;

For, clear as summer's lightning flare, the husband's warning ran,—

"Don't dance or ride with General Bangs—a most immoral man."

At dawn, across the Hurrum Hills, he flashed her counsel wise—

But howsoever love be blind, the world at large hath eyes.

With damnatory dot and dash he heliographed his wife

Some interesting details of the General's private life.

The artless Aide-de-camp was mute, the shining Staff were still,

And red and ever redder grew the General's shaven gill.

And this is what he said at last (his feelings matter not),—

"I think we've tapped a private line. Hi! Threes about there! Trot!"

All honor unto Bangs, for ne'er did Jones there—after know,

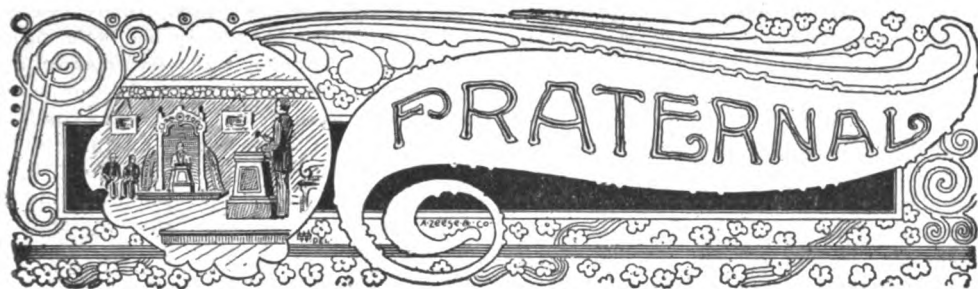

By word or act official, who read off that helio But the tale is on the frontier, and from Michai to Mooltan

They know the worthy General as "that most immoral man."

Demorest's Family Magazine for October is to hand. This sparkling periodical is always a welcome visitor, and this October number is no exception to the general rule. "Some Homes Under the Administration" is continued, with a sketch of Senator Hearst's palatial mansion, and the artist shows us the beauties of this home almost from cellar to garret, at least from entrance hall to kitchen, and in placing before our readers a portion of the description of this Washington home, we regret that we are unable to reproduce the beautiful illustrations.

The young folks will all be interested in "The Game of Golf for Ladies," which is quite new on this side of the water; and old and young will read with interest and profit the curious facts about animals embodied in "Disguises in Animal Life," and soft-shell crabs will be invested with a new interest after one has read about "The First Armor Wearers." In fact, every page is as good as it can be. Demorest's Family Magazine is the ideal magazine.

But this month there is a special attraction the new List of Club Premiums. Not only is there a host of handsome as well as useful articles offered, including material for an elegant silk dress, but the more than liberal offer is made that if this generous list does not include the thing or things desired, the prospective getter-up of a club may write to the publisher stating what would be liked better, and special terms will be made for the coveted article. The offer is unprecedented, anything from a paper of needles to the complete furniture of a house being obtainable without paying out a cent!

HALL OF EL CAPITAN DIV. NO 115, O. of R. C.)
 SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 5, 1890. }

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: The word federation as defined by Webster is: "United by compact, as sovereignties; joined in confederacy, as federated nations or powers—act of uniting in a league."

I shall propound a few questions that came to my mind pertaining to the issue now under discussion:

First. Why is federation with any "Order" necessary?

Secondly. What the objects and aims sought?

Thirdly. What will be the result?

Fourthly. Shall it be by system or general?

Fifthly. What effects produced at this period of constant revolution and dissatisfaction among the laboring classes with us as an "Incorporated Order?"

The answer to the first question, why is federation necessary is, presumably, that "in union there is strength," that is, by a union of the combined forces into one solid phalanx, the many grievances that now and will constantly arise in railway service, can be the better adjusted, provided the posts will tenaciously adhere together and demand that justice be accorded.

If this can be brought about to operate successfully, as in national affairs, or as may be further illustrated; in the earliest history of our country when our forefathers banded themselves together for the purpose of freeing themselves from tyranny and oppression that bound them and their posterity, hand and foot, but by united action and a firm allegiance to principles of liberty and justice and the sacrifice of life, they achieved the victory sought and to-day we stand at the threshold of second century of our national life, and with some of the nations problems already solved, there are others that can and must be solved.

However, the question of "federation" will have to be looked into closely, as there are important features staring us in the face, before consummating any definite plan of action, serious thought must be given this subject, or we may get into complications that may prove disastrous to us as an Order.

Take for example, the engineers, firemen, brakemen, switchmen and, in some instances, conductors, if we should organize a general federation, there would be no getting along with many of them, as there are many who belong to the "floating element" and are members of their respective orders who will rely too much upon the strength of this amalgamation, and repeated calls upon the general council to relieve them from the troubles which they would constantly take delight in precipitating.

And until the the various orders are more careful in the selection of the men whom they admit into membership, and will have weeded out entirely the element above alluded to, general federation is dangerous.

"System federation" under above circumstances is also to be looked into carefully for reasons above mentioned, and shall herewith further enumerate, and in making these assertions, I do not refer to anything personal with engineers, as I have many friends among them, but a reference to their history as an organization in the past and to prove and show to you conclusively that unless we can place implicit confidence in them as an organization to carry out fully their obligations, it will prove hazardous to federate with them.

We cannot trust them too implicitly, if we could. I believe some basis of co-operation could be brought about that would aid all very materially, as it is quite evident that there is a crisis in labor circles imminent—are we prepared to meet these impending dangers that hang over us?

However, before we think much of federating with other orders, I deem it essential that we become more harmonious in our own ranks—federate if you please among ourselves and with the 25,000 conductors in the U. S., Canada and Mexico; in one united body we can accomplish a great deal, so that when these menacing dangers are thrown around us, each one shoulder to shoulder in mind and body, we cannot help but be triumphant.

The time is at hand when we should assert ourselves as an Order, but we need a good government and officials to execute the same, and not to sell us body and soul as C. S. Wheaton has for years, besides, as is stated upon authority, used our funds to aid him in furthering his diabolical ends.

If the grand officers are incompetent, elect others in whom you may have perfect confidence and are capable, and who will work to advance and achieve every interest, and all old fossils and drones who attempt to achieve personal success and prominence to the detriment of those actually upon the rail and who may be an incumbrance to our present and future permanent government should be made to step down and out.

But we need more education, and this can be brought about by representative active membership, and to be thoroughly organized we should have officers whose ability is increased an hundred fold by the intensity of correct convictions, and the membership should possess loyal allegiance to the "will of a constituted majority"—to be in fact and in deed the one tremendous, social, compact organization, whose influence and strength is far reaching, and I believe we have every reason to believe that the public, the railway management and the whole nation have our advancement and protection more at heart than formerly.

The public offer grateful recognition that our standard is advancing in sobriety and ability, thus rendering life safer. The management of railways are watching our course and we are bettered in every way as we better our own condition.

The President of the United States, side by side with tactics, finance and diplomatic questions, in his message to congress recommends the urgent need for means for protection to the lives and limbs of railway employes—'tis evident then, that we have arrived at the time when the nations leaders believe the well-being of humanity is the nation's cause.

The object of government then is, the protection of the citizen in his person and property—to preserve for the individual his natural rights while admitting him to share the advantages that accrue from society and civilization. Men do not need a paternal government which shall kindly provide their welfare; they want the fullest possible freedom consistent with equal freedom of all others—the broadest and fullest acceptance of good government.

Hence quoting a clause in the platform of the American party which should voice our sentiments: "We recognize the right of labor to organize for its protection and by all lawful and peaceful means to secure to itself the greatest reward for its thrift and industry, and believing in governmental arbitration in the settlement of industrial differences," and as much good can be accomplished by legislation, I trust every conductor in the land will look more carefully as to whom he aids into political offices—elect those who will aid us to solve the problem pertaining to securing the rights we ask: better equipment, thus saving the lives of 20,000 young men who are killed and crippled annually.

Other things to be desired are, and in time, if we are prudent and aggressive we shall accomplish the same, to have rules and regulations everywhere uniform; to have conductors paid a salary commensurate with the constantly increasing duties and responsibilities; to have the spotter system abolished and the amount paid to conductors that is paid to these "wolves in sheep's clothing" and then there will be a handsome balance in the treasury of the companies, and for harmony with the public, to have the "train rate" abolished—these things accomplished we shall willingly give bonds for faithful discharge of duty.

These incentives held out a man will manifest the proper interest and the company make money by so doing, which I believe you will bear me out in stating.

I will also suggest in connection with the bond business that a "Bond and Trust Co." can be incorporated among conductors on all trunk lines which will be to their better advantage in securing and retaining positions thus doing away with the exactions of these foreign Bonding companies.

Each conductor taking a few shares of the stock, would receive a good rate of interest on the money invested, in the payment of monthly premiums now going into the coffers of wealthy syndicates.

Having their own Company they would watch all interests more carefully perhaps, than otherwise.

With these facts established we shall need no federation, nor will there be any strikes stopping the wheels of commerce.

Yours in P. F.,

J. T. MARR,

El Capitan Div. 115, O. of R. C.

YOAKUM, Texas, Sept. 8, 1890.

Editor Conductor.

During my leave of absence I have traveled over 7000 miles, passing over the beauties of Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, Arizona and California. My leisure afforded me time and opportunity to learn much of the true situation of our members, and of others in the train service. It is grand to note the change, the harmony and good feeling existing now among the various orders identified with the train service.

There is no comparison now with our former self. Why, then, take no note of him (Wheaton), and let him go, and thank God we are rid of a knave. We should rather be disposed to laugh than to weep. This affair will not leave a scar—the explosion has been so quick and so complete, having gone so far to play so ridiculous a part, it is rather more laughable than cryable. The die is cast, abide the hazard manfully.

Forbearance. Let us treat the ignorance, the mistakes, the absurdities of others, with tender respect. Our conduct toward each other should be such, that ere long there will be no gap existing, and in unity we may expect to accomplish success. Let us cultivate universal respect, by universal kindness. We now have nothing to conceal, nor have we to fear, by an honest acknowledgement of our true position. We want nothing but justice and fairness.

That has not been accorded to us in the past. All other orders in the train service have had the success they merit, except ours alone. We have been content these many years with silent submission. Saw wood and say nothing. Our requests have been fruitful in promises. "We will see gentlemen, what can be done." Don't that sound natural. I have been there. Right will wrong no man, though in the past I know of instances where we have wronged others as well as ourselves. The B. of R. C. should command our respects and not censure. They have been instrumental in awakening us to a realization that something must be done.

'Tis well that, that something has been done, as there is no doubt in my mind that a few thousand of our long suffering Brothers e're this, would have had their names upon the roll as B. of R. C. members.

In my rambles I was glad to note that there is no distinction being made. Every kindness and courtesy was shown me by the B. of R. C. members.

While at Los Angeles I made many acquaintances among R. R. people, and one thing I noticed that did my heart good, was, to see them worship in their R. R. chapel—presided over by the Rev. T. H. Collins. They are a good whole-souled lot of people, and ever will I remember their hospitality towards my sister and her husband after their misfortune by fire. Brother Harrington said, after my narrow escape out of the flames—that I was only receiving a warm reception.

I believe it my duty to make mention, that the widow of Brother Wm. Weist of Roodhouse Division, Illinois, has not received the insurance, or otherwise the protection and care provided for her. She is justly entitled to it. And again it is no credit to delay a matter of this kind several years before payment. Make inquiries and perhaps we will find the B. of R. C. doing that which covereth a multitude of sins for O. R. C. members. W. O. Mohler overland conductor, Southern California, made a friend of me through an introduction to a large, sweet, California melon; and the acquaintance of C. T. Moore, Assistant G. C., B. of R. C., Brother T. T. Fitzgerald was good to me and I wish I could have lingered longer. C. R. Perry another good Brother that I am glad I met. Friend C. T. Moore and Brother Roberts of Winslow Division would make valuable members of a debating club. I was critic, and scored one for Moore. Subject:—Secession. At Los Vegas we parted company and I wished for more of Moore. I thank Brother Wilcox for his advice on grape culture. Nothing to do except prune the vines and sing. Live on grapes and cold water. Yes, and if I did not fare with any better success in getting my grapes to market, than I did in bring six (corks) bottles of the juice home, I would die in the poor house.

Home and found many improvements in our little city, and some changes on the Pass—roses that wither in the blast. Have you ever been in Southern Texas, if not, when you come make inquiries every time you stop for a crossing and learn its the Aransas Pass R. R. That's the road where the following named, the most of them of our order, experience their joy and happiness.

Passenger service.—R. G. Warner, C. C. Niles, A. D. Nash, F. J. Loring, R. C. Conally, W. Luke, Ed. Steel, Con. Roberts and O. G. Moon.

Freight.—C. S. Baldwin, J. Burtle, J. H. Buchanan, E. D. Clark, R. Barr, F. W. Crawford, W. S. Dickey, Mike Dunn, J. H. Elliot, W. B. Goode, W. Grove, W. George, W. Hartman, W. G. Holt, E. H. Hone, F. M. Loring, J. C. McFarland, W. L. Orth, Thos. Orth, T. E. Quirk, E. D. Shampaign, Ed. O'Brian, G. A. Van Gilder, J. M. Chase, DeWit Munger, G. Y. M. Many long stagnant but soon beginning to flow again, as refreshing as a rock spring on a mid-summer's day.

When we meet, a banquet the heart of men can know, flowed from a friendship like ours. Envy not our happiness, only regret that you cannot share it with us.

Yours in truth,

E. H. H.

NORTHUMBERLAND, Pa., Sept. 2nd, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BRO: On Sunday, August 31st, a number of Brothers from Sunbury Div. 187, boarded Erie Mail bound West on the P. R. R. for Jersey Shore to assist A. G. C. C. Wilkins organize a new Order of Railway Conductors there. We had a pleasant journey. Our party consisted of Bros. N. Comp, Wm. Shafer, Jos. Vandyke, Geo. Ammerman, J. W. McDonald, J. Blain, C. Sarvis, Wm. Drum, N. Fertich, M. Wolf, T. C. Totten, F. Krebs, N. Nagle, C. Toole; E. M. McAlpine, of Div. 187; John Casper, of Div. 65 and I. W. Morrison, of Div. 160. Bro. B. W. Sleppy, of Div. 187, missed the train. Some Brother said he put the alarm clock on the stove so as to have a hot cup of coffee in the morning and put the coffee pot at the head of the bed and forgot to wind it. He says next time he will put it under his pillow. He came through on the next train along with Bro. W. Cornell, of Div. 187, and Ella Sleppy, of Div. 160. The town lies between two ranges of high hills or mountains, and is built on the right bank of the west branch of the Susquehanna River. It has a population of about 2300. The Fall Brook R. R. passes the town on its right and the P. R. R. about two miles from it on the left. It had its share of the horror and damage during the great June flood of 1889. Fourteen of the Youngman family being drowned, bridges swept away etc. We could see the marks of it yet on the houses ten or twelve feet above the streets. Now Bro. Jas. Blain is not the Jas. Blaine from Maine, but he gets there all the same—was in the lead and, what a lead! Bro. Sarvis, who brought up the rear and is heavier on the right than on the left side (his shoe gave it away) says next time he will get a rope and put it on Blain and hold him back as racing should not be allowed on Sunday. We were accompanied by the Small Boy, who, as usual, has his say. He told us of the flood and pointed out things of interest. He told us of a man by name of Field, who had a pig caught in the flood and in passing a clothes-line had caught it with his teeth. He hung there from 5 a. m. until 7 p. m., when becoming disgusted because his owner would not come to his help he let go and was drowned. We were afterwards told that it was a fact that horses, cows, etc. would catch at limbs of trees and try to save themselves in that manner. On arriving at the town we hied us to the Globe House, kept by two Bros., F. D. and F. B. Dankle, where we met A. G. C. C. H. Wilkins, who was introduced to us by Bro. Blain. We then ordered breakfast, which was soon complied with. After satisfying our appetites we discovered that Bro. Comp was missing. A search was made and he was found in the kitchen eating mush and milk. He had been in such a hurry in the morning to make the train he had forgot his teeth, and could not eat anything hard. After waiting awhile we were joined by Bros. J. T. Mullen and Willis Taylor, of Div. 176, who had secured a parlor for themselves there. At their request we joined them in a tele tele and smoke. We were soon joined by Bro. Fields, of Div. 8. We then learned that he was the man that owned the pig the small boy told us of. Bro. Fields wanted to know if anyone present knew of a P. R. R. engineer who was about three feet wide and five feet high, who but three or four days before had been there looking for mushrooms. He had run an engine for thirty-three years on the P. R. R. and had nothing yet but a poodle dog and was going to make an Englishmen of it by feeding it mushrooms. By this time a train had arrived from Corning, over the Fall Brook R. R. bearing Corning Div. 176. After an exchange of greetings we had dinner and then went to the Hall. A Special meeting was then opened at 2:30, p. m. by officers of 176, assisted by S. and T. Vandyke, and Blain of Div. 187. The Division starts with twenty-one charter members, seven of them new members, the others being from Divisions 176 and 172. The officers elected are: J. T. Mullen, C. C.; W. G. Fields, A. C. C.; W. S. Carraher, S. C.; J. H. Smith, J. C.; J. Boyer, S. & T. T. F. Smith, I. S.; Willis Taylor, O. S. They meet the first and third Sundays of the month. The following Divs. were represented there: Div. Nos. 8, 65, 160, 172, 176, 187 and 225. After returning thanks to our Bros. and the host of the Globe House, who we recommend to all Bros. as a good house and genial landlord, we returned home saying it is good.

Bro. Wm. Shafer, of Div. 187 and Miss Mary C. Hull were united in marriage Sept. 2nd, at the residence of the bride's father, in Snyderstown Boro, by the Rev. C. Benson. MACK.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., Sept. 11, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I herewith enclose you clippings from a Jacksonville paper relative to the death of one of our beloved and worthy Brothers, Brother John A. Da-Costa, who was killed on the F. C. & P. Ry., in a collision near Chaires Station. This was his first trip over the road as conductor, he had been working for the company about two weeks, flagging, learning the road. He was a good conductor, and for five years, within three months of his death, had been employed on the S. F. & W. Ry. as Freight and Passenger conductor. I have been unable to get the full particulars of his death as yet, but the report which is the most plausible, and the one which I believe is correct, is his engineer was a new man on the road, and ran by the station (which was a regular meeting point) without stopping. Brother Da Costa was on top of his train trying to stop him, by setting up brakes. He stood by his post to the last moment, waving his lantern and setting up brakes. His two brakemen he told to jump for their lives, when he saw the head-light of the approaching train, not thinking of his own perilous position until the engines came together. The supposition is, that he was thrown under the cars by the jar, and his leg was crushed from the knee down to the ankle, and a bruise on his breast, he only lived five hours. By the time he got medical aid it was too late to save him. He was a poor man with no insurance of any kind, and leaves a widow and four children who were dependent upon him for a support. At our next meeting will pass resolutions on his death, and send you a copy for publication.

Yours in P. F.,

G. C. FLOYD,

Sec'y and Treas. Div. 196.

McKEES ROCKS, Sept. 9, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

On the evening of August 26, at the Hotel Schlosse, was gathered a jovial set of railway conductors, the occasion being the celebration, in a pleasant manner, of the organization of McKees Rocks Div. 201, Order of Railway Conductors.

The festive board was surrounded with members and their friends of the new lodge, and a right merry time was had.

In the afternoon, C. H. Wilkins, Assistant Grand Chief Conductor, organized the new division at Chartiers, on the P. & L. E. road. At the election of officers the following is the result: J. W. Wright, C. C.; G. W. Fleming, A. C. C.; D. H. Speer, S. & T.; W. H. Hughes, S. C.; Chas. Liney, Jr. C.; James Edwards, I. S.; Mark Tucker, O. S.

After the ceremonies incident to the installation of the officers of the new lodge, both members and officers embarked for Pittsburgh. At the station carriages had been provided by Capt. W. C. Irvin, into whose hands the arrangements were placed. When all the carriages had been filled, the procession started for the hotel, headed by a brass band,

It was only a short time after arriving at the hotel, until the tables were surrounded by the members of the new division and their invited guests. Capt. Irvin, station master of the P. & L. E. station, was master of ceremonies. He exercised the power invested in him by calling, unexpectedly, on members whom he knew to be rather diffident, and unused to speech-making, yet all the remarks made, were characteristic of the men and their calling.

The event was one of the most pleasant of the kind ever held in this city, and when the men quit the dining hall, not a step was unsteady, nor an eye dimmed through the use of strong drink. The men are not all total abstainers, yet it was decided not to have a wine list at the banquet.

Among the most prominent members present, of Div. 201, were: Charles Deitrick, trainmaster P. & L. E.; D. M. Brown, assistant trainmaster P. & L. E.; Capt. W. C. Irvin, depot master P. & L. E.; James Connolly, yardmaster P. V. & C.; Geo. C. Hurst, passenger conductor P. & L. E., and all the officers named.

The new division starts off with thirty-five members, and the indications are that it will materially increase as the time goes on.

Yours truly in P. F.,

J. W. WRIGHT, C. C.

At a regular meeting of Lackawanna Division No. 12, O. R. C., held in their hall June 22, 1890, the following resolutions were adopted;

WHEREAS, God in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to take from our midst our beloved Brother, Patrick J. Gaynor.

Resolved, That we, the members of Lackawanna Division No. 12, desire to offer our tribute of respect to our departed Brother, and tender our heartfelt sympathy to the beloved widow and fatherless children.

Resolved, That by the death of Brother Patrick J. Gaynor, Lackawanna Division has lost an earnest and worthy member, and his mourning family are deprived of a kind and loving father, whose vacant seat in our Division will ever remind us of the dangers that surround us and that in the fullness of life we are in the midst of death.

Resolved, That to the widow and family we offer our heartfelt sympathy in this their hour of affliction, and tender our aid and protection in a time of need.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for the period of thirty days, and that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting; that a copy be presented to the bereaved widow, and that they be published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR and local papers.

ST. ALBANS DIVISION, No. 24.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Please allow space for just a few lines in your obituary column to announce the sad affliction that has once more visited the home of Brother N. Stewart, of St. Albans Division, No. 24.

That unwelcomed visitor was Death, who called for his only child, little Anna, aged 7 years, and caused her to bid farewell to this world of troubles and unity with the children of God. "Suffer little children to come unto me, &c., for of such is the kingdom of Heaven." The cause of her death was sickness so prevalent this season; cholera and fever, and its accompaniments. She was a bright little scholar and will be greatly missed by her scholastic circle, but her school is now of the Lord. Alas! what a consolation.

Brother Stewart and wife has not only the sympathy of St. Albans, but also from many adjacent towns where hosts of friends will unite in condolence and sympathetic feeling for their irreparable loss.

LINES WRITTEN BY A FRIEND ON THE DEATH OF LITTLE ANNA STEWART.

A gentle bird from us has flown,
A voice we love is stilled;
A cage hangs vacant in our home,
That never can be filled.

Yes, we'll miss her, dearly miss her,
Every morning, noon and night;
And her gentle voice caressing
Ever make the heart feel bright.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to remove from membership here below to higher spheres of action Brother W. H. Johnson. Therefore be it

Resolved, That the members of Logan Division No. 110 has sustained an irreparable loss in the death of Brother Johnson. And be it further

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Johnson Logan Division No. 110 recognizes his earthly work as a credit to the division and to the profession of railroading; and further, we feel that as a man and Brother and husband his work on earth has not been in vain. And further be it

Resolved, That we extend our warmest thanks to Division No. 206, Springfield, Ill., for their kind and efficient action at the death of Brother Johnson. And further be it

Resolved, That we extend to the widow of Brother Johnson our earnest sympathy, and trust that the Grand Chief Conductor will take her in his keeping. Therefore be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the widow and Division No. 206, Springfield, Ill., and published in THE CONDUCTOR.

At a regular meeting of Atlanta Division No. 180, held Sunday afternoon, September 7, 1890, the following resolutions of high esteem and respect were unanimously adopted upon the sad death of Mrs. Fannie Lee Gorman, after a short illness.

She was the beautiful and accomplished wife of our Brother, W. S. Gorman. Many of the delegates and visitors at our meeting at Rochester will no doubt remember meeting and enjoying the society of this happy couple possessing, as they did at that time, the most flattering prospects of a long, useful and happy life together. But, alas! how soon the brittle thread is broken, she having breathed her last at 2 o'clock p. m. September 3, 1890.

Her death, occurring as it did in the very dawn of a beautiful, useful and happy life, was indeed a sad blow, not only to her devoted husband, but to the large circle of friends who loved her so well, so tenderly and so dearly. Her peaceful death was in full keeping with her pure, beautiful and exemplary life—a life that her devoted husband and loving friends would do well to emulate.

The remains were taken from the Kimball House in the quiet, peaceful hours of the night and conveyed to the Union passenger depot, where they were gently placed upon the train for Cusseta, Ala., her native home, where they were laid to rest by a large circle of associates and friends. The pall-bearers were composed of the following members of the O. R. C.: D. M. Vinning, J. H. Latimer, Fred D. Bush, George Woodall, William Woodall, William J. Hammond, R. P. Dodge, W. W. Dunlay, J. L. Bell, H. M. Law and John A. Gee. Also the following members of the B. L. E.: M. McWarters, W. A. Love, C. L. Buland and a large escort of friends.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to send the dread messenger, for some wise, noble and merciful cause unknown to us, to pluck from the home and heart of our Brother Gorman his all.

WHEREAS, We bow in humble submission to the will of the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe in removing this loving wife from our Brother, knowing that He doth not willingly afflict the children of men.

Resolved, That the heartfelt sympathy of Atlanta Division No. 180, also members of B. L. E., be extended to our Brother in his bereavement.

Resolved, That while words of cheer and sympathy cannot bind up the broken heart of our Brother entirely, yet we can, and it is our duty to, point to others in like dark hours who were able to say, "Thy will, not mine, be done."

Resolved, As a token of our undying love and devotion for our Brother and all the kind and loving friends who have done so much to alleviate his sorrows, that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of our division, a copy sent to our Brother Gorman, also a copy sent to THE CONDUCTOR for publication.

Editor Railway Conductor:

For the second time the grim reaper, Death, has visited Div. 251 and has stricken from our midst our beloved Bro. Charley L. Chestnutt. Bro. Chestnutt was taken sick on August 2nd with congestion of the liver and kidneys, and although everything that medical skill and loving hands could do was done for him it was all in vain for he rapidly grew worse and at 4 a. m., August 30, he passed away, while around his bedside were gathered his little family and quite a number of friends, among whom were several Bro. Conductors. Bro. C. was buried at 3 p. m. to-day, from St. Joseph Cathedral. Members of Cotton Belt Div. acting as pall bearers and attending to other arrangements. The funeral was the largest ever seen in this city, he being loved by all who knew him and those who knew him best loved him most. Therefore be it Resolved, That in his death Cotton Belt Div. 252 has lost a true and worthy Bro, and his family an upright and loving husband and father; that we extend to the family of our deceased Brother our profoundest sympathy in this their great bereavement.

Resolved, That our charter and cabooses be draped and each member wear a badge of mourning for a period of thirty days.

Resolved, That copies be sent to the CONDUCTOR for publication; to his devoted wife who nursed through his sickness; to his Brothers and Sisters who were with him from the moment he was stricken down until the hour his soul took its flight.

Resolved, That this Division express our heartfelt thanks to Drs. White, Taylor and Brunson for their kind and professional care, especially to Dr. Brunson do we pay or homage for his loving and fatherly care of the stricken widow and children at the graveside.

THE CASE OF W. D. WEIST.

A correspondent in this issue refers to the case of Brother Weist, and says "that the widow of Brother Weist has not received the insurance, otherwise the protection and care provided for her. She is justly entitled to it, and it's no credit to delay a matter of this kind several years before payment." This communication comes to us anonymously, and it is only on account of this reference to Brother Weist that we break our invariable rule and print it. "E. H. H." has presumably heard an ex parte or untrue history of the matter. So far as the insurance is concerned, Mrs. Weist has no more claim upon the Benefit Department than the widow of a person who was never a member of it. Brother Weist forfeited his membership in the Benefit Department almost a year before his death, and the officers of the Order have no right, moral or legal, to pay his widow any benefit. They have just as much right to pay Mrs. Weist $2,500 from the general fund of the Order and assess 2,500 members of the Order who are not members of the Benefit Department $1 each to make it as they have to pay it from the funds of the Benefit Department and assess its members for it. That Mrs. Weist has a claim upon the Order at large is true—that is, if she is needy—but it is manifestly unfair and unjust that members of the Order who are not members of the Benefit Department should expect those who have taken the precaution and wise foresight to make a provision for their loved ones, to care for and support all the needy widows and orphans of those who do not make the provision. That these widows and orphans are a sacred charge upon the Order will not be questioned by any one, but when the matter is fairly and impartially considered, the only conclusion that can be arrived at is that those who are not members of the Benefit Department are, if anything, under more obligations in this respect than those who are members. There are many members of the Benefit Department who are obliged to deny themselves many things, and in many cases, to the personal knowledge of the writer, they deny themselves and families necessities, in order to pay their assessments. Will "E. H. H." or any one else claim that it is just to tax these members an extra dollar for every needy case, and let those who have made no provision, so far as the Order is concerned, to secure their widows and orphans from being dependent upon charity go free of expense? It is true that Brother Weist had at one time been a member of the Benefit Department, and perhaps did not intend to forfeit his membership; but the fact remains that he did forfeit his membership, and thereby any claim upon the Benefit Department or upon its members any more than the general claim upon all members of the Order. It is impossible for any association or company of any kind to do a life insurance business upon "intentions," no matter how sincere those intentions may be, and there are hundreds of just such cases where claims would be made against the Benefit Department if it did business in that way. There is now pending a suit against the Department by the widow of a member who, three months or more before he was killed, avowed his intention to "drop the insurance," did drop it by non-payment of assessments, yet his widow now sues the Department, claiming that he did not intend to forfeit his membership and that payment was offered.

The claim is made in behalf of Brother Weist that notices were not received, and for that reason he was not to blame for forfeiting. The law distinctly states that the duty of the Department is fulfilled when a properly addressed notice is placed in the postoffice, with postage prepaid, and this is the only way in which it is possible for any assessment association to do business at all. Brother Weist knew that a notice was issued regularly every month, and when a month passed without bringing him a notice, he should have investigated. Further than that, it is not claimed that any other assessment notice than that of Nos. 98, 99 and 100 failed to reach him; yet a notice of Nos. 101, 102 and 103 was mailed December 31, 1887, and after its receipt he had until December 31 to pay 98, 99 and 100, yet no remittance was made until late in February, long after his membership was also forfeited on account of non-payment of Nos. 101, 102 and 103. The claim was taken to the Grand Division by Division 97, and that body passed upon it. The officers of the Order are powerless to pay this or any similar claim. The members of the Department, through their delegates to the Grand Division, can do it if they choose, or the members of the Order, through their delegates, can give Mrs. Weist $2,500 or any other sum that they see fit; but it should be distinctly understood that this lady has no just or equitable claim upon the Benefit Department, and that if $2,500 is paid her by the Department it is a gift pure and simple. The only claim that she has is as the widow of a member of the Order, and, as stated above, that claim is as much, and if anything more, upon those who are not members of the insurance than upon those who are. There is too much indiscriminate censure of the Benefit Department from members who know but little of the real facts, and too ready credence given by members to idle reports against the insurance. Every one of the grand officers stands ready to aid Mrs. Weist or any Brother's widow, but they can not and will not wrong the members of the Department and violate their obligations by approving any claim which is so plainly without foundation as this one; and in writing of it, we do not wish to be understood as inferring in the slightest degree that Mrs. Weist has any intention of wronging the Department or the members of the Order. From letters on file in this office from the lady, we are fully satisfied that she is sincere in her belief that her claim is a just one, but the honesty of her purpose is not sufficient excuse for the allowance of the claim by the officers of the Department. The officers of the Order who have to do with the matter of claims always give the benefit of every possible doubt to the claimant, and we have paid a number of cases where there was no legal claim whatever upon the Department, as will be patent to any member who will take the trouble to investigate. Let every member be just to the insurance and to the officers who are obliged to pass upon claims, and not censure either the Department or the officers for what is clearly negligence on the part of members themselves.

MAKE HASTE SLOWLY.

One of the favorite arguments with some of those who insist that nothing in the shape of federation is permissible except the general plan now in existence between the organizations composing the United Order of Railway Employés is that in system federation there is nothing to compel the support of members on other roads, and that in case of a strike on any road, those interested must depend wholly upon the good will and sympathy of the members on other roads; that in case of a strike on one road it could turn over its business to another road, and if the employés of that road felt so disposed they might refuse to handle it, but on the contrary they might handle it and defeat the strikers, and no one could prevent them; while in case of any strike on the part of those composing the Supreme Council, "if we don't get satisfaction we pull 'em out, and if another road attempts to aid them we pull 'em out there, and so on until they are all out." This to some may seem a very attractive showing, but THE CONDUCTOR wishes to utter a word of warning that it hopes will be given due consideration, not only by members of the Order, but by members of other organizations as well. If ever the day comes that requires a sympathetic strike on the part of organizations of railway employés, and such sympathetic strike extends very much beyond the original strike, that day marks the commencement of a downward movement on the part of such organizations. We reproduce from the Sioux City Journal an article copied from the Inter Ocean with a brief comment, and we believe that this article contains much that is worthy of consideration by the members of all organizations, and that it should be a warning to those who are disposed to "pull 'em all out," or to even talk of so doing. The employés on any railway have, as a rule, the sympathy of the public if their cause is at all just, but human nature is very frail when self-interest is touched, and it is our belief that in case of any extended strike, spreading over any large territory, the result would be the public "ferninst" it, and legislation that would cripple the organizations largely. It certainly cannot be expected that the public will submit to any general stoppage of traffic in the United States for the redress of the employés of any road, no matter how serious or grievous their troubles are, and any threats of anything of the kind will simply prepare the public and their law-makers for quick and decided action should the occasion ever come.

We believe the assertion as to the support of members of organizations on other roads being wholly voluntary is incorrect, but must admit that at present it is true of the Order. At the same time, we believe that even under the present condition of things there would be no difficulty on account of want of support from members of the Order in any reasonable instance. This matter of federation and its consequences, both probable and possible, is a serious one, and should be maturely considered; and whatever result may be finally arrived at, we believe the Supreme Council and all others interested should condemn the sympathetic strike, or any idea of a general strike from any cause.

That federation will decrease, if not entirely prevent, strikes can hardly be contradicted; but in the event of any organization or federated organizations being compelled to engage in a strike for what they believe to be just and right, and that strike shall be contested vigorously enough to require a general cessation of traffic, we believe that it will be by all means best for those organizations to submit to injustice rather than take the risk of legislation that would for a time, at least, deprive us of influence and power, while submission to manifest injustice rather than cause wholesale injury and deprivation to the public would in the end redound to the benefit of organized labor. "All things come to him who waits," and patience, perseverance and unity will bring justice in the end, while haste and impatience are very likely to bring disappointment and defeat.

SHALL WE HAVE A BUILDING?

When the writer first began to talk of a building to be erected, owned and controlled by the Order or its members, he was called visionary and found few, very few supporters. Later it was denounced as a "scheme" and still later, when it was learned that the reputation of the Order was such that cities were willing to give nearly one half of the proposed value of the building to secure its location, it found a large number of supporters and at Denver was adopted by a very large majority. Starting with what seemed to be assured success, distrust was created by dissensions among members of the Order at the city selected and as a result, subscriptions to the stock were withdrawn and primarily on account of those dissensions, secondarily on account of a general feeling of dissatisfaction among members of the Order, the matter dragged along until the offer made for the location was withdrawn. That cities are still willing to offer inducements for the location of a building is proven by the fact that one city sent a man to Rochester merely on the possibility that the matter would be taken up and decided there. That the erection of a building by the Order would be of lasting benefit in many ways and prove a source of revenue to the Order, is, we think, the candid opinion of a large majority of our members. The only real question to be determined, is, we believe, whether the building shall be erected by a stock company or by the Order itself. That our opinion in regard to the advisability of such a building is shared by those who are not members of the Order, is evidenced by the fact that Grand Master Sargent, of the B. of L. F., recommends in his annual report, the erection of a building by that association to cost not less than $150,000. It is doubtful if the firemen will adopt the recommendation at this session as such a project is one that can hardly be expected to be acted upon without a year or more of consideration and discussion among the members. We sincerely hope that they will have the foresight to adopt it immediately though, for next to seeing an Order building, we would be gratified to see one of our sister associations own one, and we believe that the wisdom of Mr. Sargent will be verified if they will proceed immediately to build. Meantime, members of the Order, let us try again; consider the matter well between now and next May; use the columns of the CONDUCTOR to discuss it in all its bearings; more than one city stands ready to compete for the location of such a building and to guarantee us a revenue from it. Fifteen dollars per member will erect a magnificent monument to the energy and ability of the conductors of America; one dollar per month for fifteen months, and it would probably require that length of time to erect such a building, and who cannot put aside one dollar per month? We believe the stock plan to be the best for the present, giving the Order an option on the stock but if the members prefer some other plan, we are willing to yield our personal preference and give any plan selected a hearty support.

FEDERATION AGAIN.

We publish in this issue, a portion of a communication from Brother Marr of 115, on the above subject and must apologize to the Brother for Marr-ing his letter by omitting a portion of it, which we were forced to do on account of want of space.

It is not our purpose to make any reply to Brother Marr as we prefer to leave the discussion to members, and hope that it will be continued, and that Brother Marr will "come again", but we wish to correct one point in regard to which Brother M. is palpably in error. He thinks there would be no getting along with many of those who are members of the different organizations as they would be continually embroiling the federated organizations in trouble. That there are members of organizations that are ever ready to strike upon a very slight pretext, has been thoroughly demonstrated by the experience of the past few weeks, but it has also been demonstrated that the switchmen, for instance, have not been able to even embroil their own organization in their causeless "ructions," the officers of that organization having acted with good judgment and refused to permit the organization to be involved. If the officers of any one organization, possess the necessary good judgment and fairness to hold that one organization aloof from the petty and causeless troubles of its turbulent members, there is certainly little danger of a number of organizations being involved in any such quarrel, while it requires a unanimous vote of all the organizations interested to order a strike, and where in any such case, the officers of all organizations except the one making complaint, would occupy the position of disinterested judges. In citing the switchmen, we have no intent to reflect upon that organization, or to infer that it is more likely than any other to make disturbances, but simply because it offers a case in point. There is no organization that does not have members that need to be restrained, and the Order is no exception to the rule, and as we have heretofore stated, we believe that it will be found necessary to adopt some law to restrain those described in Brother Marr's letter, who are of us. Before such members can involve any federated organizations in trouble, though, they must become numerous enough to elect officers who are incapable of using the necessary firmness and ability to properly fill such a position.

TRAIN WRECKING.

For some time past, there has been frequent report of attempts to wreck N. Y. C. trains, and in one instance a passenger train was wrecked by something, though fortunately no lives were lost, and five strikers are under arrest for causing the wreck. If the five men are fairly proven guilty, the law does not prescribe any adequate punishment. Hanging is altogether too good for anyone who will make an attempt to wreck a railway train and when wretches in the shape of human beings undertake it for the simple purpose of revenge upon the company which has defeated them, language is inadequate to express the contempt in which they should be held. The men so charged, are, however, entitled to a fair trial before being adjudged guilty, and they should not be condemned in a Pinkerton court nor on account of any alleged confession to "Bob" or "Bill" Pinkerton. Neither should the knights of labor be convicted by the press and public opinion until there is reason for it; under the circumstances, the knights must suffer from any attempt by any one to injure the N. Y. C. road, and unless they act energetically, they must expect the odium of such acts to rest upon them. Should evidence show that the association is connected with any such attempt, or should it fail to promptly discipline any of its members or assemblies who may possibly be shown to have any connection therewith, THE CONDUCTOR will be as prompt to condemn that association as it is any individual wretch who may be shown to be guilty, but there must be better evidence to show the guilt of any one, than the proclamations of Pinkertons, and if it shall prove that these men have been unjustly accused, the knights of labor as an association, owe it to them to teach "Bob" and "Bill" a lesson that will possibly be of benefit to them in the future. A fact that should lead the public to be very slow to credit all the reports that are published, is the exposure of the Pinkerton conspiracy in the last CONDUCTOR where the valorous guard reported themselves as being locked in a switch house while the track was being blockaded, and the latter story told by Tim Dunwoody, who seems to have been an apt scholar of the Pinkertons, of how he found rails wedged in a cattle-guard, and was numerous shot at when he attempted to remove them, and which investigation showed to be but "the baseless fabric of a dream" of notoriety, reward and wealth for the noble Dunwoody.

AN ACT

To provide against accidents on railroads and limit the hours of service.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That no company operating a railroad over thirty miles in length, in whole or in part, within this State, shall permit or require any conductor, engineer, fireman or brakeman or any trainman who has worked in his respective capacity for twenty-four consecutive hours, except in case of casualty, to again go on duty or perform any work until he has had at least eight hours' rest. Ten hours' labor shall constitute a day's work, and for every hour in excess of said ten hours' work that any conductor, engineer, fireman, brakeman or any trainman of a company, who works under directions of a superior, or at the request of the company, shall be required or permitted to work, he shall be paid for said extra services in addition to his per diem.

SECTION 2. Any company which violates or permits to be violated any of the provisions of the preceding section, or any officer, agent or employee who violates or permits to be violated any of the provisions of the preceding section, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one hundred and fifty dollars.

SECTION 3. This act shall take effect upon its passage.

Passed March 26th, 1890. [See Ohio Laws, Vol. 87, page 112.]

How many Ohio railways are complying with the above?

RAILWAY OFFICERS AND INTOXICANTS.

Under the head of "Where Drink is Outlawed" we publish an article which is being widely quoted as showing the immense influence of railways in favor of temperance, and giving them credit for the improvement in that respect among railway employés. We do not propose to question in the least the "prohibitory" orders issued by any railroad, but we do question the assumption, from these orders, that the railways have been of any material influence in promoting temperance among employés. These rules are made for just the purpose for which they have been used by the press: that is for "show." Like many other rules they are for the protection of the companies and the delusion of the public. This is a rather serious assertion, but we believe it to be true. The press will search in vain for an order on any railroad in the United States prohibiting its officers from indulging in alcoholic drinks, and although officers are just as much employés as the engineer, conductor or section man, the orders are never construed to mean them. Further, the press will not have to search very far to find numerous railway officers who, as the editor of the Sioux City Journal is said to do, preach prohibition but do not practice it. We do not wish to be understood as accusing Mr. Perkins of the Journal of intemperance, but he is accused of indulging in spiritous drinks occasionally, and is it so much worse for the employé to indulge in cheap whisky than for the officer or influential editor to indulge in expensive wine or high-priced whisky? These prohibitory orders by railway officers who fail to include themselves in the prohibition, are very much like the prohibitory laws of some of our states; they simply create a feeling of opposition, the effect of which tends to increase the consumption of liquor. No one should understand THE CONDUCTOR as apologizing for the use of intoxicants by railway employés. We condemn the use of liquor, and particularly its use by those who have anything whatever to do with the movement of trains, but we do object most strenuously to the idea that railway officers are so much above ordinary people that they need no restriction, and that were it not for their orders against it, the employés would be a set of drunken vagabonds. The Journal quotes in its article a list of fifty-six roads that prohibit the use of intoxicants by employés, and yet of this fifty-six, a large majority are engaged in the business of selling liquor, and were it necessary, THE CONDUCTOR could name several officers who occasionally, and some of them frequently, become intoxicated. We find the notorious Reading quoted in this article as a road that forbids the use of liquor. It is but a short time ago that this pharisaical corporation issued an order that its employés must not use liquor at any time, on or off duty, and that any one who did so would be dismissed. The press and citizens generally along the line of the road, and particularly in Philadelphia, who knew something of the road and its employés, made it so exceedingly warm for the officers who issued the order, that they were very glad to withdraw it. To those who are at all acquainted with this company and who know something of the evidence before the congressional investigating committee, this attempt to assume to itself virtues by discrediting or endeavoring to discredit thousands of honest, temperate, laborers, was pharisaical in the extreme.

That there has been a great change among railway employés in the past twenty years no one will pretend to deny, but that it has been brought about or influenced by prohibitory orders from those who engage in the sale of liquor for the profit in it, is we believe untrue. The improvement we believe, is wholly and solely due to the employés themselves and the influence of their organizations, and as we have already said, these orders are merely for the delusion of the public. It is a noticeable fact that while the railways running through states that have prohibitory laws, complied with those laws up to the time of the famous "original package decision," they all recommenced the sale of liquor in those states, or at least in Iowa, as soon as that decision was made. These "orders" are just on a par with an order that might be issued by a saloon keeper to his bar-tender, prohibiting him from using liquor, and a statement that drink was outlawed in saloons where such an "order" had been made, would be just as consistent as the title to the article quoted.

Some of our railways are not waiting for the passage of a compulsory safety appliance law, and among those which are foremost in safety equipment is the Queen and Crescent route which is adding to its equipment two hundred new cars with automatic couplers and air brakes. These cars are being built by the Elliot Car Works of Gadsden, Ala., and are to be used in transporting fruit. All freight cars on that line when sent to the shops for repairs, are equipped with automatic couplers and air brakes before being returned to service.

The secretary of Division No. 96 would like to hear from Brother W. W. McIntyre of that division.

The S. M. A. A. re-elected Grand Master Sweeny and Vice-Grand Master Downey at Buffalo, and made Mr. John A. Hall, editor and manager of the Journal.

The B. of R. C. at its recent convention re-elected Geo. W. Howard, Grand Chief Conductor, selected Toledo as its headquarters and Jacksonville as its next place of meeting.

F. A. Webber, where are you? Though "lost to sight" (and hearing) you are still "to memory dear," and all the boys at Wilmington would be glad to hear from you, particularly the secretary of 224.

Grand Master Sargent reports that the membership of the B. of L. F. is 19,000; that they have $63,000 in their insurance fund, and that $459,000 was raised by assessment to support their members in the "Q" strike.

We are under obligations to Brothers for copies of the new schedules of pay for the C. & O., C. & A., S. A. & A. P. and Pacific system S. P. railways which will be published as fast as we can find room for them.

The committee representing the members of the Order who arranged the schedule with the San Antonio & Aransas Pass railway, wish to extend their thanks to Division No. 76 for favors received and assistance rendered.

A union meeting will be held at Atlanta, Georgia, Sunday, October 26, and the committee of arrangements will be glad to welcome a thousand members. The meeting is to be held in Odd Fellows hall, corner of Alabama and Whitehall streets, at 10:00 a. m. The committee have arranged with the Directors of the Piedmont Exposition for a special "Railroad Men's Day," and it is earnestly requested that all members who can possibly do so, will arrive on the morning of Saturday 25th, or earlier in order to attend the exposition on that day.

A circular dated September 1 gives notice of the appointment of F. J. Easley as trainmaster of the Rio Grande division of the "Santa Fé," with office at San Marcial. Frank is one of the old reliable members of No. 70 at Las Vegas.

Brother F. E. Langdon fell from a train on the South Pacific Coast Railway on the 11th instant, and sustained injuries so severe that he died the next day. Division 91 and the Order lose a good member by the death of Brother Langdon.

For generous hospitality extended, the Grand Senior Conductor feels indebted to Brother Arnold of Taylor, Texas, and Robinson of Aberdeen, S. Dak., and their better halves, who contributed largely to make his stay in those places pleasant.

A genius in Mattoon, Ills. has a scheme for an organization of all railway employes into one association, including telegraphers, trackmen and others to be governed by a "supreme council," and divided into local divisions and state bodies.

Chauncey has arrived home, and compliments Webb on his management of the Central during the strike, which will probably put an end to the visionary stories that the whole matter was a scheme to boom the former as a candidate for the Presidency.

A correspondent says that we have failed to note the promotion of two worthy Brothers, W. A. Mills and W. L. Park. The Brother will find a notice of the appointment of Brother Park as assistant superintendent of the Nebraska Division of the U. P. on page 633 of THE CONDUCTOR, and if someone had sent us a notice of the appointment of Brother Mills, we would gladly have given it space long ago. Brother Mills was appointed trainmaster of the Mountain Division with headquarters at Laramie on July 1st. The company gets an excellent officer, the employes will have a courteous, gentlemanly official to deal with who will always give them justice; and Division 128 loses a good secretary, and the fact that we have been unable to hear from Division No. 128 for some time past is now fully accounted for.

Brother A. P. Clayton, formerly a Badger state conductor and yet a member of Division 82, is now superintendent of construction on the Tacoma, Olympia & Gray's Harbor road at Centralia, Wash., and wants THE CONDUCTOR there. If it don't reach you promptly, let us know Brother C.

The secretary of Division No. 89 writes that he has addressed several communications to Brothers J. B. Wilstach and J. H. Stewart, the former of Sealy, Texas, and the latter of Earlington, Ky., but can't hear from either one. They are requested to communicate with him at once.

The American Federation of Labor requests the members of labor associations to withhold any patronage from the Anheuser-Busch and the Wm. Lemp Brewing Companies. We would add to that the suggestion that such members boycott all breweries, and believe they will be the better for it.

We are just in receipt of information that Brother Blackburn, the efficient secretary of Division No. 138, had the misfortune to break his leg some time in July. We are not informed how the accident occurred, but hope that Brother B. is nearly able to resume his duties.

The members of the B. of L. E. and the O. of R. C. employed on the C. & N. W. and proprietary and leased lines, have formed an alliance that will we believe be mutually beneficial. Herman E. Wills, a popular and widely known member of the B. of L. E. is chairman of the joint committee, and W. B. Parkin of Division 34 of the Order, is its secretary.

A dispatch from Philadelphia gives the cheering news that the salary of the underpaid and overworked president of the Philadelphia & Reading has been increased so that hereafter he can enjoy some of the comforts of life and need not practice quite so much self-denial. He is to receive $3,333.33⅓ per month, or $40,000 per year, and this is said to be the largest salary paid to any railway president in the United States except the $50,000 per year which the Central pays Depew. It is reasonably apparent that the net revenue of $10,348 per mile reported by the P. & R. was not made by cutting the salary of its president, and it should be remembered that this road pays its conductors less than the average pay of brakemen, and that the average pay of its freight conductors is less than one-half the average pay of brakemen on many of the western roads.

Our genial friend Ed. Ludington has left the future great of the Northwest (Sioux City) and hid himself eastward again. Ed. takes the position of general yardmaster of the N. Y., O. & W. at Hancock, N. Y., and as he is one of those who makes friends everywhere, it's needless for us to wish him success. He leaves many friends as a result of his sojourn in Iowa.

Readers of THE CONDUCTOR and particularly members of the Order, should not, as some seem to have done, mistake opinions and statements of correspondents, or items of news for statements of THE CONDUCTOR. We print such items of news as we think will be interesting to members, as news merely; communications give the opinions of the writers only, and in no case is THE CONDUCTOR responsible for them.

THE CONDUCTOR acknowledges with sincere thanks, an invitation to attend the opening exercises of the Seventh Annual Convention of the B. of R. T. to be held in Los Angeles, California, Monday, October 20th, and we regret exceedingly that business will prevent our acceptance. The boys have our best wishes for a successful and profitable convention, and we bespeak for them from our members in that vicinity, a cordial reception.

A Cincinnati reader of THE CONDUCTOR calls attention to an important omission in the cut on page 641 of the Sept. 15th issue. He says "the conductor should be on the rear end of the train." That we are not in a position to question the correction will be apparent to all when we state that the present Mrs. Daniels was "the postmaster's assistant" at a country station fifteen years ago, and we can distinctly remember that "the conductor" of one train was always on the rear end passing that station, though the rear car was a "caboose" instead of a coach.

We are in receipt of No. 1, of of "Free Russia, the organ of the English Society of Friends of Russian Freedom, published in New York and London. That there is urgent need of reforms in the Russian government is probably apparent to all, and while we would be glad to see such reforms and would welcome them in Russia or elsewhere, we cannot but think that there is ample ground for American philanthropists right here at home, and that it would be well for us to do a little reforming ourselves before undertaking to meddle with Russia or any other foreign country.

Brother Garrettson wishes to return thanks for many favors on the occasion of the organization at Osawatomie, Kas., and Taylor, Texas, to Superintendent Dunaway of the Mo. Pac., train master J. J. Gove of the M. K. & T., and train master T. Hume of the I. & G. N.; the above gentlemen arranged to have conductors present and furnished transportation for attending members. For the organization at Aberdeen, So. Dak. the C. & N. W. ran a special train from Huron, and the favor is appreciated by the new division.

August 21st, a letter came to this office which to date we have been unable to read; it is a stenographic letter, written, evidently by a master hand in the art who has arrived at the mature age of three or four years. The envelope bears two postmarks, both Englewood, Illinois, Post Office, one dated August 17 and the other August 20. If any member or the Benefit Department in Englewood is wondering why he does not get a receipt for the remittance he thinks he sent about that time this will explain to him that he left it where "the kid" found it and he or she probably took out the contents, inserted the letter above referred to and left it on the desk where paterfamilias found it, scolded the little one a trifle for the hieroglyphics on the envelope and sealed and mailed it without looking inside.

A friend sends a note criticising THE CONDUCTOR for errors, it makes in the last number in regard to Webb of the N. Y. C., and says that H. Walter is not the Webb who went to Alaska, nor is he the son-in-law of Vanderbilt. If our critic had perused THE CONDUCTOR a trifle less hastily, he would have discovered that we did not accuse Mr. Webb of going to Alaska, and the reference to an Alaskan trip by the St. Thomas Journal is the first that we had heard of it. Neither has THE CONDUCTOR accused Mr. Webb of being a son-in-law of Vanderbilt. Dr. Seward Webb, president of the Wagner Company, is a son-in-law of Vanderbilt, and H. Walter Webb, vice-president of the Wagner Company and third vice-president of the N. Y. C., is, if our information is correct, as we believe it to be, the brother of Dr. Seward Webb, and consequently the brother of the son-in-law of Vanderbilt, exactly as stated in THE CONDUCTOR. He may have been a student of the railway question and a clerk in the N. Y. C. operating department, as stated by our critic, but we are nevertheless of the opinion that he owes his position to relationship rather than to the knowledge and experience gained as either a "lawyer and stock broker," or "three or four years" as a "student and clerk."

One of those sad occurrences that casts a shadow of grief over a multitude of friends was the death by his own hand of Brother Thomas L. Fleming, of Division 105. Brother Fleming left his train on the Q. & C. Railway to fill the position of treasurer of Madison parish. Respected and loved by all who knew him, he was rigidly upright, and his death cannot be traced, as in some other cases, to any discrepancy in accounts but from ill health. No suspicion of dishonesty attaches to the unfortunate Brother who went thus prematurely to his grave. Brother Fleming's wife died about a year ago, and her loss has affected him greatly, and this, in connection with his sufferings from illness, undoubtedly prompted the fatal action. He leaves children, who will receive the benefit on his certificate of membership in the Benefit Department.

There are couplers and couplers, and as for patents on couplers, they are reckoned by the thousand; but it remained for a citizen of Cedar Rapids, an old engineer and practical mechanic, to invent the coupler that in our opinion is to take precedence of all others of the hook type. Mr. Dyer Williams entered the employ of the N. Y. C. forty-eight years ago, and was for year some of its best engineers. For a number of years past, he has been a resident of Cedar Rapids, and the proprietor of a machine shop. When the law requiring railway companies in Iowa to equip their stock with automatic couplers was adopted, the B. C. R. & N. among others began investigating the coupler question in order to select the best there seemed to be some serious defect with all that were examined, and Mr. Williams made up his mind to have a try at it. The coupler itself is simply the M. C. B. pattern, and the improvement is in the locking device, which is simply a triangular piece of iron which slides backward and up on an incline when the couplers engage and drops back to its place as soon as the rear arm of the knuckle is past it. Its action is by gravity alone, certain and secure, and there is but one piece of cast iron weighing about seven pounds, if by any mischance it should be broken, all that is necessary is to disengage the rod attached for uncoupling, slip it out of the draft iron and put in another. In actual service, it is found to work better than the model and one advantage that has been shown by actual experiment, is that when a draft-iron is pulled out, it will not drop down on the track as when it is pulled forward, the locking block is raised permitting it to uncouple and it remains nearly in place.

NO. 20.

AN HOSPITABLE JAILER.

From a stirring article of adventure, "A Hard Road to Travel Out of Dixie," written and illustrated by Lieut. W. H. Shelton in the October Century we quote the following:

"At Greenville we were lodged in the county jail to await the reconstruction of railway bridges, when we were to be transported to Columbia. The jail was a stone structure, two stories in height, with halls through the center on both floors and square rooms on each side. The lock was turned on our little party of six in one of these upper rooms, having two grated windows looking down on the walk. Through the door which opened on the hall a square hole was cut as high as one's face and large enough to admit the passage of a plate. Aside from the rigor of our confinement we were treated with marked kindness. We had scarcely walked about our dungeon before the jailer's daughters were at the door with their autograph albums. In a few days we were playing draughts and reading Bulwer, while the girls, without, were preparing our food and knitting for us warm new stockings. Notwithstanding all these attentions, we were ungratefully discontented. At the end of the first week we were joined by seven enlisted men, Ohio boys, who like ourselves had been found at large in the mountains. From one of these new arrivals we procured a case-knife and a gun screwdriver. Down on the hearth before the fire the screwdriver was placed on the thick edge of the knife and belabored with a beef-bone until a few inches of its back were converted into a rude saw. The grate in the window was formed of cast-iron bars, passing perpendicularly through wrought-iron plates bedded in the stone jambs. If one of these perpendicular bars, an inch and a half square, could be cut through, the plates might be easily bent so as to permit the egress of a man. With this end in view we cautiously began operations. Outside of the bars a piece of carpet had been stretched to keep out the raw wind, and behind this we worked with safety. An hour's toil produced but a few feathery fillings on the horizontal plate, but many hands make light work, and steadily the cut grew deeper. We recalled the adventures of Claud Duval, Dick Turpin, and Sixteen-string Jack, and sawed away. During the available hours of three days and throughout one entire night the blade of steel was worrying, rasping, eating the iron bar. At last the grosser yielded to the temper and persistence of the finer metal. It was Saturday night when the toilsome cut was completed, and preparations were already under way for a speedy departure. The jail had always been regarded as too secure to require a military guard, although soldiers were quartered in the town; besides, the night was so cold that a crust had formed on the snow, and both citizens and soldiers, unused to such extreme weather, would be likely to remain indoors. For greater secrecy of movement, we divided into small parties, aiming to traverse different roads. I was to go with my former companion, Captain Smith. Lots were cast to determine the order of our going. First exit was allotted to four of the Ohio soldiers. Made fast to the grating outside were a bit of rope and strip of blankets, along which to descend. Our room was immediately over that of the jailer and his sleeping family, and beneath our opening was a window, which each man must pass in his descent. At eleven o'clock the exodus began. The first man was passed through the bars amid a suppressed buzz of whispered cautions. His boots were handed after him in a haversack. The rest of us, pressing our faces to the frosty grating, listened breathlessly for the success of the movement we could no longer see. Suddenly there was a crash, and in the midst of mutterings of anger we snatched in the rag ladder and restored the piece of carpeting to its place outside the bars. Our pioneer had hurt his hand against the rough stones, and, floundering in mid-air, had dashed his leg through sash and glass of the window below. We could see nothing of his further movements, but soon discovered the jailer standing in the door, looking up and down the street, seemingly in the dark as to where the crash came from. At last, wearied and worried and disappointed, we lay down in our blankets upon the hard floor.

"At daylight we were awakened by the voice of Miss Emma at the hole in the door. 'Who got out last night?' 'Welty.' 'Well, you was fools you didn't all go; pap wouldn't 'a' stopped you.' If you'll keep the break concealed until to-night we'll let you all out.' The secret of the extreme kindness of our keepers was explained. The jailer, a loyalist, retained his position as a civil detail, thus protecting himself and sons from conscription. Welty had been taken in the night before, his bruises had been anointed, and he had been provisioned for the journey.

"We spent the day repairing our clothing and preparing for the road. My long-heeled cowhides, 'wife's shoes,' for which I had exchanged a uniform waistcoat with a cotton-wooled old darkey on the banks of the Saluda, were about parting soles from the uppers, and I kept the twain together by winding my feet with stout cords. At supper an extra ration was given us. As soon as it was dark the old jailer appeared among us and gave us a minute description of the different roads leading west into the mountains, warning us of certain dangers. At eleven o'clock Miss Emma came with the great keys, and we followed her, in single file, down the stairs and out into the back yard of the jail. From the broken gratings in front, the bit of rope and strips of blanket were left dangling in the wind."

Playing "Rip" in the Catskills.

There is in the village of Catskill a Rip Van Winkle Club. This society did me the honor to invite me to act the character in their town. I accepted, and when I arrived was met by the worthy president and other members of the club, among whom was young Nicholas Vedder, who claimed to be a lineal descendant of the original "old Nick." Emulating the spirit of evolution, the citizens had turned the skating-rink into a theatre, and a very respectable-looking establishment it made, though in its transition state the marks of rollers did "cling to it still." I was taking a cup of tea at the table in the hotel when I was attracted to the colored waiter, who was giving a graphic and detailed account of this legend of the Catskill Mountains to one of the boarders who sat nearly opposite to me.

"Yes, sah," he continued; "Rip went up into de mountains, slep' for twenty years, and den he come back hyar in dis berry town his own folks didn't know him."

"Why," said his listener, "you don't believe the story's true?"

"True? Ob course it is. Why," pointing to me, "dat's de man."

The town was filled with farmers and their wives who had come from far and near to see the opening of the new theater, and also, I think I may say, to see for the first time the story which Washington Irving had laid almost at their very doors.

As I drove to the theater the rain came down in torrents, the thunder rolled and the lightning played around the peaks of the distant mountains under the very shadow of which I was to act the play. It gave me a very strange sensation. When I got to the theater I could scarcely get in the crowd was so great about the door—countrymen trying to get into the ticket office instead of the proper entrance, and anxious and incredulous old ladies endeavoring to squeeze past the door-keeper but refusing to give up their tickets. The rush over, the play began. The audience was intent on the scene as it progressed and seemed anxious not to lose a word. During the scene in the last act where Rip inquires of the inn-keeper, "Is this the village of Falling Water?" I altered the text and substituted the correct name, "Is this the village of Catskill?" The crowded house almost held its breath. The name of the village seemed to bring the scene home to every man, woman, and child that was looking at it. From this time on the interest was at its full tension. Surely I had never seen an audience so struck with the play before.

There was a reception held at the club after the play, and the worthy president in introducing me to the company was so nervous that he announced me as "Mr. Washington Irving."—Joseph Jefferson, in the October Century.

The Utilization of Niagara Falls.

A contract was awarded on September 13 to Rogers & Clemens, of this city, to construct a tunnel parallel to Niagara River for the Cataract Construction Company. The consideration involved is not announced. A bond in the sum of $300,000 has been executed by the firm. Work will be commenced immediately, and must be finished in January, 1892. In 1886 the Niagara River Hydraulic Power Server Company was incorporated by a special act of the State Legislature. At various times the charter was amended and the name finally changed to that of "The Niagara Falls Power Company." In July, 1889, this company awarded the Cataract Construction Company the contract to construct at Niagara Falls works which will develop 119,000 horse power. Since that time the contractor has been preparing plans and specifications for the work. The sub-contract just awarded is the first decided move which proves to the public that the preliminaries are nearly finished, and that it is certain the works are to be built. At the present time the contractor has a commission in Europe studying plans of plants of a similar nature, with a view of ascertaining the most practical method of constructing the Niagara plant.

Up to date plans for any portion of the plant, excepting the tunnel, have not been adopted. Consequently the manner of connecting the tunnel with the upper river is not known. There will, however, be a canal either with or without a series of transverse surface conduits, which will conduct the water to penstocks and thence upon turbine wheels. The tunnel, which is to be merely a tail race, will receive the water from the turbines conducting it below the falls. The details upon which this tunnel is to be constructed are at hand. It is to start at a point below the falls under the suspension bridge, extending through the rock to the upper river to a point 6,700 feet from its mouth, where a head of 120 feet will be obtained. It will be 28½ feet high, 18 feet wide, with a semicircular top of 9 feet radius, and straight sides. The fall will be 36 feet to the mile.

The company owns 225 acres of land along the river suitable for mill sites, 75 acres under water adjacent to said land, and 1,100 acres lying back from the river about midway between LaSalle and Niagara Falls. It has been estimated that the flow of water over the falls amounts to 12,785,455 cubic feet a minute. To develop 119,000 horse power with a 120 foot fall would require but one-fifth of one per cent. of this volume. From these figures it will be seen that the power is almost inexhaustible. If this plant soon to be constructed, proves to be a success—and there is no reason to believe that it will not—the power now running to waste, reaching a figure almost beyond comprehension of the mind, can be utilized by additional plants of a similar nature.—*Eng. and Min. BY LA CROSSE.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas. Sept. 5. 1890.

With a whistle, long and short and a great puffing and steaming; and that indescribable groaning, thrilling of the air-brakes, which would almost make you testify that a railroad car had a soul doomed to some terrible penance that it constantly protested against, the train stops and the porter calls out "San Antonio!" And we step out on the platform of a depot, whose appearance would never cause one a suspicion of the fact that it was one of the gate-ways to a city of fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants. It is situated one mile from the city. We enter a "bus" about as long again as our northern "busses" and whose venerable aspect convinces you that it is not many centuries removed from Noah's ark. Drawn by four horses we go lumbering slowly up the street, whose appearance suggests the idea of a country villiage. But a sudden turn gives us a view that makes us imagine ourselves in old Mexico. Streets so narrow you could almost stand on one walk and shake hands with your friend on the opposite walk; the tall brick and stone buildings on each side, shadowing the streets until you wonder if the sun ever penetrated to the bottom. Another turn brings us to a more modern street tho' it is also quaint and foreign in its appearance. On we go, taking the rounds of every hotel on the route: at each one, the porter or clerk calls out the name of his house; if there are no passengers for him, the "bus" goes on to the next, to have the programme repeated as many times as there are hotels, until we reach the Hotel Maverick with its gentlemanly proprietors and employees. After a sojourn of two or three days we strike a boarding house—and right here to give you an idea of the color of the water of the San Antonio river, my little daughter came running in exclaiming "they have a lovely lawn back of the house, just as green". The lovely lawn proved to be the San Antonio river. The water of the San Pedro springs, the source of the river, are of the same peculiar bottle green. Both river and springs are clear as crystal, but warm and insipid to the taste as boiled water. As yet we have taken only a fleeting glance at the springs. Some enterprising person has enclosed the grounds and you enter by one or two ornamental gate-ways whose bastions are adorned with the national flag. During my brief visit I noticed a small botanical garden, a "zoo", an ice cream and dancing saloon, several pavillions and grottoes and the everlasting "merry go round". The grounds are intersected by small creeks leading from the springs and rendered picturesque by rustic bridges. The garden is full of old trees growing in quaint and fantastic shapes. San Antonio can truthfully boast of as fine a post office building as any city of its size in the union. The population consists of Mexicans, Negroes, Spaniards, Germans and Americans.

Aha! There whistles Number One!

And down the tingling grade she grows
Tossing her cloud of tresses dun Back on the twilight's fading rose.

A mile—a moment—and my Kate,
From years and half a world apart!
But now we'll smile at cheated Fate,
And keep our Kingdom of the Heart.

And—But the world is drowned in steam—
A volleying, billowing, deafening cloud—
And men there run, as in a dream,
And through the thunderous fog they crowd.

"An open switch," I heard one say;
An op—But that's a wreck! And she
A half-a-hundred yards away!
Ah, God! How ill from Fate we flee!

How cursed leaden drag my feet—
And yet the rest are far behind—
On, through that misty winding sheet,
My—Heaven! I know not what—to find.

H-h! That I tripped on moved and cried!
Ah! There she is! My Kate! my Kate!
Unscratched! And not a soul beside
Is lost, of all that living freight.

But while the grumbling travelers hie
To crowd the station with their fret,
Here, sweetheart, step a little by,
To thank the Saviour they forget.

Nay not in words—that dull ear strains
Not even to your music, Sweet!
For that poor clay in greasy jeans
There come the stretcher and the sheet.

But of your pure heart's purest give
To him the hungry Death that spied
Betimes himself to leap and live—
But stayed, and stopped the train and died!

And you dumb clinger to the dead—
Ay, weep for her who cannot! She
Upon the morrow should have wed
With him that brought you safe to me!

The Bloodiest Battle in History.

Jacksonville (Fla.) Standard: Several of our exchanges are discussing with various opinions "the bloodiest battle in history." It is recorded that Grant in one hour lost 10,000 killed and wounded at Cold Harbor, but he had nearly 100,000 to loose that number from—10 per cent. in sixty minutes. Gen. Hood, just before sunset, Nov. 30, 1860, moved about 12,000

Confederates, all told, against the strong breastworks at Franklin, Tenn., where his casualties were reported 6,800—or about 50 per cent. in twenty-five minutes.

At Franklin the Union Soldiers under Gen. Schofield were entrenched to the chin. A half-dozen forts belched their thunder from as many hill-tops—long lines of abatis, and cheveaux de frise impeded every assault—and all round the works shrapnel and grape swept down the Confederate ranks from fiery embrasures as our rapidly thinning lines advanced through an open field at shoulder arms.

The casualties of this little army may be estimated when it is stated that the Confederates lost thirteen Generals, killed, wounded and missing. Down this red valley of death rode no braver soldier than Gen. George W. Gordon—the youngest Brigadier in our Western army. We can see him in fancy now, as we saw him then for the first time, mounted on a fiery steed, his long hair swept backward by the breath of battle, as he rode into that maelstrom of iron hail. He went over the works and was captured. There fell, his noble breast pierced through, the invincible Pat Cleburne, the idol of his division as of his State. Gen. John Adams and his horse fell dead together across the enemy's breastworks. Gen. Thomas M. Scott was unhorsed by the explosion of a shell.

The reader will pardon the egotism (or the we-gotism) if the writer states that just twenty years afterwards, (November, 1884) he revisited the field of Franklin. There on the right still stood the old gin where gathered the central whirlwind of that November storm. Across the open fields leaning from the McGavock residence our doomed battalions marched. Along that line of fence beyond his house the brave ranks were formed. We looked backward across the tide of twenty fateful years, recalling the then light heart and thoughtless words of youthful ardor as we moved into the fight. We saw through a mist of unbidden tears the un-returning brave who, in the face of that leaden doom, with dauntless tread passed "over the perilous edge of battle to the harvest home of death"—swept in the twinkling of an eye from our sight forever into the shoreless gulf. We wondered as we sat there and recalled that terrible day how we could have been so thoughtless and unconcerned. As we formed in line to move upon the foe youthful eyes flashed fire and downy cheeks flushed with the rapture of the coming fight. Ah, as we looked upon loved ones then for the last time, knowing that death lurked just over the hill, why did we not pause long enough to clasp one another in a long embrace!

Revisiting these sweeping plateaus which we had seen for the first time twenty years before, and only for a few minutes in the stormy charge, we could almost recall every spot passed over in the fight, as one gathers up the fragments of a broken dream. Surely yonder is the very spot where the writer fell. Here, without doubt, beneath this friendly oak the minie was cut from the flesh where "our friends, the enemy," had embedded it. We know this "surgeon's rendezvous" full well—for along this pathway we passed to the friendly shelter of Col. John McGavock's house. There it stands as it stood then—twenty years ago! How dear to the old "Rebel" heart is the name of Col. John McGavock and his family! How many torn and bleeding bodies were borne into his asylum. Through all the long night the good man assisted by his wife and daughters bent like ministering angels above the dying and the dead.

Everything they had (God bless them!) was devoted to their thousand deeds of mercy. But words lose their native force as in memory we go back to that night of their ceaseless ministrations.

In this room died Col. Nelson, of the Twelfth Louisiana. Both legs were crushed by a cannon ball and his bowels torn by iron grape. Poor fellow! Such agony for several hours few men ever endured. His eyes, through exhaustion caused by pain, sank deep back into his head before death came to his relief. "Give me forty grains of morphine," he called out all through the night, "give me forty grains of morphine and let me die. O, can't I die? Is it so I cannot die? My poor wife and child—my poor wife and child!"

Hard soldier as the writer then was, he went down the steps and far out beneath the stars to escape the prayers of the dying officer.

But to return. Over 50 per cent. of casualties in twenty-five minutes. Franklin was, indeed, the bloodiest battle of modern or ancient history.

Those who now talk so flippantly of another war perhaps had no experience of the first.

An Anecdote of Sheridan.

While the United States was engaged in the great civil war, France and Austria took advantage of our comparatively helpless condition to attempt the conquest of Mexico, with a view to construct a new empire there under Maximilian. General Grant was strongly opposed to this policy, and after Appomattox sent Sheridan with an army to the lower Rio Grande to observe the movements of the foreigners and to be in readiness to intervene whenever Congress gave permission.

An orderly woke the colonel soon after daylight one morning and urged him to go down to the bank of the river, as something remarkable was going on there. The colonel did so, and had the gratification of seeing a combat—it could hardly be called a battle—between the national troops, the adherents of Juarez, and the Mexicans who were serving under the banner of Maximilian and who were in possession of Matamoras. The object of the Juarez troops was, of course, to drive the enemy from Matamoras and hold the place, as, owing to its proximity to the United States forces, it was a very important point. Each side seemed to be fortified, and was engaged in a contest at long range, which was neither very exciting or destructive. The next morning the orderly came again and woke the colonel, and assured him that he would see some genuine fighting. The colonel hurried down to the bank, and there he saw the Juarez men leave their entrenchments, advance with the utmost interpedity, storm the works at Matamoras, and drive the adherents of Maximilian through the town and far beyond out into the open country. Of course, Sheridan could not send a force to the other side of the river without the authority of Congress and the War Department. That would be an unheard-of proceeding. What he did do was to give one of his brigades a leave of absence, and that settled the question so far as Matamoras was concerned.—From The Century for October.

His Text.

Probably no class of men can compare with the clergy in providing stories for the common stock of literature. If any one doubts this, he has only to listen to a group of preachers on some social occasion.

The late Dr. Ward, of Yankton, Dak., was famous for the number of good stories he could tell. One of the last recollections which an old friend had of him was at a banquet of college men, where he related the following of a college classmate who was present:

This classmate was a rising young minister, very absent-minded, very earnest and very sensitive. Hurrying to church one Sunday morning and going into the pulpit late, he was horrified to discover that he had not his carefully written sermon with him. The service had begun by the singing of the anthem, but he called up one of his neighbor's boys and gave him hurried directions about his study and the probable location of the sermon, and sent him post-haste to get it and return as fast as possible.

The service proceeded and the boy did not appear. The young preacher was in agony. He had never preached without notes, and the perspiration stood in great beads on his forehead as he wondered what he would do if the sermon did not come.

Finally, just as the last stanza of the hymn which preceded the sermon was being sung, the boy appeared, rushed up the aisle conspicuously and handed the minister his manuscript. The clergyman took the package nervously, opened it, and during profound stillness, announced the text. Not until he had spoken it did the meaning of it flash over him. It was this:

"Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost!"

This was too much for the audience. The people laughed outright. But the lesson was a good one for the minister, who never forgot his sermon again while in that parish.—Youth's Companion.

Uncle Sam's Cruisers Among British Iron-clads.

Almost like yachts they look, compared with some of their huge neighbors, for some of Great Britain's strongest and most terrible sea-monsters are gathered in the harbor; lying on the waters as if in slumber, quiet and tranquil enough now, but ready to awaken at their mistress's bidding, and to vomit forth death and devastation from their steel-clad sides.

Close to our ship is the Anson; on the other side the huge Benbow, with massive black hull and white, fortress-like superstructure, points the muzzle of her enormous guns over the tops of the turret-like barbettes on her decks, fore and aft, while from the ports in her sides the cannons of her batteries peer menacingly outward. A fringe of davits, from which here and there a boat is hanging, runs on both sides of her upper-deck, and her tall military mast, the top bristling with machine guns, tapers aloft amidships. The Anson flies the flag of the rear admiral; on her quarter-deck scarlet coated, white helmeted marines are drawn up and the band is playing; alongside of her some boats are lying. Farther out in the bay the Iron Duke has shaken out her topsails, and the canvas droops from the long yards in graceful folds, while from her bows to aft of her main-mast the white clothing of her crew, hanging there to dry, flutters from the clothes lines. Over by the long stone wall of the New Mole the Northumberland and the Colossus, the vice admiral's ship, and a number of smaller vessels—despatch-boats and yachts—are moored, while back among the colliers the Monarch's white ensign marks the presence of a man-of-war in their midst. In the offing another naval monster, the Camperdown, is steaming slowly out to sea.

The harbor is alive with row-boats and launches of all kinds. Yonder, glancing like a fish half emerging from the water, comes a small, queerly shaped craft. Gircling with astonishing rapidity around our ship for a moment, it darts off suddenly, and, with a swish and quick splash, something drops from its side. A moment later a dull report, a flash of fire, and a little puff of blue smoke, curling over the water some distance beyond us, where a little red flag waves from a sort of buoy floating there, shows us that the torpedo, that we have just seen launched, has reached its mark.—From "Port to Port with the White Squadron," by R. F. ZOCBAUM, in October Scribner.

Fair Elections.

The New York Dispatch thinks both Democrats and Republicans will appreciate the following:

"What you people want is a fair election," said a northern republican to a colored politician in Arkansaw. "Congress is doing its best to assure you that constitutional privilege, and I think that before long you may be all freed men indeed."

"Hol on er minit," the negro answered.

"I has got ernuff o'dese yere fa'r 'lections. Fur er laung time I thought I gwine be er justice o' de peace sho, when er fa'r 'lection wuz hil, an' I prayed fur dat ar time But I doan do it no mo'."

"Why so?"

"Wall, sah, we had er fa'r 'lection an de rascals beat me wus'n eber befo'."

"But how do you know the election was fair?"

"How I know it? I jest knows it, dats how. W'y, we had ever'thing fixed jest ez we wanted it, an' we stuffed de box faires' sorter way, an' had de votes counted ter suit ouse'fs, but da beat us."

"How do you account for it?"

"Counts fur it in de fack dat we didn't hab votes ernuff, dat's how. We has been doin' er great deal o' howlin' an' all dat, but it ain't no use. Dar ain't but one way ter fix dis yere 'lection business."

"By passing the Lodge bill, I suppose."

"I doan know nothin' 'bout no bill, but I does know dat it ain't gwine do no good."

"Then how can the situation be improved?"

"By not lettin' deze yere Dimocrats vote, sah, dat's how."

"But we can't keep them from voting."

"Wall, den, ef dat's de case, dar ain't no hope. I's tired o' runnin fur office an' not gittin' dar, an' I wantar say ter de guberment dat lessen it stops dese white folks from votin', w'y dar ain't no chance fur me. I mout jest ez well go ter work an' be done wid de whole bus'ness."

The firemen did a good piece of work when they re-elected all the grand officers at their last convention. They are grand officers in every sense of the word. Hanahan is a good, honest and conscientious man. Sargent distinguished himself during the New York Central strike, and as for Debs, just read his magazine. No organization stands better before the public to-day than the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen. They have had but few strikes in the past and when they have struck they have had the sympathy of the public in most cases. Labor organizations should not be judged by the number of strikes they have won, but by the number of strikes they have avoided. What organized labor wants is a decrease in the number of labor leaders who never labor and then strikes will decrease.—Western Railway.

The Reason Why.

"When I was at the party,"
 Said Betty (aged just four),
 "A little girl fell off her chair,
 Right down upon the floor;
 And all the other little girls
 Began to laugh, but me—
 I didn't laugh a single bit,"
 Said Betty, seriously.
 "Why not?" her mother asked her,
 Full of delight to find
 That Betty—bless her little heart!—
 Had been so sweetly kind.
 "Why didn't you laugh darling?
 Or don't you like to tell?"
 "I didn't laugh" said Betty,
 "'Cause it was me that fell!"

Mr. and Mrs. Bowser.

BY MRS. BOWSER.

Mr. Bowser came home the other day and wanted the hammer for something. He found it in the kitchen, where the girl had been using it as a poker for the range. Mr. Bowser gave expression to his outraged feelings. The girl replied with a good deal of spirit, and after supper she got her wages and walked off. Had I been the cause of her going Mr. Bowser would have read me a lesson forty rods long. As he was the cause it was all right. He'd like to see the hired girl who could run his house while he lived—didn't propose to take "sass" from anybody—wished he had discharged her outright, etc.

All this happened on Monday. Tuesday is our wash-day. I didn't think of it until after the girl had gone. Then I said to Mr. Bowser:

"You'll have to hunt around in the morning and get me a washwoman. It would have been better to let the girl stay a day longer."

"Not a minute longer."

"But about the washing?"

"I'll find a woman or do it myself."

After breakfast he took a walk through the locality where washwomen abound, but his quest was a vain one. He came back to the house about nine o'clock and said:

"Mrs. Bowser, I have decided to do the washing myself."

"You wash?"

"I will. I'll do it as a matter of principle. I don't propose to have this house upset because one hired girl gets her back up and quits."

"Let the washing go and I'll find a woman to do it."

"Not by a jugfull! That washing will all be on the line before noon!"

"Mr. Bowser, you can't wash; you will only rub the skin off your knuckles, lame your back and make a great muss of it."

"I will, eh? That's all you know about it! Now, then, I don't want you to come fooling around. Don't you show your head in the basement until the last rag is on the line."

Mr. Bowser got into an old pair of pants and a vest, changed his boots for slippers, and disappeared down stairs and at once started a fire. I knew what the result of his efforts would be, and while he was at the barn for wood, I ran down and rescued most of the fine clothes. He didn't notice the fact, and in a few minutes had the water heating. He had seen clothes boiling, and the water was no sooner hot than he filled the boiler belterskelter. I heard him at it, and started down stairs to tell him that clothes must be rubbed first.

"Go right back!" he yelled, as I struck the first stair.

"But you are making a great mistake, Mr. Bowser; you shouldn't—"

"I know my business, and you go back! If I don't know more about washing in one minute than you do in a week, I'll eat these sheets and tablecloths!"

He boiled the clothes about half an hour, and then came up and rummaged around the pantry. I suppose he had read of some substance to put in the boiler to save rubbing, but he wasn't clear as to what it was. He therefore took a half-pound can of baking powder and sifted it in to the last pinch. I heard him up stairs, and half suspecting what he was after, ran to head him off, but too late.

"Mr. Bowser!" I called from the head of the basement stairs, "are you putting that sal-soda into the boiler?"

"Sal—nonsense!" he growled in reply. "When I don't know my business I will apply for information!"

Mr. Bowser knew that bluing was part and parcel of the laundry business. He had even seen a tub of blue water. At what stage of the game this blue business came in he didn't know, and he was too obstinate to inquire. He took the clothes direct from the boiler and sozzled them into a tub of cold water, and, not knowing how much of the blue to use, he decided to empty in the whole bottle and be on the safe side. He had a pretty fair quality of writing fluid when the water was stirred up. At this point I called to him:

"Mr. Bowser, how far along have you got?"

"Don't you worry about me, Mrs. Bowser. I'll have the whole shooting match on the line in half an hour."

He put the wash-board into the blue tub and began to rub the clothes in the cold water. He might have had a faint suspicion that something had been left off the program, but he made up for it in energetic rubbing. He went wash! wash! wash! for about twenty minutes, and then there was an awful flopping and splattering, as if a dozen ducks were playing in the water. He was rinsing the clothes. He wasn't over five minutes about it, and then he appeared in the back yard with a basket full of clothes to hang on the line. At sight of him I had to sit down. The clothes were plum-blue, and Mr. Bowser was plum-bluer. "The Great and Only Tattooed Man" couldn't hold a candle to him. Just as he appeared in the yard a farmer's wife, who sells us eggs, opened the back gate and walked in.

"Good Lor', but what is this?" she ejaculated as she stood with open mouth.

"It's only me," replied Mr. Bowser; "I've been washing."

"Washing what? Why man you've spoiled everything there, to the last dud! Is your wife sick, dead or run off?"

"Aren't these clothes right?"

"Man! Man! but even a heathen would know better."

Just then one of Mr. Bowser's down town friends drove through the alley in a buggy. He could see over the fence, and when he saw Mr. Bowser he pulled up his horse so quickly that the animal almost fell.

"Is that you, Bowser?" he called.

"Y-yes."

"Well, what in the name of past ages are you doing?"

"Oh, n-nothing."

"Nothing! I'll bet ten to one you're fitting yourself for a museum freak. Say, old man, you have hit it! Just file your teeth to a point and you'll pass for a genuine cannibal!"

He drove on and the egg woman backed out of the gate and said:

"I've been furnishing you three dozen a week, and I've never missed a Tuesday, but I give you notice that I don't come no more. It would be taking chances. A man as is light in the head may be all right one day and werry violent the next. Love to your excellent wife, and I'm sorry for her."

Mr. Bowser entered the kitchen in three jumps. I sat there laughing until I could hardly breathe. He towered above me like a mountain over a mouse, and after choking and gasping for a minute he roared out:

"Mrs. Bowser, you have finally done it, haven't you?"

"What have I done?"

"What have you done! Got me to do the washing and give myself away for an infernal idiot! Look at me! Look at them duds in the yard!"

"Mr. Bowser, didn't I tell you not to try it? Didn't I do my best to keep you from trying it?"

"No! Never! You encouraged me to go ahead!"

"Mr. Bowser!"

"Don't Mr. Bowser me! This is the end of it! The worm turns! We'll settle matters this very day!"

But Mr. Bowser is still with me, and I have no doubt we shall live and die together.—Detroit Free Press.

The Widow's Might.

HOW A WAGER AT A SUMMER RESORT WAS LOST AND WON.

I was warned to beware of that widow. One might have thought to hear people talk, that she carried poison on her lips and that her embrace was as deadly as that of a boa constrictor! To tell the truth, I expected to see a ravishing queenly beauty, with a command in her eyes and manner that I should have to fight hard to disobey.

As I climbed down out of the stage coach that carried me from the station, I scanned the piazza furtively for a sight of her, but she was seemingly not visible. In the dining room I again sent my eyes on a search but without result, save to see, sitting in one corner over by the window, a tall, slender, willowy girl, with marvelous brown eyes and a great mass of gold-brown hair, who, I observed, was gazing at me. The widow, however, I could not detect. I fancied she must have gone to town, not to return until a late train.

After dinner I strolled up and down the piazza, where most of the guests were seated gazing at the sunset

As I passed in the rear of one of the scattered chairs the occupant dropped her handkerchief. I stooped, picked it up, and returned it to her.

She looked her thankfulness out of a pair of great brown eyes, while a smile, which I must have mistaken for one of recognition, curved her ripe lips, for without any further invitation I sat down near her, and the next moment we were in conversation.

"Oh, do tell me," I said presently, "where is the widow? I've heard so much about her, and the last word of advice given me by the boys at the club was to beware of her."

"The widow!" returned the beauty with a merry laugh. "Oh! yes; to be sure. Oh! you will have to be careful. She will have you on your knees before her within twelve hours from the time you meet her."

I laughed at the thought.

"Ridiculous!" I exclaimed. "You will pardon my laughing, I know, but the idea struck me ludicrously. I have never bent the knee yet, and I doubt if there is a woman in the world" (here I paid her a pretty compliment) "that could bring me to that position."

The beautiful creature took my compliment, seemingly, as a matter of course.

"Do not be too confident," she said. "Would you like to make a wager?"

"A wager!" I replied. "I should be delighted. Let it be a bottle of champagne, to be drunk tete-a-tete."

"With all my heart," she responded.

And with the bet thoroughly understood, the conversation drifted to generalities, the scenery and other matters.

"Look!" I suddenly exclaimed, "the sun is drooping behind that cloud. Isn't the effect glorious? I am sure the final exit, though will be spoiled by that clump of trees here to the left of us."

"If you would really like to see the rest of the finale," she returned, "I can take you to a place that corresponds to a front seat in the parquet."

"I should like it of all things," I replied, and almost before I have spoken we were hastening along the road, up a wooden pathway to the top of a hill which lies just to the back of the house.

"We shall have to make haste," she said, rushing on ahead, "or we will miss it."

We do not make haste, but, notwithstanding our efforts, we are not a minute too soon. We have scarcely reached the summit of the knoll—for that is about all it is—ere the sun's smallest upper segment sinks out of sight, leaving all the west bathed in a rosy glow.

My friend—I have not yet learned her name—is quite out of breath with running.

"Oh, do let us rest," she says, "Here is the most delightful arbor of boughs, carpeted with turf, that you could possibly imagine. Let us sit down and watch the sky change color."

She certainly was very delicious. The pink lawn gown that she wore suited her demi-blond complexion to a nicety, and the exertion of run had given her cheeks a glow that was simply maddening.

Together we sank down on the grassy half inclosure that she pointed out, and while the horizon gradually shaded from the most gorgeous golden pink into a luminous purple tint and then into a rapidly deepening grey, we chattered on, altogether heedless of the approaching darkness and the absence of a chaperon for my companion.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" she suddenly exclaimed. "You are so entertaining, I really forgot that it was growing dark. We must get back to the hotel, or everybody will be saying the most wicked things about us."

I arose and assisted her to her feet, and we started back. Suddenly she stopped short.

"How very annoying," she said, "I'm so sorry, for we ought really to be back; but, do you know, I've lost a turquoise ring that papa gave me last birthday. It must have slipped from my finger in the arbour."

"We must find it by all means," I returned; "it will not take long, surely. 'Let us hurry back.'"

How quickly the night falls! With every second the black curtain seemed to be drawing more closely about us. When we left the bower everything was clearly discernable, now we could scarcely pick our way.

"Haven't you some matches?" asked the lady.

"Fortunately, I have," I replied, as I drew forth my matchbox.

I struck a light. It flickered and went out.

"Look over the ground for it," she suggested. "Strike another match, and inside the bower, the wind will not blow so."

Together we re-entered our former resting place. Stooping down I struck another match, the flame of which I carefully shielded with my hands.

"There!" she suddenly exclaimed; look there. Isn't that it?"

I knelt down and carried the light in the direction she indicated; she was just in front of me.

Then the rippling laughter rather startled me. "You have lost," I heard her saying. "You have lost. Here is the ring," and she held up her finger with the turquoise-set circlet upon it; "but the champagne you must pay for."

"The champagne!" I repeat in surprise, still on my knees before her; "the champagne! I——"

"Of course," she laughs; "you never suspected it for a minute, did you? I am the widow."

A Popular Authoress.

Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger, who was at Newport as the guest of Mrs. Paran Stevens, has returned to her country place on Long Island and will probably not be in town until the beginning of the opera season, late in November. The new book entitled "A Diplomat's Diary," which was put forward a short time ago as the work of a mythical Julien Gordon, says the New York World, was written, it seems, by this charming and accomplished woman. "A Diplomat's Diary" may be described as the literary sensation of the hour. The counters of the two or three book stores at Newport are piled with the dainty white and gold volumes, and the sale, not only at Newport but in New York, has been almost unprecedented. Mrs. Cruger has for a long time been regarded as the most stylish woman in New York. She is a brunette, with dark eyes and clearly cut features, and her tall and striking figure is always effectively gowned. Last year she came forward more prominently in New York society than ever before.

Mrs. Cruger, by the way, is the author of the story now current in the Cosmopolitan Magazine and entitled "A Successful Man." Further interesting information in this direction is to the effect that Mrs. Cruger will spend her time at her Long Island place between now and the beginning of the Winter season finishing a novel which she has had on the way for some time and which it is expected will be an extremely interesting study of social life. She is either a niece or a grandniece of Washington Irving and developed at a very early age a good deal of literary talent. Some of the most brilliant bons mots with which society has become familiar during the past few years are those of Mrs. Cruger. It was she who invented that peculiarly happy phrase "the little brothers of the rich" to describe the accommodating gentlemen who are in the habit of travelling around the world on Willie K. Vanderbilt's yacht and helping him pass the time by playing cards with him. That celebrated phrase is only about a year old, and was uttered by Mrs. Cruger during a visit to Mr. Vanderbilt's yacht while it was lying in Newport Harbor during the summer of 1889.

The Olden Spell.

Written for THE CONDUCTOR by Miss Ada F. Cobb, thirteen years of age.

I am sitting in the school house
On a cool September day,
And the cool mild winds are blowing
As the birds went on their way.

As I, sitting there in silence,
Lone and lonesome do I feel;
Hark! I hear a step approaching
How quietly he tries to steal.

Though I recognize the figure,
One I have not seen for years,
My heart, I fear I know not what,
My eyes are dim with tears.

Once again, O, love, I meet thee
And I feel the olden spell,
Memory breathes around me perfume
That I used to love so well.

Perfume of the sweetest flowers,
Coming back through many years.
With the fragrance turned to whispers,
And the dew drops turned to tears.

In the olden days I loved thee,
Then each word, each thought of thine,
Made my heart to thrill and quiver,
With a rapture half divine.

But we parted, I was happy,
I am sad for we have met,
Wafts of perfume brings before me
Days I cannot now forget.

Tuberose breathe their meaning,
When they thou givest me;
Fragrant flower send forth thy whisper,
All is dead twixt me and thee.

All is dead but still I love thee,
Come again thou dreamy spell,
With the perfume of the flowers
That I used to love so well.

The Private School an Important Factor in National Education.

Every state in the Union has been generous to the public schools—munificent individuals have built and endowed with lavish hands universities and colleges for young men, and within the last two decades woman has had doled out to her, with great reluctance, with much reserve, and many misgivings, some of the crumbs which fall from the tables of the great universities. And four colleges, exclusively for women, have been built and generously endowed.

The question as to her capacity to receive this blessing is not yet decided, and the fear that it will subvert the purposes of nature and unfit her for the functions of domestic life is finding nervous and inchorent expression in the periodical literature and after-dinner speeches of the day. Meanwhile there is a great and powerful arm of the educational force of this country which has no literature, no written history, which is seldom referred to by periodical, scientist, or the orator of the day, except in some flippant allusion to point a moral or adorn a tale—this is the "Private School for Girls."

For two hundred years this institution has held a dignified and responsible place in the educational and social system of this country. To this the American woman, such as she has been in times past, and such as we find her to-day, owes the character, the culture, the grace, and the embellishments which enable her to take her stand, not blushing for her ignorance or her stupidity, side by side with the cultivated and representative woman of other countries.

It has no favor from the state. Being private property, it cannot hold endowments; it has paid its own taxes and supported itself. European educators have marvelled that American writers should leave the world to learn by accident that American ladies were not all educated in their famous public schools. The French Commissioner of Education to the Centennial Exhibition, whom I afterwards met, could not forgive the committee which waited on him in New York that it had not afforded him an opportunity to visit the schools in which the accomplished women whom he had met in this country were trained.—From "The Private School for Girls," by MRS. SYLVANUS REED, in October Scribner.

Young as Ever.

In entering the ministry, genial "Bob" Burdette has not lost his sense of the humorous, as evinced by his description of one of the sisters:

There's a sister I often meet in my travels. She is the good sister who "feels just as young as ever she was." She's a kittenish thing, yet she'd be a little more kittenish if she was less elephantine. Frisky old girl, how she does love to climb into the swing at the picnic! Weighs two hundred and fifteen and makes the swing crack like a hoisting tackle. "Higher, Mr. Thinshanks! Higher! Oh, higher! You can't frighten me! I'm not one of the scary sort of girls." You bet she isn't. Has six children, and if you'll mistake her for her eldest daughter—a sweet, slender girl, with an oval face, spirituelle expression, and figure as graceful as a swaying lilly—she'll ask you to dinner for a week. Plays "Pussy wants a corner" and "Hunt the slipper." Loves to "teeter."

With an eighteen-foot board you have to pull all but about thirty inches over to your side of the trestle to make it balance. When the board is balanced right in the middle, she can fire the whole young men's bible class up into the air as though they had been fired from a catapult. When her end of the board bangs down on the ground it jars all the buds off the trees. Fond of mountain climbing. Usually fastens on to a young man to drag her up. Older brethren too wary. They dragged her up hills when she was younger. Beside, the old youngsters retain their old-time prejudice in favor of younger girls. They help her daughter up. Man never mistakes mother for daughter going up mountain. Apt to make that mistake about luncheon-time only. Oh, we know the old-elderly—that is, middle-aged woman who is the youngest of the lot! And, knowing her, we fly from her, that is, as well as a man—who has long since shed his wings and raised a few achers of corns—can fly.

* The Little Grave.

But few hearts are so hard that the sight of a little grave will not touch them and a prison keeper in the Atlanta Constitution tells a pathetic story:

"I have just returned from inspecting the convict camps, and during my trip I met with an incident which has impressed itself deeply on my mind. I was traveling along the line of the Columbus Southern Railroad in Terrell county, which is being constructed by the convicts, when my attention was attracted by a little grave.

"There is nothing but pine woods down there, and the great trees stood like sentinels about the little sleeper. A marble slab at the head of the grave bore no name and only the inscription: 'Mark the grave of your loved one.' This one small grave, left there by the roadside in the stillness of the great forest, seemed strange to me, especially as it appeared well kept, and I knew that no one lived within fifteen miles of the spot.

"When I reached the next town I made inquiries about the child's grave, and learned that years ago a white family who were making their way to Florida camped on that spot, and during the night their little baby died. They buried it there, and left only a little mound to mark the spot where a mother's heart had been broken.

"Year after year, when the men came to mend the road, the little grave was remembered, and it was cared for and banked up. At last, three years ago, a gentleman who passed by was told the story, and it was he who placed the marble stone above the dust of the little stranger."

The World of Dreams.

We dream of worlds that are fairer than this,
Of homes that are brighter, far
Above all clouds, where immortal bliss
Is morning and evening star.

The distant hills wear a softer green,
In the sunlight's faceless ray,
And, blessing the richer vales between,
Flow rivers of life away.

Our fancied heavens are paved with gold,
Our temples among the stars
Are stainless, as in the days of old,
Before life's failures and scars,

But every morning before my eyes,
The rays of the dawn are fine
As in the immortal days or skies
Can break from the womb of time.

And would we but wreath with faithful deeds
The hours as they come and go,
For wrecks of homes and the cant of creeds,
Would arise love's overflow.

The world's from rising to setting sun,
A beautiful world to me;
Its flowers perfect, its rivers run
Through light to love's shoreless sea.

Securing "A Pleasant Expression."

It is an easy thing to laugh when there is something to laugh at. But when nothing funny has happened, laugh to order is a very different matter. The other day a certain German gentleman urged an amateur to photograph his two children when they were laughing. On a certain afternoon the amateur came with his camera, but on hunting up the children it was discovered that while the little girl was quite willing to smile, the boy was in a very bad humor. In fact the boy had just been punished by his father, and when he was asked to laugh never felt less humorous in his life. But the camera was there and the father was set upon having the performance proceed. He repeatedly urged the boy, whose mouth did not get beyond a slight twitching at the corners. Then, becoming exasperated, the father shook his finger and exclaimed, "You laugh now, or I vip you again!" And under this awful persuasion the boy made a heroic effort.—From "Through a Detective Camera," by ALEXANDER BLACK, in St. Nicholas for October.

A Texas girl has this year made a bale of cotton, "which," we are told, "she proposes to devote to her dress." That quantity of cotton will give the whole business away.

The Force of Numbers.

When several persons combine in an effort to obtain desired privileges they are usually successful. There lies great virtues in numbers. Elsie, a little New England girl, was delighted with the prospect of a trip to California, and it never occurred to her that her twelve dolls were not to go also.

"Tell me where they're to be packed, mamma," she said, "and I'll put them in. They mustn't be rumpled and tumbled."

"Elsie, dear," said mamma, regretfully but firmly, "I really can't allow you to take all that set of dolls. You may have two, any two you like, but there I draw the line. Twelve dolls are quite unnecessary."

Elsie made no reply, but went quietly on, altering a skirt for lady Ethelinda, the prettiest one of the waxen and china-faced family.

Later in the day, when her mother entered the room devoted to packing, she saw a curious sight, supported against a trunk sat a row of dolls, in traveling costume, as far as they could manage such, and above their heads was pinned a large placard bearing the words:

"We are waiting to be packed."

What mother could resist the united appeal of a dozen dolls? Not this one, and to California the twelve went.—Youth's Companion.

Little Flossie Yorick is six years old.

"Mamma," she said the other day, "if I get married will I have a husband like pa?"

"Yes, my dear," replied her amused parent.

"And if I don't get married, I suppose I'll have to be an old maid, like Aunt Kate?"

"Yes, love."

"Mamma," said Flossie, after a pause, "It's rather a rough world for us women, aint it?"

Natural.—Mrs. Jinks—Oh, Thomas, Thomas, what shall we do with our daughter? I heard her talking to herself in her room, just now, while she was dressing, and she said d-d-damn, twice!

Mr. Jinks.—Let's see. She has begun wearing boiled shirts, like a man's, lately, hasn't she?

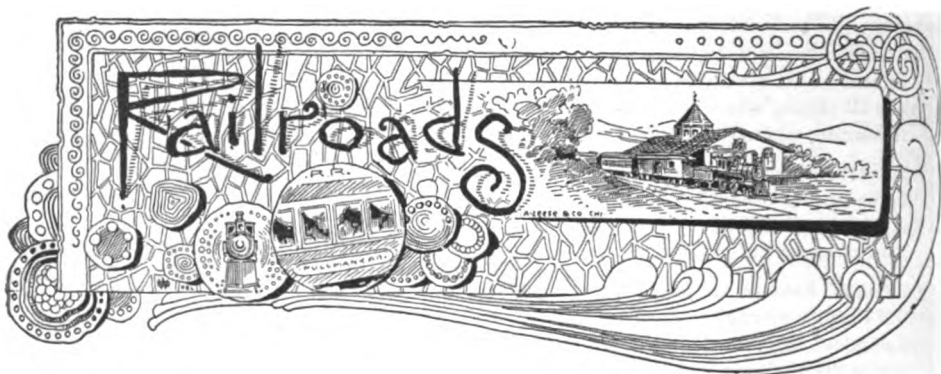

Mrs. Jinks.—Yes; but what has—?

Mr. Jinks.—She probably lost her collar button down the back of her neck.—Lawrence American.

The Fly in the Ointment.—"Ya-as," said the Anglomaniac, "the Fahls of Niagawa would be truly gwand, don't you know, but for one dwaw-back."

"What is that?"

Agreement

BETWEEN THE SAN ANTONIO AND ARANSAS PASS R.
R. COMPANY AND THE CONDUCTORS EM-PLOYED BY SAID COMPANY.

We, the undersigned, representing, and in behalf of the above named Railway and the Conductors employed upon the same, do hereby promise and agree to recognize in good faith, and adhere strictly to each and all terms and conditions set forth in the following contract or agreement:

ARTICLE I.

No Conductor shall be discharged or suspended without sufficient cause, and in case a conductor believes his discharge to have been unjust, he shall make a written statement of the facts in the premises and submit it to the Superintendent of Transportation, and at the same time designate any other conductor who may be in the employ of the company at the same time, who, together with the General Superintendent, shall investigate the case in question without unnecessary delay and give a prompt decision, and in case the aforesaid discharge or suspension is decided to have been unjust, he shall be re-instated and paid full time for all time he has lost on such account. This decision to be final.

ARTICLE II.

No Conductor shall be called more than one hour before leaving time of the train he is to take out.

The Company, when necessary, will provide a caller with a book, in which the Conductors will register.

Conductors' time will begin one hour after being called, and the authority for computing delay will be the caller's book and the register at the other end of the run.

Time of Conductors on regular runs begins at schedule leaving time.

ARTICLE III.

All Freight Conductors other than those in charge of local freight, to be paid three (3) cents per mile, one hundred miles or less to constitute a day's work at three ($3.00) dollars per day. All over 100 miles to be paid three (3) cents per mile.

Ten hours shall constitute a day's work in all freight service for a hundred miles or less.

A delay of fifty-nine minutes not to be counted.

A delay of one hour shall be considered one hour.

Conductors in freight service shall receive thirty (30) cents per hour for all delays over fifty-nine (59) minutes including the first hour over time.

Conductors delayed loading stock or switching other than local freights, when delayed one or more hours, to receive one or more hours at thirty cents per hour.

ARTICLE IV.

Local Freight Conductors shall be paid on the following schedule, between the following terminal stations:

San Antonio and Corpus Christi, $90.00 per month. Three crews on the run.

Wallis and Kennedy, $90.00 per month. Three crews on the run.

Yoakum and Lexington, $90.00 per month.

Yoakum and Lockhart, $90.00 per month.

Twenty-six calendar days to constitute a month's work.

ARTICLE V.

Passenger Conductors to receive $100 per calendar month.

A Conductor taken from his regular run and placed on a passenger special or pay train, shall be paid the same wages as passenger conductors, and if in running said train he makes less time than he would have made on his regular run, he shall be reimbursed for said loss.

ARTICLE VI.

Conductors on Work trains shall be paid the following schedule:

To receive $90.00 per month. Twelve hours or less to constitute a day's work. Twenty-six calendar days to constitute a month's work. All over to be paid at the rate of thirty (30) cents per hour

ARTICLE VII.

Conductors running light as a section of passenger train will receive regular freight mileage.

Conductors dead-heading on Company business shall be paid actual time lost, and when necessary to leave the road on which he is employed, hotel and traveling expenses will be paid. All other dead-heading shall be paid for according to the class of service performed.

ARTICLE VIII.

The right to regular runs shall be governed by seniority and ability to assume increased responsibility, Company reserving the right under all circumstances to select conductors for passenger trains.

ARTICLE IX.

It is agreed by this Company that no fines shall be imposed on any conductor for loss of tools or for damages incurred to rolling stock, or for stock killed or injured; Conductors on their part shall use their best efforts to avoid all accidents, damages or losses.

ARTICLE X.

The Company agrees not to put on more crews than is necessary to move the traffic with promptness and dispatch.

ARTICLE XI.

Conductors shall be notified when time is not allowed as per trip reports.

ARTICLE XII.

All subordinate officers shall be provided with copies of the foregoing contract, and copies shall be kept posted in the several terminal stations or divisions.

ARTICLE XIII.

The company on its part, and the conductors on their part, agree with each other that they will perform the several stipulations and duties required as provided in this agreement until reasonable notice shall be given for a change in same, and the said Company and the said Conductors hereby agree that this contract and agreement shall take effect on September 1st, A. D., 1890.

Clifton Forge to Bell's Valley and return, (regular run)	56 "	2.90
Clifton Forge to Goshorn and return 6 hours or less	46 "	1.45

3rd. Conductors running local freights shall receive $85.00 per month, or on that basis if they work less than a full month, except on the Piedmont District, Richmond Division, where the pay shall be $3.35 per trip; and the Lynchburg and Scottsville run, where the pay shall be $80.00 per month.

4th. Freight Brakeman to receive two-thirds of Conductor's pay, except where it will cause a reduction, in which case the present pay shall govern.

5th. When a crew has served 12 hours, counting one hour after being called, Conductors and Brakemen shall receive 25 and 15 cents respectively per hour, for the time delayed.

6th. When a passenger or freight crew is temporarily assigned to work, excursion, circus or wreck-train service, they shall be paid $3.00 and $2.00 respectively for Conductors and Brakemen; 12 hours or less to constitute a day's work.

7th. Conductors or Brakemen ordered on duty by person in authority, to be ready at a certain time, and the train is not run, shall be paid for the time held on duty at the rate of $3.00 and $2.00 per day respectively, and stand first out.

8th. Conductors and Brakemen attending court shall be allowed $3.00 and $2.00 per day respectively, while absent and $1.00 per day for living expenses; and all necessary railroad or carriage fare shall be paid.

9th. Conductors and Brakemen ordered to deadhead on passenger trains shall be allowed half pay; when deadheading on caboose by order, shall be allowed full pay. Conductors and Brakemen on light trains shall be allowed full pay.

10th. If a Conductor is suspended he will be given a hearing within seven days and will be notified promptly of the result of the investigation; and, if found innocent, will be allowed half pay for the time lost. If he so desires, he may select a Conductor, running on the same District, to be present at the investigation. If he considers the punishment unjust, he will have a right to appeal to the General Superintendent, through the Superintendent, the appeal to be acted upon promptly.

11th. Freight Conductors will, whenever practicable, be assigned to Divisions, and run first in first out in the service to which they are assigned. The right to regular runs and promotion will be governed by merit, ability and seniority. Other things being equal, the conductor who has served the longest on any Division of the road, will have the preference of runs on that Division.

12th. Callers will be provided with books for the men to sign at the hour called and what hour they shall report for duty.

13th. No Conductor will be censured or discharged for serving on this or any other committee.

14th. For runs not provided for in this schedule, when Conductors are on duty 6 hours or less, they will be allowed one-half day, over 6 hours a full day at the through freight rate on the District upon which they run.

15th. In case of difference of opinion as to the construction of this agreement, which may arise between the conductors and Division Officers, a written statement of the question at issue must be submitted by the Conductors to the General Superintendent, through the Superintendent, for his consideration.

All other runs $95 and $75, yardmaster and switchman $95 and $75. No change in wood engines on lines in Oregon.

18. Main line baggagemen to be paid $80 per month.

19. In the column headed "Month's Work," where mileage is not given, it is understood that employes will do the same work they have been performing for the monthly salary. Where mileage is stated, all excess mileage to be paid for pro rata.

20. Where a brakeman acts in the capacity of both brakeman and baggageman and receives compensation from Wells, Fargo & Co., this is a privilege we accord him, as it does not in any way interfere with the duties devolving upon him in train service. We shall make arrangements of this kind as they may arise from time to time on the various divisions.

21. Division Superintendents will make such regulations in relation to yard service as they may deem necessary in defining the work to be performed as between trainmen and switchmen.

22. Trainmen shall be called for duty at divisional terminals, within the limits prescribed by the Division Superintendent, where callers are maintained, by the regular caller, one hour, as near as practicable, before they are required to start their trains. The caller will be provided with a book, giving names of crews and number of train for which crews are wanted; in which trainmen will sign their names and enter the time of call.

23. As extra men for the Los Angeles Divisions are all held at Mojave, employes must report at the Superintendent's Office at Division headquarters when they wish to lay off; unless it may be arranged between the trainmen so that the "dead-head" trip to Los Angeles and return, to relieve trainmen at Los Angeles, shall be made without expense to the company.

24. The local freight work on the Ventura Division will be divided up among and handled by the trains running over that portion of the road between Los Angeles and Sagus, and freight must be handled on the trains as decided upon by the Division Superintendent.

25. As far as practicable trains scheduled on the different divisions, during daylight, will do the way work on their respective divisions; but the Division Superintendent is expected to use his best judgment in these cases.

26. Trainmen running snow-plows, flangers, pile-drivers, construction trains, and all other work trains, six hours or less shall constitute one-half a day's work; over six and under twelve hours, a day's work. This service shall be paid for as follows: Regular train crews assigned temporarily to work train service, shall have their average regular rates of pay. Crews specially employed for work train service shall be paid 10 per cent. less than the regular division freight rate. Any excess over 12 hours to be paid pro rata; computing overtime, fractions less than one-half hour will not be counted; thirty minutes or more will be counted as one hour.

27. All freight train crews, detained on the road, or at terminals, on scheduled trains, will be paid overtime as follows: For any delay less than two hours (late of carded time) nothing; for two hours or more, payment according to the rate of 30 cts. and 20 cts. per hour for conductor and brakemen respectively.

28. When freight train crews are held waiting for stock cars to be cleaned, sanded, loaded or unloaded, they shall receive overtime as follows: 30 cts. and 20 cts. per hour for conductor and brakemen respectively.

29. When a train is abandoned for which a crew has been called, the crew shall be paid 30 cts. for conductors and 20 cts. for brakemen for all time over one hour that the crew may be held between time of calling and notice of abandonment of such train.

30. For turn arounds made in six hours or less, crews shall be allowed one-half time; for six hours and less than twelve hours, full time. For all time over twelve hours, conductors 30 cts. and brakemen 20 cts. per hour. For a turn around in less than six hours, crews shall not lose their turn out.

31. The question of employment shall be left entirely in the hands of Division Superintendents, but no discrimination shall be made against brotherhood or other men.

32. Men or crews "dead heading" over the road on passenger or freight will be allowed 2½ mileage when going over the road with caboose and an engine full time.

33. When men are taken off regular crews, sent out on special or other runs, and when they return are held waiting for their own crews, they shall be paid full time for such time as they are so held.

34. Trainmen will be informed when time is not allowed as per trip report.

35. Trainmen will not be required to coal engines at terminals, excepting on some short branch lines, where the mileage is not excessive and the work is light. In these cases the prevailing custom cannot well be departed from and shall be continued. Also in cases of emergency trainmen may be called upon to coal engines between terminal points and at regular intermediate coal-ing stations.

36. Engines leaving terminal stations will be provided with a full tank of wood. Trainmen will not be required to wood up engines, coming in, or out of terminal stations, excepting during the winter season at Coldstream, where wood will be piled up and wood piler will assist trainmen in loading tank before coming into Truckee.

37. After an employé shall have served sixteen consecutive hours on duty, at his request, he may have at least eight hours' rest, excepting in cases of emergency, such as wrecks, washouts, etc.

38. Crews not assigned to regular runs shall run first in, first out.

39. In ordering freight crews for "dead-head-ing" on any freight train, the first crew will run the train, the next crew will "dead-head." The "dead-head" crew will be the first out ahead of accompanying crew at other terminals.

40. When an employé is detailed to attend court as a witness on the part of the company, he shall be paid for such service at the same rate of pay for actual time absent from duty as he would have received had he been on his regular run or crew or schedule, also all necessary expenses while so employed if away from his home station.

41. It is our policy to promote freight conductors from freight brakemen, passenger conductors from freight conductors, and baggage-masters from passenger brakemen; but we will promote freightmen to the position of baggage-masters if it should be deemed essential to the best interests of the company.

42. In making promotions, Division Superintendents will consider seniority of service; in other words, those longest in service, other things being equal, shall have the preference. When a reduction in force becomes necessary, those retained shall be the ones that have been the longest in service; that is to say as between those equally honest, sober and capable. But "seniority" is not to be made a cover for short comings of any kind, nor shall this rule be construed so as to prevent the company securing the most efficient service that may be obtainable. As we hold each Division Superintendent responsible for the proper performance of all duties devolving upon men working under his supervision, he is in the best position to look after the welfare of the company, and he shall be the judge regarding the respective merits and qualifications of those working under his directions. If any employé feels that an injustice has been done him under this rule, he has the right of appeal to the General or Assistant General Superintendent.

43. Whenever an employé believes he has been unjustly treated, in any way, he shall have the right to present his case personally to his Division Superintendent, with such evidence in his own behalf, as he may have to offer. It shall be the duty of the Division Superintendent to investigate the matter thoroughly, without unnecessary delay, and his decision shall be given to the employé. Should the latter wish to appeal the case to higher authority, upon application the Division Superintendent will give him his decision in writing (excepting in cases involving drunkenness or fraudulent or dishonest action,) which the employé may present, together with his own written statement of his case, to the General or Assistant General Superintendent.

44. When trainmen have been discharged and upon further investigation it is found they have been unjustly dealt with, it shall be left to the judgment of the Division Superintendent to reinstate or re-employ them as the merits of the individual case may seem to demand.

45. The company will continue the practice of blacklisting on its own lines, whenever employés have been discharged for good and sufficient causes, such as dishonesty, dishonorable habits, criminal carelessness, insubordination, drunkenness, violation of rules whereby company's property is endangered or destroyed, and offenses of like character. This blacklist is distributed over our own lines only, as a matter of protection to the interest of the company, and we can say with certainty that this practice works to the advantage of all deserving employés. It is not our purpose to blacklist a man who may be discharged from the service for some minor offense, or because of incompetency for the particular work in which he may be engaged, as in the latter case, such an employé may be very useful in some other capacity.

46. The company will discipline men by fining, suspending or discharging as each particular case may seem to justify.

47. Trainmen leaving the service shall be paid at the earliest practicable moment.

48. The same courtesies in the way of transportation shall be extended to trainmen as are accorded to enginemen.

49. Our practice is to file letters of recommendation with the personal records of employés. When an employé leaves the service such letters shall be returned to him upon application.

50. When an employé may be transferred from one point to another for convenience of company's service it is the policy of the company to transport free the household effects and family of such employé.

51. If in the judgment of a Division Superintendent a conductor can show good cause for the removal of a brakeman working with him, it shall be done.

52. The company reserves the right to govern the movements of its trains under the standard time-card rules.

53. The appointment and dismissal of employés must remain entirely in the hands of the officers of this company.

Glenwood Springs.

Situated in the midst of beautiful mountains and easily accessible by two railroads, which pass through some of the grandest scenery in the world, Glenwood Springs, Colorado, is sure of a leading place among the great health resorts of the world. Its naturally balmy climate is so modified by the exhalations from the hot springs, that grass is green and flowers bloom all winter, and Christmas-day is celebrated by swimming, out of doors. The waters from the Springs are led down into a large oval pool, about one hundred feet in width and five hundred feet long, lined with masonry, and of sufficient depth for comfortable bathing and swimming, which is indulged in all the year round. Upon the bank a luxurious and beautiful bath-house of stone has been built, in which are a large number of private bath-rooms and reception-rooms, with a wide parapet overlooking the swimming pool. Along the hillside are caves, through the floors of which vapors arise, forming natural Turkish baths. The curative properties of the hot salt sulphur waters are recognized very favorably by medical men. The hotel accommodations are excellent, game in the vicinity being abundant; and no detail has been omitted to make the baths comfortable and attractive in every respect. Not the least attractive feature of Glenwood Springs is the route by which they are reached. The Colorado Midland R'y runs via Colorado Springs, Manitou, around the base of Pike's Peak, and up the Ute Pass, through a country abounding in picturesque scenery, which is rapidly filling up with summer resorts and hotels, prominent among which is "The Ute," at Ute Pass Park; after leaving the Pass the road crosses the South Park and skirts the hills which overlook the Buena Vista valley, and command a fine view of the high mountains of the Seguathe range, then up past Leadville and through a most picturesque and wild mountain scenery, crossing the Continental Divide at the Hagerman tunnel, which is over half a mile in length and 11,528 feet above sea level. The view at the western end of the tunnel, is sublime. Five hundred feet down the mountain side, little Loch Ivanhoe sparkles like a jewel. Far in the distance, on every hand, an endless succession of rugged, snow-capped mountain peaks cluster against the sky. As the train winds its tortuous way down the mountain side it suddenly comes upon a desolation of boulders, jagged, forbidding crags, a fit place to be a haunt of demons, well named "Hell Gate;" then on down into the valley, past huge rocks moulded into shapes by the hand of Time, the mighty architect, so that one can scarcely believe that they are not the castles of some gigantic race of mediæval barons, and then through the green valley to the springs, clustered in a little amphitheatre among the hills.

The route by the Denver and Rio Grande Railway is equally wonderful and diversified. Leaving Glenwood it runs down the canon of the Grand River, a typical Rocky Mountain canon, whose sides, rising perpendicular far above the roaring current of the river, at times almost closing like an impenetrable barrier across its path, have been cracked by the frost and worn by the ceaseless rush of waters into fantastic shapes of towers and minarets and frowning battlements. Then, on further, into the open country, past a huge lava bed, the scene of some volcanic battle of prehistoric time, and then on into the peaceful, cultivated valley of the Eagle River District, climbing again up the mountains to the Tennessee Pass, the solemn, white-capped peaks always in view on either hand; catching a glimpse of the mountain of the Holy Cross; then, with many turns, each curve revealing the mountain in a new aspect, over the Divide and down to Leadville, passing, as in review, range after range of beautiful mountains; then, out past Buena Vista, with the Seguathe Range towering above it, and through the wild scenery of Brown's Canon to the busy town of Salida, with its distant cordon of mountains hemming it in. Leaving Salida the road follows the Arkansas River through the great canon of the Arkansas to the chief of Colorado wonders, the Royal Gorge, where the rocks tower in a pinnacle 2,600 feet above the river bed, and so little foothold is given for the roadbed that the track is swung upon beams braced against the opposite sides of the rocky canon. No description can do justice to this awe-inspiring spot. No picture can convey any adequate idea of its massive boldness, or its matchless coloring.

From this point the road follows the river through the ever changing canon, down into the pleasant valley, to the picturesque towns of Canon City, Pueblo and Colorado Springs — Travellers' Official Guide.

The "G. P. A's."

The "Burlington Special," which took a party of one hundred and thirty to the convention of the general passenger agents at Denver, was perfection itself in the way of entertainment. Mr. Eustis did the honors of the occasion in a most thorough manner, combining all those genial qualities which go to make up the perfect host with the executive abilities characteristic of a railroad man. He was ably seconded by Messrs. Francis and Kenyon, and the three were indefatigable in making everybody at ease and in contributing to their enjoyment. The train consisted of sleeping cars, an observation car and a dining car, new and bright from the shops. The cuisine and service of the dining car was perfect in every detail. The train left Chicago on Sunday evening, at eight o'clock, and stopped at Omaha for a few hours, where the Board of Trade entertained the party by driving them around that prosperous and handsome city, which is full of elation at the immense growth which the recent census shows it to have attained during the last decade. From Omaha a fast run was made to Lincoln. It was with genuine regret that time would not permit a long enough stay at Lincoln to accept an invitation from the citizens of the bustling capital of Nebraska to take a drive about its beautiful streets. A committee of prominent citizens, including Governor Thayer, of Nebraska, and Mayor Graham of Lincoln, met the party at the station, and their invitation to visit Lincoln on the return trip was heartily accepted. The baskets of beautiful flowers left in the cars, made the city of Lincoln at once popular with the ladies of the party. From Lincoln the train made a fast run, and arrived at Denver on the morning of the 16th. No one who enjoyed the hospitality of the "Burlington" on that occasion can forget the perfect manner in which it was extended. — Travelers' Official Guide.

The H. & T. C. Trouble.

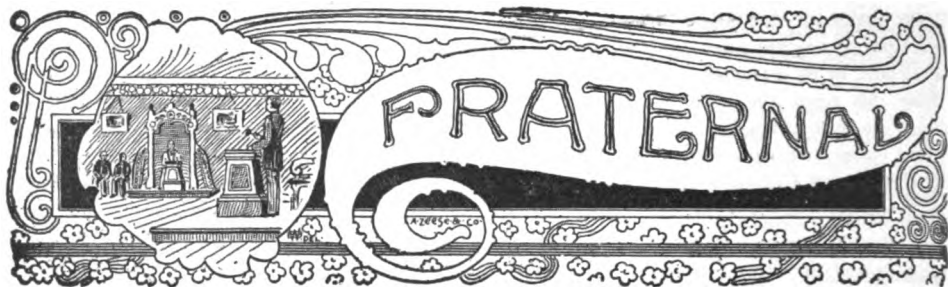

HOUSTON, Tex., Oct. 9.—For the second time in little more than a month the supreme council of the Federation of Railway Employés is engaged in an endeavor to amicably adjust an important railway dispute. Five weeks ago at Terre Haute, and after a prolonged consideration, it adopted a wise and conservative course by declining to order out the men under its control to aid the Knights of Labor in their attack upon the management of the New York Central. To-day the same delegates are assembled here to consider the troubles that have arisen on the Houston and Central Texas road of the Huntington section on account of the action of the company in employing negro switchmen in its yards in this city. The organizations represented are the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Brotherhood of Railroad Conductors, the Order of Railway Trainmen and the Switchman's Mutual Benefit Society. This is the first instance in this country in which the race question has threatened trouble; and it is an interesting fact that not one of the railroad orders in the United States from the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers downwards, accept colored men as members. The trouble in this city is due to the fact that the efforts of the white employés on the road in question to obtain a raise of wages have been thwarted by the colored railroad hands, who are willing to work for very low rates. The issue is one of the most difficult with which the federation has been called upon to deal since it was brought into existence, and its action will be watched with more than ordinary interest, not only by railroad men in general, but by students of the race question everywhere. The colored men have labor organizations of their own in the south, covering the firemen, brakemen and switchmen, and they claim that as the white railway men refuse to take them into their unions, they have a right to work for any scale of wages that their own organizations may approve.

Railroad Men in Politics.

The Nebraska State Journal says that the number of men employed on the railroads of the country by 1,750 companies is now reported by the interstate commission at 703,753. It is a pretty big army of transportation. It is an average of 456 men to every 100 miles of railroad. The proposition, therefore, "that railroad men have no business in politics," is not a very tenable one. They have all the rights of American citizens, and their interests are probably as dear to them as those of other working people.

The Journal adds that in Nebraska there are 5,046 miles of railroad, and this ratio would give, as the total number of men employed in operating the railroads in that state, 23,171. These represent a population of over 100,000 that depend upon rail transportation for subsistence. Next to the farmers of Nebraska the largest class of men engaged in the same general work are the railroad men.

Three Times a Winner.

The third annual excursion, Trenton Division, No. 42, was a grand success, regardless of the fact that it rained almost the entire day. September 25th was the day set for our third attempt to handle all the people that cared to risk their lives on a conductors' excursion, and the people either don't care much for their lives or they have a great deal of confidence in the conductors. I will not attempt to say which, but 640 people followed off the Brass Band just the same.

The train left Trenton 7:30 a. m., 6 coaches and a baggage car, the coaches loaded with people, the baggage car with good things to eat and (ice-water) to drink.

Our first stop was at Hickory Creek, where Bro. Jolliff had persuaded about thirty good looking people to run the gauntlet. Our next stop was at Jamesport, and, say, you ought to have seen that crowd. One old vet. in our party thought the war was not over yet and called loudly for Johnny to get his gun, but I finally told him they were all peaceable people and were going with us on the train. "Train nothing," he says, "there aint room for them that's on now, without taking any more, Samantha is in the coal box now and two dudes sitting on the lid."

We had sent a coach to Jamesport and the ladies of that town had decorated it in great shape in honor of their Band which we had engaged to take with us. At Jackson we took on about twenty-five more of Davis County's best farmers, accompanied by their wives and daughters.

At Wabash Crossing and Gallatin we found a few more. We then had to put up the sign, standing room only. At Cameron we discovered an extra coach, and like Columbus by America, we took possession of it, and after we had filled it so full Bro. Covington was unable to get his portly shape through it we found we were short one more car. About thirty minutes after leaving Cameron it commenced to rain one of those soft, wet, gentle, foggy rains; a rain that will wet through an inch board, and make you think it is going to clear up all the time.

Professor Jackson, of hot sausage fame, was with us, so I asked him for a weather report. After drawing himself up to his full size he imparted the information that the indications were that it would rain till it stopped.

We then and there made up our minds to have a good time and live up to our program as near as possible. We arrived in Leavenworth 12:15, p. m. After giving our own and Jamesport's Bands a chance to blow some of the fog out of their horns we started for the Soldiers' Home. We headed a procession with the Trenton Band in the lead Jamesport in the rear and marched to the main building. Regardless of the rain the soldiers turned out in great shape to see us. We were comfortably housed in the Home Opera House and listened to some of the best music from the Home Band that we have heard for many a day. After a short visit to the Home grounds we returned to the city, where those who had baskets with them proceeded to fill up, while those without a lunch, some 160 in number, were being looked after by the Gacomini brothers at the Delmonico Hotel.

After dinner we took our train to the Fort, where a good portion of our people took in the sights, rain or no rain. I told the girls not to be afraid of a little mud, that I had to wash the next day, they could send their clothes over, it would be all right. At six o'clock we went back to the city, where we allowed our people time to get their supper, after which the two bands turned themselves loose for thirty minutes and when Leavenworth gets as good a free concert again I would like to hear from them. To say they did good work is putting it mild. As to which is the best band I am not the one to say, for I am partial to our boys for they are my people, but if there was any flies on Jamesport I was unable to see them. We started for home at 7:30 p. m., arriving at 12:30 a. m., everybody good humored and good natured. The rain was a big disappointment, but the Conductor who has charge of such matters, knows what is best, the bell-cord to His train is too high for us to hang our coat on just yet and

His silver punch never cancels the wrong ticket. Twice before has He honored us with the light from His golden lamp and let us hope that our next excursion will be in the sunshine of His beautiful smiles.

NOTES.

Supt. Ewing and train-master Tinsman could not resist the temptation to go with the boys. Scott of course had business in Leavenworth, but C. L. E. just went on purpose to tell Bro. Jalliff and myself that story about the New York Limited. You are all right, Loss, I am going East myself next summer, (to Tindall.) Master Machinist Gesler's good looking face showed up in time to catch the train. You are just the kind of people we are looking for, William, don't forget to come again.

Brother Covington had charge of the train and handled it like an old timer.

Our old favorite Johnny Simmons pulled the train and I don't believe he was off his seat box thirty minutes all day. He is just the man for the place and I believe if every man in 42 was asked to name their choice of an engineer, Johnny would get them all.

Brother Jolliff missed a wedding by going to Leavenworth the day before to make arrangements, but never mind Will, I ate enough for both of us. Ask Mrs. Jolliff if I didn't.

Brother Stone was unable to go this year; of course, someone has to work. Mrs. S. was with us and we saw she was taken care of.

Our old-timer, Brother Reed, was along, but being out of the railway business could not run the train. We appointed him Master of Ceremonies at the Soldiers' Home, and that old familiar, all-aboard, carried many of us back to years gone by.

Mr. Phillibust, our highly respected agent at Jamesport, is a rustler from away back. He sold 140 tickets from his station, got a lay off, took his wife and went with us. Phil you are my people and when they appoint me General Manager, well, I won't say what I will do, but come and see me, sure.

Dan Mathews and Felix Belisle were out in shape. Say Felix, how about your introducing Dan to some of the Post-office clerks as the Governor of Missouri, Dan says it was a mistake and don't want me to say anything about it to his wife.

Prof. Jackson says that he is bound to have peace if he has to kill some one to have it. Can't blame you Professor, you are one of the Brotherhood, see.

George Amick had his best girl with him, and they were one of the best looking couples on the train. George is a great curve pitcher, that is the reason he can get such a curve on his mustache.

THEO. HEWES.

ATLANTA, Ga., Oct. 2, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR:—With your permission I desire to monopolize a small space in the valuable CONDUCTOR, and I hope it will be for the good of the Order, which I am happy to believe is, at the present time, in a more flourishing condition in a general way than ever before in its existence—except one of the most important departments which I regret to say is not keeping pace with the grand progress and onward march of our noble Order, namely, the Insurance Department; and the question presents itself, Why is this so?

When we look at it we are constrained to believe this of itself should be an incentive to cause every conductor to join himself to the Order of Railway Conductors; and again I ask, why is this so? Speak out, my Brother! Is it because you have no loved ones who anxiously watch for your well known footsteps; no one who on bended knee implores divine protection over you through the dark dismal and stormy night when you are out on your run in the discharge of duty, or is it because you have already made ample provision for them. Let me say—yes, let me implore you, if you have loved ones who are dependent upon you and you have not made ample preparation for them, do not kiss the good-byes for the purpose of starting through gloom and uncertain storms, washouts and other accidents which may cause you to be brought home to them a lifeless lump of clay, until you have done so. This is a solemn duty every man owes to his family; and then think how easy it is for you, my brothers, to place them beyond the tortures of misery and want by taking advantage of our cheap Insurance Department, which for the risk there is no cheaper insurance to be found in this broad land; and then, where is to be found a plausible excuse for the present condition of the Insurance Department. Just think of it, my Brothers! Since the meeting of the Grand Division at Rochester our members in the Order has increased marvelously, and why not in the Beneficiary Department? Now I would be pleased to hear a full expression of opinions from our clear headed brethren as to what, in their opinion, is the cause of this lack of interest upon the part of so many of our thousands of members, and if it is costing too much for the amount insured. I ask you, one and all, who think so, to give us the benefit of some wise suggestions whereby it can be reduced so as to enable all our members to seek its protection. I believe that the law on total disability claims should be so changed at the next meeting of the Grand Division so as to read, "whenever a member becomes totally disabled from following his avocation as Conductor he should have the benefit of his insurance. A large number of our insured members believe that to be the law when they join the insurance. But such is not the case. So long as a man is able to sell peanuts on the street he is not considered totally disabled from following any avocation.

Now, my reason for desiring this change in the disability clause is this: Take, for instance, the majority of conductors commencing their avocation young in life and many of them grown gray in the service. I ask, what do they know about any other business? Almost invariably make a failure from incompetency, and dissatisfied condition of the mind as a result.

Now, in conclusion, I ask a free and full expression of opinion and an exchange of ideas as to our needs in the Insurance Department that it may build up and be what it is justly entitled to, the best beneficiary association in existence.

Before closing, I desire to mention our Union meeting, which has already been sent out through circular to all divisions. This meeting bids fair to be one of the most important ever held in this part of the country, and among the various subjects to be discussed I hope the delegates will be prepared to say something to advance the interest of the Insurance Department. We have an interesting program arranged for the 25th and 26th that does not show on our circular, and in behalf of Atlanta Division No. 180 permit me to extend a hearty invitation to one and all with your families to meet with us on Sunday, Oct. 26, but be here on Saturday, the 25th, if possible.

Yours truly in P. F.,

J. H. LATIMER.

OSAWATOMIE, Kan., Sept. 12, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BRO:—Having been lately assigned a through run with duties of correspondent to THE CONDUCTOR, I desire to introduce through its columns Osawatomie Div. 137, organized Sunday, Aug. 31, by our worthy grand organizer, Bro. Garrettson. The regular runs have all been assigned to the following old land marks, who will never fail to take them in on time, rain or shine: T. E. Young, C. C.; O. P. Miller, A. C. C.; A. J. Scow, S. and T.; A. C. Hamlet, Sr. C.; E. A. Smith, Jr. C.; P. Lanahan, I. S.; F. C. Gow, O. S.

The first regular meeting was held Monday evening Sept. 8th, at which time every officer was at his station. The new division has bright prospects for the future. Several petitions were presented, and a number of Brothers have expressed their intention of joining by transfer card, which, with the new material in sight, will make it a strong and healthy division.

Our worthy chief conductor is the right man in the right place; he sounds the gavel promptly at the opening hour, and by this method of doing business all know that business will be transacted specifically and compactly. In the selection of Bro. Scow for S. & T., the members made a wise choice, as he is a prince of good fellows and a zealous worker, and the financial interests of the division are in good hands. Bro. Ed. Smith, who will officiate as junior conductor, is one of the oldest members of the Order, and will fill the important station with credit to himself and pleasure to the entire division.

Hoping this will not be consigned to the waste basket, we will close, promising to look after the best interests of Div. 137 and its members in the future.

Yours truly in P. F.,

F. C. GOW.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Sept. 20, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Enclosed please find a clipping from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of September 19th, which announces the promotion of conductor, A. S. Ostrander, of the N. Y., N. H. & H., to the superintendency of the same road. Now there is nothing startling in the simple announcement of a conductor being promoted to superintendent, but in this case the public is informed that Mr. Ostrander was "for many years the Grand Secretary of the Independent Order of Railroad Conductors." Now, Brother Editor, if this be the case, I as well as thousands of others are away behind the times and in woeful ignorance of the origin and birth of the "I. O. R. C.," and it becomes your duty as one of the great fountain heads of knowledge to enlighten us on this subject. I believe the general impression is, that the great "I. O. R. C." is composed of a few of the fossils who clung to the original O. R. C. purely for purposes of personal aggrandizement, but who became disgusted with the thorough cleaning out and renovating the Order received at Rochester, and like so many vampires they left the body which had supported them in luxurious idleness for years. Like vampires, did I say? I offer an humble apology, for who ever heard of a vampire leaving anything cleansed and purified after its departure? Wheaton and his followers resemble that species of bird only in the fact that they hung on until throttled by their victim and forced to abandon their feast. All this happened in June of the present year.

The next we hear of Wheaton is in connection with the "Independent Order of Railroad Conductors." A new organization which they proudly boast is in no way a labor organization. Then for God's sake, Brother Editor, tell us what it is and what they are organized for, and by the way don't forget to tell us how long they have been organized.

Yours in P. F.,

ED. E. WILLIAMS.

St. Louis Division No. 3.

[The only explanation that we can offer to Bro. Williams is that the results obtained by the I. O. of R. C., and its present magnitude and membership is so great that it would have required "many years" for any other organization to have accomplished the same, and accordingly they estimate their age by these results instead of being tied down by such ordinary trifles as calendar time.—EDITOR.]

SAVANNA, Sept. 26, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I just write to say that I have been notified of the death of Bro. Frank L. Barker of Div. 78, which occurred at Farley, Iowa, Wednesday evening, Sept. 24, by being run over. I enclose notice from the Savanna Journal; also of the death of Bro. John Lyons of Div. 87, who died at Kirkland, Ill., yesterday morning from injuries received about ten days previously, falling from his train at Genoa, Ill., breaking his collar bone, some ribs and receiving some internal injuries. One of his ribs pierced his lung. His body will be taken to-day to Brownsville, Ind., his old home, for burial. Bro. Lyons was about 50 years old, and had been in train service since the close of the war, in which he served with distinction. He leaves a wife and four grown up children. I do not know anything about Bro. Barker's friends. Please mention in THE CONDUCTOR.

Yours in P. F.,

G. W. ASHFORD.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., Sept. 22, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

While reading THE CONDUCTOR No. 15, my attention was most earnestly called to the front picture, "A Picnic," and I looked and laughed at the picture and thought to myself that the person who did the engraving on that picture must have been a brakeman once, for the expressions are so very perfect. The picture carried me back some fifteen or twenty years ago when I was "only a brakeman," then upon the old reliable C. & N. W. R. R.

But that picture, "A Picnic!" Say, boys, how many times I have been upon the top of freight trains setting brakes in just such a snow storm as the author of "A Picnic" has made his picture to show.

And again, in No. 17 of THE CONDUCTOR is the picture of "Hard Luck," which is equally as grand, and the pair, "A Picnic" and "Hard Luck," nicely framed, would add greatly to any collection of pictures, and I know thousands of them could be sold. I want a pair and will give a good price for them, for if such pictures will do me so much good looking at them at my present age what enjoyment and pleasure will they be to us when we are old and feeble.

Now don't let this idea slip by you, but have the pictures made larger and I know the investment will pay well.

Yours in P. F.,

WM. HANSELL.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Sept. 14, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

It is some time since you have heard from this section, but I suppose the reasons are good, as all the Brothers have been very busy in some other avocation. Div. 206 is doing well. Since the last annual meeting we have added new members to our division and have others on the way. Brothers Sheehan and Schmitt both attended the Union meeting at St. Louis, and they report a very successful meeting which was of great benefit to the Order.

Last Sunday was spent at Havana on an excursion given by Lincoln Div. No. 206, and a very pleasant day was spent at Riverside Park by the members, their families and friends. The excursion was a success in every particular.

Brother D. N. Lepper is running Bro. Sheehan's run during the illness of Sheehan, who is down with a heavy fever. Lepper is the last of the Order men that were acting in the capacity of brakeman on the Wabash.

Our regular meeting takes place to-morrow, and we have three candidates to work on and look for some new petitions.

Yours in P. F.,

XIX.

The following resolution was unanimously carried at the Union meeting at Scranton:

Resolved, That we censure and condemn the Reading R. R. Co. for its action against members of the O. R. C. who are in their employ.

JOHN RENCHLER, Sec.

ALAMEDA, October 4th, 1890.

Wm. P. Daniels, Sec. Order Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR:—I wish to acknowledge through THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR the receipt of the elegant engrossed form of resolutions sent to me through you, by the committee recommended by the Order. I appreciate the compliment and feel highly honored and much gratified.

Most respectfully,

Mrs. J. J. LAPPING.

FORREST, Ill., Sept. 28, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: To-day, organized Wabash Division, No. 260, at this place, with twenty (20) charter members, none of whom had ever been members of the Order.

The officers of the division are, C. C., Brother T. C. Broderick, 4455 School street, Chicago, Ill. S. and T., Brother H. Brennan, box 301, Forrest, Ill. They will meet in Masonic hall on the 2nd and 4th Sundays at 2 p. m. The "personnel" of the division is good and the working force in good shape.

Immediately after organization two Brothers were admitted by transfer card, giving them already twenty-two members.

I desire to return thanks to Brother Stuart of 79, Finegan of 74, Garver of 159, Hume of 113, Schmitt of 206, and others, for aid extended in organizing.

The banquet was spread at the depot hotel and full justice was rendered thereto. I enclose charter list and transfer.

I am sincerely in P. F.,
GARRETSON, G. S. C.

GAINESVILLE, Texas, Oct. 5, 1890.

Editor Conductor.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Have just completed the organization of Red River Division, No. 262, at Gainesville, Texas, with 19 charter members all employed on the G. C. & S. F. R'y., out of this place,—good material and more ready to act on.

The C. C. is Brother J. M. Porterfield, and the S. and T., Brother J. B. Conlisk. The address of both is Gainesville, and they meet on first and third Sundays at 8 p. m. in the K. P. Hall.

There are good rustlers on the list and I think they will be heard from in the times to come.

I acknowledge obligation to Brothers Mathews of 217, Loomis of 55, Dain and Kollert of 53 and Benson of 85, for aid given in organization.

Met many old friends of the days when I carried the punch out of here, and had an enjoyable visit.

Sincerely in P. F.,
GARRETSON, G. S. C.

Carrier—Coupon Ticket—Mistake of Conductor.

1. When the wrong coupon of a ticket is detached by a conductor of a train on the going trip, and the returning coupon retained by the conductor and the going coupon returned to the passenger, who retains it, without discovering the mistake until presenting it on the return trip and then makes the explanation, the passenger has the right to be carried back on the going coupon.

2. When coupons of a railroad ticket, stipulated to be void if detached, were severed by accident or through no fault of the passenger, and he presented both coupons to the conductor on the going trip with an explanation as to their severance, the passenger is entitled to passage. If the conductor takes and accepts one of the coupons it is clearly a waiver, although he took the wrong coupon.

3. Where the conductor required a passenger to pay fare for which he had given a ticket, threatening to eject him, the passenger is entitled to recover damages for the humiliation suffered and indignity done.

Pennsylvania Company vs. Bray, Ind S. C., Oct. 7, 1890.

NOTE:—The accepting of plausible explanations made to the conductor by passengers is generally done in violation of the company's rules and regulations. The Ohio Supreme Court decided June 24th, 1890, in the case of McKay vs. R. R. Co., that if a passenger pay a railway agent fare for a certain trip, and by mistake of the agent is given a ticket not answering for that trip, but one in an opposite direction, and the conductor refuses to recognize such ticket or accept of an explanation, and demands fare, which the passenger refused to pay, ejection without unnecessary force will not be ground for an action, in tort, the action if sustained must be based upon a breach of the contract to carry.

The Michigan Supreme Court has recently decided (Frederick vs. R. R. Co.) that, as between the conductor and passenger and the right of the latter to travel, the ticket produced must be conclusive evidence, and he must produce it, when called upon, as the evidence of his right to the seat he claims. Where a passenger has purchased a ticket, and the conductor does not carry him according to its terms, or if the company, through the mistake of its agents, has given him the wrong ticket, so that he has been compelled to relinquish his seat, or pay his fare a second time in order to retain it, he would have a remedy against the company for a breach of the contract. So, in a case where a passenger had paid for a ticket to a point beyond that called for by the ticket presented, and refusing to pay the extra fare, was ejected, and was denied a recovery in an action on the case. The principle announced here is that, as between the passenger and the conductor the ticket is the conclusive evidence of the passengers right to travel, and has been so held in New York, Mich., Ill., Maryland, Conn., New Jersey, Wis., and Massachusetts. Ohio, too, has held, that the fact that a ticket had been purchased, which was afterward wrongfully taken up by a conductor on one train, will not relieve a passenger from the duty of buying a ticket or paying fare on another train of the defendant, and in such case the right of action would be for wrongfully taking up the ticket, and not for ejection for failure to pay fare.

The Illinois Court (Railroad Co., vs. Griffin) held, that if a passenger pay fare to a certain station, and the agent inadvertently gave him a ticket to an intermediate station, a demand for a second fare will be a breach of the implied contract to carry him to the proper station. By paying a second time, his action will be as complete as if he resisted and suffered ejection. It is his duty to pay the second fare, and if reparation be not made, he can maintain an action.

So, in New York (Yorlon vs. R. R. Co.), where a passenger had a right to a stop-over ticket, and the conductor negligently gave him instead a trip check, held, that a second conductor may demand additional fare, and a refusal followed by ejection, such demand, refusal and ejection will be no ground of recovery against the company, though it will be liable for the fault of the first conductor.

The same court, (Townsend vs. R. R. Co.) that a regulation of a railroad company requiring passengers to present evidence to the conductor of a right to a seat or pay fare, is reasonable, and for non-compliance a passenger may be put off, and the wrongful taking of the passenger's ticket by a conductor of a previous train, on which the passenger had performed part of his journey, does not exonerate him from compliance with the regulation, and that for the wrongful act of the former conductor only, the company is liable. It has also been decided, that a passenger who had a ticket in his pocket and had exhibited it once to the conductor, and refused to exhibit it again when called on, was properly put off for refusing to exhibit his ticket. Hibbard vs R. R. Co., 15 N. Y., 445.

Conductor and Passenger—Fraudulently Evading Payment of Fare—Right to Arrest Statute.

In order to justify an arrest made for an offense committed in the presence of a conductor who is also a police officer, the arrest must be made immediately. If the officer, as conductor, observes a breach or unlawful act committed, departs and afterwards returns, he cannot arrest the offender without a warrant for such previous offense so committed in his view. The shortness of the interval or absence from view does not affect the question. Hence, where a person without money fraudulently offers a worthless ticket for his fare which was refused by the conductor, who after leaving the car and returning when the train arrived at the first station and effected his arrest and afterwards filed a complaint against him for fraudulently evading the payment of his fare,

Held, That a jury might return a verdict for an assault and false imprisonment on the ground, that the conductor did not arrest him immediately upon discovering the fraud, but afterwards and in the presence of local officers to whom he was given over, who were not present when the offense against the statute was committed.

Krulewitz vs. Eastern R'y Co., Mass. S. C., Jan. 5, 1890.

Carriers—Injury to Passengers—Negligence of Conductor—Evidence.

In an action for damages for bodily injury sustained in consequence of the alleged negligence of a conductor, the court held:

1. That in order to impose a liability on a railroad company for the consequences resulting from the omission of an act by one of its employes, (conductor), the test is not whether, had the act been done, the accident would not have occurred, but whether the act omitted was one which it was the duty of the conductor to perform.

2. Where a conductor, who was told by an ordinary passenger that he has heard an unusual loud noise, and felt a jolt which had made the coach jump and aroused him, and who after reasonable inspection, inside and outside of the car, did not become conscious of a cause for alarm or danger, is not bound to stop the train for an inspection.

3. The conductor's failure to do so, and the consequent injury sustained thereby to the complaining passenger by the derailment and capsizing of the coach, caused by the breaking of a wheel, is not such negligence as imposes on the company the obligation of indemnity for harm sustained. Simply a wrong done to a passenger for which the law provides no remedy.

Irelson, et ux v. Southern Pacific Railway Company, La. S. C. May 29, 1890.

Carriers—Use of Passenger Platforms—Injunction.

In an action for an injunction against a railway company to determine depot rights, it is Held, That a railway company cannot grant to one hack owner the exclusive right to use its platforms for receiving and discharging passengers; and, any soliciting or direction by conductors or agents in favor of the one and against the other carriers is unlawful, and an injunction will lie against such grant or contract.

Montana Union R'y Co. v. Langlois, et. al., Montana, S. C. June 1, 1890.

Injury to Passenger Leaving Car—Brakeman—Negligence.

1. The plaintiff, a passenger upon defendant's train, arose as the train approached her station and passed to the door of the car, which the brakeman held open. The jar of the train impelled her to hold her hand on the door-casing, when, as the train stopped, the brakeman let go of the door, which slammed together and injured her hand seriously.

Held, That the brakeman, who had been so seated as that he must have seen that plaintiff wished to get off at the station, was negligent in letting go of the door, and in the absence of suitable appliances to hold it from shutting when the train stopped.

2. It is not negligence for a passenger to leave her seat and go toward the door, which at the time is held open by one of the trainmen as the train approaches the station. Judgment in damages and $100 paid to a nurse affirmed.

Cohoe v. Manhattan, etc. R'y Co., N. Y. S. C., July 18, 1890.

"When did you return from abroad, Mr. Skimilk?"

"Why, I haven't been abroad."

"Why, father said you had been living off Cowes for a year or so past."

"Why, er—yes—er I've been running a dairy, y'know."—Light.

"Yes," sighed the dissappointed mother, "I brought up my son very carefully and piously. As soon as he was old enough I got him to join the church, and made him give me his solemn promise that when he married he would marry a Christian woman."

"And didn't he?"

"No; he married one of the girls of the choir."—Jacksonville Critique.

Judge—So you were caught in the act, sir. You deceived your master?

Culprit—On the contrary, m'lud. He deceived me. He said he was going out of town and didn't go.—Topical Times.

She Did Not Understand.—"I do not see, papa, why you should object to my marrying him. You know he is rich, for he puts all his business in your hands."

"On mature consideration, my dear, I think it would be safer to marry some one who does not put all his business in my hands. You will understand these things better when you are older."—Chicago Figaro.

Not Necessarily Fatal.—Quizzel—What's the matter with young Downie? He looks sad.

Knowit—Oh, the popular disease—heart failure.

Q.—Heart Failure! Why, I thought that killed folks.

K.—Oh, not always. Miss Inswimmie threw him over for old Goldbee last week, and said she feared her heart didn't beat in unison with his.—Detroit Free Press.

A Sure Preventive.—Johnson—What do you have that big pile of wood in your yard for? Don't you burn coal?

Jackson (who lives in the suburbs)—Oh, yes, I just keep that there to frighten away tramps.—Lowell Citizen.

Whom to Consult.—Doctor (to patient.) What ails you?

Patient—Indeed, I don't know. I only know that I suffer.

What kind of a life do you lead?

I work like an ox, I eat like a wolf, I am as tired as a dog and I sleep like a horse.

In that case I would advise you to consult a veterinary surgeon.—Texas Siftings.

He was Dazed.—A Friend (to Z., a widower since twenty-four hours)—My poor friend, you seem dazed by your misfortune.

Z.—Yes, indeed, I was married sixteen years, and it seems as though I have come out of a long nightmare.—Texas Siftings.

"What is that scratch on your arm, Henry?"

"Oh, I hit it with the cat," was the unconcerned reply.—Youth's Companion.

Beware of new blotters. Here is what a lady not a hundred miles from Bryan found upon a fresh blotter when she dropped in at her husband's office the other day; "eno gnirad nwo yM" Having received no such communication from him for a period of 20 years or more, a question arose which has not yet been satisfactorily answered.—Bryan, O., Press.

"I'm run to death," said the coffin.

"I'm all put out," said the lamp.

"I'm all cut up," said the hash.

"I'm played out," said the trump card.

"I'm tired," said the wagon wheel.

"I'm done up," said the parcel.

"I'm used up," said the umbrella.

"I wish you would all follow my example," growled the pen-knife.

"What's that," cried the chorus.

"Shut up."—Light.

The Brotherhood Magazines for October are all on time, and are all as usual of interest to any one connected with railways.

For some unknown reason, The Western Railway fails to reach this office with anything like regularity. Whether it is a conspiracy of Republican postal officials to annoy a Democrat, or whether the fault is in Bro. Warman's mailing department, deponent sayeth not. Rise up and explain, Cy, or we'll join the U. P. Employees' Magazine and say you've sold out to railroads.

Bro. Honin announces the formation of a stock company for the future publication of The Railway News Reporter, and that Mr. John H. Lichteberger, late private secretary of General Manager Dickinson on the U. P., is to take an active part in the future management of The Reporter. We wish the new company success, and hope that it will relieve Dan enough so that he will have time to answer a letter.

No. 1, Volume 1, of the Western Garden, published at Des Moines, Iowa, is on our desk, and if succeeding numbers shall prove as interesting and valuable to those interested in gardening, whether it be for pleasure or profit, the Western Garden is likely to be a success. It is the only publication of the kind that we know of in the State, and it should meet with an extended patronage, while its publishers should be able to make it of much more value to Western gardeners than a paper that is published in the East.

A copy of The Clef, published in New York in the interest of vocal societies and musicians generally, has reached us, and we are somewhat surprised that these people in New York should know our musical ability and use such discriminating judgment as to send us a musical publication for criticism. We don't sing and can't whistle, but on an organ we are an expert. Some organists play by note, and some by ear, but we play by hand, and defy competition. The Clef has a page of reading matter and ten pages of music, and if the music is as good as it looks difficult, the book is worth the $1 per year that is asked for it.

After the spirited ballad of "Piping Jean," by Caroline D. Swan, which opens the October Wise Awake, the reader comes upon a good foot-ball story, a story of Phillips-Exeter Academy, written by Mrs. Adeline A. Knight, and entitled "John McGregor's Lesson;" curiously enough, while this story describes a foot-ball game between this school and Phillips Academy at Andover, the chapters of Mr. Ward's serial, "The New Senior at Andover," chronicle a base-ball contest between the same two schools; the first story is illustrated from life photographs of a typical "team" of each school.

Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford is at her splendid best in the war story "One Good Turn." "An Adirondack Camp," by Margaret Sidney, is a breezy chronicle of a particularly jolly time had by some particularly jolly young people. "Jack and Æsop's Jackdaw," by Amos R. Wells, is one of the brightest of the School and Playground series of stories, while "The Scarlet Specter of Sandy Ridge" is perhaps the strongest yet of Miss McLeod's Acadian Old-Folk Lore tales. "Brer Lizard's Coats," by Martha Young, is a quaint bit of story such as southern negroes like to tell. Alexanderia Black's "Camera Club" has seven fine photographs by amateurs. "A Quilt Expedition," by Henry Cleveland Wood, brings back to notice an old-time species of sewing-work, and gives twenty-four popular counterpane designs. "A Story of 1812, Part 1," by Olive Risley Seward, is a true story of Commodore Perry and an ancestor of the author. Mrs. Clafin's "Margaret-Patty Letters," Mr. Bridgman's Puk-Wudjie tale of "Father Maple's War-Paint," Miss Steinhauer's sketch of "Jack Weatherwax, Hero," Mrs. Rayne's "Pets of the Treasury," Helen North's "Letter-Writing for Young Folks," and Mrs. Sallie Joy White's article upon "Insurance and Advertising" agencies as business openings for women, together with the "Men and Things" department, complete the prose of the number.

The poems are by Graham R. Tomson, Mrs. Whiton-Stone, Kate Putnam Osgood, and Mary E. Wilkins.

Wide Awake is $2.40 a year. Our readers can obtain it in connection with THE CONDUCTOR at club rates.

The modern magazine may be taken as embodying the best literature of the world, as the magazine editor pays the highest prices to novelists, scientists, statesmen, soldiers, and even kings and princes, for the best they can furnish in the literary line. The well-edited magazine becomes an educating influence in the family circle, whose importance cannot be over-estimated. The children, as they grow up, are attracted by its illustrations, and so come in time to have a taste for reading. There is always something that is new, something that is strange, something that is interesting; and we consider that we are doing our readers a positive benefit if we are instrumental in placing such a publication within their reach. The special arrangement that we have made with the Cosmopolitan presents very unusual inducements. The magazine, although only in the tenth month under its new management, is already recognized as one of the most interesting publications of the day. It is seeking subscribers everywhere and obtaining them. The proprietors believe that the Cosmopolitan has only to be examined to secure a permanent subscriber. That is why we are enabled to make, if the offer is accepted before January next, such a low rate, by which our readers can obtain the Cosmopolitan for little more than the cost of this journal alone. Just think of what the combination means! You obtain your own home journal at about the regular price, and have thrown in a magazine which gives you, in a year, 1536 pages of reading matter by the ablest writers of the world, including over 1300 pages of illustrations that are unsurpassed in point of interest and execution. Will it not pay you to send a subscription to this office for THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR and the Cosmopolitan, immediately? Remember, only $3.50 for the two.

Noticeable in this month's St. Nicholas is the article "Through a Detective Camera," written by Mr. Black, the well known amateur, and illustrated with characteristic bits of child life; the street scenes are as perfect as insects in amber; the hokey-pokey ice-cream man is a genre picture complete, and his Italian baby is a history of a down-trodden race in miniature. Frederic Villiers, the famous English war-correspondent, tells of his narrow escape from asphyxia, because of a "Copper Brazier" containing crude charcoal used in warming an inn room at a Servian hotel. Mr. Villiers's forcible and peculiar drawings fully illustrate his text.

A real juvenile story is "Betty's By and By," in which Julia Lippmann tells a heedless heroine's experiences in that great rendezvous of procrastination. Mr. Bensell's quietly humorous drawing shows the youthful postponers engaged in squaring their accounts. Another story with a sly moral administered in a well flavored medium is "The Gwynnes' Little Donkey," by Kate Woodbridge Michaelis. This tells of the substitution of a pet donkey for the overworked drudge of a tinker's cart. It is the sort of story that is sure to make young people think, and yet not set them to worrying.

A novelty is "An Old English Folk-song," an application of Wagner's principles of operatic composition to the awful crime of that little peddler "whose name was Stout." It is more, however, than a musical joke, for the musical composition is of unusual merit.

Other features are a short illustrated life of Edward the Sixth; a toothsome poem by James Whitcomb Riley; a bright story by J. O. Davidson, telling how a Yankee with a rifle proved himself a match for a Chilian torpedo-boat; a clever poem designed to teach the hollowness of king's and queen's grandeur, and many other bright pictures, clever hits in verse, well-sustained departmental attractions, and all the serials. The man who cannot find interesting reading in this number should consult his physician.

The October Century opens with a frontispiece portrait of Joseph Jefferson. The last installment of the autobiography accompanies the familiar face, an installment which the author considers the most important of all, perhaps, because it contains, at considerable detail, his own final reflections upon the art of which he is an acknowledged master. It is doubtful whether such subtle and at the same time practical suggestions can be found elsewhere from a source so authoritative.

Professor Darwin, of Cambridge, England, a worthy son of a great father, contributes a paper of high and original value on "Meteorites and the History of the Stellar Systems." A striking photograph of a nebula, in which a system like our solar system seems to be in actual formation, accompanies this remarkable paper.

"A Hard Road to Travel out of Dixie," is the accurate title of a paper in The Century's new war-prison series. The present contribution is by the well-known artist and illustrator, Lieut. W. H. Shelton, of New York. Mr. Shelton naturally furnishes his own illustrations for his own story of hardship and adventure.

"Prehistoric Cave-dwellings" is a profusely and strikingly illustrated paper by F. T. Bickford, on the prehistoric and ruined pueblo structures in Chaco Canon, New Mexico, the Canon de Chelly, Arizona,—the ancient home of the most flourishing community of cave-dwellers,—and other extraordinary cave villages not now inhabited.

The first article in the number is a pleasant travel sketch, "Out-of-the-ways in High Savoy," by Dr. Edward Eggleston, fully illustrated by Joseph Pennell.

Mr. La Farge's "Letters from Japan" have for their most striking feature this month the description, in word and picture, of fishing by means of cormorants in a Japanese river.

Mrs. Amelia Gere Mason closes in this number her first series of articles on "The Women of the French Salons." These articles having been so successful Mrs. Mason has been asked to furnish a supplementary paper or two on Mesdames Récamier, De Stael, and Roland.

Miss Helen Gray Cone contributes a paper on "Women in American Literature," in which she reviews the whole field of American female authorship—Miss Cone apologizing at the beginning for thus separating the women writers from those of the opposite sex.

In fiction the October number closes Mrs. Barr's story of "Olivia", and gives a sketch by a new Southern writer (Mrs. Virginia Frazer Boyle), and a story by Miss Sarah Orne Jewett—both illustrated by Kemble.

The "Bric-à-Brac" contributors are the late John Eliot Bowen and Edward A. Oldham.

Several articles have a general or special bearing on the fall elections—in the direction of reform and a wholesome independence. Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, the Republican Congressman, strongly advocates the extension of the merit system in his paper on "Why Patronage in Office is Un-American"; and Judge Thompson, the Democratic member of the National Civil Service Commission, in an "Open Letter" shows the reasonableness of the reform. The leading "Topic of the Time" shows by a review of the political history of the country that there has always been "Partisan Recognition of the Independent Voter," and that State "calls" and conventions, and national "calls" and platforms have all along appealed to good citizens to take fresh and independent action in every election. The editor, in separate editorials, sustains the present Civil Service Commission, and the citizens' movement in New York city.

Scribner's Magazine for October contains articles of life and adventure in unusual places and circumstances, as on a cable ship, in the Maine lake region, and on board the "White Squadron" in port; others about interesting natural phenomena, like Professor Shaler's second paper, and the description of destructive sand waves; articles of great practical value, like Mrs. Sylvanus Reed's paper on private schools for girls, and John W. Root's on Western city architecture; good fiction and poetry, and many rich illustrations.

Herbert Laws Webb, who writes "With a Cable Expedition," was the member of the technical staff of a cable-ship, and from full experience describes the unique life on one of these vessels, which combines the "adventures of voyaging with operations demanding the highest scientific skill and knowledge, and with the most ingenious mechanical work.

"The City House in the West" is contributed to the "Home" series by John W. Root, a leading architect of Chicago, who is thoroughly acquainted with the rapid development of the taste for good art in house building in Western cities.

Mr. Zogbaum's second article in the New Navy pictures life with the White "Squadron" in ports of the Mediterranean—Lisbon, Gibraltar, Tangier—each with its strange people, bizarre costumes, and peculiar life. The author has caught the varying panorama, both in text and illustration, which together make very vivid the impressions of an acute observer, alive to both the human and artistic sides of the passing show.

Mrs. Sylvanus Reed, who, after a successful career of a quarter-of-a-century, has retired from the active management of a famous school, contributes "The Private School for Girls," an earnest explanation of the principles and aims which guided her in building up a school for "American girls of the highest class." Mrs. Reed replies to those critics who have called her methods "fashionable" and "superficial," and points out that recent modifications in the curriculum of American colleges are in line with her course of instruction. The article deals with an important class of schools which has received little attention from writers on educational subjects.

Professor N. S. Shaler's second paper on "Nature and Man in America" shows how the physical conditions of that part of North America east of the Mississippi "insure the profound diversifying influences which come to man from his occupations."

There is a short story by a new writer, the scene of which is in the Bolivian Andes, a strong instalment of the dramatic novel, "Jerry," and poems by Edith M. Thomas, Mrs. Fields, C. P. Cranch, and others.

The frontispiece is the third of Mr. Weguelin's artistic illustrations for Odes of Horace. Mr. Gladstone's translation of the "Lovers' Quarrel" is reprinted with it.

ROBINSON DIVISION, No. 78. }
SAVANNA, Illinois, Sept. 28, 1890. }

WHEREAS, In view of the loss we have sustained by the death of our Brother and associate, F. S. Barker, who was killed while on duty at Farley, Iowa, September 24th, 1890.

Resolved, That it is but a just tribute to the memory of the departed to say, that in regretting his removal from our midst we mourn for one in every way worthy of our respect and regard.

Resolved, That we wish to ever cherish his memory sacred as a faithful friend and Brother.

Resolved, That this heartfelt testimonial of our sympathy and sorrow be forwarded to the parents of our departed Brother and published in THE CONDUCTOR, and our charter be draped in mourning for thirty days.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY LINE, }
BUTTE, Montana, Sept. 21, 1890. }

Last Sunday evening at 8:30, a switch engine and three cars of wood got from control on the hill here near the Alice mine. The engine left the track and ran into an immense smoke stack containing eighty thousand brick, which collapsed and buried the engine in a vast heap of ruin. Engineer Jake Hatter was instantly killed, and foreman James Fitzgerald was fatally injured. No injuries were visible but the brain received internal wounds. He lingered five days in an unconscious condition and passed quietly away. His mother arrived from Auburn, Illinois, the day after his death.

The remains of Engineer Hatter were taken to Minneapolis, Minn. The B. of L. F. took charge and in company of a B. of L. F. Brother, his bride wife, mother-in-law and sister-in-law, all that was mortal of Jake Hatter passed from our sorrowing gaze.

To-morrow evening the B. of R. T. will perform the same duty to their beloved Brother, James Fitzgerald, and thus will fade from us two good true men, universally liked and respected by all. We sincerely mourn their loss. At Auburn, Illinois, or Minneapolis, Minn., the mounds that mark the spot where rest our dear friends and Brothers, will ever remain revered in our memory.

Should these lines ever meet the eyes of the near relatives of our late friends, they will kindly remember, that in the railroad men of Butte, there will ever be sympathizers with them in their sore trouble.

With bleeding hearts we extend to them our sympathy, but words are weak—How empty the words, "engineer killed," "switchman fatally injured," when compared with the grief and desolation which clouds two homes.

On behalf of the railroad men of Butte, we take these means of extending our sympathy to the sorrowing families, and we know we but re-echo the sentiments of each and all.

A gap has been made in our ranks, one that it will be hard to fill.

SACRAMENTO, Cal., Sept. 26, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

At a regular meeting of Sierra Nevada Division No. 195, held on September 21st, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased God to remove by accidental death, Brother J. D. Kepler, be it Resolved, That in his death we have lost a true and worthy Brother.

Resolved, That we extend to the father and friends of our deceased Brother, our profoundest sympathy in their great affliction.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for thirty days in honor of our departed Brother.

Resolved, That these resolutions be placed on the records of this division and they be published in THE CONDUCTOR.

M. V. MURRAY,
Secretary Division No. 195.

THE DALLES, Oregon, Sept. 29, 1890.

At a regular meeting of Mount Hood Division No. 91, O. of R. C., the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God in his infinite goodness and wisdom to remove from our midst our worthy Brother, F. E. Langdon, Sept. 11, 1890. While in the discharge of his duties, Sept. 10th, he fell from his train and received injuries from which he died the following day.

Resolved, By the death of Brother Langdon, his parents and relatives have lost an affectionate son and brother, and that the heartfelt sympathy of this division be extended to them, hoping that they will find consolation in the thought that the deceased had always been true to their best interests while on earth, and that they will meet him in that better land where grief and sorrow never enter.

Resolved, That another link having been sundered from the fraternal chain that binds us together, may we, who survive him, be more strongly cemented together in ties of union and friendship, and during the short space allotted us here, strive to mutually promote the welfare and happiness of one another.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for a period of thirty days, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his bereaved parents, and published in THE CONDUCTOR.

J. H. SULLIVAN,

BURLINGTON, Iowa, Oct. 7, 1890.

At a regular meeting of Star Division No. 31, Order of Railway Conductors, October 5, the sad intelligence of the death of Henry Henderson, eldest son of Brother S. M. Henderson of Galesburg, Illinois, reached us and the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, The Grand Chief Conductor of the universe in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to take from Brother Henderson and family their eldest son and brother. Therefore, be it Resolved, That we most deeply deplore the loss sustained by our Brother and his family, yet we bow with resignation to the Divine will.

Resolved, That we offer to Brother Henderson and family our sincere and heartfelt sympathies in this their sad bereavement. And

Resolved, That these resolutions be recorded on the minutes of this meeting and be published in THE CONDUCTOR, the Burlington Gazette and Hawkeye. Also a copy be sent to this deeply afflicted family.

W. W. VAN SANT,

John Lyons was born at Alquina, Ind., August 18th, 1836. He was united in marriage to Miss Harriet M. Chapman, daughter of Dr. Amos Chapman, of Alquina, April, 1856. When the South proclaimed war against the Union he loved, he sacrificed the pleasures of family associations and the comforts of home to assist in the preservation, and served honorably in Co. E., 16th Regiment Indiana Vol's. About thirty years ago he entered the service of the C. & I. J. railroad, and was engaged in the railroad business until the time of the accident that caused his death.

He was a faithful member of the Order of Railroad Conductors. In politics he was a republican, and always took a lively interest in questions that affected the public.

For the past six years he has occupied the position of conductor on the C., M. & St. P. R'y, at Genoa, Ills. September 15th, 1890, while in the discharge of his official duties, he fell from his train and received injuries that resulted in his death a few days later, at Kirkland, Ills., where he had been taken for medical assistance. The sudden summons that called him away will leave a lasting void, which his presence once filled. A wife and four children survive him; one son, Albert G., and three daughters, Birdie, Mattie and Mrs. A. L. Streeter. Faithful and competent in official life, he possessed to an unusual degree the confidence of those whose interests he was employed to serve. Fair and agreeable in his relations with his fellow men, he commanded the perfect respect of those who in social life, had the pleasure of his friendship. Attentive and affectionate in the circle of his beloved home, he will be missed most by those whose tower of strength and protection he was. His remains were taken back to his old home at Brownsville, Indiana, and there laid to rest. Several members of Savanna Div. No. 78, accompanied the bereaved family to Brownsville. He resided at 554 Warren Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

DENISON, Tex., Sept. 7, 1890.

At a regular meeting of Lone Star Division No. 53 the following resolutions were adopted;

WHEREAS, Division No. 53 has learned of the death of Brother A. K. Waddell, our first Chief Conductor. Therefore be it

Resolved, That while we bow with humble submission to the will of Divine Providence, we deeply mourn the loss of one who in prime of life and manhood has been removed from among us.

Resolved, As a mark of profound respect for his memory, our charter be draped in mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to THE CONDUCTOR for publication.

A NEW YORK OPINION.

The New York Herald endorses the opinion of THE CONDUCTOR in regard to the influence that placed Mr. Webb in the position of second vice-president of the N. Y. C. In a column editorial on the recent order in regard to the Knights of Labor, it expresses the opinion that he "is too big a man for New York to endure without peril to the public welfare," and thinks Mr. Depew should prevail upon the President to appoint him Consul to Senegambia. The Herald says further that Mr. Webb owes his place to "family ties," and it enunciates the principle of the right of labor to organize so forcibly that we quote at length from it:

"What do we see? The New York Central has emerged from a serious strike. It was provoked by administrative incapacity and insolence. Its consequences were averted by the common sense of the labor leaders and the pressure of public opinion. The good name which the Central had earned by its considerate treatment of its employes, the personal esteem in which the principal owners and the president were held, contributed to an understanding. Nothing showed more clearly the conservative tendency of labor organizations than the quiet adjustment of a controversy in which the laborers were but partially at fault and which, the more closely we read the after evidence, seems to have been precipitated by the recent indifference and ignorance of the Central management.

"The strike over and done, Mr. H. Walter Webb writes a circular forbidding the employes of the Central to belong to the Knights of Labor. So long as the Central employes, switchmen, engineers, conductors, or what not, do their work, it is not the business of Mr. H. Walter Webb to make inquiry as to their associations. The tendency of the poor is to congregate. They unite for ceremony, good fellowship, politics, thrift, charity and religion. They call themselves Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, Tammany Braves, and other odd, quaint names. Where is the harm in this? And why may they not call themselves Knights of Labor and confer upon the thousand and one cares which enter into their lives as among our striving, suffering poor?

"This question concerns the inalienable rights of the American citizen, and it is incredible that Mr. Depew does not see it. Mr. Depew is a statesman with tact, a knowledge of men and affairs, has been a candidate for the nomination to the Presidency, and may again proudly look upon that high place. But does Mr. Depew believe it possible that at this day and hour a mere third vice president of the New York Central owing his place to family ties can say to an American citizen, even the humblest in his service, that he may not associate with his fellow laborers, that he may not call himself a Knight of Labor or Knight of the Moon if he pleases, that he may not concert with his fellows as to wages, hours of work, charities, privileges—that he may not even come into the august presence of H. Walter Webb and state a grievance?

"It is inconceivable that Mr. Depew should have permitted this folly. Does he think that H. Walter Webb and his family alliances own the New York Central? The New York Central is a public institution. It exists by the grace of the Commonwealth, by endowments from counties and municipalities, by chartered rights from the Legislature. No one knows better than Mr. Depew that it has been dowered with a princely hand, and that because of many acts of public favor some of the greatest fortunes in the world have come from its revenues.

"Mr. Depew has but to look at the Fourth avenue subway to see what was largely a gift from the people of New York. He can recall the time when by a stroke of the pen eighty per cent was added to the capital stock of the Central, and that to sustain that unnecessary and unjustifiable imposition every farmer in New York has been taxed for years and will be taxed forever. He knows how much the forms of justice and legislation have been subordinated to this great corporation; that for twenty years in Albany no Speaker's gavel has ever fallen to announce the passage of a decree which was not in its interest. With this knowledge, and comprehending the incredible obligations of the Central to the people of New York, it is hard to believe that he should permit an act which is as tyrannous an interference with the rights of American freemen as any which led to the Revolution. * * *

"Mr. Depew should put aside the vanity of opinion and realize that his management has blundered. The American people will not endure, even from the Central, an interference with their liberties. Where corporations are concerned and bread and butter must be found for children they are long suffering. But right is right and freedom is freedom, and unless this maxim governs those in high authority and swaying vast responsibilities no one can tell what the end may be—nor with what terrible, relentless swiftness it may come."

On the other hand, the Sun apologizes for the circular and says it is surprising that the Herald should so misconstrue, and asserts that it is not from hostility to labor organization but to the Knights of Labor only that it is aimed. In our opinion, Mr. Webb is but carrying out the course determined upon before the strike occurred, but resolutely denied at that time. The Sun seems to think that he may have made a mistake and closes its article as follows:

"The Central's order, therefore, can reasonably raise nothing more than a question of its wisdom in regard to the special organization of the Knights of Labor. Such direct warfare as Mr. Webb represents, made upon any union, however atrocious, may arouse such a concentrated sentiment of sympathy that the result will be exactly the opposite to that desired. But the course chosen involves the quality of prudence only. To say that opposition to Mr. Powderly's society means hostility to other unions amounts to a greater libel upon labor organization proper than its bitterest enemy ever conceived of; to say that it means a purpose to exterminate organization is making the Central officials out to be too great fools for facts to stand."

With the Herald, we wonder that a management usually so liberal toward labor organizations, and that a man of Mr. Depew's acknowledged foresight and wisdom, should permit any such course to be taken by Webb. From a personal and selfish standpoint, we should be glad to see every conductor on the Central who is a Knight of Labor leave that association and become a member of a conductors' organization, and we believe that it will be better for them to do so, and we also believe that it will be better for the firemen, the engineers, the brakemen and the switchmen to leave the Knights and affiliate with the B. of L. F., the B. of L. E., the B. of R. T. and the S. M. A. A., but as a matter of principle, we cannot but condemn the assumption of any railway officer who interferes with what is the private and personal business of the employes by dictating to them as to whether or not they shall retain membership in, or become members of any organization. It is said that the circular contains no order to dismiss those who refuse to leave the Knights, and it is attempted to give the public the inference that it is only to be mildly persuasive in its character, and that if those who are members do not withdraw, they will not be interfered with; to railway men, such an explanation is farcical in the extreme. Mr. Webb did not care to openly violate the law of New York, but all the same, every officer who received the circular, knows that it is an order to dismiss those who do not comply, and every member knows that if he does not comply, he will be promptly discharged on some pretext, and that under the present condition of things, there is no help for him. We wish to make no war on the Central as a company or on its management generally, but we caution the members of other organizations on that road, to look well to themselves if Mr. Webb remains in charge. What Mr. Depew should do, if he has influence enough to bring it about, is to depose Webb and put in his place some practical railroad man, like Mr. Toucey, for instance. These same men who are now Knights of Labor, will, the most of them, become members of other organizations, if they leave the Knights and remain on the Central, and Mr. Webb will then have an excuse for attacking some other.

FRAUD "POTTER" AGAIN.

A Denver dispatch says: A man traveling under the name of A. D. Potter is going the rounds of the east representing himself as a conductor on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé railway, residing at 1340 South Water street, Denver. He claims to have been held up and all of his money, passes and jewelry taken from him. After a very pitiful tale he generally succeeds in borrowing money and is never afterwards heard of. He successfully worked a clergyman at Seneca Falls, N. Y., while other victims have been heard from in that state and Pennsylvania. The officials of the road declare the man a fraud and a swindler, that there is and has been no man in their employ by the name of A. D. Potter.

The position of the writer in opposing state legislation compelling railway companies to equip their rolling stock with automatic couplers has been very unexpectedly and energetically endorsed by the S. M. A. A., which at its late convention pronounced in favor of a link and pin coupler with the face recessed to make room for the hand, and the reason for this action is on account of the danger arising from the multitude of various "automatic" couplers that are being placed in use. State legislation is extremely dangerous, and safety lies only in national legislation that shall compel uniformity which is of more importance than anything else. With state legislation there will not be uniformity and political papers that profess to represent railway employes in condemning legislators for opposing such state legislation do both the legislators and the employes injustice

MENTIONS

R. O. Jeardo, a reliable member of No. 8, is now running out of Iron Mountain, Mich.

If those of our readers who write to advertisers will kindly refer to THE CONDUCTOR, they will do us a favor.

Bro. E. S. McCarthy of Div. No. 97, is now a resident of Paragould, Ark., and is president and general manager of the St. L., K. & S. R'y.

Since our last issue, divisions have been organized at Forest, Illinois, and Gainesville, Texas, and other places are waiting for the organizing officers.

Bros. C. S. Robb, of 195; F. H. Davenport, of 4; F. J. Woodard, of 53 and A. C. Shelton, of 181 were among those who have invaded the sanctuary lately. Call again.

A railway officer, when first shown the model of the Williams coupler, said "I would rather own the patent for that than to be president of the United States; there's more money in it." And we are of the same opinion.

We are in receipt of the twelfth annual report of the Bureau of Labor and Statistics of New Jersey, for which Mr James Bishop, Chief of the Bureau has our thanks. It contains much valuable information.

J. E. McCarthy, originally a charter member of Division No. 115, at San Francisco, and lately train master on the U. P. at Pocatello, has resigned his position. Brother McCarthy will have the best wishes of many friends wherever he goes.

A daily paper notes as one of the great benefits of advertising, that W. L. Douglass is likely to receive the nomination for congress in his district. In case he is nominated, we predict that both Mr. Douglass and the party which nominates him will find that he is altogether too well advertised. Mr. Douglass is well known among laboring men as one of those who have persistently fought labor organizations and while under the influence of the "New Engl and way," described in a late number of the Firemen's Magazine and copied in the last CONDUCTOR under the head of "The Way it Works," he may go to congress, he will not have the voluntary support of enough voters to elect him.

We acknowledge with thanks a pressing invitation to be present at an entertainment given by the ladies of the new division of the L. A. organized at Toledo, Ohio, on the 9th inst., and regret very much that pressure of business prevented attendance.

Information is wanted of the whereabouts of Bro. E. J. Waterhouse, who left his home several months ago. His family are anxious to know something of him. Send information to Mrs. E. J. Waterhouse, 127 John Street, Cincinnati or to the C. C. of 107.

Brother A. A. Bowman, a charter member of Division No. 118, was appointed train master of the C. & E. I. with headquarters at Danville, September first. Brother Bowman and the members employed under him have the congratulations of THE CONDUCTOR.

Born Sept. 23rd, to Brother and Mrs. N. Pryor, a daughter. Congratulations are in order and those of THE CONDUCTOR are sincere. A little advice though, Newton; if the little Miss should Pryor father out of bed in the small hours, he should always keep his temper.

Note our offer of the Ladies' Home Companion and a copy of the celebrated painting "Christ before Pilate" to every subscriber who sends 30 cents additional or $2.30 in all. The Home Companion and the picture will be sent to all members of the Order who send 30 cents.

An agreement has been perfected between the committee of members of the Order and the officers of the C. & N. W. R'y by which the pay of conductors is increased on an average about thirteen per cent, the pay of passenger conductors ranging from $90 to $120 per month with pay for over time. The new schedule will be given in THE CONDUCTOR soon.

We are in receipt of a copy of the new Illinois Central schedule which will be published as soon as space can be found. In this as in the new C. & N. W. and in fact all other agreements perfected by members of the Order, the interests of the brakemen have been cared for.

For prompt payment of losses, the R. O. & C. Accident Association, familiarly known as the "Indianapolis" and of which Bro. L. D. Hibbard is president, takes the lead of any in existence that we know of. All that is claimed by them in this respect, is true to our personal knowledge.

The members of the Order on the Pacific System of the Southern Pacific, speak highly of Bro. Jack Massey, who was their chairman, and they also wish to express thanks for the fraternal manner in which they were met and treated by Grand Master Wilkinson of the B. of R. T.

A neat business card informs us that Bro. J. T. Marr has associated himself with Messrs. Allen & Wills, in the real estate business in San Francisco. Mr. S. M. Allen will be recognized by many Santa Fé employés as a former train master there. We wish the firm good luck and "lots" of prosperity.

The secretary of No. 79 writes that he despairs of hearing from some of the members of that division, and that to some of them no more notices will be sent. He requests that Bros. C. W. Gossett, M. D. St. Clair, J. J. Humphrey, R. J. Kerstevens and E. L. Burrell communicate with him at once.

Conductor Albert S. Ostrander, of the New York, New Haven & Hartford, and for many years Grand Secretary of the Independent Order of Railroad Conductors, has been promoted to the Superintendency, vacated by E. G. Allen, who has become Superintendent on a New York Central division.

The difficulty between the B. of L. E. on one side and the So. Pac. and the B. of L. F. on the other arising over the promotion of a member of the B. of L. E. to which the engineers objected, is to be settled by arbitration, the arbitrators to meet at Houston, Texas, this month. So says a dispatch from Frisco.

It is with no small degree of satisfaction that we note the acquittal of Brother John Houghtailing, who was indicted for criminal negligence in causing the accident on the Lake Shore near Buffalo, last March. The report says, that but one witness was examined for the defense and that the jury returned its verdict in less than an hour.

The Grand Secretary is in receipt of an envelope with a mourning border containing nothing whatever. Presumably sealed and mailed with the intended contents omitted by mistake. Only a part of the postmark is legible and that shows it to have been mailed from some "On the Hudson" post office September 29th.

Division No. 107 requests us to inform members that on the occasion of their Union Meeting on the 19th. inst., the Grand Hotel will be headquarters and that a special rate has been made for the occasion. The boys at Cincinnati have made preparations for a large number of visitors and we urge our readers not to disappoint them.

A fact that inadvertently escaped notice some time ago, is that the National hotel at Hot Springs, Ark., is "run" by an old engineer and a member of the B. of L. E.; this fact alone will insure a cordial reception for any railroad man who visits the Springs and all who make the National their stopping place will not regret it.

The dispatches state that Mr. Webb of the Central has just issued orders to subordinate officers to the effect that all employés who are members of the Knights of Labor must withdraw from that association or leave the employ of the company. His success in defeating the strike seems to have emboldened Mr. Webb to openly acknowledge what he has heretofore denied and will probably convince many who have heretofore doubted, that the Knights were correct when they complained of being dismissed for membership in that order.

It will be of great interest and a matter of important information to the readers of THE CONDUCTOR to know that the removal of the Westinghouse Air Brake Company from Allegheny City to Wilmerding, Pa., is now completed. The shops in Allegheny City are now occupied by the Fuel Gas and Manufacturing Company, another Westinghouse concern. A few days ago the last complement of Air Brake workmen left for the new shops in Wilmerding.

The general offices have also been located near the new works, while the company's city office is located in the Westinghouse building, corner of Ninth street and Penn avenue, Pittsburg, Pa. This building is the property of the Westinghouse Air Brake Company.

The new works at Wilmerding are now in full operation, and, owing to the increased facilities, the output of the company is now much larger than formerly.

NO. 21.

THE BRAKEMAN AT CHURCH.

By request of an eastern friend we republish the following from the Burlington Hawkeye, and believe there are many in this section who will be glad once more to think of the fat passenger, the cross passenger, the tall, thin passenger, the man on the wood box and the woman who talks bass—familiar friends of a few years ago when the genial Bob was a Hawkeye citizen.

On the road once more, with Lebanon fading away in the distance, the fat passenger drumming idly on the window pane, the cross passenger sound asleep, and the tall, thin passenger reading "Gen. Grant's Tour Around the World." To me comes the brakeman, and seating himself on the arm of the seat, says:

"I went to church yesterday."

"Yes?" I said, with that interested inflection that asks for more. "And what church did you attend?"

"Which do you guess?" he asked.

"Some union mission church?" I hazarded.

"No," he said, "I don't like to run on these branch roads very much. I don't often go to church, and when I do, I want to run on the main line, where your run is regular and you go on schedule time, and don't have to wait on connections. I don't like to run on a branch. Good enough, but I don't like it."

"Episcopal?" I guessed.

"Limited express," he said, "all palace cars, and two dollars extra for a seat, fast time, and only stop at the big stations. Nice line, but too exhaustive for a brakeman. All train men in uniform, conductor's punch and lantern silver plated, and no train boys allowed. Then the passengers are allowed to talk back to the conductor, and it makes it too free and easy. No, I couldn't stand the palace cars. Rich road, though. Don't often hear of a receiver being appointed for that line. Some mighty nice people travel on it, too."

"Universalist?" I suggested.

"Broad gauge," said the brakeman, "does too much complimentary business. Everybody travels on a pass. Conductor doesn't get a fare once in fifty miles. Stops at all flag stations, and won't run into anything but a union depot. No smoking-car on train. Train orders are rather vague, though, and the trainmen don't get along well with the passengers. No, I don't go to the Universalist, though I know some awfully good men who run on that road."

"Presbyterian?" I asked.

"Narrow gauge, eh?" said the brakeman, "pretty track, straight as a rule; tunnel right through a mountain rather than go around it; spirit-level grade; passengers have to show their tickets before they get on the train. Mighty strict road, but the cars are a little narrow; have to sit one in a seat and no room in the aisle to dance. Then there is no stop-over tickets allowed; got to go straight through to the station you're ticketed for, or you can't get on at all. When the car's full, no extra coaches; cars are built at the shops to hold just so many, and nobody else allowed on. But you don't often hear of an accident on that road. It's run right up to the rules."

"May be you joined the Free-Thinkers?" I said.

"Scrub road," said the brakeman, "dirt road bed and no ballast, no time-card and no train dispatcher. All trains run wild, and every engineer makes his own time, just as he pleases. Smoke if you want to; kind of as-go-as-you please road. Too many side tracks, and every switch wide open all the time, with the switchman sound asleep and the target-lamp dead out. Get on as you please and off when you want to. Don't have to show your tickets, and the conductor isn't expected to do anything but amuse the passengers. No, sir, I was offered a pass, but I don't like the line. I don't like to travel on a road that has no terminus. Do you know, sir, I asked a division superintendent where that road run to, and he said he hoped to die if he knew. I asked him if the general superintendent could tell me, and he said he didn't believe they had a general superintendent, and if they had, he didn't know anything more about the road than the passengers. I asked him who he reported to, and he said 'Nobody.' I asked a conductor who he got his orders from, and he said he 'didn't take orders from any living man or dead ghost.' And when I asked the engineer who he got his orders from, he said, 'he'd like to see anybody give him orders; he'd run that train to suit himself, or he'd run her in the ditch.' Now, you see, sir, I'm a railroad man, and I don't care to run on a road that has no time, or makes no connections, runs nowhere, and has no superintendent. It may be all right, but I've railroaded too long to understand it."

"May-be you went to the Congregational church?" I said.

"Popular road," said the brakeman, "an old road, too; one of the very oldest in the country. Good road-bed and comfortable cars. Well managed road, too; directors don't interfere with division superintendents and train orders. Road's mighty popular, but its pretty independent, too. Yes, didn't one of the division superintendents down east discontinue one of the oldest stations on this line two or three years ago? But it's a mighty pleasant road to travel on. Always has such a splendid class of passengers."

"Did you try the Methodist?" I said.

"Now you're shouting," he said with some enthusiasm. "Nice road, eh? Fast time and plenty of passengers. Engines carry a power of steam, and don't you forget it; steam gauge shows a hundred and enough all the time. Lively road when the conductor shouts 'all aboard'; you can hear him to the next station. Every train-light shines like a head-light. Stop-over checks are given on all through tickets; passengers can drop off the train as often as he likes, do the station two or three times and hop on the next revival train that comes thundering along. Good, whole-souled, companionable conductors. Ain't a road in the country where the passengers feel more at home. No passes, every passenger pays full traffic rates for his ticket. Wesleyan air-brakes on all trains, too; pretty safe road, but I didn't ride over it yesterday."

"Perhaps you tried the Baptist?" I guessed once more.

"Ah," said the brakeman, "she's a daisy, ain't she? River road, beautiful curves; sweeps around anything to keep close to the river, but it's all steel rail and rock balast, single track all the way and not a side track from the roundhouse to the terminus. It takes a heap of water to run it through; double tanks at every station, and there isn't an engine in the shops that can pull a pound or run a mile with less than two gauges. But it runs through a lovely country: these river roads always do; river on one side and hills on the other, and it's a steady climb up the grade all the way till the run ends where the fountainhead of the river begins. Yes, sir, I'll take the river road every time for a lovely trip, sure connections and good time, and no prairie dust blowing in at the windows. And yesterday, when the conductor came around for the tickets with a little basket punch, I didn't ask him to pass me; but I paid my fare like a bond man; twenty-five cents for an hours run and a little concert by the passengers assembled. I tell you, Pilgrim, you take the river and when you want—"

But just here the loud whistle from the engine announced a station and the brakeman hurried to the door shouting:

"Zionsville! This train makes no stops between here and Indianapolis!"

Fighting Machines.

THE BATTLES OF THE FUTURE WILL BE CONTESTS BETWEEN THEM.

It is becoming more and more apparent that the battles of the future, whether on land or sea, will be largely contests of machines with machines. The development of modern weapons has gone on at such a pace that it seems not unreasonable to predict that before long what will be required of men who fight battles will be, more than anything else, a thorough knowledge of mechanism; in short they will be, to a great extent, mechanics and engineers. Already the modern naval vessel has become what may be called simply a fighting machine, all its space not required for the men and officers being taken up with intricate and complicated machinery for doing things which in the old days were done by the men, or left undone. Indeed, the modern warship has grown so complicated, and done it so rapidly, that it is said many of the older officers of the navy are meeting with considerable difficulty in keeping abreast of the improvements, and that the younger men, fresh from the study of science, and with more ambition to spur them on to further study, are coming rapidly to the front in consequence. It seems that future naval victories are to be won not by the side that has the strongest and bravest men necessarily, but by the side which has its men best protected from the machines of the enemy, and is itself provided with superior machines. All this, of course, will inevitably bring more and more into prominence the machinist and engineer, and it is beginning to be recognized that some additional effort must be made to secure the best of both on war vessels.—American Machinist.

His Half Son.

An old negro was scolding his son when a man who happened to be passing along said: "You don't seem to be pleased with that boy?"

"No, sah; I ain't pleased wid him er tall. Dar's er good many p'int's erbout him dat I ain't got no use fur. He ain't right bright in his jedgment, an' he's erbout the laziest human pusson I ever seed in my borned life. But I couldn't 'spect much better o' him caze he's only my ha'f son, nohow."

"Your half son?" the man exclaimed.

"Yas, sah, dat's all he is—jes' my ha'f son."

"Why, how do you make that out?"

"Easy ernuff, caze I dun been maird twiced."

"That don't make any difference."

"But I reckon it do. De chillun that wuz borned undurin' my fust wife's life-time is dat boy's ha'f brudders an' sisters, an' ez da is my chillun, I 'lowed dat I was his ha'f daddy. It 'peer ter me dat it take er mighty long time ter get er p'int through er white pusson's head, nohow."

Working the Innocent.

A TRAIN BOY WHO WAS A MIGHTY GOOD JUDGE OF HUMAN NATURE.

The experienced train boy, says the Chicago Herald, was apparently giving instructions to a youth whom he was breaking in as an assistant.

In the seat directly in front of the two sat Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Kerpunk, of Georgeson's Cross Roads. It was their first trip away from home.

"You can generally tell by their looks," said the peanut boy, oraculary, "whether it's goin' to pay to try to come any little game over 'em or not. See that chap half way between here an' the other end of the car? Well, you could sell that man a dime novel for a dollar and a half and rope him in on the dollar-in-the-box trick just as eas; as look at him. You'd be wastin' your time, though, to try and play any tricks on such people as these two in front of us. They're old travelers. No use to show them any thing but what's bang up genuine an' cheap. If you've got anything that's fresh an' wuth the money, them folks is the kind of customers to take 'em to the first thing. Snide goods won't go down with such customers as them, I tell you. Well, I must work the train now. Remember what I've told you."

"That boy is a mighty good judge of human nature, Jose, isn't he?" said Harrison to his wife, after the experienced peanut boy had gone into the forward car to get his basket. "He thought he wasn't talking loud enough for us to hear, but I've got pretty sharp ears. I heard every blamed word he said. Well, it's a fact, Jose," he added, "it wouldn't be much use to try any of his little tricks on me. I've got my eye teeth all cut. Here he comes. If he's got anything worth buying he'll come straight to us. You see if he doesn't."

And before the peanut boy was done with Mr. Harrison Kerpunk he had sold him half a dozen prize packages, five boxes of last years maple carmels, a dozen sour oranges, three twenty-five cent books for half a dollar each, unloaded his entire stock of moldy figs on him, and cleaned him out of a two dollar bill on an innocent little trick with a pill box and a gold coin.

"Jose," said Harrison, after he had sat looking out of the window for about five miles, "durned if I don't begin to think he said all that to the other boy on purpose for me to hear it!"

Saw a Train Coming.

WHY THE OHIO MAN FELT UNDER OBLIGATIONS TO A COURTEOUS BRAKEMAN.

The train was passing over a high trestle-work, on an Ohio railroad, when a man who had been smoking his cigar in silence suddenly observed:

"Ah! gentlemen, but I have cause to remember this spot all my life."

"Any thing happen to you here?," asked one of the quartette.

"Indeed, something happened. It was two years ago this month. I was visiting my aunt in that hamlet at the other end. One day I wanted to come over to the big stone quarry. a quarter of a mile further on. It was a near cut to take the track, and so I took it."

"And met a train!" exclaimed a voice.

"Yes, I had reached the center of the trestle, which is ninety-five feet above the cruel rocks, when I heard the whistle of a locomotive, and a moment later caught sight of a freight train rounding the curve. There was only one possible way of escape."

"And you—you—"

"I seized it. Though considerably rattled I did not loose my presence of mind. Dropping down between the cross-pieces I swung clear with my feet and hung on with my hands. You can judge of a man's feelings with almost a hundred feet space between his feet and a great mass of jagged rock."

"Great Scots! How long did you hang there?"

"About ten minutes."

"But did it take the train that long to pass over you?"

"Oh, no."

"Then how was it?"

"Why, the train side-tracked at the other end, you see, and I hung on until one of the brakemen walked out to me and said if I wasn't in the circus business to stay I'd better get out of that."

"But I don't exactly see."

"Oh, there is nothing to see. I got off the bridge all right, with three hours to spare before another train came along. I was very much obliged to the brakeman—very much. I might have hung there all day, you know."—N. Y. Sun.

Ten Good Things to Know.

1. That salt will curdle new milk, hence in preparing milk porridge, gravies, etc. the salt should not be added until the dish is prepared.

2. That clear boiling water will remove tea stains and many fruit stains. Pour the water through the stain and thus prevent its spreading over the fabric.

3. That ripe tomatoes will remove ink and other stains from white cloth, also from the hands.

4. That a tablespoonful of turpentine boiled with white clothes will aid in the whitening process.

5. That boiled starch is much improved by the addition of a little sperm salt or gum arabic dissolved.

6. That beeswax and salt will make rusty flat irons as clean and smooth as glass. Tie a lump of wax in a rag and keep it for that purpose. When the irons are hot, rub them first with the wax rag, then scour with a paper or cloth sprinkled with salt.

7. That blue ointment and kerosene mixed in equal proportions and applied to the bedsteads is an unfailing bedbug remedy, as a coat of whitewash is for the walls of a log house.

8. That kerosene will soften boots and shoes that have been hardened by water, and render them as pliable as new.

9. That kerosene will make tin tea kettles as bright as new. Saturate a woolen rag and rub with it. It will also remove stains from varnished furniture.

10. That cool rain water and soda will remove machine grease from washable fabrics.—B. of L. E. Journal.

"Let Us Welcome Our Company Home."

Headlines of an editorial in daily paper on the day of the return of a militia company from the scene of a late strike.

Let us welcome our warriors home,
They are toming all crowned from the fray,
Like a thoroughbred flecked with the foam
Which he blows from his nostrils away.
To a quickstep how gaily they tread,
As it rolls from a soul-stirring drum;
Oh! they conquered slaves struggling for bread—
Let us welcome our warriors home.

For the very brief space of a week
The undaunted lads went to the wars,
To protect every ulcerous freak,
That was coupling and switching the cars;
They're returning all laureled and crowned,
Like the conquering heroes of old;
And the streets with their praises resound,
Half their valor can never be told.

Pray, what right has a toiler to strike,
Or suppose he's created a man?
He's presumptuous to think of the like,
Let him carry his chains while he can;
For if ever he tries to escape
From the shackles in which he is bound,
We can riddle his carcass with grape,
From the guns of our heroes around.

With the Pinkerton thugs and the guards,
And the treasure which lies in the vaults,
All the strikers are sure of rewards,
In the shape of ferocious assaults;
And the law and the question of right
For the moment are equally lost;
They are crushed by the moloch of might,
Stalking onward regardless of cost.

To "our citizen soldiers" my song
Is inscribed with a poisonous will;
They're the boys who marched gaily along,
The "disorderly rabble" to kill;
Never pausing a stride to reflect
On the wrongs the poor devils may feel,
Who for once in their lives stood erect,
Asking justice and getting the steel.

* * * * *

I remember a few years ago
When the "higos" were ordered to march,
To encounter a resolute foe,
All their limbs were deficient of starch;
They slunk off to the land of the queen
From a terror of Southern braves,
But their courage ferocious is seen
When they level their muskets at slaves.

Two Dreams and What Came of Them.

There was a time in the history of our country when the name of Soiengarahta, or as the English have it, "Old King Hendrick," stood for all that was brave and powerful.

Many Indian allies of the English proved treacherous and revengful, but Soiengarahta and his sturdy band of Mohawk warriors stood firm in their loyalty to "their pale-faced brethern."

Old veterans of the famous Duke of Marlborough regarded Hendrick with reverence, and the British officers stationed in America were only too glad of the friendship and advice of so valiant a man and so shrewd a counselor as the venerable Mohawk sachem.

American life in the eighteenth century seemed exceedingly tame to the spirited English officers who had been used to gay society and high living, and it was their custom to enliven themselves by giving entertainments to their friends and brother officers. To one of these entertainments, given by General (afterwards Sir William) Johnson, Hendrick was invited.

The aged, grizzled hero, better used to simple fare in his native woods, was greatly pleased by the extensive preparations for enjoyment which he saw at General Johnson's house.

As he passed from room to room, inspecting and admiring everything, his eye fell upon a full military dress of fine scarlet, richly embroidered and resplendent in gold lace and buttons, which had been carelessly tossed into a chair. With reverent hands Hendrick lifted and examined the gorgeous suit which had just been sent to General Johnson by his royal master in England.

At last, with a sigh, he softly laid the garments upon the chair and left the room; but during that evening and the next day he returned frequently to look with greedy eyes at the scarlet dress.

Upon the third and last morning of the entertainment, Hendrick said to General Johnson, after exchanging with him the compliments of the day, "Pale-faced brother, Hendrick had a dream last night."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the General, "and pray let us hear what it was about."

"Pale-faced brother," said the chief gravely, "Hendrick dreamed that that beautiful coat was his."

"Red-faced brother," cried General

Johnson, promptly and heartily, "it is yours."

Joyfully Hendrick bounded away, and presently his tall, commanding form was dressed in the magnificent scarlet costume.

Sometime after this Hendrick resolved to give an entertainment and invite all those English officers who had treated him so royally. Accordingly the guests were bidden, and General Johnson was among the number.

Hendrick's home was in that part of the beautiful country now called New York State, through which the Mohawk River runs. The chieftain was a bountiful host, and his guests retired at a late hour, well satisfied with their entertainment.

The next morning General Johnson arose early and went out into the open air to greet his host.

"Ah!" exclaimed Hendrick, his face lighting up at sight of his friend, "how did my pale-faced brother sleep?"

The general replied that he rested well, but that he had had a remarkable dream.

"What did my brother dream?" asked the sachem.

"I dreamed," said Johnson slowly, and spreading his hands out before him as he spoke, "that all these lands were mine."

Hendrick looked at the general in speechless wonder. The Indians are firm believers in dreams, and Hendrick was sorely perplexed. To grant this request was to give up nearly one thousand acres of well-wooded, fertile land; to refuse, was to tempt the great spirit to send some terrible evil on the man who had dreamed.

At length Hendrick turned to the General and said solemnly, "The land is yours. But my pale-faced brother must not dream again."

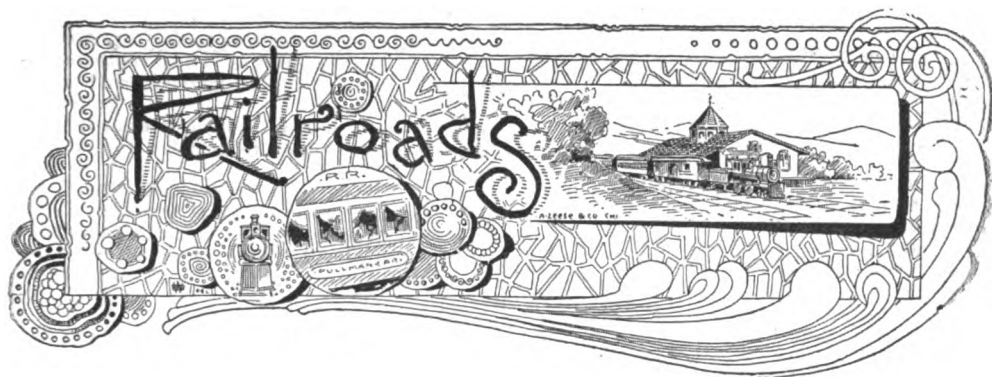

This grant of land which was made by Hendrick, and afterwards received the royal sanction, was for some time called "the dream land."—MINNA STEIN WOOD, in October Wide Awake.

A Sure Enough S'prise.

The Sioux City Times is responsible for the following:

John Roberts, of North East, is a farmer well enough to do, but he had always been eccentric about his clothes. Until a week or so ago he had not been known to buy a new suit of clothes for years. The ones he wore had been so patched and repatched that no bit of the original warp and woof was visible. This personal slovenliness on the part of her husband was a source of constant annoyance to Mrs. Roberts, who is a woman of exceptional neatness. She had long ago become so ashamed of his appearance that she would no longer accompany him to town to do her trading. This singular characteristic of the farmer was not owing to penuriousness, for he is a liberal man in all his dealings. A few days ago he went to town to do a little trading, and, to the utter astonishment of the town, he purchased a new suit of clothes for himself. His new clothes were done up in a package, and he placed the package on the wagon seat beside him when he started for home that night. It was a dark night. Farmer Roberts had got half way home when a brilliant idea struck him. He stopped his horse on a bridge where the road crosses the east branch. "I'll do it, by gum!" he said. "I'll do it and su'prise Eliza!" Thereupon the farmer rose up in the wagon and began to take off the patched and re-patched clothes he had worn so long. As he removed a garment he tossed it into the creek until he had tossed them all in, and had nothing on but his shirt. "Great apple sass!" he exclaimed. "But won't Eliza be su'prised!" Then farmer Roberts reached for the package that had his new clothes in. It wasn't on the seat. Farmer Roberts got down and reached under the seat. The package wasn't there. Then he felt all over the bottom of the wagon. The package wasn't anywhere on the bottom. Farmer Roberts rose up in the wagon and looked back along the pitch-dark road. Then he climbed back in his seat, and away the horses went for home. The night was chilly and there was three miles to go. When Farmer Roberts reached home and climbed out of his wagon he paused. "The hull idea didn't work," said he, "but I'll bet $9 that I su'prise Eliza." That he did no one doubts, but when he got up in the morning and went out to the barn, clad in the hired man's overalls, and saw his package of new clothes hanging by its strings on the brake handle at the side of the wagon he was a little surprised himself.

THE ERIE TROUBLE.

THE CLAIMS OF THE MEN.

To the General Manager of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railway Systems:

We, the federated body of employes of the New York, Lake Erie and Western system, composed of engineers, conductors, firemen and trainmen, through our representatives, respectfully submit to you the following schedule of pay and regulations to govern said employes, to which we expect a just and satisfactory answer, within a reasonable length of time:

Articles 1 to 48, inclusive, to govern engineers and firemen.

Articles 49 to 83, inclusive, to govern conductors and trainmen.

ARTICLE 1.—Ten hours or less to constitute a day's work; overtime 1-10 day per hour. The balance of our present agreement to remain as at present, except as hereinafter provided for, and all present time allowances to remain as at present, excepting as hereinafter provided for.

ART. 2.—Engineers in road and construction service, $3.75 per day. In switching service $3.25 per day. Deadheading, one-half actual trip rates.

ART. 3.—Firemen in road and construction service, $2.30 per day. In switching service, $2.15 per day. Hostlers, $2.40 per day. Deadheading, one-half actual trip rates.

ART. 4.—Engineers and firemen called for a train which is subsequently annulled shall receive one-half day.

ART. 5.—Engineers and firemen used as witnesses in suits brought or defended by the company shall be allowed actual trip rates for trips lost, plus day rates for time consumed when trips are not lost, plus expenses. Payment for witness service shall be by voucher.

ART. 6.—Wrecking service is special service, the time allowance for which must be determined by the circumstances of each individual case. Engineers and firemen called to make their regular trips and are requested to do switching, pushing, construction work or other duty not pertaining to their own train, shall be paid one-tenth day per hour, while so engaged.

ART. 7.—Qualification being equal the oldest man shall have the preference to engines and trains.

ART. 8.—All vacancies of regular runs or jobs shall be advertised on all bulletin boards and such vacancies given to the oldest man in accordance with the roll of honor, providing always that such applicant so advanced, shall be determined to be thoroughly competent for such position.

ART. 9.—No engineer or fireman shall be discharged or suspended without a fair and impartial trial with a member of his own organization present, the same to take place within five days after suspension. Engineers or firemen found blameless shall be allowed full pay for all time lost.

ART. 10.—Engineers or firemen on trial may have the privilege of calling in and having present during the investigation any actual witness of the offense being investigated.

ART. 11.—For every two firemen promoted, one engineer shall be hired. The engineers hired shall pass the same examination as the firemen, and take rank on the roster behind the last promoted man. All applications for the position of engineer shall register their names and the men shall be sent for in rotation, if they can be found, if not, keep on down the list until a qualified man is found. Application books shall be open for inspection at all times at master mechanics' offices.

ART. 12.—All suspensions of engineers or firemen shall be definite, the time of suspension to be computed from the time the party was originally taken off, pending investigation.

ART. 13.—Monthly passes good over the Erie system shall be furnished all engineers and firemen as long as they continue in the service of the company.

ART. 14.—An engineer or fireman leaving the service (either discharged or of his choice) shall be furnished a letter, signed by the master mechanic and superintendent, with the stamp or seal of office affixed, stating his qualifications.

ART. 15.—Work report books will be opened and maintained at all terminal roundhouses.

ART. 16.—Hostlers to be stationed and used as follows: Jersey City, all through trains arriving. Bergen, for east bound incoming trains only. Newburg, for passenger engines arriving and departing only. Port Jervis, all engines, both passenger and freight, arriving only. Ssquehanna, for eastbound passenger engines arriving only, and both eastbound and westbound freight engines arriving only. Hornellsville, passenger engines, both east and westbound, arriving and departing, and freight engines arriving. Buffalo, for all passenger engines, both arriving and departing, and for all freight engines arriving and departing. Freight engines will be brought from roundhouse to JU by hostlers, to be taken from there by road crews. That hostlers carry engineers and firemen on their arrival at Buffalo from the shop to Louisiana street between the hours of 9 p. m. and 5 a. m. Salamanca, for passenger engines, both arriving and departing, arriving freight engines to be turned over to hostlers on ash pit. Bradford, passenger engines arriving and departing, freight engines arriving only. Meadville, Kent, Galion, Cleveland, Youngstown, O., Carbondale, Chicago, Huntington, same as at present. At Marion, the same as at Chicago now. At Binghamton, one day and one night. Engines to be turned at Youngstown and Bradford by roundhouse men. It is understood that round trip rates cover the service of handling locomotives at turning points, Elmira, one hostler nights.

ART. 17.—Engine crews running regular trains shall be furnished an engine for making each regular run and shall be permitted to run consecutively during the month.

ART. 18.—Engineers and firemen, on every other-day runs, shall be at liberty on arrival in from return trip, provided that it is understood that engineers or firemen, (when notified on their arrival in from such runs that they may possibly be wanted for special service before their regular time for going out) shall not absent themselves from their houses or boarding places without keeping the superintendent advised where they can be found; provided also, that under such circumstances there shall be no claim for compensation on the part of the engineers or firemen, unless held at round-houses or on their engines by special instructions, in which case they shall be allowed one-tenth day per hour as in case of overtime.

ART. 19. All committees of engineers and firemen will be cheerfully granted leave of absence, as soon as possible after applied for, when they wish to present any matters to any of the officials of the company.

ART. 20. The matter of making up freight trains is one for which no general rule can be established, and it must be determined by the proper officers, who have intimate knowledge of local conditions.

ART. 21. Calling cards (the same as now used on the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio,) to be used on the Erie proper. The time designated on such card as the leaving time of the train shall be the time from which the allowance is to be computed. This shall not be construed as implying that the company agrees to make any provision for calling engineers and firemen who live any unreasonable distance from engine dispatcher's office. All engineers and firemen on the Chicago and Erie shall be called for all trains, caller to be furnished with book to be signed when called, time to commence one hour after.

ART. 22. Road engineers and firemen who have become disqualified for road service, whether by age, sickness or accident, if able to properly do switching service, may drop back into switching service at road rates.

ART. 23. The firemen's roll of honor shall be carefully revised every six months, to the satisfaction of the officials and firemen's committee.

ART. 24. No fireman shall run an engine without having first passed examination and taken grade as an engineer.

ART. 25. The present system of examination of firemen for promotion to engineer to be continued.

ART. 26. Engines on the rounds, when having no regular crew or crews assigned to them, shall have oil cans filled, lamps filled and trimmed (but not lighted) by round-house men, and no fireman shall be required to clean or build fire, hostler or turn their engines or take coal at terminal points.

ART. 27. Firemen will not be required to clean engines below the running boards, and we request that the company furnish men to take care of and paint all front ends and stacks.

ART. 28.—Hereafter, in filling hostlerships, the oldest fireman applying for the position as hostler shall take and hold the same until his turn for promotion or a better job of firing is advertised.

ART. 29.—Jefferson division—All engines and trains round trip between Susquehanna and Carbondale, one and one-sixth days; overtime as per article 1.

ART. 30.—Eastern division—The rates for switching engines at Jersey City car shops, Newark, Paterson, Newburgh, Goshen, Middletown and Port Jervis coal pockets to be the new rates for switching service, except in those cases where special rates have already been established for individual reasons.

The runs from Port Jervis to Newburgh and return, to be allowed one and one-half days, over time, as per article 1. New York and Greenwood Lake engineers and firemen to receive main line pay.

ART. 31.—Delaware Division.—The run from Port Jervis to Honesdale and thence to Lackawaxen and Susquehanna to be rated as one and five-sixths days. It is not agreed that an engine especially for switching service shall be stationed at Honesdale. The run from Port Jervis to Lackawaxen and return to be paid three-quarters of a day; over seven and under ten hours, one day. The run from Susquehanna to Deposit and return to be allowed one half day; over five and under seven hours, three-quarters of a day; over seven and under ten hours, one day; overtime as per article 1.

ART. 32.—Susquehanna Division—Engine crews hauling trains 17 and 18 to be allowed one day for trip between Binghamton and Corning.

ART. 33.—Western and Bradford Division—Western and Bradford division, no change asked for.

ART. 34.—Buffalo division—Engine crews hauling trains 16, 11, 21, 22, 19 and 31 between Buffalo and Avon, will be allowed one and one-quarter day for each round trip. The case of the engine working between Buffalo and Black Rock is already especially provided for, by allowing the crews road pay for switching service. Switching engine in service at Castile to be paid for at road rates. Switching engine in service at Tonawanda to be paid for at switching rates.

ART. 35.—Rochester division.—Switching engine at Avon and Rochester to be classed as at present, and rates as in switching service. Engine crews hauling train 2 and 3 between Rochester and Elmira, be allowed one and one-sixth days per single trip.

ART. 36.—Buffalo and Southwestern division.—Way freights and runs between Buffalo and Dayton and return, one and one-sixth days. Buffalo and Southwestern switch engine at Buffalo be considered a road job, and be paid road rates. Overtime as per article 1.

ART. 37.—1st Division, N. Y., P. and O.—The run between Meadville and Jamestown to be paid one and one-half days round trip; two days if over twenty hours; over time as per article 1.

ART. 38.—2nd Division, N. Y., P. and O.—The run between Kent and Leavittsburg to be paid three-quarters of a day; over seven and less than ten hours, one day. The run between Meadville and Leavittsburg one and one-half days, and two days if over twenty hours. Overtime as per article 1.

ART. 39.—3rd Division, N. Y., P. and O.—No changes, except that local freights will be allowed one and one-sixth time. Switching crew at Silver Creek will be allowed road rates.

ART. 40.—4th Division, N. Y., P. and O.—All through trains, passenger and freight, will be allowed one and one-tenth days; all local freights, one and one-sixth days; one round trip between Galion shop and Marion junction to be allowed one-half day; over five and less than seven hours three-quarters of a day; over seven and less than ten hours one day; overtime as per article 1.

ART. 41.—Mahoning Division, N. Y., P. and O.—All local freight trains on Mahoning Division, receive one and one-sixth days; overtime as per article 1.

All time consumed between Cleveland and Youngstown through freight round trips over seventeen hours shall be paid overtime at the rate of one-tenth day per hour. Time allowance to remain as at present, one and five-eighths days.

All time consumed on through freight trains, round trip between Cleveland and Niles, over fourteen hours shall be paid overtime at the rate of one-tenth day per hour. Time allowance same as at present, one and three-eighths days.

All time consumed on through freight trains between Cleveland and Leavittsburg over ten hour-round trip shall be paid for overtime as per article 1. Time allowance as at present, one day.

One round trip between Youngstown and Leavittsburg, if made in five hours or less, be paid one-half day; over five hours and under seven hours, three-quarters of a day; over seven hours and less than ten hours, one day; overtime as per article 1.

Engineers and firemen on regular helping engines between Cleveland and Randall, day and night, for all time consumed over ten hours, shall be paid overtime as per article 1.

Engineers and firemen on extra helping engine between Cleveland and Randall, one round trip of five hours or less to constitute one-half a day; over five and under seven hours, three-quarters of a day; over seven and less than ten hours, one day; overtime as per article 1.

Engineers and firemen on local freights between New Lisbon and Niles, round trip, to be allowed one and one-sixth days; overtime as per article 1.

Engineers and firemen through freight trains between Niles and Leetonia, one round trip of five hours or less to be paid one half day; over five and less than seven hours three-quarters of a day; and over seven and less than ten hours one day.

Two round trips ten hours or less, one day; overtime as per article 1. One round trip on passenger train between Cleveland and Youngstown shall constitute one and one-third days; between Cleveland and Leavittsburg one day; between Cleveland and Mantua one day. Two round trips on passenger between New Lisbon and Niles shall be paid one and one-quarter days.

One round trip between Youngstown and Sharpsville or Sharon, if made in five hours or less, one-half day; over five and less than seven hours three-quarters of a day; and over seven and less than ten hours one day; overtime as per article 1. One round trip between Youngstown and Shenango, if made in seven hours or less, three-quarters of a day; over seven and less than ten hours one day. tween Huntington and Marion, one and three-quarter days, overtime to commence after fourteen hours. Locals between Huntington and North Judson, one and one-sixth days; overtime to commence after ten hours. Locals between North Judson and Chicago one and one-sixth days; overtime to commence after ten hours. Transfer engines between Hammond and Griffith to receive road pay. Round trip between Marion and Lima, one and one-sixth days; overtime to commence after ten hours. Round trip between Huntington and North Judson, one and one-half days; overtime to commence after fourteen hours. Trains 6 and 7 between Huntington and Marion be allowed one and one-half days, while hauling freight cars. The oldest men to have the preference of runs regardless of divisions.

ART. 49.—The following schedule of pay and regulations to govern train conductors and train flagmen and brakemen on freight and passenger trains on the Erie railway and leased lines, including the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio railway and the Chicago and Erie railway, in effect.

ART. 50.—Local passenger trains to be based on a daily mileage of 120 miles. Conductors of local passenger trains to receive $3.46 per day of 120 miles or less, and three cents per mile for additional mileage; flagmen $2.10 per day and 21.10 cents per mile for additional mileage; brakemen, $2 per day and two cents per for additional mileage.

ART. 51.—Through passenger and express trains, including Wells Fargo express trains, to be based on a daily mileage of 150 miles. The conductors of through passenger trains to receive $3.46 per day for 160 miles or less, and three cents per mile for additional mileage; flagmen, $2.10 per day and two and one-tenth cents per mile for additional mileage; brakemen, $2 per day and two cents per mile for additional mileage. In all cases, when by reason of exceptionally hard runs, unusual hours, or for any other reason, less than 120 miles for local and 150 miles for through passenger trains is now computed as a day's work, no change in mileage to be made.

ART. 52.—Turn-around trips, either on through passenger or local passenger trains, of 105 miles to be computed as 120 miles, and overtime to be allowed for additional mileage, as provided in article 50. Any passenger train making stops at half of the stations on any division shall be classed as a local passenger train within the meaning of articles 50 and 51.

ART. 53.—Conductors of mixed passenger and freight trains to receive $3.46 per day for 100 miles or less, and three and one quarter cents per mile for additional mileage; flagmen $2.10 per day and two and one-tenth cents per mile for additional mileage; brakemen $2 per day and two cents per mile for additional mileage. Turn-around trips of eighty-five miles with mixed trains to be computed as 100 miles.

ART. 54.—Conductors of local freight, through freight, stock, and coal trains to receive $3.25 per day; flagmen $2.10 per day; brakemen $2 per day. On turn-around trips trainmen are to be considered on duty until the round trip is completed, and overtime allowed as provided in article 55.

ART. 55.—On all freight runs of 100 miles or less, consuming more than ten hours to make the run, overtime will be paid as follows: All overtime to be computed according to the rate per day of each class: one hour to constitute one-tenth day; no fraction of an hour less than thirty minutes to be counted; any fraction of an hour over thirty minutes to be counted as one hour. Trainmen required to remain on duty over thirty minutes after arriving at main line terminal stations to receive overtime at the rate herein provided. For freight runs exceeding 100 miles, trainmen to be paid for all overtime used to complete the trip in excess of an average speed of ten miles per hour. No crews to receive less time than they are now allowed for their runs; and further provided that conductors, flagmen and brakemen in freight service shall be allowed the same time for the same work that is allowed to engineers and firemen.

ART. 56.—Freight or passenger crews making extra trips in addition to their regular assigned runs, will be allowed extra time upon the basis of pay allowed other crews in similar service. Excursion trains, pay trains, officers' trains and special passenger trains of any kind shall be paid upon the basis of articles 50 and 52.

ART. 57.—Construction trains to be paid as follows: Conductors, $90 per month, flagmen, $63 per month, brakemen, $60 per month. Twenty-six or twenty-seven days per calendar month to constitute a month's work, and ten hours to constitute a day's work. For any extra service overtime to be allowed; conductors, thirty cents per hour; flagmen, twenty-one cents per hour; brakemen, twenty cents per hour. When a conductor acts as foreman of a construction train he shall receive $15 per month extra.

ART. 58.—Conductors of pusher engines to receive $2.75 per day of ten hours, and extra pay for overtime at the rate of twenty-five cents per hour.

ART. 58.—No train to be run on the road without a conductor.

ART. 60.—Conductors, flagmen and brakemen called to go to wrecks, washout, or bucking snow to receive thirty, twenty-one and twenty cents per hour respectively. No time of less than one day to be allowed for this class of service.

ART. 61.—When conductors, flagmen and brakemen are called to go out, their time shall commence at the time specified for them to leave, and if the train is annulled they are to be paid at the rate of thirty, twenty-one and twenty cents per hour, respectively, until notified that such train is annulled or until relieved from duty. Not less than one-half day to be allowed under this rule.

This rule to apply to trainmen who report for duty on their regular assigned runs without being called.

ART. 62.—Conductors, flagmen and brakemen attending court at the request of an official of the company, will be paid at the same rate he would have been entitled to had he remained on the run and if away from his home station he shall receive his legitimate expenses in addition thereto.

ART. 63.—Conductors, flagmen and brakemen deadheading to any point on company's business, to be allowed half time at their regular rate, this rate to be on the basis of the work to be performed, and for which the deadhead trip was made.

ART. 64.—Passenger and freight conductors, flagmen and brakemen, after a continuous service of eighteen hours or more, shall be entitled to ten hours rest, if they so desire, before they are called again for service, except in cases of wrecks, wash-outs or other similar emergencies. No trainman to be required to go out when sick or physically disqualified.

ART. 65.—Conductors, flagmen and brakemen are not to be dismissed or suspended from the company's service, without just cause. All suspensions of trainmen to be definite. In case of suspension or dismissal of any conductor, flagman or brakeman, who believes his sentence to be unjust, he shall have the right, within five days, to refer his case by written statement to the division superintendent. Within five days of the receipt of this notice, the superintendent shall give his case a thorough investigation, at which the aggrieved employé may be present if he desires, and also be represented by a disinterested employé of his own grade, whom he may select. In case he shall not be satisfied with the result of said investigation, he shall have the right to appeal his case to the general superintendent or general manager. In case suspension or dismissal is found to be unjust, he shall be reinstated and paid for all time lost. In case of suspension the time shall date from the day the man was first taken off his run for investigation.

ART. 66. A conductor, flagman or brakemen leaving the service of the company (either discharged or of his own accord) shall be given a letter signed by the division superintendent with the stamp or seal of his office affixed, stating the record and time of service, etc., of said employé.

ART. 67. Committees of conductors or trainmen to be granted leave of absence as soon as possible after applying for same, when they desire to present any matter to any of the officials of this company.

ART. 68. All conductors, flagmen and brakemen are to be regarded as in line of promotion, and qualifications being equal, the man longest in the service of this company to have the preference of trains and runs. This rule not to effect any promotions already made. Promotions to the positions of passenger or freight conductors and trainmaster to be confined to men in train service. Any trainman promoted to conductor, and any freight conductor promoted to passenger conductor, shall be considered as in line of further promotion, dating from the time the first promotion was made, without regard to men who might have been older in the service at the time the first promotion was made.

ART. 69. When freight traffic is light and it is necessary to reduce the number of crews in order to allow conductors and trainmen to make reasonable wages, the conductors of crews thus taken off to be given preference as flagmen and brakemen, until such times as an increase of business requires more crews, when said conductors shall be reinstated in the order in which they were taken off, flagmen and brakemen to be provided for in the same manner as above. Every employé to understand that it is his privilege to make written appeals to his division superintendent whenever, by promotions, reductions or assignments, he deems an injustice has been done him.

ART. 70. In assigning conductors or trainmen to trains, due consideration shall be given to age and location, by reason of residence; and whenever practicable they shall be allowed to take such local or through runs as they shall desire, by reason of the advantage to them of residence, at points where such local or through runs may lay over; and no conductor or trainman shall lose any right or be deprived of the advantage of any better paying run shall he desire to accept of runs under the above conditions.

ART. 71. Any conductor or trainman who has become disqualified for road or yard service, whether by age, sickness or accident, the company shall furnish such person employment suitable to his condition.

ART. 72. All local freight crews on the Western and Mahoning divisions of the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio and the eastern division of the Chicago and Erie, and on all other locals where they are now employed, to have three brakemen and one flagman.

ART. 73.—Train baggagemen on through trains between New York and Chicago and Cincinnati to receive thirteen mills per mile, and all division, branch and turn-around runs to be allowed the same time that crews receive on same runs. No train-baggageman to receive less pay than the flagman on the same run receives.

ART. 74.—No parties to this agreement shall be required to pay for supplies used in the discharge of their respective duties.

ART. 75.—All trainmen, after two years' service for this company, shall receive monthly passes, good over the road and branches upon which they are employed.

ART. 76.—Passenger conductors to be granted relief from making the following reports: The monthly passenger reports form 227; daily train card, form 877; and from reporting other than the total mileage on mileage books; also from giving classification and number of tickets on back of form 890.

ART. 77.—Men regularly assigned to passenger service are not to be called upon to run freight trains.

ART. 78.—All passenger trains consisting of more than four cars are to have at least one brakeman in addition to the flagman and baggageman employed upon the train.

ART. 79.—Trainmen will be called at terminal stations by a train caller, who will be provided with a book in which the men called shall register their names, with the time they were called, for reference.

ART. 80.—Yard Men.—Day foremen in yards to receive not less than $2.75 per day. Night foreman to receive not less than $2.75 per night. Day brakemen to receive not less than $2.30 per day, and night brakemen not to receive less than $2.50 per night. Less than five hours shall constitute one-half a day's work, and over five hours one full day's work, and overtime as per article 55.

ART. 81.—Whenever a vacancy occurs on any train, it shall be regularly advertised in the bulletin books on the division for a space of at least twenty days.

ART. 82.—No pusher engine shall be used to push trains on diversified grades, but when pusher or helper engines are used, except on hills or steady up grades, both engines shall be coupled on the front end of the train.

ART. 83.—Trainmen not to be required to turn engines at Bradford and Youngstown.

President King's Reply.

NEW YORK, Oct. 9, 1890.

To the engineers, conductors, firemen and trainmen of the lines of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company.

There has been presented to this company by certain of its employés "a schedule of pay and regulations," accompanied by the statement that "a just and satisfactory answer is expected within a reasonable length of time." The schedule consists of eighty-three distinct articles "to govern engineers and firemen, conductors and trainmen." A copy of the schedule is attached to this answer.

The rights and duties of engineers and firemen of this company are fixed by detailed regulations, which were made by the company in 1887, as the result of nearly a week's consultation with those classes of its employés. The arrangement thus made was at the time accepted by them as entirely just and satisfactory, and, so far as they are concerned, is expressly recognized by the first paragraph of the schedule now presented as constituting an "agreement." Although this arrangement has proved in many respects onerous, so far as its interests have been concerned, still the company has carried it out with the utmost good faith. So fully, indeed, has it done this that since the arrangement was made not a single charge to the contrary, not a single complaint regarding the administration of these regulations has never been brought before the chief executive officers of the company. No reasons are suggested why this arrangement, which three years ago had the approval of the employés interested and which has since worked so satisfactorily with them, should now be changed to the disadvantage of the company, and no such reasons can be found in the condition of railroad business generally or of this company particularly.

Many of the articles contained in the schedule now presented express what is already the practice of the company. As no changes in regard to these matters are contemplated they need not be further considered. A large number of the proposed articles provide in various forms for increase in compensation. It is not suggested that since the present rates were fixed there has been any change in the state of affairs warranting the same. On the contrary, the well-known fact is that the earnings of the company per ton per mile have, in common with all other railroad companies, steadily decreased. It is not claimed that higher rates are currently paid for similar services or that the company is able to pay higher rates consistently with its obligations to the public and to the holders of its securities; and the facts are distinctly to the contrary. Since the receipt of the proposed schedule a careful comparison has been made by the officers of this company between the rates of wages paid upon its lines to engineers, firemen, conductors and trainmen, and those paid upon the principal competing and adjacent lines. The facts upon which the comparison is based must be known to railroad employés generally. In making the comparison on roads where wages are paid by the month, they have been reduced to pay per mile run, and the same has been done with the trip system in force upon this line. The rates paid upon the Erie road, based on 100 miles service, compare with the average rates paid upon the principal competing and adjacent lines for similar service as follows:

Pass. and freight engineers.....	64 cents in excess
Passenger firemen	41 cents in excess
Freight firemen	30 cents in excess
Passenger conductors	22 cents in excess
Freight conductors	71 cents in excess
Passenger brakemen	12 cents in excess
Freight brakemen	34 cents in excess

The rates paid upon the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio road, based on 100 miles service, compared with the average rates paid upon the principal competing and adjacent lines for similar service as follows:

Passenger engineers.....	28 cents in excess
Freight engineers.....	3 cents in excess
Passenger firemen	31 cents in excess
Freight firemen	22 cents in excess
Freight train flagmen.....	4 cents in excess
Freight conductors.....	11 cents in excess
Freight brakemen.....	The same.
Passenger conductors	40 cents less.
Passenger train flagmen	12 cents less.
Passenger brakemen	13 cents less.

So far as concerns the Mahoning division, as has recently been demonstrated to a committee of the employés by the general superintendent, not only do the rates of wages and the hours of service thereon conform to those of other roads with which this company competes, running from the lake ports to the ore and coal districts, but any increase in these rates would put this company at a disadvantage as regards its competitors in a manner which would ultimately compel it to do the work in question without remuneration to others than its employés.

The rates paid upon the Chicago and Erie compare with the average rates paid upon its principal competing lines for similar service, as follows:

Passenger engineers.....	11½ cents in excess
Freight engineers.....	8½ cents in excess
Passenger firemen	21½ cents in excess
Freight firemen.....	4 cents in excess
Freight conductors.....	21 cents in excess
Freight brakemen.....	19 cents in excess
Pass. conductors.....	$13.69 per month in excess
Passenger brakemen.....	$1.61 per month in excess

In addition to this, a careful computation of the pay rolls for the past year shows that the rates and allowances requested would increase the pay rolls of the Erie system to the amount of $1,034,000 per annum. Moreover, it would naturally follow that justice to the employés of classes other than those engaged in the train service would make them participants in any general advance, and the addition to the burdens of the company would, therefore, be still greater. The sum named is in excess of the average earnings of the company for the last five years above its fixed charges, which latter must necessarily be met in order to prevent the company from insolvency and the property from disintegration. The company desires to secure the very best character of services, and recognize that to do so it is necessary to pay wages at an equal rate with its competitors. The foregoing facts show that it does more than this. But the proper rate of wages depends not upon what the employés would like to get, nor upon what the company would like to pay, but upon what, in view of rates upon other lines and the nature of the competition to be met, the company is able to pay consistently with its own continued existence. As has been said, whatever change in the condition of railroad business has taken place since the present rate of wages were fixed has been to the disadvantage of the company. It is manifest, therefore, that any such general increase is impracticable. It will, however, be observed that the comparison which has been made discloses that the rate of wages paid upon the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio line are, in some instances, below the average paid upon adjacent lines. The general superintendent has been instructed to give these matters his attention and to readjust the rates of wages to conform to conditions existing on competitive lines as far as practicable.

One of the articles of the schedule proposes that ten hours or less shall constitute a day's work, and overtime shall be paid for at the rate of one-tenth day per hour. While this apparently relates to the length of time during which employes shall be upon duty, it is in fact a proposition for increase of wages. The proposition is not to limit continuous hours of work to ten, but is merely that any time beyond that limit shall be paid for as extra work. The system of pay in force is the trip system; all runs are computed as a day or more than a day, as the length of the division may warrant. For instance the run from Jersey City to Port Jervis, a distance of eighty-seven miles and occupying on some passenger trains less than three hours is counted and paid for as a days' work; from Port Jervis to Susquehanna 104 miles, occupying on passenger trains an average of three and a quarter hours is counted and paid for as one and one sixth days work; from Susquehanna to Hornellsville, 140 miles, the average time for a passenger train is four hours and the longest schedule time of a freight train is eleven hours and fifty minutes and each of these is counted and paid for as one and one-half day's work.

From these illustrations it is manifest that many of the runs regularly occupy much less than ten hours. The present proposition is that for every hour in excess of ten occupied by a run additional wages shall be paid. But if the runs are to be paid for strictly by the hour it would naturally follow that, for every hour less than ten, wages should be correspondingly reduced. Although this would be manifestly equitable, no suggestion of the sort is made in the article in question. Such an arrangement would be greatly to the advantage of the company. For the number of hours by which the runs fall short of ten is far more than the number in excess thereof. When there are unusual delays the trainmen are on duty and in charge of their trains, but rarely perform any actual labor, the time is occupied merely in waiting upon sidings or at terminals; and their position is quite similar to that of delayed passengers. If these unusual detentions continue so that the trainmen are on duty for more than twelve hours, they are paid for every hour thereafter at the rate of one-tenth of a day's wages. The proposition of the article now under consideration is that this payment should begin at the expiration of ten hours rather than of twelve hours. The proposition, is therefore, as has been said, not for a reduction of hours of labor but for an increase of compensation. The reasons already given show why an increase in compensation is impracticable under existing conditions. The comparisons above stated show that the wages paid already exceed those paid upon competing and adjacent lines. If the allowance for overtime were increased it would merely increase this disadvantage upon the part of the company. The present arrangement is more liberal than that ordinarily prevailing. For on many roads no overtime whatever is allowed; while upon others an allowance is made only in case of failure to promptly enter yards at terminal points. And it may be observed that a change which would make delay in operation more advantageous to those in charge of the trains would not conduce to efficiency of the service. As has been said, the article in question proposes increase in wages, not reduction in the hours of work. But it may not be out of place to say here that the present application has led to the conclusion, that by reason of the recent rapid increase in the tonnage of the road, the number of trains run on the eastern and Susquehanna divisions, is in excess of the facilities of those divisions and that some classes of freight trains are, therefore, at times unduly delayed. This can be remedied only by an increase of side track facilities which will enable trains to pass over those divisions in shorter time. Orders have been given for the construction thereof and the work will be rapidly completed. It is believed that this will remedy any unnecessary detentions to trains upon those divisions; but if it does not, other measures will be adopted to prevent any excessive hours of work occasioned by increased volume of business.

Many of the articles contained in the schedule proposed relate wholly to matters of discipline, administration and operation of the road. For many years most pleasant and cordial relations have existed between the company and its employes. Their well being and individual convenience have been constantly studied. Every officer of the company has been readily accessible to their suggestion and requests and the same have received careful and respectful consideration. The company realizes that a fair and considerate course of action toward its employes alone can secure for them the efficient service which is necessary to the successful operation of its road and the full discharge of its duties to the public. Its past course in these matters is a guaranty for the future far more effectual than would be any attempted contract upon the subject. But it must be remembered that the obligations of the company are not merely to its employes. It is charged with grave duties to the state which has granted its franchise by virtue of which it exists; to those who have loaned to it the money which has paid for construction of its works; to the communities which it serves and which depend upon it for their prosperity, and to the persons who entrust to it their lives and property. The law has imposed the responsibility for performance of these various duties upon the directors and officers, and has for the purpose of securing such performance, committed to them the management and administration of the property. It is beyond their power to delegate their duties to others or to limit by contract the wise discretion which it is their bounden duty to exercise. The company, therefore, could not, if it would, enter into any agreement in regard to these matters. Such parts of the corporate business as the hiring, promotion and discharge of employes; their duties and discipline while in the service of the company and the methods of enforcing the same, cannot, therefore, be delegated or made the subject of contract obligation.

Under the present practice all employes charged with neglect of duty are afforded a full investigation with the opportunity, if they deem themselves aggrieved, to appeal to the highest officers of the company. Appointments and promotions are made with careful reference to the qualifications and length of service of the individuals. The discipline and duties of the employes, as their compensation, have been fully as favorable to them as those prevailing upon other lines. The company is now requested to bind itself by cast iron rules for an indefinite time to the exclusion of the exercise of any discretion by those to whom such questions are committed by law, namely, the officers and directors for the time being. As has been already said, the company has no such power. In any event, the present state of affairs suggests that there would be no advantage in endeavoring to do so. For, only three years ago, the relations of the company to its engineers and firemen were expressed in elaborate regulations with the approval of those employes. Yet those regulations are now, without any cause therefore being suggested, sought to be materially changed. Moreover, one or two of the suggestions now made may be referred to as showing how manifestly objectionable it would be to attempt this method of managing the corporate business.

One of the proposed articles is that for every two firemen promoted to the position of engineer, one engineer shall be hired from among those not already in the company's service. For many years the company has pursued the policy of promoting engineers from among its own employes. Largely the supply has been drawn originally from the range of freight train brakemen. To undertake to hire an outside man for every two promoted would be to debar one-third of the firemen and brakemen from the chance of promotion to one of the most lucrative positions in the company's train service. A fireman ordinarily serves from three to four years before he becomes an engineer. It would manifestly be unfair to the firemen and prejudicial to the service to increase that term merely with the result of providing employment for outsiders. The good of the employes and the efficiency, of the service are the only considerations which can have weight in such matters.

Again, one of the articles is that promotion shall be made of the oldest men. That is the ordinary practice with the company. But it may well be that the oldest man is not the most desirable or competent person for the higher position, and that his promotion would be injurious to the service. As the superior officers are responsible for its efficiency, they should have the right to decide such questions. Opportunity should be given for the recognition of individual ability and merit, and the way left open for every individual to rise to the highest position in the service of the company.

Still further, it is requested that passes over the entire system shall be granted to all trainmen. At present division superintendents issue passes to their employes and their families over their own divisions, whether traveling on the company's business or not; and requests for passes over other divisions for employes and their families are granted as occasion requires. But to extend this and permit indiscriminate travel over the lines by all classes of employes would not be consistent with good discipline or proper service to the public, which requires that they should be at their posts of duty, or when not on duty be within the reach of the proper officers unless granted leave of absence. If the employes without the knowledge of their superior officers could be at any time hundreds of miles away, those officers would never know upon what force they could rely.

If it were necessary numerous other illustrations could be drawn from the schedule now proposed of the unfortunate effects which would follow any attempt to administer the corporate business by any general contract.

A number of the articles, however, refer to local conditions such as the readjustment of runs, the amount of rest allowed, the making of reports and similar matters. These will be at once taken up by the superintendents of the divisions affected and their action will be communicated to the employes interested. In these matters every effort will be made to satisfactorily meet the views of the employes.

In conclusion, then, the company is unable to advance wages generally. It does not expect or desire to pay less wages for similar service than those paid upon competing and adjacent roads, but on the other hand, as it cannot obtain higher rates for transportation, it cannot afford to pay rates higher than its competitors. And the fact is that its present rates are without exception higher than the average paid by them. In a few instances where this is not the case the company will, however, readjust its rates. In addition to these reasons for not making the advance now requested, the same, as has been shown, is beyond the company's means.

So far as the management of the corporate business and the employment and discipline of the company's officials are concerned, those matters are committed by the law to the wise discretion of the officers and directors in office when questions regarding the same may from time to time arise. No one has power to make any arrangements or contracts which will be effectual to deprive them of that discretion. The interests of all concerned—of the employes no less than of all others—require that the law in these respects should be obeyed, and the stability and efficiency of the corporation be thus insured. But the officers of the company will continue in the future as they have in the past to faithfully endeavor to promote the welfare of each and every employe, as well as the efficiency of the service.

Inasmuch as the subject of this correspondence is one affecting the interest of every employe, it is proper that all should be fully informed of the position of this company; and, therefore, this answer to the schedule is addressed to all employes, not merely to those who presented it.

JOHN KING,
President New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company.

The S. M. A. A. and Couplers.

The following is the portion of the report of the Switchmen's committee referring to the coupler question, which was adopted by the convention.

As to the draw-bar question, we, your committee, respectfully submit that we have carefully considered all facts submitted to us and have obtained much valuable information from delegates, and have also familiarized ourselves with the communications from railroad officials which were handed to us by Vice-Grand Master Downey, and would say that it is a vexed and difficult subject to handle. We, as yard men, have watched for years the many devices put out for connecting cars, and many of them are so impracticable for freight service as to be a disgrace to the inventors. Knowing their defects and the great losses sustained by the railroads in consequence of their use it is but justice to our own safety and a greater duty to our families dependent upon us for support that we come squarely out, face the issue, and in the plainest language give expression to our convictions of right and justice to switchmen. This we must do if we are ever to hope for relief from the dangers to which we are exposed when coupling and uncoupling freight cars. Therefore, we recommend the adoption as a standard of a single improved draft iron link and pin coupler, with recess in face of drawhead for protection of hands and fingers, until some automatic coupler has been produced more satisfactory than any yet brought to our notice, which above conclusion we have reached after examining the reports on draw-bars submitted to us from numerous subordinate lodges, and we recommend that all draft irons be placed at uniform height from the rail, and that hand rails be attached to the ends of all cars.

We further recommend that the legislature of those states that have not already done so be requested to enact such laws as will insure some protection from the deadly frog and guard rail. We have investigated the Mahoney Foot Guard and earnestly recommend its adoption by the various railway companies.

Train Orders.

"A Conductor" asks us where trains 8 and 9 should meet after having received the following orders:

Order No. 1, at A.

C. & E. No. 9,—Meet No. 8 at B.

Order No. 2, at B.

C. & E. No. 9,—Meet No. 8 at C. instead of B.
Order No. 3, at B.

C. & E. No. 9,—Order No. 2, is annulled.

This is the same old question about which there has been so much misunderstanding in the past and which has been discussed in the columns of THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR several different times, only in this case there seems less cause than usual for any misunderstanding.

It is the position of THE CONDUCTOR that in the absence of any rule to the contrary, any order annuls any former order or part of any former order that refers to the same subject or movement and we believe that practically all experienced trainmen will agree with us that this is the only safe course. With this understanding, when order No. 2 was given order No. 1 was annulled as completely as if it had never been given and when order No. 3 was given annulling order No. 2, train 9 was left without any orders whatever relating to meeting No. 8 and should therefore proceed on its card rights. No. 9 was an east-bound train and had the right to the road over west-bound trains of the same class and consequently should proceed regardless of No. 8 except so far as the allowance for variation of time after reaching the card meeting point. Of course, if the conductor had any doubt as to the effect of the orders or if he had any reason whatever to think that the conductor of No. 8 would understand that annulling order No. 2 revived No. 1 and made the meeting point at B. it would be his duty to take such action as would avoid accident. No. 9 was clearly entitled to the road but that right would not justify the conductor in proceeding if he had reason to believe that it would be dangerous. In the case cited however, which was on the Southern Pacific we do not see how there could be any misunderstanding whatever; for in the rules governing train orders we find the following: "An order superceding another may be given, adding 'this supercedes order No.—'" or adding "instead of—". The example given being "No. 1 and 2 will meet at Sparta instead of Thebes." This demonstrates very clearly to our mind that order No. 2 superceded and made entirely void, order No. 1. Then comes a "clinch" in the following language: An order that has been annulled or superceded (italics ours,) must not be again restored by special order under its original number." And if it cannot be restored by special order, is it possible that any experienced trainman will for a moment claim that it can be restored without?

It is a fact well known to all, that custom on different roads has much to do with the understanding of rules and one who knows nothing of the customs of the trainmen on any road, is at a disadvantage in making any decision; as for instance, if it has been the universal custom on the Southern Pacific, carried out in practice, that annulling an order does restore a former one relating to the same movement, such a custom would make law for that road and in that case, No. 8 and No. 9 would meet at B., under order No. 1. We are firmly of the opinion, however, that if any such practice is in vogue there or anywhere else, it should be immediately abolished and that it is a very dangerous one.

WOMEN AS ADVERTISING AGENTS.

Another business which women are entering is that of advertising agents, and in this they have succeeded admirably. Mrs. Susan C. Vogl, who has recently died, was for many years the advertising agent for the Woman's Journal, and she brought the paper into prosperity by her able endeavors. See made herself friends by her genial cordiality. She was true and honest, and her every statement could be relied upon. Men used to say sometimes that they would give Mrs. Vogl advertisements when they would not give them to any one else. It was Mrs. Vogl's sunniness that won every time, and her genuine good will to everybody. There are one or two advertising firms in Boston composed of women, and they do a very good business. They have a large number of patrons, and they control several newspapers. They evidently are making money, for everything about them bears the stamp of prosperity.

I know of only one woman who has undertaken railroad advertising, and she has done so well that her story is worth telling. She controls the advertising along the entire line of the New York and New England railroad, and no one can advertise without making the terms through her. When the Chicago fire occurred, she was a happy young wife, with a lovely little baby, living in the midst of luxury, for she was the petted daughter of rich parents, and the cherished wife of a still more wealthy man. This young couple had everything before them to make life bright and pleasant. Riches, social position, youth, a lovely home, a dear little girl—it seemed as though nothing was wanting. But the fire came, and swept away everything; the home, the property, all, and left them with little besides themselves, and their youth, their baby and their willing hands. If that had been the end! But the husband and father fell ill from exposure at the time of the fire, and died leaving the young wife and baby to face the world alone. They had something left, but not enough to live as the wife would like, and there would be the child to educate. So she came east and went to work. She had friends in plenty, and there were those who were ready to give her a home, and render it unnecessary to labor. But she was an independent body, and she proposed to work out her own destiny. She tried one or two things, going a step in advance every change that she made, until finally this opportunity came to her. It was a large undertaking, but it found a woman ready to meet it, and not only ready but entirely able. She undertook the work, and is making a great success of it. She has an office in Boston where she makes her contracts, attending personally to them for she has found that her own judgment is better than any one's whom she can obtain, and the terms are sure to be more satisfactory if she makes them herself. She is a capital business woman, and no man ever attempts taking unfair advantage because she is a woman. Throughout all she has remained the same refined, charming woman that she was when she was a purely society woman; and she is so evidently the gentlewoman that men become more gracious when in her presence, recognizing the womanly element even when in the most intricate of business problems. Her little daughter has grown to gracious sweet womanhood, under a careful mother's eye and is the housekeeper and home companion in a dear little cosy home in a fashionable quarter in Boston, where she is surrounded by the friends who have stood by her all through her career.

There is one thing that this woman does not do that I would like to emphasize. She does not consider it necessary, because she has her way to make in the world, and because she does it in the business world, to copy the dress and manners of the men whom she meets. She is essentially womanly in her dress and manner. She does not wear Henly shirts nor four-in-hand neckties. She is content to be a woman, and to keep her womanly ways. She wears, as she should simple tailor-made dress at her office, but there is no suggestion of mannishness about them. Her bonnets are becoming, and her hair prettily arranged. All the trifling accessories of the toilette are attended to, and she is as fresh and dainty in her office gown as she is in her pretty dresses at home.—SALLIE JOY WHITE, in October 1890 Awake.

The Volunteer Organist.

The gret big church wuz crowded full uv broad-cloth an' uv silk,

An' satin rich as cream that grows on ol' brindle's milk;

Shined boots, biled shirts, stiff dickeys an' stove-pipe hats were there,

An' doods 'ith trouserloons so tight they couldn' kneel down in prayer.

The elder in his poolpit high, said, as he slowly riz:

"Our organist is kep' to hum, laid up 'ith roomatiz, An' as we have no substitoot, as brother Moore ain't here,

Will some 'un in the congregation be so kind's to volunteer.

An' then a red nosed, drunken tramp, of low toned, rowdy style,

Gave an interductory hiccup, an' then staggered up the aisle,

Then thro' thet holy atmosphere there crep' a sense er sin,

An' thro' thet air of sanctity the odor uv ol' gin.

Then Deacon Purington he yelled, his teeth all sot on edge:

"This man perfan'es the house er God! W'y this is sacrilege!"

The tramp didn' hear a word he said, but slouched 'ith stumblin' feet,

An' sprawled an' staggered up the steps, an' gained the organ seat.

He then went pawrin' thro' the keys, an' soon there rose a strain,

Thet seemed to jest bulge out the heart, an' lectrify the brain;

An' then he slapped down on the thing 'ith hands an' head an' knees,

He slam-dashed his hull body down kerflop upon the keys.

The organ roared, the music flood went sweepin' high an' dry,

It swelled into the rafters, an' bulged out into the sky,

The ol' church shook an' staggered, an' seemed to reel an' sway,

An' the elder shouted "Glory!" an' I yelled out "Hooray."

An' then he tried a tender strain that melted in our ears,

Thet brought up blessed memories and drenched 'em down 'ith tears;

An' we dreamed uv ol'-time kitchens, 'ith Tabby on the mat,

Uv home, an' luv, an' baby-days, an' mother an' all that!

An' then he struck a streak uv hope—a song from souls forgiven—

Thet burst from prison-bars uv sin, an' stormed the gates uv Heaven;

The mornin' stars they sung together,—no soul was left alone,—

We felt the universe wuz safe, an' God wuz on his throne!

An' then a wail uv deep despair an' darkness come again,

An' a long, black crape hung on the doors uv all homes of men;

No luv, no light, no joy, no hope, no songs of glad delight,

An' then—the tramp, he staggered down and reeled into the night!

But we knew he'd told his story, tho' he never spoke a word,

An' it wuz the saddest story thet our ears had ever heard;

He hed tol' his own life history, an' no eye was dry thet day,

When the elder rose an' simply said: "My brethren let us pray."—S. W. Foss in Yankee Blade.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, Oct. 20, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I have been thinking and wondering how I could find words nice enough, and have been wishing for a whole vocabulary of them, in which to speak of the pleasureable and gratifying event occasioned by the installation of Banner Division No. 6, Ladies Auxiliary to O. R. C., at Toledo, Ohio. But as we are not gifted with a flow of beautiful language, we will proceed as best we can, knowing that simplicity is generally accepted, as it will necessarily have to be in this instance, for it would be impossible for our pen to portray what was inspired within us. October 9th was a very beautiful day—a day quite in keeping with our hearts, as we in company with eight of our Sisters of Division No. 3 boarded the train for Toledo, Ohio, via C. H. V. & T., arriving there about 10 o'clock A. M. We were received at the depot by a committee of ladies and gentlemen, who welcomed us just as O. R. C people can do. It was also our pleasure on arriving to meet a party of Sisters and Brothers of Elkhart, Ind., who lent their interest with their presence, which made our hearts beat with that feeling inspired only by the ties of fraternity.

After a delightful and exhilarating drive over the prosperous and beautiful city, and an excellent good dinner at the Jefferson, we found ourselves in good spirits and ready for the afternoon's work. The meeting was called for 2 P. M., at Friendship Hall, and at that time between fifty and sixty ladies, including visitors, had assembled. At 2:30 the doors were closed and business commenced. By invitation the officers of No. 3, of Columbus, Ohio, exemplified the work, which was done in a manner reflecting great credit upon that Division.

After the installation of officers, and said officers having received proper instruction, the President, Mrs. McMillen, opened the meeting for remarks, calling on Mrs. A. W. Brown, worthy Vice-President, Mrs. F. Northway, Grand J. S. of Elkhart, Mrs. E. W. Higgins, Grand S. and T., Mrs. A. Shumaker, Grand S. S., and Mrs. G. Shipley, President of No. 3 of Columbus, all of whom responded in the interests of the Order, the meeting concluding with an interchange of thanks.

Myself and the conductor, whose lot I promised some ten years ago to share, were then escorted to the pleasant home of Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Stout, where we were royally entertained the remainder of our stay.

The evening's entertainment, with Brother E. W. Purrett as master of ceremonies, was rich and spicy, opening with an address from the Mayor of the city, and including musicales, recitations, supper, dance, and almost everything that wit and genius could invent, from the presentation to the Auxiliary by Brother Purrett, in behalf of the conductors, of a handsome Bible, down to the introduction of a live goat, bedecked in all the regalia necessary to work the "degree," and whose admittance caused quite a commotion, especially among the ladies, despite the fact that most of them had become pretty well acquainted with him during the afternoon.

The following evening we said our good-byes and took our leave of the city of Toledo with a deep sense of satisfaction and pleasure, knowing that our "Order" was gaining ground and had the well wishes and support of Division 26 O. R. C., every Brother of which we would like to take by the hand and thank him personally for the interest and kindness he has shown us.

On our way home we were pleased to meet W. P. Sheehan, C. C. of Division 206, Springfield, Ill., and Past Grand O. S., who gave us a cordial invitation to come and organize an Auxiliary to their Division, which we hope will be our privilege at no distant day, assuring Brother Sheehan of this one fact that should a Division of our Order be instituted there, just so sure will it double the interest of their conductors in the Order of Railway Conductors. And why would it not? for that is one of our objects, which the words of H. W. Longfellow are here applicable:

"As unto the bow the cord is,
So unto the man is woman;
Though she bends him, she obeys him,
Though she draws him, yet she follows;
Useless each without the other."

We will all agree that the female lodges of our land are accomplishing great good and are gaining favor every day, for, created upon the great principles of Charity, Friendship and Truth, we can but accomplish the end whereunto we are organized. Charitable not only with our time and pocketbooks, but charitable with love for our neighbor, that charity which "suffereth long, and is kind, envieth not, is not puffed up, seeketh not her own, thinketh no evil."

We as an Order have not, as yet, realized the support and recognition of the O. R. C. that the ladies of the engineers have from the B. of L. E., but we are not going to give up in despair. "Faint heart never won fair lady." Our aim is to carry out all the principles inculcated in our Order and rise upon our own merits, trusting that in time the Order of Railway Conductors will accept our offered hand. We bid you God speed, my Brothers. May the sun of prosperity ever shine on your pathway.

MRS. CHAS. RAGON,

President L. A. to O. R. C.

No. 38 West Mound Street.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Oct. 11, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

On Oct. 9th, 1890, a special meeting of the Ladies Auxiliary to the Order of Railway Conductors was held at Friendship hall, for the purpose of organizing a division to be known as Banner Division No. 6. After opening in due form we proceeded to institute. The division is composed of 40 charter members. We then elected the officers with the following result: President, Mrs. James McMillen; Vice-President Mrs. E. W. Purrett; Secretary and Treasurer, Mrs. F. J. Stout; Senior Sister, Mrs. I. Prince; Junior Sister, Mrs. M. Loop; Guard, Mrs. O. W. Baldwin; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. D. F. Myers.

The members of Capital City Division No. 3, Ladies Auxiliary to O. R. C., assisted us in the organization. In the evening followed an entertainment which was witnessed by 500 people. The exercises began by an address of welcome by Mayor Hamilton, and a reply by Mrs. C. Ragon, of Columbus, explaining the objects of the Order. An interesting program followed, consisting of recitations, vocal and instrumental music, after which refreshments were served, and dancing was the order of the evening. The goat was led in and Sister McIntyre invited to take a ride.

Thanking the gentlemen of Division No. 26 for their beautiful gift, and the ladies of Capital City for their kind help in assisting us, knowing our Order will be a success, I will close.

MRS. D. F. MYERS, Corresponding Secretary.

"No Fair," or Fare Either.

"Fare," gentlemen," suggested a conductor in the smoking car to a party of four card players, who held on their knees between them a large atlas. Three of them quietly handed up tickets, but the fourth man near the window became suddenly embarrassed.

"Fare!" again remarked the brass-mounted official, rather sternly. The passenger addressed replied with a series of spasmodic winks and tapped the back of his cards significantly.

"Come, sir, I'm in a hurry," said the conductor.

"I haven't got any ticket," replied the passenger.

"Pay your fare then, with the usual slight advance."

"Boys, will you allow him to take a rake—off?" inquired the delinquent traveler.

"Not much," answered the trio.

"My money's all up," said the passenger appealingly to the conductor.

"You will have to get off then," answered the official, reaching for the bell rope. The man laid his cards face downward and said in a low tone to one of the other players:

"What do you do?"

"I raise you," was the reply.

"How much?"

"Twenty dollars."

"The man by the window passed his hand up to the conductor. The latter gave it one glance. Then he released a large, fat pocketbook from inside his coat, took out two $20 bills, and handed them to the delinquent passenger.

"I see your twenty and go you twenty better," he said.

This complicated matters, and the original miser of $20 shifted uneasily in his seat. Finally he said:

"I raise you ten dollars."

"Call him," said the conductor, handing over an X, "I'm in a hurry."

The delinquent passenger did so, and was about to take in the money on four aces, when the other player showed a straight flush and pocketed all the money, including the conductor's. The latter was dazed; the delinquent passenger meek and abashed.

"Now you will have to get off," snapped the conductor.

"Yes, sir; stop the train," he replied.

The whole party got off.

"Know those fellers?" inquired a fat man on the opposite side of the aisle.

"No," answered the conductor.

"Slickest quartet of card sharps on the road. How much did they do you for?"

But the conductor raced himself down toward the door, which he banged shut without replying to the sardonic inquiry.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Doubtful.

At the bottom of the item the sender writes the words, "How is this for Texas?" If we are to reply candidly to the question we may say we have great doubts of the item being true.

The item says that a boy 13 years of age, son of a farmer near Navasota, climbed up a corn stalk in order to get half an ear of corn which was to be roasted for the whole family. He sat astride of the ear and began to saw off half of it, as that was all he could carry to the house. While doing this he slipped and fell, but managed to save himself by being caught on the top of a stalk of millet, and clasping his arms around it he slipped safely to the ground, but his rapid descent set his clothes on fire and he was badly burned on the limbs and body. He then put out the fire by crawling into a cucumber. Of course, this may be true but we have grave doubts about it, even if it did happen in Texas.—Detroit Free Press.

Purchaser.—Rosenbaum, you told me this suit was fast colors. Look how it has run.

Rosenbaum.—S'hellup me, Vatter Abraham, vot does the man vant? I said dose colors vas fast, unt dey run. Do you dink dey oughter fly or go by steam, or someding like dot?—Jacksonville Critique.

Too Far.

Down by the bank of the beautiful Nile
Sat Pung Goo Bing and Girl,
Pung Goo was clothed in his usual smile,
And she wore an ebony curl.

Said Pung Goo Bing: "My dear, will you go
To the Crocodile ball this eve?"
Then spake up the beautiful maid Jo Jo
And said she: "Yes, dear, by your leave."

"But the fact of the matter is this, that—well,
I have nothing to wear at all,
Excepting the dress of a New York belle
That she wore at a charity ball."

Then the ebony face of Pung grew glum,
And he doubtfully spoke: "I fear
That we'd better not dance at the lummy-tumtum—

No wonder your blushing, my dear."

Catching the Train.

Some of our readers who have occasionally tried their skill at chasing a train may not have succeeded in catching it as easily as the drummer mentioned below, and they will appreciate his position.

The train for Cleveland was pulling out, says the Indianapolis News, and had gained considerable headway when there came a whiz and the sound of splitting wind as a man with a tall silk hat crushed down on his ears dashed through the gates. He carried two big valises, but they were apparently as light as feathers, for they did not interfere with his mad rush after that train. He fairly flew along the platform, and the brakeman on the cars was so busy looking at a girl in the window of the National hotel that he did not see him. The crowd yelled and whooped: "Get there, old man!" "Pull for it hard!" You'll make it if you don't fall dead," and a hundred such aggravating remarks. The man made an heroic effort, but he didn't have the legs, and the brakeman didn't see him—thus he missed the train. He came slowly back to the gates, put down his grips, mopped his face, and remarked:

"Well, I'll be blowed." He didn't say blowed; but we let it go at that.

"Had a lively run," suggested a meek and lowly gateman.

"Rather. Just my luck, though, to miss that train. Why, I wouldn't missed that train for $50."

"Where are you going?" once more asked the gateman with ginger-colored whiskers.

"Lafayette. And I have an important engagement there to-night."

"Well, you can keep it."

"Hay?"

"The train you were chasing goes to Cleveland. The Lafayette train don't start for eight minutes yet. There it stands."

The drummer didn't say a word. He gathered his grips and climbed aboard the cars while the faintest bit of a smile hovered about the meek and lowly gateman's countenance.—Trainman's Journal.

On a Michigan Central train going west the other day, the conductor came to a passenger who had no ticket, and who owned to also being dead broke.

"How did you pass the gates at Detroit?" was asked.

"Bought a ticket to the last station back here."

"Well, you'll have to get off."

"Before you make up your mind let me show you some figures. Here they are: This train is now on time. You must stop dead still to put me off. To stop, start and get under the same headway will consume four minutes. See? It is also figured out here by a statistician."

"Ticket or money."

"The extra fuel consumed is placed at 94 cents, and you must report to the train dispatcher at a cost of 35 cents. The delay to seventy-five passengers is put at $25. The stopping and starting and extra strain to make up four minutes damages the train $2.20 worth. Now, then I only want to go thirty miles further."

"Can't do it, sir," replied the conductor, and he pulled the bell-rope, halted the train, and escorted the impecunious passenger to the steps.

"All right, old chappie!" said the latter as he dropped into the ditch. "The railroads of this country don't pay 2 per cent., and it's no wonder. When you'll spend $30 to save 90 cents, it's a wonder a stockholder ever smells a dividend at all. Go ahead with your old caravan—the poor house isn't over six miles down the track."

An Unforseen Question.

New York Sun: Farmer Depew tells a story about his Syracuse address to indicate the independence and wit of the agriculturist. As he was relating his experience on Farmer Evarts' domain in Vermont, and how champagne and milk had been set out for his delectation with the remark that "They both cost the same," a tall farmer far back in the crowd, who had been literally drinking in every word that Mr. Depew said, yelled out the unanswerable and literally stunning inquiry: "Say, Chaucey, which did you take?"

Into cold gray nickels, oh "V !"
And I would that my pen could scribble
The thoughts that arise in me.

O, well for the rich galoot
Who has dust to blow in each day;
O, well for him on a tear
That he has the wherewith to pay.

But the days and nights go on
To the man that owes a bill,
Then, O, for the touch of a good fat roll
And the jingle of that which is still.

—Cyrus W. Tenneyson in The Western Railway.

Wasted Eloquence.—"Matilda," the young man said, nervously, "what I am going to say may surprise you. But my feelings are leading me on. Encouraged by your kindness, intoxicated by your beauty and rendered desperate by the conviction that the hours are fleeting away and that the future can hold nothing for me worse than the suspense under which I now labor, I have resolved to risk my fate on the cast of the die."

He loosened his collar, coughed and went ahead. "Other young men, Matilda, mere butterflies of fashion, may dance attendance upon you and flatter you. Listen not to them ! Listen to the voice of sincere devotion ! Other young men, talented, nay, perchance, young men possessed of wealth in abundance, may seek your hand. I am not talented, Matilda, I am not handsome, I have not those delicate little arts that win the affections of women. I am not rich—"

"No, Mr. Dennis," said the young beauty with a yawn, and rising to her feet, "I regret to say, also, that you are not in it !"

Mr. Dennis withdrew from the competition at once. He was clearly outclassed.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

There is one pawnbroker in Pittsburg who has registered a solemn vow that never again will he do the gallant for a pretty woman, even though she be in dire distress. His last experience in that line cost him $2,000 worth of jewels and a big row with his wife.

A few days ago a remarkably pretty girl, richly attired, walked into his store and said: "I am stranded in this city. I am an actress and would like to borrow a little money."

"Certainly," replied the pawnbroker, smiling: "what security have you got ?"

"Oh, I forgot," she said, and a deep crimson suffused her cheeks. "May I retire for a moment ?"

The door of a private office was opened and the beauty entered. She soon came out and held a jeweled garter in her hand. It was worth about $50. A little conversation and the broker advanced $10. The girl started to go. She got as far as the door, turned, and blushing fiery red, said: "If you please, have you a piece of string? My—my—stocking is coming down."

He furnished the twine, and she again retired, emerging in a moment. The door was reached again, and again she turned. "The string's broke," she mournfully said, "and I can't go out upon the street. Won't you go next door and get me a pair of elastic garters ?"

The unsuspecting pawnbroker took a dime and entered the nearest dry goods store. The girls at the counter laughed at him, and as soon as possible he pushed the garters into his pocket and hurried back to his store. It was empty, and about $2,000 worth of diamond rings and watches had been taken. He forgot the paper parcel in his pocket, and went home a poorer and a wiser man. That night his wife found the garters in her husband's pocket. There was a scene in the household.—Philadelphia North American.

A Telegraphic Declaration.

'Twas last summer, when vacation brought a blissful breathing spell,
And the townsman sought the pleasures of the rural hill and dell,
That I saw her at the station as her fingers white and small Moved with dextrous grace in answer to the telegraphic call,
And now, down in my pocketbook, 'mongst papers worn and dry,
Is a fragment upon which I often look with fondest eye;
I found it on the floor one day, when all her work was through,
And upon it there was written simply:

How many times I've wondered who the happy soul could be Whose name was lingering in her thoughts and wished that I were he!
She had a smile as winsome as the daisies that were bright
In the moonlight by the roadside when I saw her home one night.
I had talked to her quite often as the days went swiftly by,
And when I took the train at last I did it with a sigh.
I like to gaze upon it when I've nothing else to do—
That little scrap of paper with its

Who are Fellow Servants.

Station Agent says the following are recent decisions on the question, who are fellow servants:

A foreman of a bridge gang is a fellow servant with persons operating a freight train on the road. St. Louis, A. & T. R'y Co. v. Welsh 2 L. R. A. 839, 73 Tex. 298.

A brakeman is a fellow servant with the engineer. L. & N. R'y Co. v. Martin, 3 L. R. A. 282, 87 Tenn. 398.

A section foreman, who is about the track and liable to be injured by passing trains, is a fellow servant of the conductor. Elliott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R'y Co., 3 L. R. A. 363, 5 Dak. 523.

A superintendent, in respect to work properly belonging to a servant, is a fellow servant of the co-employés. Hussey v. Coger, 3 L. R. A. 559, note, 112 N. Y. 614.

A laborer employed by a railroad company to remove snow and other obstructions from the track is a fellow servant of a track walker and conductor. Fagundes v. Cent. Pac. R'y Co., 3 L. R. A. 824, 79 Cal. 97.

A station agent is a fellow servant with a brakeman. Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R'y Co. 4 L. R. A. 151, 113 N. Y. 251.

A traveling auditor of a railroad company traveling on the cars from station to station is a servant of the company and assumes the ordinary risks of accidents. Minty v. Union Pac. R'y Co., (Idaho), 4 L. R. A. 409.

A locomotive engineer is a fellow servant with the fireman. Gulf, Colo. & Santa Fé R'y Co. v. Blohn, 4 L. R. A. 764, 73 Tex. 637.

A foreman of a gang of men employed in building a railroad is a fellow servant with the workmen under him while engaged in the work. Lindvall v. Woods (Minn.), 4 L. R. A. 793.

The members of a city board of public works are fellow servants with the driver of a fire engine. Coots v. Detroit, 5 L. R. A. 315, 75 Mich. 628.

In a majority of the states an employé cannot recover for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant or co employé. Isn't there good reason for such legislation as that proposed by Senator George in regard to this matter, and should not organized labor of all kinds be interested?

Passengers—Fare—Tender After Expulsion Begun—Excessive Damages, etc.

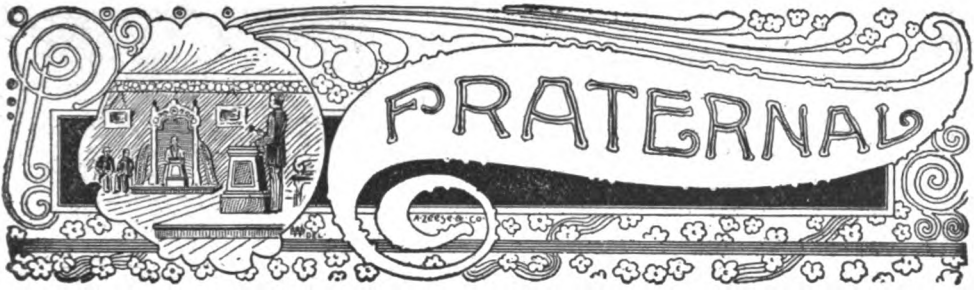

1. Before a conductor can collect excess fare from a passenger who has not purchased a ticket, under the provisions of the laws of 1886, the company must have a ticket office open for the sale of tickets at the station where passage is taken, at least 30 minutes prior to the departure of the train. A keeping of the office open 30 minutes prior to the advertised time of departure, will not suffice where the train is behind time. If the office is not open, with an agent in the same ready upon call to sell tickets, long enough before the actual departure of the train, whether delayed or not, to enable passengers to purchase tickets and safely board the train, no excess fare can be collected.

2. In an action to recover damages for expulsion from the train for refusal to pay the fare demanded, the following instruction was given: "That if the passenger refused, when demanded, the fare he knew, or ought to have known, was justly due, and persisted in such refusal until the conductor, in the exercise of the company's right to expel him therefor, had taken the necessary steps to put him off, by commencing to stop the train, or seizing the person, if such seizure was necessary, such plaintiff was a trespasser, and by such act and conduct relieved the company of its obligation to carry him; and he could not reimpose such obligation on the company by making a tender of the sum due after having once refused it for the purpose and under the circumstances stated, and having put the conductor to the trouble of the performance of an act necessary to his safe and proper expulsion.

Held, Such instruction to be the correct rule under the facts of the case stated.

3. A verdict excessive in damage arrived at by a jury through prejudice and passion, or the misconduct of counsel will be set aside and new trial given.

Atchison, T. G. & S. R'y Co. v. Drælli, Kansas S. C. July 3, 1890.

TERRE HAUTE STATION, Oct. 19, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR, AND BROTHER:—I am again compelled to request space in THE CONDUCTOR to ventilate my opinion regarding the world, for we find everything here below in a "topsy turvy" condition. Yes sir, no man is satisfied. You find one man squealing or struggling to get justice, another one is flying from it; one man saves his hard earned dollars to buy a home, another is trying to sell his for less than cost; one man is spending all the money he can make taking his best and good girl to the theatre, and sending her presents and flowers, in hope of eventually making her his wife, while his friend and neighbor is spending all the money he can get, to procure a divorce. One man escapes all of the sickness and diseases that man is heir to, to get killed by a street car; another poor fellow goes through a half a dozen railroad wrecks to die with the measles. Bro. A. J. Lee, better known all over the middle Division as "Lou," a good conductor and an elegant gentleman, has returned from one of his "fishing tours" to the seashore, and the usual places that attract men of money and those seeking first class recreation. His reports would cover one hundred pages, therefore I will not attempt to encroach on the space of THE CONDUCTOR to that extent, but he does say that fishing was so good that one of the party fell in the lake with the bait in his pocket and when he came out that there was several fine bass in his pocket. Bro. John W. Caskey, secretary and treasurer, of Division 92, was away for two weeks, at the lake in northern Indiana, fishing and having a "boss time" generally. He either caught some fine bass or the men at the lake who fish for a living found "good sale" for their catch, as Bro. Jack fed several families at Terre Haute with fish. Bro. John Rohm, of late, looks finer than split silk and fresher than a No. 2 mackerel, all of this "thushness" is caused by a nine pound girl at his house. Father, mother and baby are reported as doing well, all of Johnnie's Brothers and friends hope he will live through it, and as these little "episodes" present themselves may they cause as much happiness as this one has for Bro. Rohm. Report has it that at an early date Bro. Frank Campbell will try the sweets of married life. To the fortunate young lady that gets him, I wish to say that she has drawn a rare prize, as there are few better men living than F. L. Campbell, and may he "live long and prosper." Bro. Grand Chief Clark paid 92 a visit on Sunday the 5th, and gave us much valuable information. May his visits be often, for we can profit by such visits, and especially from a man who is honest in what he says. Apparently there is a vast difference between Clark and ex-Chief "Selah Calvin," the latter being an extremely "promising man."

Yours in P. F.,

C. H. ARTHUR.

Resolutions of Thanks.

Lackawanna Division, No. 12, have recently been the recipients of a beautiful Bible and bookmark from the wife and daughter of the popular Assistant Superintendent, Mr. Garrett Bogart, which were presented to the Division on the occasion of public entertainment recently held at the Academy of Music. They were presented through Mr. E. E. Clark, Grand Chief Conductor, and informally accepted by the chairman, Mr. P. F. Duffy, in behalf of Lackawanna Division No. 12.

At a regular meeting held on October 12, 1890, the following resolutions were adopted:

In view of the fact that time and circumstances would not permit us to give full expression or voice the sentiment of all our members earlier, does not in the least degree lessen our gratitude to the donors, Mrs. Bogart and Mrs. Fowler, for the beautiful gifts received from their hands;

Resolved, That individually and collectively, we, the members of Lackawanna Division, No. 12, tender our sincere thanks, and add that we regard these gifts as tokens of friendship, and we shall always treasure them as such and accept them in the spirit in which they were presented, be it further

Resolved, That so long as one vestige of those emblems shall remain that the friendship of the members of Lackawanna Division and the donors shall not be severed, and after we have passed away to a peaceful abode, that the memory of the donors shall always be fresh and green in the minds of those that shall survive us and constitute Lackawanna Division No. 12.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be suitably engrossed, framed and presented to the donors, Mrs. Bogart and Mrs. Fowler, and they be spread upon the minutes of this meeting and published in the Scranton city papers and THE CONDUCTOR.

"WHERE DOES THE O. R. C. STAND."

I notice an editorial in the "Railway Trainmen's Journal" for October, with the above heading and I desire to express a few of my ideas on the subject in response to the inquiry of Brother Rogers. "For a number of years" the Order pursued what was considered by the other labor organizations and by many of us within the ranks of the Order a mistaken policy. Until within the past three years those who considered the (then) policy of the organization as wise and proper were very much of a majority, and by virtue of that majority were enabled to dictate laws and elect officers in the Grand Division year after year. At Toronto in '88, the opposition to the policy being pursued, first took tangible shape and by persistent work among the members succeeded in converting so many that at Rochester in '90, the most obnoxious portion and greatest stumbling block in the way of success as an organization were removed by overwhelming majorities. As Brother Rogers says: "The labor press offered congratulations," and the congratulations of none were more acceptable or more thoroughly appreciated than those of the "Railway Trainmen's Journal." "Labor stood ready to forget the past and hope for the future." Allow me to ask Brother Rogers what has occurred to cause anyone to change that opinion. In the several instances, (within the past six months) when the members and officers of the B. of R. T. and the O. of R. C. have joined hands and issues against the railway companies in question, has their been any occasion for doubt as to where the O. of R. C. stood? Was there any question as to where the O. of R. C. stood on the Aransas Pass a few days ago?

"The chief executive gives it out cold at Savanna, that he cannot pledge the O. R. C. as an Order." Why not make that clear, Brother Rogers, and state that the above statement concerned the point of "federation" only, and state further what the Grand Officers of each other railway labor organization know, viz.: That the matter of federation was referred by the last Grand Division to a committee to report upon at the next Grand Division, and that as chairman of that committee, in order to get all the information possible upon the subject before the committee, I have invited the Grand Officers of all other railway labor organizations to meet with said committee. No need for anyone to wonder "which side will be on top in the future, and whether the new element that has at last gained temporary notice will be able to maintain its position." The notice gained by the new element was gained by reason of the ideas entertained by them on the vital points at issue, being indisputably right as compared with the past administration of affairs in the Order, and for the further reason that these ideas were conceived in conviction and born in deliberation. For these same reasons there will be nothing of a temporary nature about the recognition, and for these same reasons the element will beyond any question maintain its position even though the present exponents of their ideas may prove unequal to the undertaking and be supplanted by those better fitted. An old maxim says: "Great reforms work slowly." It would not be at all surprising if some of the minor details necessarily attendant upon so radical a change of policy should be overlooked or delayed for a time. "As an organization," the O. R. C. has declared for protection and as an organization may be relied upon as possessing intelligence enough to enact the necessary laws or take necessary action to maintain that position and to legislate for the best interests of the American Conductor.

We desire no "prestige with the employers" that is born of sycophancy or any of its kin. We in common with the other organizations expect to wield a prestige as an honorable, self-respecting, reasonable organization, devoted to the interests of our members, ready at all times to assert their rights or to resent injustice or wrong.

"As an organization" we will do these things and "as an organization" we will go to any lawful extreme to prevent anyone or any company from "walking all over us." "Other publications" have said very many uncomplimentary things about the Order on many occasions. I do not propose to dig up the past or harbor any resentment for that which is past, but paradoxical though it may seem to them the O. R. C. has adopted a policy of protection and a policy that will enable it to join hands with its contemporaries and assist in working out the salvation of the the American railway employes. This policy will be pursued and persevered in; if mistakes are made every effort will be made to prevent a repetition and the O. R. C. will stand "in line" and keep pace with the times regardless of the strenuous efforts of some to place it in the position of "Ishmael."

Did you ever meet a college-bred girl who did not love her Alma Mater? And why should not she, as well as her brother, think her own "the dearest and noblest and best?" After reading the charmingly written and magnificently illustrated article on "Student Life at Wellesley College," in Demorest's Family Magazine for November, just received, we do not wonder at the enthusiasm of the Wellesley alumnae and students for the "Wellesley blue."

Every woman, and every man, too, will be interested in the illustrated article about "The Fur Seal;" the women, because every blessed one of them loves a handsome sealskin garment; and the men, because they want to know what they pay their money for, for "sealskin is sealskin" now, and costs a pile of money.

Indeed, this number of the Magazine really takes us all around the world. Starting at Wellesley, by simply turning the leaves we are transported to "The Land of the Lapps," and the numerous illustrations and vivid descriptions make us quite familiar with these queer people; then the illustrated serial story carries us to China, and we complete the circuit by visiting the seals in Alaska and Greenland, taking a little diversion by the way in reading "Chat" about society doings, and enjoying in imagination so many good things told about in "Household," that we wish Thanksgiving were already come.

In fact, if you want to be amused with good stories, learn how to keep house and make it beautiful, how to keep well, or anything else that you want to know, take our advice and send your subscription (only $2 a year) to W. Jennings Demorest, 15 East Fourteenth street, New York.

The twentieth anniversary of The Century, and the beginning of its forty-first half yearly volume, is celebrated by the publication of the November number. The date will be marked by an issue of special interest, and the twenty-first year of the magazine will contain a wealth and variety of literary and artistic material that cannot be here fully detailed, but which is fairly indicated by the announcements that follow:

The Gold Hunters of California. The Century series of separate illustrated papers on the romantic movement to California in 1849 and the events which preceded it begins in the November number, with a narrative, by General John Bidwell, of the experiences of "The First Emigrant Train to California." General Bidwell gives a graphic account of the organization of this first movement to California, and of the toils, perils, and mishaps of the journey. The article will be capably and picturesquely illustrated by Remington and Fenn, and by unpublished drawings by the late Charles Nahl, well known in California as an artist of the gold-hunting period.

Among other articles which will follow, as nearly as possible in chronological order, besides the contributions of General and Mrs. Fremont, are "California Before the Gold Discovery," a paper of unique interest by General Bidwell, who was for some years at Sutter's Fort, the headquarters of Americans; an historical sketch of the Missions by John T. Doyle, Esq., illustrated by Fenn; a description of "Ranch and Mission Life Before the Gold Discovery," by Miss Guadalupe Vallejo, niece of General Vallejo, reflecting the life of the Spanish Californian; an historical sketch of the Discovery of Gold, by Mr. John S. Hittell, the California historian—including memoranda by surviving members of Marshall's party; narratives of the trip to California by the different routes, including those by the way of Cape Horn, by Panama, by Nicaragua, by Vera Cruz and San Blas, and by the Gila River; important and graphic accounts of Life in the Mines, the Vigilance Committees (by the chairman of both committees, Wm. T. Coleman, Esq.); A Woman's Pioneer Experiences (by a survivor of the ill-fated Donner party); besides interesting shorter special memoranda in a new temporary department entitled "California."

Keeping in view, first, last, and all the time, the tastes and interests of the boys and girls themselves, St. Nicholas has obtained—in addition to short stories, descriptive papers, and sketches of travel and adventure—an unusual number of interesting long stories. Thousands of its readers will welcome the return to its pages of three favorite writers, whose stories in earlier volumes proved exceedingly popular. The publishers, therefore, are glad to announce the three following serials:

"One Brave Boy," by J. T. Trowbridge. One of the best stories ever written by this famous friend of American boys. St. Nicholas readers who remember "The Tinkham Brothers' Tide-Mill" and "His One Fault," will be eager for this new story from Mr. Trowbridge's pen. It will begin in either the November or December number, and will run through the entire volume.

"The Boy Settlers," by Noah Brooks, author of "The Fairport Nine" and "The Boy Emigrants," originally written—like this new story—expressly for St. Nicholas. "The Boy Settlers," full of stirring episodes, is a very picturesque and faithful narrative of frontier life, based upon the author's personal experiences. It has been admirably illustrated, throughout, by Mr. W. A. Rogers. The opening chapters will appear in November.

"A Spoiled Darling," by Francis Courtenay Baylor, whose "Juan and Juanita" has endeared her to the readers of St. Nicholas. This new story (now complete and in the Editor's hands), though addressed to girls, will strike home to many a boy in this favored and very independent land. It arches over the broad Atlantic, so to speak, enabling the boys and girls of America and the boys and girls of England to meet half way and see each other face to face, perhaps to their mutual amusement and benefit. "The little terror," in this case, however, hails from our side, as no "spoiled darling" comes to us from the other end of the arch, at the author's magical bidding. But one will be enough for the present, as boys and girls "on both sides," will admit, before the volume ends.

Scribner's Magazine for November contains three remarkable illustrated articles of travel and adventure of widely differing characteristics, embracing Elephant hunting in Africa, a perilous voyage through the Canon of the Colorado (the first trip ever made from the source to the mouth of that river), and cruising with the White Squadron along the coast of France. Another unusual feature is an article ("A Day with a Country Doctor") written, drawn, and engraved by the same man—Frank French. Training Schools for Nurses are described by Mrs. Frederick Rhineland Jones, who has been interested in their organization from the very first. There is a long installment of the anonymous serial "Jerry," and a short story by F. J. Stimson, the author of "Mrs. Knollys." Two sonnets on Cardinal Newman are by the aged Irish poet Aubrey de Vere, and by Inigo Deane, a disciple and friend of the late Cardinal. A strikingly melodious anonymous poem, "In Broceliande," and the last of Prof Shaler's papers on "Nature and Man in America," are among the other features of the issue. Fred-eric Villiers (the English war artist), R. F. Zogbaum, and Frank French illustrate single articles.

Robert Brewster Stanton, Civil Engineer, tells in "Through the Grand Canon of the Colorado," the story of the railroad surveying expedition which he led along the course of the Colorado River, from Grand Forks to the Gulf of California—a distance of twelve hundred miles. Six hundred miles are at the bottom of the great canons, and the journey was made in boats through dangerous rapids. The narrative details many stirring adventures in shooting these rapids, and is illustrated from a great series of photographs made by the author and an assistant. No previous party had traversed these canons except that of Major J. W. Powell, in 1869.

Herbert Ward, the African traveler, from his abundant knowledge and experiences, has told the "Tale of a Tusk of Ivory"—giving, in a vivid narrative, the history of a tusk from the trapping of the elephant to the sale of the ivory on the coast. All the iniquities of the traffic—the raids by Arab traders and the resulting slavery and ransom—are described. Frederic Villiers, who has spent much time in Africa, illustrates the article with spirited drawings.

"A Day with a Country Doctor," by Frank French, is the record of the amusing, pathetic, and vexatious incidents which make up the life of a benevolent old physician in a rural district. The odd characters of the place are described as seen through the Doctor's kindly eyes, and the whole article is a tribute to a strong but self-denying type of men who are often too little appreciated by those for whom they labor. The illustrations, which Mr. French has drawn from life and engraved, are very effective interpretations of the text.

We wish to call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of The Holiday, which appears in this number. The Firemen of the Hercules, begun in number 40 of the present volume is a story of railroad life that will interest the boys and girls whose fathers and brothers spend their lives "on the rail," and the fathers and brothers themselves are likely to read it with interest; the paper is finely illustrated and is filled with good wholesome reading, and it offers premiums that will pay any boy or girl to get up a club for it.

At a special meeting of Cincinnati Division, No. 107, Order of Railway Conductors, held October 19th 1890, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Supreme Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe to remove from our midst our late and lamented Brother, John Edmondson, of the Kentucky Central Railway.

WHEREAS, The esteem and high regard long held by our deceased Brother with the members of this Division, render it proper that we place on record our appreciation of his services as a Brother and his merits as a man. Therefore be it Resolved, That while we bow in humble submission to the will of the Almighty, we do not less mourn for our Brother who has been called to rest.

Resolved, That in the untimely death of Brother Edmondson, this Division loses a Brother who was always active and zealous in his work; one who was wise in counsel and fearless in action; an honest, upright man whose virtues endeared him not only to his Brothers of the Order but to all his fellow citizens.

Resolved That this Division tenders its heartfelt sympathy to the family and relations of our deceased Brother and hope that in their sorrow they may find comfort in Him who doeth all things well.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for 30 days, these resolutions entered upon the minutes of this Division, a copy sent to the family of our deceased Brother, and also published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

J. A. CONLY,

Justus Shaw, of Hallstead, who for a number of years has been a prominent conductor on the D. L. & W., died of consumption at his late residence in Hallstead, Saturday, October 11th, aged 40 years. A number of months since deceased journeyed to the far west in search of an atmosphere which would tone up his system and help to overcome a bronchial difficulty. For a time he seemed to gain, but on returning home a relapse took place and he was gradually weakened until the final dissolution. He was very highly respected, was a member of the Order of Railway Conductors and also of the Improved Order of Red Men, the latter organization conducting the funeral, which occurred at 2 o'clock Monday at the Presbyterian church, and performing the ritualistic services at the grave, which were very impressive. There were 75 Red Men in attendance to do honor and pay their last tribute of respect to their departed brother. The Order of Railway Conductors also attended the funeral in a body. Owatta Tribe presented a floral emblem of a "Tomahawk," and the Conductors tendered "The Gates Ajar." Both pieces were very rich and beautiful. The funeral sermon was preached by Rev. L. W. Church, who was assisted by Rev. H. Hughes.

CURRAN—Died, September 25th, Arthur Curran, son of Brother and Mrs. J. H. Curran. Arthur was a bright, manly boy of ten years of age, with the promise of a bright, useful manhood before him, the hope and joy of his bereaved parents. He fell from his seat in school, injuring himself seriously, and from the effects of which he died.

"A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled;
A place is vacant in our home
Which never can be filled.
God, in his wisdom, has recalled
The boon his love had given,
And though the body slumbers here,
The soul is safe in heaven."

At a regular meeting of West Philadelphia Division No. 162, Order of Railway Conductors, held in their hall, Sunday, Oct. 12th, 1890, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Almighty God in His infinite goodness and wisdom to remove from our midst our worthy Brother, William Gibson, who died September 12th, 1890, from injuries received while in the discharge of his duties; therefore, be it, Resolved, That West Philadelphia Division No. 162 has lost a true friend and Brother, whom to know was to love, and while we bow to the will of Divine Providence, we deeply mourn the loss of one who, in the prime of his manhood, has been suddenly taken from among us.

Resolved, That to his grief stricken family we extend condolence and heartfelt sympathy in this their hour of sorrow.

Resolved, That we wish to cherish his memory sacred as a faithful friend and Brother.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of our deceased Brother and that they appear on the minutes and a copy be sent to THE CONDUCTOR for publication, and that our charter be draped in mourning for the space of thirty days.

A RESOLUTION.

At the union meeting held at Scranton, Pa., last month, a resolution was adopted in regard to which no two members present can agree, so far as we are able to learn. What was said to be a copy was sent to THE CONDUCTOR and was placed in type for the last issue. This copy recited that it was the sense of this meeting, that "the language used in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR is scandalous and disgusting in the extreme, and is time a halt was called," and that it was "ordered printed in THE CONDUCTOR." This was something of a surprise to us, particularly as no specific instance was cited, but the sweeping charge was made as above. There was no hesitation on our part, however, and we promptly proceeded to carry out the "order" and print in THE CONDUCTOR, but Brother Clark who was present at the meeting, objected saying that no such resolution was adopted, and that there was nothing in regard to printing it. We had intended to print with it a very brief comment calling attention to the vagueness of the charge and its serious import, and then wait for some one of those who made it to specify something. After receiving the information from Brother Clark, however, we decided to hold the matter for a little further information and wrote to the author of the resolution for his version of the matter, which while conveying the same idea as that expressed by Brother Clark, is materially different as to language. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this union meeting, that it is an outrage on the members of the Order to use the columns of THE CONDUCTOR in following and giving prominence to C. S. Wheaton, late Grand Chief Conductor; that such a course can do no good, and that it is high time that we called a halt in that direction."

It will be noticed that in this version of the resolution there is no 'order to print,' and very likely there are some who will object to its being printed, but first, we have never yet hesitated a moment to publish anything censuring the writer, directly or indirectly and anything of this character will always find entrance more readily than praise. For a further reason for printing, there are undoubtedly many members who were present at this meeting who understood as the secretary did, that it was to be printed, and who would ascribe its omission to incorrect motives, and finally, we desire to take issue with those who voted for this resolution, in regard to what they assume to be facts. In briefly dismissing the copy received from the secretary, we wish simply to call the attention of our readers to the injury that may be done by a little carelessness. This union meeting by its secretary, made a charge against THE CONDUCTOR, that if true, would demand the immediate removal of the responsible person, whoever it might be, and the imperative duty of every member of the Order who voted for a resolution reciting that the language of THE CONDUCTOR was "scandalous and disgusting in the extreme" would be to present the facts to the Executive Committee, and demand action on their part. That a report should be circulated, though ever so little, that such a resolution had been adopted when it had not, does the writer grave injustice, and had such a resolution been adopted, the matter would not be dropped here by any means, but believing that this statement of the error is all that is necessary, nothing further will be said in regard to it.

As to the resolution that was adopted, it assumes as a fact that the columns of THE CONDUCTOR have been used in following up and giving prominence to C. S. Wheaton. We deny that anything of the kind has been done and request any one of those who were present at this meeting or any other to point out a single instance.

Items of news clipped from other papers or taken from the press dispatches have been printed in regard to Brother Wheaton, just exactly as they would have been about any other person, and from the multitude of inquiries received at this office in regard to the matter, we believe that members are interested in knowing what is going on. The editor has not taken the liberty to reject communications from members of the Order because they may have contained some reference to the past Grand Chief Conductor, nor has he taken the liberty to mutilate these communications by erasing a portion. THE CONDUCTOR has carried out in good faith, the understanding arrived at between the members of the Board of Directors, and has not in any sense persecuted any one, but after giving the history, carried out its determination to drop the matter and we again repeat, that the assumption contained in the resolution is incorrect. If any reader will specify an instance to the contrary we will be glad to have him do so. A friend in a letter says that the writer "having been a candidate for the office of Grand Chief Conductor, gives men a chance to think that you are making it a personal matter." Freely admitting that we are no more likely to be free from personal bias than others, and probably very much less likely to be uninfluenced thereby than the majority, the assumption that any personal bias or influence comes from the fact that the writer was not elected Grand Chief Conductor should be forever settled by the facts themselves, and dropping for a moment the editorial prerogative and becoming a contributor, I will briefly state the facts in that connection and challenge contradiction. Before the close of the Grand Division in Denver, in 1889, I was importuned to be a candidate for the office and refused; from that time I was continuously importuned, not by a few, but by many, and among them some, perhaps, who would not now care to have their names known, but not until late in February, 1890, did I make any other reply than a square refusal. February 20th, in reply to a letter signed by eighteen members of the Order, (one of them being A. S. Ostrander) I explained my position at length and used the following language:

"Up to within the past few weeks I have not seriously considered the matter, and have replied to all that I was not a candidate, and would not be except under exceptional circumstances. My personal preference would be not to be a candidate under any circumstances, and I am in hopes that you who have so kindly addressed me, will see your way clear to unite in the support of some member who is much more competent than I. * * * please consider that nothing in the letter that you have addressed to me, or that has been said at any time by any one of you, commits you in any way to support me, but on the contrary, I shall be very glad if some other shall be selected. * * * I shall sincerely hope, that after deliberation, your choice will fall upon some one else." At Rochester, several members proffered their support and were in each instance requested to support some other; in one case, a member came to me as a messenger from a caucus representing as he said, thirty votes which would be cast for me if I wanted them. That member was told, as all others were told, that I did not wish the support and preferred that it would be given to some one else. This member, and any other, has full permission to make public anything said by me, although I do not feel at liberty to give any names without the consent of those referred to. In conclusion, and for the information of members generally, a complaint was made to the Executive Committee some time ago, and they declined to take any action because there was no reason for it.

WHERE IT STANDS.

The October Trainmen's Journal asks "Where Does the O. R. C. Stand?" and we must say that it certainly seems to us that Bro. Rogers must have given THE CONDUCTOR just about the amount of time that he says was given to a certain article in the U. P. E. Magazine, or it would be unnecessary for him to ask the question. There are additional reasons why the Trainmen's Journal should need no information and there are members of its own family who are competent to reply to its queries; if it will ask any of those members of the B. of R. T., who have been members of joint grievance committees with members of the Order since last January, it can have their opinion without doubt and there is no doubt in our mind as to what that opinion would be.

We might take up the introductory and show with but little trouble that what is said to be the opinions of other organizations in regard to the Order, were not well founded; that the Order has never sacrificed any other organization or its members and has never engaged in any contest with the members of other organizations without great provocation and in many cases in self defense only, but it would probably be of no effect in changing the opinions of those organizations and we do not care to take up the matter in any event. We may also question the assertion of Bro. Rogers, that "other organizations have a right to know" anything of our internal affairs, but that also we pass without further remark, as there is nothing that the Order wishes to conceal. There has been no authoritative statement by any one, that the Order was not on a "strike basis" so far as the meaning of the Journal in using the term is concerned. There was a statement made during the Grand Division that was intended to contradict the falsehoods that were being circulated by interested members and to convince the nervous members that by eliminating the strike clause, the Grand Division had not resolved itself into a band of rioters and that they would not be immediately involved in a causeless and expensive war that was, according to those same interested members to be immediately precipitated by the western element. Immediately after the election, it was given to the press and loudly proclaimed by certain ones, that Clark was a radical, a dynamiter and in fact a very "bad man" who would immediately cause more trouble than all others combined could cure. That these reiterated reports had considerable effect was openly apparent to the members of the Grand Division and it was also apparent to them that unless something could be done to allay suspicion and restore the confidence of the members through the east generally, that the expectations of those who had even then planned to lead a revolt would be fully realized and the Order would be split in twain. This much by way of explanation of what some of those who are not particularly friendly to the Order are pleased to call its "apology" for eliminating the strike clause and while the action of the Grand Division, necessarily taken in haste, may not have been as wise as it would have been with more time for deliberation, it accomplished its object and the much talked of secession dwindled to less than 200 members and many of those are returning. The Order is not now upon a "strike basis" if the words are to be understood as meaning going around with a chip on its shoulder, daring every one to "knock it off" and talking of what we will do "if they, (railway officers) don't come to time." It is however on a strike basis if those words are understood to mean that its members will no longer submit to injustice and injury under a mistaken belief that they are "tied up" or under teaching that "they can't do anything." The Order and its members will be conservative and will take every possible, legitimate and manly means to prevent a strike on the part of any of its members either individually or otherwise, and it will do this under the lead of the man who has been accused of being a radical of radicals but whose course so far has given the lie to such accusations. The chief executive cannot bind the Order to any federation; neither can any other officer or officers and in this respect the truth was told at Savanna; the last Grand Division appointed a committee to consider and report upon the matter of federation and the chief executive is chairman of that committee but it gave the committee no power to act further than to recommend a line of action to the Grand Division. We believe there is no present officer of the Order who would hesitate to say that should occasion require it, the executive of the Order would not only authorize but would advise a strike, certainly both the executive and the writer have publicly stated as much and the writer has no hesitation in saying that there have been times in the past, when had he possessed the authority he would have ordered a strike.

The Journal says that an officer of the Order who organized a division in Pennsylvania declared that he "believed there is no desire for federation and that system federation is, at most, the only thing the O. R. C. would ever sanction. This must refer to A. G. C. C. Wilkins, and while we have no knowledge of the matter and are not authorized to speak for him, we believe that he is to some extent at least, misquoted. It certainly must be apparent to any officer of the Order who has the opportunity for information that Brother Wilkins has, that there is a desire for federation on the part of members of the Order, and by a very large majority too, though we believe that no one can at present state with any certainty, as to whether the desire of the majority is for system or national federation. We believe that we can say without egotism, that no member or officer of the Order, with the exception of Brother Clark, is as well informed as to the opinion of members, as the writer. It is our opinion that the first choice of the majority is system federation, but we freely admit that this opinion is likely to be influenced to some extent by personal preference, and other officers of the order believe that the choice is for national federation. Certain it is, that any statement by any one that members of the Order would repudiate any but system federation is not authoritative, nor is there at present, any reason except personal opinion for any one to make any such statement. The writer has repeatedly stated that personal preferences on his part would be cheerfully yielded to the wish of the majority and THE CONDUCTOR has refrained from pressing system federation upon its readers, but on the contrary has endeavored to be entirely impartial in anything said. The Journal is mistaken in saying "meanwhile the wrangle between the factions goes on." There is no wrangle, no factions in the Order; it is at present united as it has never been in the past and the only "wrangles" or "factions" are those created in the imaginations of those who wish to injure us and who have succeeded in imposing upon the Journal. One thing that undoubtedly has considerable influence upon some members of the Order in regard to their choice of systems, is the continued hostility exhibited by some members of the Supreme Council toward the Order. It can hardly be expected that members of the Order will unanimously approve of national or general federation so long as members of the Council continue to denounce the Order, pronounce it dead and deliver eloquent (?) funeral orations over its supposed remains. Finally, Brother Rogers, ask some of the members of the U. P. joint committee for instance, as to their opinion of "where the Order stands."

MR. HOWARD'S ASSERTIONS.

We note that the Grand Chief Conductor of the B. of R. C. has lately resumed the course that he commenced when he first assumed the office and is largely engaged in a wholesale denunciation of the Order of Railway Conductors. Prior to the last Grand Division of the Order, Mr. Howard said that if the "strike clause" was repealed, he would favor but one organization of conductors; since that Grand Division he has repeatedly stated in public that there should be but one and that it was his belief that there would be but one and for some time his course was marked by fairness. The reason for his change of base is, however, very apparent to any one at all acquainted with the situation; since the formation of the Supreme Council, Mr. Howard has been buoyed up by the hope that with the aid and assistance that would be given by the other organizations that were members of the Council, the pathway of the Brotherhood was a flowery one and devoid of obstacles; in fact that it would be but a short time until the prophecies so freely made by one, at least, of his co-laborers, would be fulfilled, and the Order of Railway Conductors be non est; that there would be but one organization of conductors, but that organization would be his Brotherhood; as time passed, the Order instead of quietly "turning up its toes," as it should do in the opinion of Mr. Howard and others, took on a new lease of life, and it became very evident to all and to Mr. Howard as well that his hopes were vain and that they would never be lost in fruition; that the Order was destined to be the organization of conductors and that even the efforts of the Council was not sufficient to "boost" the Brotherhood into the place occupied by the Order. As this conviction began to force itself upon the gentleman's mind, he began to denounce and misrepresent the Order in the hope of stopping its progress, and if the reports given by the press are correct, the vehemence of his attacks are constantly increasing. The Order will not engage in any controversy with the Brotherhood or with Mr. Howard; we regret that he has permitted himself to engage in such a course, but we shall pay no attention to it hereafter, except perhaps to note for the benefit of members of the Order, when we are grossly misrepresented. We regret that we are not at liberty to repeat some things that have been said and written by Mr. Howard within the past six months without violating confidence. It would perhaps throw some light upon his present course; the fact that in several places where petitions for charters of the Brotherhood were being circulated, inquiries were made by members of the Order and upon receipt of the replies the petitions have been destroyed, may in a measure account for some of the late ebullitions. Mr. Howard seems to be making an effort to rival the newly elected assistant, who in his statements is bound by nothing less than his own imaginative fancy. Meantime the silence of those publications that have in the past been so extremely solicitous that the Order should not attack any one or organization is so profound that it can be felt. It sometimes makes a vast difference whose ox is gored, but we freely admit that it is somewhat vexatious that the Order should persistently decline to die in obedience to the dictates of those who have already pronounced feeling eulogies in its behalf.

The following from the Toledo Commercial of September 23d is a fair sample of the misrepresentations of the Order by Mr. Howard and some of his allies:

The Grand Chief was seen in reference to the dispatch printed in the Commercial yesterday to the effect that a combination had been arranged between the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Order of Railway Conductors, whose headquarters are in Iowa. Mr. Howard pronounced it a canard, probably sent out to injure the Brotherhood of Conductors, as it is a sample, he said, of the underhanded movements of the O. R. C. to undermine and cast reflections upon the Brotherhood. He said it was an utter impossibility, under existing circumstances, for the Brotherhood of Engineers to make a combination with Order of Conductors, as the Order of Railway Conductors does not belong to the Supreme Council of the Federation of Railway Employes, of which he is a member, and which is pledged to support the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in all emergencies, provided a call is made for such support. The O. R. C., he said, was trying hard to get into the Council, but can't do it, as they are constitutionally opposed to strikes as a necessity, and are not a protective organization, as are all the others in the American Federation.

As Mr. Howard will doubtless learn, facts are stubborn things and will not "down" at his bidding nor will his denial change them. The report that the members of the B. of L. E. and the Order on the C., & N. W. system, had formed an alliance, which is the report referred to, is true and the ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS is not in the habit of sending out canards or of going out of its way to injure the brotherhood or any other organization.

Mr. Howard's evident intention in his assertion that "THE ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS does not belong to the Supreme Council" is to have readers infer that the B. of L. E. does. The B. of L. E. is not a member of the Council and in that respect is on a par with the Order.

When the alliance on the Chicago & Northwestern was first discussed, it was proposed that all organizations enter into it but Mr. Howard succeeded in frightening members of other organizations out although it was their desire to enter it; this was accomplished by exceeding his authority as an officer of the Council, unless, as we have stated before, they have some laws that are not made public. The gentleman has in every instance, used his utmost endeavor to prevent any such alliance with the purpose of driving the B. of L. E. into the Council and thus procuring the aid of that organization in the effort to crush the Order; it was perfected on the Northwestern in spite of determined opposition and it is not surprising that he feels chagrined over it. The denials may delude his own followers who wish to believe it, but it should not mislead any one else. The Supreme Council may be pledged to support the B. of L. E. but it decided very recently in the Central strike that it could not aid an organization outside of its own circle. Certainly the engineers are not under any pledge to the Supreme Council and are entirely free to enter into a friendly alliance with members of the Order if they choose, Mr. Howard to the contrary, notwithstanding. The members of that organization may relish the inference that they are in leading strings and that the Council controls them, but we doubt it. The statement that "the O. R. C. is trying hard to get into the Council but can't do it because they are constitutionally opposed to strikes as a necessity and are not a protective organization" is unequivocally false and we are inclined to believe that the reporter did not correctly quote Mr. Howard for we can hardly believe that he would make so palpably false a statement even under the smart of defeat in the Northwestern matter. That the Order "can't get into the Council" is perhaps true for Mr. Howard would undoubtedly prevent it if he could. That it is trying to get in, is not true and the only foundation Mr. Howard has for such a statement, is that on the occasion of the meeting of the committee appointed by the last Grand Division to investigate and report upon the matter of federation, the officers of the Supreme Council, including Mr. Howard, were invited to present their views to the committee. This committee however, has no authority to make any application to the Council, nor, as Mr. Howard himself has several times stated, has any one else, until the Grand Division meets again.

All the matter in regard to this Northwestern alliance that was published by the papers, was given them by Mr. H. E. Wills, a prominent member of the B. of L. E. for a long time chairman of the general grievance committee on the Northwestern and at present chairman of the joint committee of the B. of L. E. and O. of R. C., and it is Mr. Wills that Howard is accusing of sending out "canards to injure the B. of R. C."

THE ERIE AND ITS MEN.

The New York Tribune speaks as follows of the recent request made by the employés of the Erie and the reply thereto of president King.

If, as now seems probable, the employés of the Erie road accept the company's response to their demands as conclusive, and go on with their work, they will have set a useful and honorable example to all labor organizations. Both parties to this controversy have showed excellent sense. The men did not make preposterous and revolutionary conditions and immediately follow them up with a vindictive strike, and the company was therefore enabled to make a frank and detailed statement of the facts, and to submit strong arguments to reasonable men. Thus far the transaction is a credit to both sides.

In saying that the demands made by the committee of employés were not preposterous we do not mean that they were just, or even capable of being granted. On the contrary, we think that the officials of the road have made it obvious, in a document of unusual force and clearness, not only that it was practically impossible to concede what was asked, but also that the men are not in an unhappy situation as compared with the employés of other roads. The sobriety of this explanation and exposition, and the temper in which it is made, are in the highest degree praiseworthy.

There are indications that most of the members of the committee and the general sense of the employés accept the company's statement as truthful, kindly and convincing. We believe, furthermore, that it is calculated to promote fidelity and efficiency in the service of the road. A strike is altogether improbable, but if a strike should be declared it would fail, because it would be unjustified in fact as in public opinion.

In common with the usual custom of the metropolitan press, (to which however there are some notable exceptions,) the Tribune accepts the ex parte statement of Mr. King as a correct statement of the affairs of the Erie and its employés, decides off-hand that while the men were reasonable in apparently dropping the matter on the showing made they had no business to ask or expect any concessions whatever, and that they do not deserve any increase of compensation. Had the Tribune taken any pains to hear the other side before passing judgement and then formed its opinion fairly, it might possibly have been somewhat different.

We agree with the Tribune that the men acted with good judgment and fairness, but we must differ with it in respect to the action of president King, and we must also beg leave to differ with the conclusions arrived at from Mr. King's reply as well as with statements made by that gentleman. Mr. King did not meet the committee with fairness in the first place. The committee was one chosen to represent and act for the employés; they asked for just exactly what they believed they should receive and while we are not authorized to speak for them; yet from the character and our personal knowledge of the members of that committee, we can safely say that they were ready to listen to reason, and to make any reasonable concessions in their request or to waive all if after a fair discussion of the matter, it could be shown that they were in the least unreasonable. The request was presented to Mr. King and the committee had a right to expect a reply would be made to them. If Mr. King should have submitted a paper to this committee which required an answer, and they had ignored him entirely and made their reply to the Executive Board or Board of Directors, would the Tribune think he had been treated fairly and courteously? Had Mr. King replied to the committee and they had refused to listen to reason or argument, he would then be justified in appealing direct to the employés, but under the circumstances, all must admit that his action in ignoring the committee was distinctly discourteous, although the committee wisely ignored the "snub" and did not make it a matter of grievance. As to the statement itself, it is not a fair or correct one. We are not in possession of the schedules of wages paid by the trunk lines competing with the Erie, and at present can only express the opinion that in making his comparison of wages, Mr. King has certainly included all the roads that pay the lowest wages in that section, and perhaps not included all those that pay the highest; there are some roads in New York that pay passenger conductors only $60 and $65 per month, and if our recollection is correct the Erie has one branch train which does principally a passenger business, and for which it pays the conductor only $45 per month. It is manifestly unfair for Mr. King to include the wages paid on small local roads in making any comparison of wages, and we believe that a comparison made with any of the competing trunk lines only will result very much to the disadvantage of the Erie, and that it will be found that the Erie conductors run more miles for less than the average pay on those other lines. Mr. Webb says that the Central pays better wages than the western roads. The lowest wages that any western road pays its freight conductors is $2.90 per hundred miles and with nearly all, less than a hundred miles is counted as a hundred, while as high as $3.70 is paid, the average being $3.00 and $3.25. The Erie pays its freight conductors $2.70 per day, and Mr. King says that this $2.70 is 71 cents in excess of the average rate of pay on competing lines. Mr. King says that trainmen are now paid for overtime after twelve hours; this is not the case; some are paid overtime after twelve hours and others are not paid for over time at all, no matter how long on the road. On the C. & E. overtime is paid after fourteen hours, and the statement that time occupied by waiting on side-tracks should not "count" because train men "rarely perform any labor," is one that will strike the average train man as rather ludicrous; waiting on side-track, particularly at night, is about the hardest labor that a conductor is called upon to perform, and it is hardly necessary for us to explain why it is so. Mr. King's position throughout the whole matter has been autocratic and discourteous, and it is particularly surprising to us from the fact that it is so inconsistent with the reputation that he has hitherto borne for fairness in dealing with employés.

It is true that the Erie makes a mileage allowance on some of its freight runs as stated by Mr. King, as 88 and 90 miles are computed as a day, 104 miles as a day and a sixth, 140 miles a day and a half; but this is no more than the usual allowance for such freight runs. The paragraph in which Mr. King makes this statement leads to the inference that the same time allowance is made for passenger conductors, viz.: That passenger conductors are allowed a day for running 88 or 90 miles, a day and a sixth for 104 miles, and a day and a half for 140 miles; and that the average time is three and a quarter and four hours. If the inference is correct, and the allowance is made for passenger runs and the Erie pays these passenger conductors 22 cents per day, in excess of the average, they have no fault to find and should be satisfied. We are, however, inclined to think that while Mr. King is willing that such an inference should be drawn by those not posted, that it is not correct and the allowance is made for freight trains only, and it is not long ago that passenger crews ran from Jersey City to Elmira, a distance of 274 miles. On some divisions of the Erie, the passenger conductors run 208 and 216 miles daily, an average of nearly 6500 miles per month, and receive $105 per month; these men certainly are not paid more than the average pay for the miles run, and there certainly is need of an equalization if other men are paid $105 per month for running 88 miles per day.

Since the committee left New York, the passenger trainmen on the first, second and Mahoning divisions of the Nypano have been notified of an increase in their pay to take effect Oct. 1st; this increase makes the pay for the passenger conductors on the first and second divisions $110 per month of twenty-six days, which with the extra four or five days, if conductors run every day will make about $125 per month; but to make the $110, conductors must run over 5000 miles per month, and while the increase is a material one, (about $11 per month,) it is not what it should be. In comparison with other roads, these men should be paid at the rate of $125 for twenty-six days. On the Mahoning division the pay is made $3.85 for the round trip from Cleveland to Youngstown.

The notice of increase contains the following:

After a careful investigation as to rates of wages paid passenger trainmen by other trunk line roads, it will be observed that the increase hereby given will enable the passenger trainmen on this division to make better wages per month than are made by men in similar service on competing and adjacent roads.

Although not advised, we presume the same increase has been made on the third and fourth divisions.

Returning to the Erie committee, after Mr. King's reply was made, or to speak correctly, after his manifesto, ignoring the committee, was issued to the public and the employes, the committee asked him for an interview, wishing to point out some of his erroneous statements and conclusions, and he declined to meet them or to discuss the matter at all. The committee made a second appeal for an interview and asked if the manifesto was an ultimatum; to this, Mr. King replied declining an interview and informing the committee that they could present anything else in writing and he would then determine whether or not an interview was necessary. Does the Tribune call this fair and courteous treatment? Certainly the committee deserves the commendation given them, for in view of the treatment received, they have acted with unusual moderation and good judgment; the matter however, is not settled, but the further acts of the committee will be governed by the same fairness and deliberation that has so far influenced them.

The gross earnings of the Erie for the year ending June 30th, 1890, was $29,059,818. The operating expenses $18,882,775, leaving the net earnings $10,177,043, and the report shows a net income of $1,021,906, after paying $3,792,290 rentals, (a large portion of which was practically paid to itself,) interest and all other charges.

There are many other points in this reply which invite comment and criticism, particularly what is said in reference to "matters of discipline, administration and operation of the road," but time and space forbid, and we only note that the company now has a contract with its engineers and firemen, to which Mr. King refers and which covers some of those very things which he says, "cannot be made the subject of contract obligation."

THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR'S BUILDING.

Occasionally an inquiry is made as to the status of the Railway Conductors Building company and the building itself. As has been stated in a circular and to the last Grand Division, the offer of Sioux City to the Order for the location of its building at that place was withdrawn last spring, and the withdrawal ended the matter so far as the Sioux City location was concerned; all subscriptions to stock have been cancelled, and to all those who made the first payment, the money has been returned. The Railway Conductor's Building company has yet a corporate existence, and all that has been done when Sioux City was the prospective location, can be utilized for any other place by simply amending the articles, providing some other than Sioux City as the location of the principal office of the company. The last Grand Division laid the matter over until next May. We believe that it should be taken up with a determined effort to retrieve the failure of the past, and we believe that it is certain that the conditions are much more favorable now than before for while, perhaps, the eager competition witnessed at Denver may not be repeated, we believe that the situation of the Order generally is now such as to beget confidence where there was a lack of it before. The B. of L. F., at their late convention, decided to build, and a late paper says that Des Moines has offered them $50,000 to locate there. We know that as much and if anything more will be offered by Des Moines for a conductors building. In this connection we may say, that should the Grand Division or the members so desire, the matter of location can be opened to the whole United States instead of being confined to Iowa, and in that event it is quite likely that a large number of cities would offer something in the way of inducements. Indianapolis, St. Louis, Cleveland, Omaha, St. Paul, Minneapolis and a score of eligible places would undoubtedly enter the race, but if anything should be done, the Grand Division should make a fair and equitable provision for receiving the propositions of all, and that would preclude any such game of bluff as was entered into at Denver. In our opinion, a committee should be appointed to receive any propositions, investigate the advantages and disadvantages of any proposed location, and make a decision or report thereon to the Grand Division; whether a decision is finally made by the Grand Division itself or by a committee, it should be away from the influence of the agents or representatives of any place as much as possible. Of course, if the matter of location is extended beyond Iowa it will necessitate surrendering our articles of incorporation in this state, but that is a matter that is easily done and many members of the Order think it should be done even if we remain in Iowa. We had hoped that the matter of location so far as the state is concerned was definitely settled at New Orleans, but if it shall prove to be for the best and that it is the wish of a majority of the members, the writer and all other loyal members in Iowa, (and there are none but loyal here) will join heartily with the majority, only let us make the next move, whether it be merely from one place in Iowa to another or from Iowa to some other state, a permanent one and let us provide a permanent home in the shape of a building that will be not only a source of pride to each but of revenue to all.

Let us hear from members of the Order on the subject. And by-the-way, to the firemen we say success and prosperity with your building.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

Does the St. Louis Globe-Democrat think that because a man enters the employ of a railway company that he thereby surrenders his right to control his own actions and becomes not only the servant of the public, but the serf of his employer? Does he thereby surrender the right to fix the price for which he is willing to labor? These queries are suggested by the following from its columns:

"The legislature exhausts only half its power and performs only half its duties when, in making appropriate regulations for the protection of the lives of persons and transportation of property upon railroads, it stops with their application to the corporations and their officers." These words occur in a report made by the New York State Board of Mediation and Arbitration in 1887. Further on the same document says that the "operatives of a railroad, from engineers down to track men, are, in the practical relations of their services to persons and property transported, far more important as factors than officers of the corporation, and should be held to due responsibility."

The relations which railway employes bear to the public have never found stronger and clearer expression than was given them in the document from which these words were taken. The men who formulated them could not be accused either of ignorance of the subject or of unfriendliness to the persons to whom they referred. They had studied the question in its practical as well as its theoretic bearing. With both the workers and their employers they had been brought in contact. They spoke as honest, intelligent and fearless servants of the state, who had been selected by the people to discharge a delicate and needed duty, and, by their works, justified the confidence reposed in them. Nor is the justice of their position in any way affected by the fact that the law-making body to whom they reported paid not the slightest attention to their recommendations.

There is not the smallest room for doubt that the most direct, practical and effective remedy for the abuses inherent in railroad strikes under present conditions lies in the direction indicated. Law must be made to bear upon the employé as well as the employer. The employé must be made to understand that when he obtains service on a railroad he becomes, in some degree at least, a public officer and that if he abandons his post voluntarily and designedly, and thus imperils the public either in person or property, he renders himself liable to punishment by the law. The interests of the public, which comprises a class more numerous and important than either the stockholders of railroads or their employés, and who suffer seriously in all contests of this sort under existing conditions, must be defended. The remedy here proposed may not entirely remove the evil aimed at, but nothing else which has been suggested promises to be nearly so readily applied or so adequate.

As THE CONDUCTOR has repeatedly stated, railway employes will not object to any just legislation and will not only cheerfully acquiesce in anything of the kind but will aid it all in their power. Employes will not object to a requirement that they shall give a reasonable notice before leaving the service of a railway company provided the obligation is made reciprocal and the company is deprived of the power to not only dismiss an employé without a moments warning, but as has been done in some cases to make an effort to publicly humiliate him by serving notice of dismissal after he has appeared in public to take his accustomed run; and in some cases to make the dismissal at a little way station and refuse to provide transportation home, leaving in some instances, a penniless employé away from home without means to return. In this respect, the employes have always given much fairer treatment than they have received; with few exceptions, notice has always been given of a strike and none of any great importance has ever occurred without ample notice either direct or indirect. It is in the power of railway companies now, to make an equitable arrangement with employes, but they are unwilling to surrender the privilege of abrupt dismissal. The writer prepared, as is well known to railway employés generally, a bill providing for the examination and license of conductors by a government board; and one of its provisions was that any conductor who unreasonably refused to perform the duty of a conductor when called upon by his employer, should have his license suspended, but the railway companies would none of it and why? Because it provided for an investigation, and did not leave them the sole judges of the matter. It also provided for an investigation in case of accidents, thus preventing them from making "scape-goats" of the employés in order to relieve themselves, which made it still further objectionable. The Globe-Democrat will find the employés always ready to consider the claims of the public, and will be ready to meet more than half-way, any proposition that will give them a "fair show." It will find that they are invariably, more ready to consider the claims of the public than are the companies, but they will not submit to deprivation of all manhood, the right to fix the price for which they will do a day's work, and be left entirely dependent upon the charity and sense of justice of railway officers. Some of us have already tried that too long for our own good. This article from the Globe-Democrat will, however, serve a good purpose in emphasizing the words of warning that we have endeavored heretofore to utter, and should be a significant notification to all employés that we must be alert and ready to meet such an attempt on the part of corporations and their papers that to some extent make public opinion.

POLITICAL UNION.

Considerable has been said of late by some of the political papers, of railroad men in politics, some assuming to direct them to keep out and others taking the opposite ground and defending the right of the employé to exert his citizenship. There are not many stronger partisans than the writer, and on questions outside of the interests of railway employés, political affiliations and preferences will be likely to govern. It is the intent of THE CONDUCTOR to keep its columns entirely free of "politics" as generally understood, but which is in reality "partisanship." The Order of Railway Conductors provides in its laws, that "The influence or sympathy of this Order shall never be used in favor of any political or religious organization whatever, and no political or religious discussion whatever, shall be permitted in any meeting of any division." We believe this provision to be a wise and beneficent one, for without it, there is always the possibility that the majority of a division might prostitute its influence to unworthy partisanship. This law, however, does not in any way prevent members from discussing in or out of meeting, such political action as, regardless of partisanship, they believe to be for their own benefit; it does not prevent them from using their influence in favor of or against any political candidate when they believe it to be their interest to do so, and further we believe it is their duty to do so; THE CONDUCTOR will never hesitate to commend any candidate for any office if in our opinion it will be for the interest of the conductors of any state, or of the United States, and we shall do this without the slightest regard as to whether such candidate is a democrat, republican, mugwump or anything else; neither shall we hesitate to condemn and to advise opposition when we believe it to be best. We believe that there should be more unity of action politically, among railway employés than has ever been in the past. The employés of the nation or of any state, if united, will wield an influence that will command respect and bring benefit, while if divided by party name and regardless of our own benefit, we will never be able to secure for ourselves a proper consideration. THE CONDUCTOR is very glad to note the improvement in this respect and the general tendency to unity of action as evinced by the action of the employés in some states, and we sincerely hope to see the day when such action will be the rule instead of the exception and extend to national affairs as well as to state. It is extremely probable that within the near future, legislation will be attempted that will in a great measure, at least, injure our organizations and deprive us of present influence and power. We believe that it is time for these things to be considered and that we should be ready to meet any such emergency when it comes.

WHY NOT?

Some little time ago, an officer of the Brotherhood of Railway Telegraphers stated that Grand Organizer Kirch of the Order of Railway Telegraphers claimed to know all about the secret work of the Order of Railway Conductors. In the September 15th CONDUCTOR, we noted this charge and also the denial made by Grand Chief Telegrapher Thurston. If any mention of the matter has been made in the official paper of the O. of R. T., we have failed to see it and the query arises as to why Mr. Thurston should consider it necessary to ask us to deny it, and neglect to deny it in his own paper. The fact of whether or not Mr. Kirch has made any such claim is of supreme indifference to us, and the ridiculousness of any such claim was shown by the fact that he was said to claim to know what was not in existence, but it would seem to us that good taste would suggest that Mr. Kirch or some one with authority from him, speak through the proper channel.

Changes in Division Directory since Oct. 15th:
Div. 5. Meetings 1st and 3d Tuesday at 8 p. m., 2d Monday at 10 a. m., in Elk's Hall, 11 Fayette street.

Div. 120. X. Secretary.
Secretary Div. 140. J. B. Parrott.
Secretary Div. 143. G. I. Wood, 268 Calder st.
Div. 149. Meetings every Sunday, 2 p. m.
Div. 220. Meetings 2d and 4th Sundays.
Div. 263. Cumberland, Md.; C. C., D. R. Shull, care Windsor Hotel; Secretary, W. W. Dunlap, 38 Hanover street; meetings every Sunday, 9 a. m., I. O. O. F. Hall.

Brothers R. Fraser and S. W. Cooper are requested to communicate with the Secretary of Division No. 81.

Cumberland Division No. 263 was organized Oct. 19th by A. G. C. C. Wilkins, with eighteen charter members and all good men and true, who will add strength to the Order.

Mrs. J. W. Rose, East McDonald street, Atlanta, Georgia, wishes the address of "Conductor's Wife," who gave the directions for dyeing in No. 17 of THE CONDUCTOR.

Savanna Division No. 78 will hold its annual election of officers at the regular meeting, Monday, December 8th; all members will please take notice and be on hand.

J. T. Harrahan has been elected second vice-president of the Illinois Central, and both stock holders and employes are to be congratulated on the choice.

Frank Butler, G. O. S., is now general yard master at Anniston, Ala., for the Georgia Pacific. Frank is at home in a yard as well as in a convention.

W. E. Burns, a past grand officer of the B. of L. F., has been nominated for the Illinois legislature in the fifth district. Mr. Burns should have the support of railway employes regardless of political affiliation.

A union meeting will be held at Altoona, Pa., Sunday, November 23, and it is hoped that there will be a large attendance. The committee having the matter in charge, (Brothers Albright, Stutsman and Clay) is a guarantee that the arrangements will be complete.

Brother W. H. Smith requests that any reader of THE CONDUCTOR to whom may be presented a letter introducing one W. K. Parker, will retain it and return it to him at 268 Calder street, Harrisburg, Pa. See November circular from this office.

The Supreme Council, which met in Houston lately to pass upon the grievance of the members of the B. of R. T. against the H. & T. C. railway for employing colored switchmen, decided against the brakemen.

Brother J. T. Crank, one of the oldest members of that "old reliable" Division, No. 53, at Denison Texas, had the misfortune to be thrown from his train by being caught by a telephone wire over the track and was badly injured. He is just getting able to walk with the aid of a crutch. THE CONDUCTOR joins a host of others in wishing his speedy recovery.

Railroad men in Missouri should not forget J. K. Merrifield and all should see that his name is on the ticket they vote. It is reported that the B. of L. E. as an organization is opposing Jim, but we are very loth to believe anything of the kind after the hearty and cordial support given by conductors to the engineer who is now a member of the Commission.

The Chief Conductor of Sedalia Division No. 60 requests us to warn members against one T. D. Whitlock, who claims to be a member of the Order, and who swindled several members there out of various sums ranging from $2 to $25. He is now said to be in Texas. Brother Hart expresses wonder that any such a man can impose upon members of the Order and induce them to give up their hard earned dollars.

Brother George C. Peiffer held two certificates in the Mutual Benefit Department as provided for by the amendments adopted at New Orleans and is entitled to the benefit for disability on both of the certificates, Nos. 400 and 403, and he is a member of R. B. Hawkins Division No. 114. In printing the notice of assessment, a typographical error was made, which makes it read that he is a member of Divisions 114 and 124; the latter is wrong and should be 114. This is the first instance where there has been a claim made for two certificates, although a number of members hold two.

Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, has issued a call for the tenth annual convention, to be held in Detroit, December 8th; all national labor organizations are invited to send delegates on a basis of a delegate for 4,000 members or less up to five for 64,000. From a brief acquaintance with President Gompers we believe the A. F. L. has an able and energetic leader.

What would be thought of the organization of railway employes that would resolve in favor of giving an annual dinner "for the purpose of calling out a larger attendance," and instruct its secretary to "communicate with the managers about having the membership fees and expenses of attending conventions defrayed by the companies." Yet this is what the late convention of the Society of Railroad Superintendents did.

Brother James E. Barton, a member of Syracuse Division, No. 155, was on October 20th, appointed train master of the western division of the Central with office at Syracuse, and has charge of the passenger and freight service and crews. Mr. Burrows has made a wise selection in appointing Brother Barton to this position and the employes are to be congratulated on having so genial a train master.

Brother R. S. Brock, one of the reliable members of Richmond Division No. 152, has been appointed general yardmaster in charge of the Richmond yards of the Chesapeake & Ohio. Brother Brock is ably assisted by Brother A. J. Blanton as day yardmaster and Brother Henry Schweickert, night yardmaster. Brother Blanton will be remembered by all who have attended the Grand Division for the past four years.

Brother E. D. Hogan of Minneapolis Division, No. 117, has been appointed train master of the First, Cannon Valley and Pacific divisions of the M. & St. L., vice W. E. Johnson, who takes an indefinite leave of absence on account of ill health. The boys regret that Mr. Johnson is compelled to leave, and hope that he may be completely restored to health. Brother Hogan will be a worthy successor and all are well pleased over the appointment.

Married at the residence of the bride's parents in Boone, Iowa, Thursday evening, October 2nd, Charles H. Richmond, Jr., of Council Bluffs, and Miss Kate Champlin. The friends of Brother Frank Champlin are counted by the hundred and there isn't one of them in all this broad land that will not sincerely congratulate Mrs. Richmond and wish for her a long and happy future. THE CONDUCTOR is proud to be reckoned among those friends.

Brother Charles H. Angell, a member of Chicago Division No. 1, died in Denver about Sept. 10th, and when his death occurred there were in his room two men, who claimed to be members of the Order. When the brother of the deceased arrived at the room, these two men were gone and there was missing Division card No. 5463, an O. R. C. charm and about $40 in money. If this card is presented, have the person presenting it arrested for robbery and telegraph Mrs. Chas. H. Angell, 719 Penn st., Kansas, City, Mo.

Col. J. R. Hollowell, who is a candidate for Congress in the 7th Kansas District, has publicly and privately pledged himself to labor for the passage of the safety appliance legislation outlined in these columns lately and which has been endorsed by a large majority of railway employes. Col. Hollowell is on the Republican ticket, which makes it politically "tuff" for the writer to endorse him, but nevertheless we urge railway employes to support him regardless of party and then to note that he carries out his promises faithfully.

The versatile genius of The Western Railway has devised a reminder of his publication in the shape of an "editorial pass" bearing on its face a lithograph of some of the celebrated scenery on the Rio Grande where he formerly officiated. In the conditions, Warman says "Nyether will visitors be permitted to tinker with the typewriter," which makes us think that "eyether" The Western Railway must be prospering or Cyrus don't understand the darkey's rule for pronunciation. It also suggests a query as to the sex of the typewriter. THE CONDUCTOR is indebted for a pass.

We are authorized to say to readers of THE CONDUCTOR that John T. Hamilton will support and vote for the compulsory application of safety appliances to cars and engines, whether it be a renewal of the legislation proposed at the last session of Congress or something similar that is satisfactory to the employes. Mr. Hamilton is a warm friend of the writer, both personally and politically, and we do not think that we are in any way inconsistent in urging members of the Order and railway employes generally to support him regardless of their political preferences, particularly as we have never hesitated to advise them to support Republican nominees when we believed it for their interest to do so. Mr. Hamilton is a man who can be depended upon to fulfil any promises, and we sincerely believe that employes who are voters in the Fifth Iowa District will conserve their own interests by supporting him.

If there is any punishment that is at all adequate for the crime of train wrecking, we would like to know what it is. A train on the C., M. & St. P. near Kansas City was wrecked by the rails having been disconnected and the ends pried out of line. The fireman was caught under the wreck and held for over an hour, dying just as the trainmen succeeded in releasing him. A day or so later, a farmer caught four men endeavoring to disconnect the rails on the C., B. & Q. in the same vicinity, and it is thought they were the same who caused the wreck on the St. Paul. No motive for the crime is known.

Brother James Curran president of the Mutual Aid and Benefit Association of Chicago, notifies members that the annual meeting will be held at the Sherman House, Chicago, November 28th, and he also reports a net gain of about ten per cent. in membership. The present membership is 1324, and Brothers Curran and Huntington have our sincere congratulations on the improved showing. This association paid for benefits during the past year, $41,000, and for expenses, $2,799.99; making a total of $533,339.50 paid for benefits since organization, and a total of $29,484.31 for expenses.

October 23rd, Brother E. H. Belknap, with the assistance of his faithful and devoted wife, took a walk out of doors. That this may be the prelude to a much more rapid recovery will be the sincere hope of all who read THE CONDUCTOR. Stricken down from a vigorous manhood and confined to the room for six weary months, his lot has been a sad one, but now that he has regained the use of his limbs and can get out into the air and be benefitted by exercise, we believe that he will soon be able to resume his accustomed duties and relieve both the writer hereof and the patient readers of THE CONDUCTOR, who through their friendship and love for "Brother Bel" have tolerated with but little protest, the vain effort to fill his place.

It begins to look very much as if the O. & M. railroad company were afraid to meet the issue raised by them in the arrest of Brother Marshall Lafferty some time ago. His suit for damages has again been postponed by request of the company, and it appears very much like an effort to tire out the prosecution. The court fixed Oct. 28th, and Dec. 2d, for the parties to agree upon and it is to be hoped that no further continuance will be permitted. Brother Lafferty deserves and should receive the support of every conductor in the United States in his effort. He still has a large number of copies of the argument of Messrs. Lamb and Voorhes, which he will be glad to sell at half price, (25 cents each) in order to assist him in paying the expense of the present suit. We hope that every reader of THE CONDUCTOR who has not already purchased one, will send for a copy.

The "Old Reliable" convention has been called by president Sinclair to meet October 29th, at Chattanooga, Tenn. We regret to note from the secretary's report, a net loss of 139 members, and sincerely hope that the present year will show a much better result; $16,505 was paid in benefits during the past year. This association is one of the oldest, if not the oldest conductor's association in existence; it has provided for too many widows and orphans in the past to be permitted to pass out of existence now or in the near future, and we sincerely hope that the convention in its wisdom will provide some way to restore the enthusiasm of the past. We would suggest to them the creation of a reserve fund but for the fact that some one might remind us of the decayed "fruit of the tree of the genus Castanea which is enclosed in a prickly pericarp." We would be very glad to meet the friends who will be at Chattanooga, and we heartily wish them success.

Every member of the Order who was at Rochester last May, will be saddened to learn of the premature death of I. S. Emery. Mr. Emery was the passenger agent of the R. W. & O. R'y., and it is to his efforts that the members were indebted for the pleasant trip to Charlotte as well as for many and various courtesies. The impression of all that he was a genial, kindly gentleman who would deem it a pleasure to discommode himself to accommodate a friend, is confirmed by the opinion of those who have known him for years. Mr. Emery was nominated by the labor party as a candidate for congress; accepting the nomination merely through his sympathy with and for the laboring man, and without hope of success. He was dismissed by the company for it, and the general opinion is that the depression therefrom caused him to commit the rash act of taking his own life, which he did on the evening of October 18th, at the Livingston hotel in Rochester.

J. M. Ashley is President and H. W. Ashley is General Manager of the Toledo, Ann Arbor & North Michigan Railroad. The General Manager, who is the son of the President, is a man who not only blacklists dismissed employes, but follows them to other roads and procures their dismissal when possible, and when one of the men who had been followed by this man to another road, called at his office he was ordered out. The President, J. M. Ashley, is a candidate for Congress in the Tenth Ohio, or Toledo, District, and if the father is like the son, railway employes should not hesitate as to their action. He should be opposed not only by railway employes, but by all laboring men, and particularly by members of labor organizations, for even if not a party to the despicable practices of his son, the President of a road should be able to prevent any such action, and if he does not, should be held responsible for it. The cause of the "following" in one case was that the man had been subpoenaed in a suit against the T., A. A. & N. M., and, when on the witness stand, told the truth instead of perjuring himself to save the company.

The Brotherhood of Railway Employes Home, lately incorporated and placed in running order in Chicago, is entirely separate and distinct from any Brotherhood hospital scheme. If any division has a disabled member, have the secretary write to J. B. Spencer, room 10, 166 Randolph street, Chicago, for blanks and investigate the matter. The home is unqualifiedly endorsed by THE CONDUCTOR. Its support is by purely voluntary contributions, and there are no high salaried officers. No one is admitted who is not a member of some one of the several organizations of railway employes and there is no admission fee. Its president, Hon. L. S. Coffin, needs no introduction to the railway employes of the United States, and its other officers and incorporators are well known business men whose names are guarantees of fairness. In fine, it is not a money-making scheme, but a purely charitable one, and in this respect it is entirely different from the "Brotherhood Hospitals" which are sending out circulars and which are formed simply to make money for the originators. We sincerely hope that every division of the Order will at once start a subscription paper and thus aid this worthy institution, and we also hope, that if any division of the Order has a member who is unable to work, they will immediately correspond with Mr. Spencer. Those who are unable to follow their vocation, but can do other light work, will be taught and aided to procure such work by the Home. All employes of the Home will be members of some one of the railway organizations and a member of the B. of R. T. is now employed in the secretary's office. Contributions may be sent direct to Mr. Spencer, or if preferred, members or divisions may send contributions to this office and we will see that it reaches the Home and is properly receipted for.

A member asks "why do you not solicit articles for THE CONDUCTOR from amongst the members?" We thought that when we had not only asked but urged members to write communications for THE CONDUCTOR, to discuss insurance, building, federation, legislation and various other matters that should be of interest to conductors generally and members of the Order particularly, that we had "solicited articles," but if there is a single member of the Order or a conductor, brakeman, fireman, engineer or any other trainman in the United States, Canada or Mexico who has not been solicited, this is an invitation to him to write an article for THE CONDUCTOR. We do not even confine this invitation to railway employes, but will extend it to any person who has the slightest interest in their welfare and prosperity. We will cheerfully cut down our editorial space to a single page or to nothing in order to fill THE CONDUCTOR with interesting matter from members. This invitation is further extended to the ladies; let us hear from you and let the members hear from you through the columns of THE CONDUCTOR. When you send a communication, however, do not be discouraged if it does not appear at once, and it sometimes happens that a letter is received containing items of interest at the time, which comes just too late to be inserted in a number and before the next number is issued, the items are so old as to be of less interest than newer ones that are in hand. In some cases we have communications for a single number that would fill three or four; manifestly some must be omitted or held over, while at other times there is practically none at all. We would be very glad to receive a communication each month from some member of every division of the Order.

We assure the good Brother who made the inquiry that we will welcome a communication from him or from any other member of his division, and we are obliged to him for his inquiry if it shall enable us to impress upon members of the Order generally, that they are not only welcome to the columns of THE CONDUCTOR but we are anxious to have them relieve us from the necessity of "hustling" for matter to fill with that is not so interesting as their correspondence would be. There are dozens of topics of interest to members of the Order, and every member has some opinion upon all of them, as well as some reasons for "the faith that in him is," and by an interchange of ideas of individuals we will arrive at what is desired by, and for the interest of, the majority.

TO CALIFORNIA IN '41.

In November or December of 1840, while still teaching school in Platte County, I came across a Frenchman named Roubideaux, who said he had been to California. His description was in the superlative degree favorable, so much so that I resolved if possible to see that wonderful land, and with others helped to get up a meeting at Weston and invited him to make a statement before it in regard to the country.

At that time when a man moved out West, as soon as he was fairly settled he wanted to move again, and naturally every question imaginable was asked in regard to this wonderful country. Roubideaux described it as one of perennial spring and boundless fertility, and laid stress on the countless thousands of wild horses and cattle. He told about oranges, and hence must have been at Los Angeles, or the mission of San Gabriel, a few miles from it. Every conceivable question that we could ask him was answered favorably. Generally the first question which a Missourian asked about a country was whether there was any fever and ague. I remember his answer distinctly. He said there was but one man in California that had ever had a chill there, and it was a matter of so much wonderment to the people of Monterey that they went eighteen miles into the country to see him shake. Nothing could have been more satisfactory on the score of health.

He said that the Spanish authorities were most friendly, and that the people were the most hospitable on the globe; that you could travel all over California and it would cost you nothing for horse or food. Even the Indians were friendly. His description of the country made it seem like a paradise. * * * * *

On leaving Weston where there had been so much opposition, we were six or seven in number, and nearly half the town followed us for a mile, and some for five or six miles, to bid us good-by, showing the deep interest felt in our journey. All expressed good wishes and desired to hear from us. When we reached Sappling Grove the place of rendezvous, in May, 1841, there was but one wagon ahead of us. For the next few days one or two wagons would come each day, and among the recruits were three families from Arkansas.

Every one furnished his own supplies. The party consisted of sixty-nine, including men, women and children. Our teams were of oxen, mules, and horses. We had no cows, as the later emigrants usually had, and the lack of milk was a great deprivation to the children. It was understood that every one should have not less than a barrel of flour with sugar and so forth to suit; but I laid in one hundred pounds of flour more than the usual quantity, besides other things. This I did because we were told that when we got into the mountains we probably would get out of bread and have to live on meat alone, which I thought would kill me, even if it did not others.

My gun was an old flint-lock rifle, but a good one. Old hunters told me to have nothing to do with cap or percussion locks, that they were unreliable, and that if I got my caps or percussion wet I could not shoot, while if I lost my flint I could pick up another on the plains. I doubt whether there was one hundred dollars in money in the whole party, but all were enthusiastic and anxious to go. * * * * *

The first incident was a scare that we had from a party of Cheyenne Indians just before we reached the Platte River, about two weeks after we set out. One of our men who chanced to be out hunting, some distance from the company and behind it, suddenly appeared without mule, gun, or pistol, and lacking most of his clothes, and in great excitement reported that he had been surrounded by thousands of Indians. The company, too, became excited, and Captain Fitzpatrick tried, but with little effect, to control and pacify them. Every man started his team into a run, till the oxen, like the mules and horses, were in a full gallop. Captain Fitzpatrick went ahead and directed them to follow, and as fast as they came to the bank of the river he put the wagons in the form of a hollow square and had all the animals securely picketed within.

After a while the Indians came in sight. There were only forty of them, but they were well mounted on horses, and were evidently a war party, for they had no women except one, a medicine woman. They came up and camped within a hundred yards of us on the river below. Fitzpatrick told us they would not have come in that way if they were hostile. Our hunter in his excitement said that there were thousands of them, and that they had robbed him of his gun, mule, and pistol.

When the Indians had put up their lodges Fitzpatrick and John Gray, the old hunter mentioned, went out to them and by signs were made to understand that the Indians did not intend to hurt the man or to take his mule or gun, but that he was so excited when he saw them that they had to disarm him to keep him from shooting them; they did not know what had become of his pistol or of his clothes, which he said they had torn off. They surrendered the mule and the gun, thus showing that they were friendly. They proved to be Cheyenne Indians. Ever afterwards that man went by the name of Cheyenne Dawson. * * * * *

I think I can truly say that I saw in that region in one day more buffaloes than I have seen of cattle in all my life. I have seen the plain black with them for several days' journey as far as the eye could reach. They seemed to be coming northward continually from the distant plains to the Platte to get water, and would plunge in and swim across by thousands—so numerous were they that they changed not only the color of the water, but its taste, until it was unfit to drink; but we had to use it. One night when we were encamped on the South Fork of the Platte they came in such droves that we had to sit up and fire guns and make what fires we could to keep them from running over us and trampling us into the dust. We could hear them thundering all night long; the ground fairly trembled with vast approaching bands; and if they had not been diverted, wagons, animals, and emigrants would have been trodden under their feet.—November Century.

Time.

One of the things to be found in this country which will, no doubt, seem odd to most of the iron and steel men now visiting us from the other side, is the arbitrary changes in time which will be made at various points in their journey. In the British Islands all time is Greenwich mean time; the distances east and west of Greenwich, within the limits of the land, not being sufficient to require the adoption of several divisions, each having a time of its own, as has been found necessary here. The mere swinging of the hands of one's watch one hour forward or back, on passing from one time belt to another, will not, however, be found troublesome, and experience shows that even the first glance, at one's watch after the change has been made does not shock one's sense of the eternal fitness of things, as might be supposed from the arguments put forth by the opponents of the general adoption of standard time.

But the thing which will prove bothersome is, where cities or towns are encountered, where people imagine that no time but their own particular time will do, and that, if the hands of their watches and clocks are set to any other time, they must necessarily get out of bed in the morning without due regard to the position of the sun, eat their dinner while the shadows are a little longer than they should be, and retire out of sympathy with the entire solar system. In such places the time will be found to agree with no other time, either of the railroads or of neighboring cities, and our English visitors can perhaps find no consolation for the annoyance caused thereby except in grumbling at the conservatism which is its prime cause. And the spectacle of Englishmen grumbling at American conservatism may seem a curious one; but such grumbling, we are forced to conclude, is entirely justifiable in this instance, for there can be no shadow of necessity or excuse for the present bewildering condition of affairs, when so simple an alternative is offered as the adoption of standard time. The city of Cincinnati, which until recently held to local time, to the great annoyance of her own people, as well as visitors there, has now, for some months past, been running on standard time, and it has been found entirely satisfactory, the difficulties which it was supposed would follow its adoption having been found to be wholly imaginary.

As an example of the other way of doing things, we need go only a short distance from Cincinnati, to the manufacturing town of Springfield, where the city council recently adopted standard time, and were followed by the county commissioners; but the board of education refused to adopt it, the result being that many of the shops were going by one time, and the schools by another, the endless confusion and trouble caused thereby being, curiously enough, and, of course, illogically, charged to the adoption of standard time; whereas, it was due solely to a mixture of standard with local time.

Nearly all manufacturing concerns have a great deal to do with railroads, and the use of two different times is especially troublesome in manufacturing towns. It is perfectly safe to say that, wherever standard time is really tried by itself, and unmixed with any other time, it will be approved, and within one week after such adoption no citizen of the town so adopting it will be able to see the difference, except in its greater simplicity and relief from bother. Yet, as an illustration of how firmly a popular superstition may become rooted in the minds of the people, and also of the means sometimes taken to perpetuate it, we find in a school geography published by Harper & Bros, among the other reasons given for the failure of some places to adopt standard time, that many occupations are "dependent upon sunlight," as though the changing of the position of the hands of a watch altered the amount of sunlight available, or as though it would be impossible to commence work at the occupations demanding sunlight until the hands of watches and clocks were in a certain position.

Work can be commenced and left off at the most convenient and suitable time, whether standard or local time is in use; but the minute hands of all time pieces in this country should agree, as provided for by the scheme of standard time adopted by the railroads to avoid endless confusion, and which will do away with still greater confusion when its adoption by everybody has been brought about.—American Machinist.

Advice of the Spider.

Commenting upon what it calls the "cruelty of strikes," the Railway Age suggests that it is a cruel thing to order into idleness many thousands of men who are now earning good wages and who have no personal reason for dissatisfaction."

Evidently the above named organ of railway officials does not consider the fact that every toiler has a personal interest in the condition of every other one. If the laboring man could see no farther into the problem than the Age assumes, his case would be indeed hopeless. But the toilers fully understand that they must depend upon united action for the preservation of what favorable conditions they now enjoy, just as a soldier understands that the safety of the whole army depends upon individual courage.

The argument that general strikes should never be ordered because many engaged in them would have no "personal interest" to be served is a favorite one with employers who give cause for strikes. It is an appeal to selfishness. It is made in the hope that the toiler can be dazzled with the dollar in sight and his vision for the future blinded. It is an attempt to create a stampede that shall destroy discipline in the ranks and thus weaken the irresistible power of united effort.

But the spider will sing the serenade to selfishness in vain. Labor may sometimes act the part of the fly, but it is altogether too "fly" to be so easily entrapped. The wonderful power of federation is forcing itself to the front. Its practical lessons have already been so clearly taught that he who runs may read. The toilers have at last learned that they are an army—not of aggression but of protection and preservation—and that the general welfare of all armies depends upon the willingness of each soldier to act like a man instead of considering his personal convenience and sacrificing the whole army by a cowardly anxiety for personal safety.—Firemen's Journal.

"David and Goliath" in Naval Warfare.

A NIGHT ATTACK BY A TORPEDO BOAT.

The opportunity comes,—a night dark and tempestuous. The clouds have covered the stars like a pall, and there is a howling wind which drowns all other sounds. The pygmy vessel makes ready and puts to sea. It rushes along as swift as the wind and as silent as a calm. Big waves sometimes sweep over it from end to end as it plunges through the darkness, but they are not heeded. Small as it is, it is stanchly built and can stand the strain of storm as well as its adversary. All men save one are snugly shut inside, tending the flying engine and preparing the missile of destruction. This is a strange bolt, shaped like a cigar, over ten feet in length; and the crew place it in the bow tube. The man on deck stands behind a little iron tower which shields him from the shock of the waves, and there he steers the boat.

In the darkness they seek their adversary determinedly, and with deadly purpose, since they are the protectors of their native land. The boat searches for a time in vain, for the big ship has covered all lights and is lying like a sleeping monster upon the waves, awaiting morning to renew the havoc. Perhaps if the ship remained thus, the little boat would never find her; but "Goliath" becomes uneasy; he fears "David" will make an attack, so he has determined to watch. A dazzling cone of white light suddenly starts from a point in the darkness and broadens upon the water. Slowly it sweeps about over the sea in circling arcs. All at once the little boat is bathed in a brilliant, blinding glare. The monster's eye finds it! But in finding the enemy the battle-ship has disclosed itself, and the dauntless little adversary steams straight forward at utmost speed. Streaks of flame are now shooting from under the white light, while the rattling reports of rifles and machine-guns rise sharply above the winds roar. Shot and small shell are falling about like hail upon the water, but the monster can not keep the range of the on-rushing boat, and the missiles fly wide of the mark. Suddenly the great ship looms up,—tall, long, shadowy, overpowering. It is not far off, almost near enough to be attacked. Yet a little closer and the intrepid pygmy, still unharmed, slows and steadies, with that ominous black tube pointing toward the monster's blazing side. Shots are falling upon the boat, and the man who was steering has taken refuge in his iron tower; but inside there is a wheel, and he can steer as well as before, for around him on a level with his eyes are little slits through which he can see. Now seconds are precious, if the fragile little craft is to escape destruction. The moment has come! A lever is pulled, and from that black tube comes a short hoarse roar. At once the little boat begins to turn, ready to escape with the speed of the wind.

But before the boat can turn, a dull heavy shock has jarred the sea. A gigantic column of white water rushes upward toward the black clouds. In it the tall masts of the monster ship seem to sway about and clash together. The banging of the guns is sharply succeeded by cries of human terror.

The mass of water falls back into the sea with a roaring crash and scatters over the waves in great wisps of glistening foam. The wind, sweeping on again forms new waves over the disturbed water. The monster ship has disappeared—the Goliath of the Deep is conquered by his pygmy antagonist.—JOHN M. ELLICOTT, in November St. Nicholas.

Through Great Granite Gorge.

The Great Granite Gorge is about forty miles in length. That portion from its head to the Bright Angel Creek, some fifteen miles, is narrow, dark, and gloomy. It stands at the upper gateway of the great cañon as if by its very frown to keep back the intruder, and guard from vulgar and sordid greed the grandeur, the beauty, and hidden treasure of the lower cañon. At the Bright Angel Creek everything changes—the granite slopes are flatter, they are of a softer black granite, cut into sharp pinnacles and crags, and seem more as if formed of very coarsely stratified slate.

The cañon grows more and more picturesque and beautiful the farther we proceed. The granite has lost its awful and threatening look, and slopes back in beautiful hillsides, of variegated black, gray, and green.

At the side cañons, and from the bends of the river, the upper portions of the whole gorge are brought into view, showing the great marble and sandstone cliffs, benched back far away from the river, while mountains jut in close between the side cañons and washes nearly a mile and a quarter in height. As we look down the river, or up a low side cañon, with the placid water between its polished walls of black, and gray, and green, for a foreground, there rise above the dark sandstone, tier upon tier, bench upon bench, terrace upon terrace, stepping back farther and farther, and higher and higher, and in immensity of height and proportion seeming to tower almost over our heads. First above the dark sandstone come the flattened slopes of the lime and mineralized matter, in horizontal layers of yellow, brown, white, red, and green.

Then rise sheer walls of stained marble one thousand feet or more, the lower portions yellow, brown, and red the coloring of red growing brighter as it nears the top. Above this smaller benches of marble, at the top of each a little mesa covered with green bunch grass and bushes, and above these a dozen or more terraces of scarlet and flame colored sandstone, stained on their outer points with black, and the little benches between them relieved by the bright green of the greasewood and bunch grass, the whole crowned with perhaps a couple of thousand feet of the lighter gray, yellow, and white sandstone ledges, capped by pinnacles and spires, turrets and domes, in every imaginable shape, size and proportion.—

* * * * *

On the morning of July 9th, Mr. Brown and the supplies having arrived, we started into the unknown depths of Marble Cañon, with three boats and our little party of eight. That night we camped at the lower end of the Soap Creek rapid. President Brown seemed lonely and troubled, and asked me to sit by his bed and talk. We sat there late, smoking and talking of our homes and our journey on the morrow. When I awoke in the morning Mr. Brown was up, and as soon as he saw me said, "Stanton, I dreamed of the rapids last night, the first time since we started." After breakfast we were again on the river in very swift water. Mr. Brown's boat, with himself and McDonald, was ahead, my boat, getting out from shore with some difficulty, was a little distance behind. In two minutes we were at the next rapid. Just as we dashed into the head of it, I saw McDonald running up the bank waving both arms. We had, for a few moments, all we could do to manage our own boat. It was but a moment. We were through the rapid, and turning out into the eddy. I heard McDonald shout, "Mr. Brown is in there." I looked to the right, but saw nothing. As our boat turned around the whirl-pool on the left, the note-book which Mr. Brown always carried shot up on top of the water, and we picked it up as we passed.

Mr. Brown's boat was about one-half minute ahead of mine. His boat went safely through the worst part of the rapid, but in turning out into the eddy, an up-shooting wave, so common in that river between the current and the whirlpools and eddies on the side, upset it without a moment's warning. Brown was thrown into the whirlpool, while McDonald was thrown into the current. McDonald as he came up saw Brown on the side of the current, and shouted to him, "Come on." He answered with a cheerful "All right." McDonald, carried down by the stream, "was three times thrown under by the terrific tossings of the mad waters," and with great effort reached the left bank, where the current rushed upon the shore at a sudden turn to the right. As soon as he recovered himself he saw Brown still in the whirlpool, swimming round and round. Rushing up the bank he shouted to us for help. In that whirlpool poor Brown battled for his life, till exhausted in the fight he sank, a hero and a martyr to what some day will be a successful cause.—From "Through the Grand Cañon of the Colorado," by R. B. STANNON, in November Scribner.

Cardinal Newman.

Louder than roar her own reverberant seas
 Around the white sea cliffs—more full than they
 Of tumult and harsh discord—night and day
 Uprising, England's voice for centuries
 Has smitten the ear of God; but melodies, Strong ones and true, have still not failed her;
 they
 Up through the din wind still their silvery way
 And God for earth's marred harmonies appease.

Of such, sweet-springing from a blameless heart,
 And perfect grown with length of many days,
 The music that we ceased but now to hear;
 That fuller swelled and sweeter year on year
 Until it rose a marvellous hymn of praise
 And with the nine-choired choral strain found part,

CHARLESTON, S. C., Oct. 22, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor.

DEAR SIR:—I have already acknowledged myself a Crank on the subject of life insurance, and would that I could say that there were at least ten thousand more members of the Order of Railway Conductors cranky on the same subject.

How any Brother can read the appeal of Brother Latimer in his letter of Oct. 2d, where so much is said that is true, and not take immediate advantage of the insurance—is a mystery that I cannot solve.

There is no question about its being the cheapest and best insurance (all things considered). Take the Equitable Insurance Company, which ranks away up, and see what it will cost you. A man at the age of twenty-five years has to pay $20.00 a year on the thousand and to carry an insurance of twenty-five hundred he would pay $50.00 per year, and would have to die to win.

What does it cost in the Order of Railway Conductors? $37.00 a year on the same amount, and in this case you are not obliged to die to get your insurance. For the loss of eyesight, hand, foot or limb, or totally disabled, you get the full amount of insurance.

I do not lay any claims to clear headedness, but our Brother asks that the clear headed Brothers express their opinions as to the lack of interest in this matter. My Brother I think in a good many cases it is nothing but indifference, and if every member of the Insurance Department who is interested in it, would make it his business to make at least one convert,

"not a block of five but one, and who of us that cannot induce one member to do his duty to his family. Is it not our sworn duty to help a Brother or a Brother's family, and is this not helping both at the same time. And now Brothers who are not insured do not think about this matter, but go to your Division Secretary and get a blank application, fill it out at once, and when approved, hand to your wife, if you have one, if not, perhaps you have an aged mother who is depending upon you for a support, or sisters who will be left to live upon the cold charities of this world. I know after you are insured, your trips will be made lighter, knowing that you have performed a duty which you will never regret. Now Brother L. let us try this plan and get others in your Division to do the same, and you will see our Benefit Department increase so rapidly that our assessments will decrease.

Yours in P. F.,

S. C. GILBERT, 208.

SYRACUSE, N. Y. Nov 3.—Through the undue officiousness of a boy telegraph operator at Rock Cut, near here, this afternoon, a wreck was caused resulting in the death of four trainmen and the injury of a number of other people. Two coal trains were side-tracked at Rock Cut waiting for the New York and Philadelphia express from the south. Just as the headlight of the express came into view it struck operator Clark that the switch ahead of the coal train was not set for the main track. Immediately he dashed out of the station, rushed to the switch and threw it over. Then he realized, too late, that he had been mistaken. Before he could make a move to reset the switch, the express train rushed into the siding and crashed into the engine of the first coal train. The firemen and engineers of both engines, James Doyle, M. Furnand, Michael Burke and Jeremiah Lee were caught in the wreck and ground to pieces.

The baggage and express cars of the passenger train careened over into the ditch on the north side of the track. W. H. Coppenall, George Derby, Joseph Kibball and Michael Tierne, trainmen, were very seriously, but not fatally hurt. All the passengers were badly shaken up, though only one was injured seriously—Mrs. Julia Corcoran of Buffalo.—SIOUX City Journal.

"TWENTY BUSHELS OF ROSES."

Now, what was he going to do with all those roses? What did he want them for? He asked that he might have leave to gather "twenty bushels a year." What an unusual request! An unheard of one it was—and coming from a man!

It is a poetic little incident which I have plucked right out of sober history. It immediately brings a picture before me of an old, a very old, 'English garden. The man was the unfortunate Bishop of Ely of Elizabeth's reign. He was unfortunate not only because he lost the favor of his fickle sovereign, but because through one of her caprices he lost his garden. It is the last-named loss that engages our sympathies, and it is the one with which we have to do.

England had had pleasant gardens from the time of the Conquest; with shady walks, hedges, fountains and many fruit trees. And those gardens had been, as a rule, in the hands of men who had chosen an ecclesiastic life. The monks and bishops found the pursuit of horticulture congenial to their quiet tastes and their ways of seclusion. Even now, in the neighborhood of some of the old abbeys and other religious houses, may be seen a few half-wilding rose-bushes, descendants of those once cultivated by tender hands; and along the moldering walls are still clinging vines and scraggly fruit-trees.

Elizabeth's bishops were great horticulturists. Dr. Cox, bishop of Ely, rich, honored, scholarly, and a man of fine taste, had a palace in London "and fair gardens called Ely-place, on Holborn-hill." This great estate had long been held by the bishops of Ely; and it appears in history that the Duke of Gloster, afterward Richard III., once asked for strawberries from that place. In the play of "King Richard III." Shakespeare makes use of the incident:

"My lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn,
I saw good strawberries in your garden there:
I do beseech you, send for some of them."

Our Bishop's garden covered several acres of land; and a right fertile tract it was, too, with ust the needed moisture, for once, before London had become so densely peopled, a stream had flowed there, called the Oldbourne, from which the hill, Holborn, had taken its name. The Bishop had a princely establishment in this, his town house, which he kept up, besides maintaining his country place at Stanton; and there was no lack of upper gardeners and under gardeners to keep things in order.

We may be sure that, according to the custom, this ample domain was inclosed by a high wall of brick or stone, against which fruit trees were trained, so that in the genial warmth where the sunshine could strike them, the abundance of peaches, plums, pears, apricots, nectarines—how tempting the names—might ripen in their time. Think of this great garden with its cool, green vistas, its orchard trees where pippins and other favorite apples grew, its gravel walks bordered with box, its beds of lavender and thyme and all sweet herbs. Fragrant and beautiful, musical with the hum of bees and songs of birds, it was a peaceful, flower-adorned retreat. Right in the busy London of tradesmen and guilds, processions and pageants, of hawkers who cried their wares just outside the walls, the stir and discordant noises must have come to the good Bishop as he walked and meditated, like the turmoil of a world he was glad to escape from.

We know that he took great delight in it, especially in his roses. One cannot help wondering about the kinds he had there. Roses past counting, "a gardenfull," had the Bishop of Ely,

"Red roses, white roses, Roses past season."

Perhaps he had collected all the varieties which once grew wild in Britain, the Scotch roses, the sweet-briers, all the red, red roses of many reds, the pale pink ones, the white ones, from thickets and hedges all over the dominion. He must have had the blended rose of York and Lancaster, the Provence and Burgundy roses and others which came into England with the queen consorts from the south of Europe. The daintiest, dearest, most delicious, the damask rose could, hardly have been among them unless some crusader of kindred tastes with the Bishop had brought one when he came home.

We might never have known of this rose-passion of his but for the misfortune that befell him. He had offended the Queen by rebuking her for some Popish ceremonials, and she had never forgiven him. Elizabeth was a good hater; and the time came when she could have her revenge. Her new favorite, Sir Christopher Hatton of whom she was foolishly fond, had long had his eye on the lovely gardens on Holborn-hill and wanted them. When it came to her knowledge the Queen commanded the Bishop to give them up. He resisted. Then she wrote him a brief letter, in which she used some of the strong language habitual to her when she was wroth. The Bishop was compelled to yield. But he reserved the privilege of free access through the gate-house, liberty to walk in the garden, and "leave to gather twenty bushels of roses yearly therein." The same was to be granted to his successors in the bishopric.

And now a light dawns upon me. Can it have been that the good man wanted the roses for confections and conserves? Did he purpose having them distilled!

Let us not harbor such a thought for a moment. We will remember how many men have been almost passionate lovers of flowers; how Linnæus fell down on his knees when he first beheld the golden furze of England, how a great American divine expressed the extravagant desire to have mignonette growing in his garden in such a quantity that he could mow it with a scythe. We will remember two distinguished historians, Bancroft and Parkman among their roses.

How such men would revel in the flowers that certain recent travelers tell us of; the acres of blood-red anemones on the hillsides of Ephriam; the vast solitudes of daffodil far as the eye could reach, splashed with gladiolus and purple iris, that Pierre Loti came upon in Morocco, and the plains of lavender he saw; the miles of prairie roses in the far west; the forget-me-nots of Western Siberia described by Kennan: "the steppe to the very horizon was a blue ocean of forget-me-nots. I do not mean simply that the ground was sprinkled with them, nor merely that they grew in great abundance. I mean that the grass everywhere was completely hidden by them, so that the plain looked as if a sheet of blue gauze had been thrown over it, or as if it was a great expanse of tranquil water reflecting a pale, blue sky."

We will believe that the Bishop, grown gray among his flowers, stipulated for these twenty bushels now that the garden was to be taken away from him, so that he might have the pleasure once a year of revelling in roses within the walls of his own home. To be let in through the gate-house by Sir Christopher's gate-keeper and suffered to walk up and down and look at them would be tantalizing after all those years of ownership. He would have a carnival of roses, till every old oak-panelled room in his house should be brightened by their glow and made sweet by their fragrance. From hall to lady's boudoir everywhere within, there should be a feast of roses.

So the housemaids came out while the morning dew lay on the garden; and with much chatter and girlish laughter and pelting one another with roses till the paths were strewn with petals, filled their baskets and bore them into the great house. And this continued till the Bishop of Ely was gathered to his fathers.

Years after, Gerard the botanist had a garden on Holborn-hill, containing eleven hundred plants, as catalogued by himself. There were all sorts of pleasant flowers; and who can doubt that some of the identical roses beloved by the Bishop were among them, and that they clung to the spot until the hill was dug over for building purposes and not a trace remained to show that a garden had ever been there?—AMANDA B. HARRIS, in November Wide Awake.

TOLEDO, October 28, 1890.

Toledo Division No 26 has much to be proud of from the fact that our ladies have organized a Division of the Ladies' Auxiliary to the O. R. C. under the name of Banner Division No. 6.

Surely it is the Banner Division in numbers—forty charter members and more to be heard from, well officered and in proper working order.

Thursday afternoon, Oct. 9th, there gathered at Friendship Hall some seventy ladies, all wives of O. R. C. conductors, to institute, elect and install its officers. Mrs. Chas. Ragon, Grand Worthy President, of Columbus, Ohio, assisted by other Grand officers from Elkhart, Indiana, Columbus and Norwalk, Ohio, was present to perform the work. The work was done throughout without the ritual, showing the interest all their Grand officers are taking in the work, a lesson which might well be copied by some of our older Divisions of the Order. I often think myself how much more impressive is our ceremony when the officers of a Division have the work committed to memory.

The following officers were elected and installed: Mrs. James McMillan, Sister President. Mrs. E. W. Purrett, Sister Vice-President. Mrs.

F. J. Stout, Sister Secretary and Treasurer; Mrs. Prince, Senior Sister; Mrs. M. A. Loop, Junior Sister; Mrs. Baldwin, Sister Inside Guard; Mrs. D. F. Meyers, Sister Corresponding Secretary.

In the evening they gave their first entertainment, which for precision, neatness and nicety there is no equal, and the ladies are entitled to great credit for the manner in which it was carried out—taking charge of everything, even acting as floor managers when the dance commenced. Below I give you the program:

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS.

Mrs. Jas. McMillan, Mrs. J. Powers, Mrs. Jas. H. Moore, Mrs. A. W. McIntyre, Mrs. F. B. Rockwood, Mrs. O. B. Clarke.

RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

Members of Banner Division No. 6.

FLOOR MANAGERS.

Mrs. John Talty, Mrs. H. O. Wright, Mrs. E. W. Purrett, Mrs. D. F. Meyers, Mrs. M. A. Loop.

The entertainment was strictly invitational and the Hall was taxed to its utmost.

Mayor Hamilton's address was pithy and to the point, creating at times merriment and applause. Mrs. Ragon's address was listened to with much interest and was delivered in an able manner, defining the object of the Ladies' Auxiliary, its work and necessity.

Mrs.——of Elkhart spoke at some length, explaining the necessity of working in harmony and unison, that no unbiased acts or feelings should ever exist among them.

The vocal and instrumental music, and the recitations, were grand and of the highest order.

Especial credit is due Mrs. Robt. Miller who is a woman of rare ability.

The entertainment was interrupted by Bro. Purrett, our worthy Sec. & Treas. who called Mrs. McMillan, president-elect, to the rostrum and in a few well chosen remarks in behalf of the Conductors of Toledo Division No. 26, presented Banner Division with a handsome bible for their altar.

This was not on their program and Mrs. McMillan for the moment was dazed, but rallied at once, showing herself equal to the emergency and in a trembling voice thanked the conductors in behalf of the Sisters of Banner Division for their kindness, and magnificent present.

There most always comes a time to eat, to the railroad man and it was so in this case, and such a spread!

Mr. Editor, you should have availed yourself of your invitation, to understand and appreciate I cannot do it justice, so will not try.

The conductors tried to help, but all you could hear was, "sit down." If ever there was anyone that was going to run the "machine" these ladies were the ones.

The refreshments were passed around to the audience on plates with "jap" napkins, by a score of ladies with such dispatch, that all were partaking of the delicacies at the same time.

After doing justice to the refreshments the hall was cleared, and the dance began.

Just glance at the program of dances and see their title.

"Unfurl the Banner." Surely it was unfurled, one would think so had they seen the beautiful drapery of those handsome ladies floating in the "mazy waltz," and, "A La Ragon."

The worthy G. W. P. did not enjoy the "name sake lanciers," as she is rather religiously inclined and does not take part in such exercises.

The "Barber Pole" was a stunner, "Our Hoosier Sisters" did credit to the military band.

Sister Loop was one of the floor managers and got lost in the shuffle while calling out in a weak sisterly voice "one more couple this way." The dancers went around the "Loop" and they did not know how it happened.

The event of the evening was "McIntyre's Reel." Just speak of a reel and Mr. and Mrs. Mc. are in their element; the floor had to be cleared to give them a chance.

"Well, say," again I am inadequate for the occasion.

Nimble Mrs. McIntyre, who tips the beam at 250, and Mrs. Loop near that, have been called by the "Elder" as the two Johns.

At this point the dance was called to a halt by Brother Purrett, who, after the floor had been cleared and the people called to order, explained that through an oversight on the part of the conductors a portion of the ceremony had been overlooked and forgot. There was a presentation to be made to the ladie's auxilliary of one of the most important working tools of the initiatory ceremony.

It was a well recognized fact, that through all the dark ages past and present no secret organization was properly equipped without a royal Bumper, and the conductors had not overlooked this fact and had purchased at a great expense his majesty the "Goat," for their particular benefit, and asked that all remain quiet as the procession entered.

The outside door was opened and in bounded the goat, with Masters Burrell, Loop and Clare McIntyre in charge. Brother Lon McIntyre gave him such a start from the ante-room one would have thought he was a ten-wheeler with forty loads, the way he brought the boys into the room.

He was a fine fellow, and carried out his part nobly.

The boys had got a blanket painted with "Banner Division No. 6, Ladie's Auxiliary," on either side, which his goatship wore with royal grace.

For a few moments pandemonium reigned in the hall, and after quietness was again restored it was announced, that the ladies would now exemplify the work, as Mrs. McIntyre had consented to ride the goat. Through some hitch and misunderstanding Mrs. Mc. refused, but her sister, Mrs. French, volunteered. Several of the Columbus ladies objected to this, and were joined in this objection by Elkhart, as Mrs. French did not belong to the corps. Brother Charles Shultz and Wash Brown told them to make the kick, because her husband was not a conductor anyway. The kick held, under the circumstances, that the majority had to rule. Mrs. Sumaker and Mrs.

Shipley voting with the minority. At this hitch in the proceedings his Goatship was led from the room in the triumphal march; "Nearer my God to Thee," all following to pay their last respects to the departed one. The dance again went on.

Mrs. Purrett as a floor manager was a success, and is entitled to great credit for the manner in which she conducted the floor. The other floor managers were conspicuous by their silence and non-assistance.

As we go down the program we come to "Sumaker's last." Surely there must be work for the shoemaker's last, judging from the way they hammered out the last dance.

Then comes a time when all enjoyable things must cease, so it was in this. As all commenced getting ready for home, hand-shaking, good-byes, and kissing was in order, (only among the ladies, mind that) every one declaring an enjoyable time and voting the entertainment a success.

NOTES.

Brother Stout was on deck doing all in his power to make things pass off pleasantly. He liked to have killed your humble servant trying to make me dance with two ladies at the same time.

Mrs. Powers is entitled to much credit for the able manner in which she conducted her part on on the committee of arrangements.

Brother Purrett is a dancer of no mean profession.

Mrs. James Moor, Mrs. F. B. Rockwood, Mrs. O. B. Clark, and others of the committee of arrangements had a smile and pleasant word and look for all.

Brother Harry Wright and Lon Mc. can dress many things better than a goat.

Sister Hugh Carnes gave away part of the secret work (about the goat), and should be churchered for that.

Brother Harry Wells is a good single handed dancer.

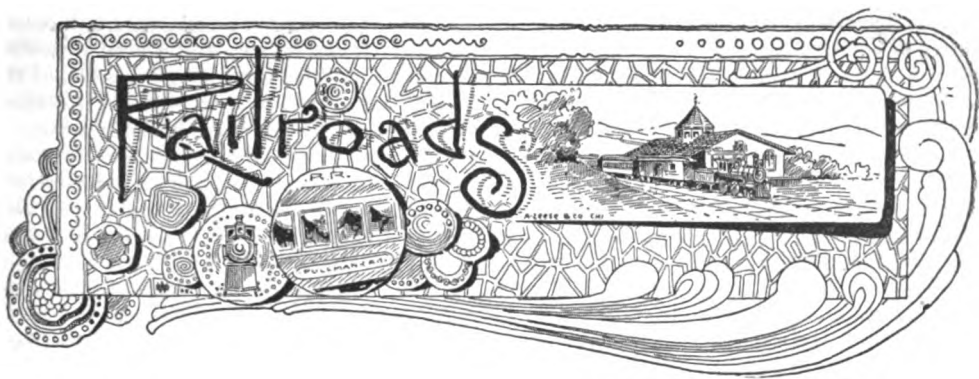

Brother Osborn, C. C., of Division 26, one of the dromios, was also conspicuous by his absence.

The oriental degree was conferred on Brother Loop by the ladies next day—don't mention it. There was no goat, but "Oh my" is no where; ye olden time running the gauntlet is nothing compared.

Harry Wright was there for first, but turned pale and ran away and did not show up for two days. I will close, with more anon.

Yours truly in P. F.,

M. A. L.

THE NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD STRIKE.

BY SAMUEL GOMPERS, PRESIDENT AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, NEW YORK CITY.

Public attention has been attracted to the recent strike of the employés of the New York Central Railroad, not because of the number of employés involved, the causes of the dissatisfaction that culminated in the withholding of their labor by the strike method, or because of the conduct or continuance of that special skirmish in the industrial war.

The strike of the carpenters for eight hours was vastly more important as a fact and as a study; but as that strike was in the direction of progressive civilization directly affecting production and not commercial distribution, it was less startling than the short, impulsive strike of the railroad men.

As men can exist longer without eating than they can without breathing, so the men engaged in the varied business interests, can calmly witness the stoppage of production in any industrial center or enterprise other than their own, while the stoppage of the transmission of news by electricity, or of the transportation of passengers and freight over any of the great avenues of trade, awakens commercial and financial fear, endangering a panic.

Wendell Phillips said: "The laborer puts his hand into the cogwheels of the factory, and when the machinery stops the employer asks, What is the matter?" The employés of the New York Central Railroad put their hands into the cogwheels of the intricate machinery of commerce, and the people will not only ask what is the matter, but what is the remedy?

In your letter requesting my views upon some of the questions involved in the New York Central strike, you say: "There are at least three parties interested in every railroad strike: first, the employés; second, the corporation, and third, the general public;" and you add, that "each of these parties has, of course, its interests and rights." As your space and the time at my disposal will not permit an exhaustive essay on so important a theme, permit me to give my views upon the first proposition as stated in your communication, "What are the rights of employés?" "Have they the right, after voluntarily striking, to be heard in any grievance either through a committee of their own or through a committee of the organization to which they belong, or through any other representative whom they may select?"

It is now almost unanimously acknowledged that employés have the right to strike, and having the right to strike, that they have the right to use all constitutional means to make the strike successful. As a strike is the withholding of labor for a better condition of the market, it must be conceded that the laborer has the right to fix the price and conditions upon which he will put his labor into the market. Having the inalienable right to organize for mutual protection and benefit, they have the right of use to all the rights, customs, privileges and immunities of organized bodies. An organized body can speak only through and by its legally constituted representatives, and the members of organized bodies are the only constituted and competent persons to select such representatives.

As the principal is responsible for the acts of his agent in his capacity as agent, it is the duty of the principal to protect the agent when he performs the duties assigned him, and the agent has the right of immunity from responsibilities within certain legal and moral limits. Agents are, and should be held up to public odium when they, as agents, perform an act that is dastardly, contemptible or cruel, even when such acts are not punishable by courts of justice; but when an agent of an organized body seeks the betterment of his principal, that is, his constituency, by securing by equitable methods a new contract, the man, or body of men, who would maltreat the agent bearing such a commission, would shoot the bearer of a flag of truce on a field of battle. The right of representation by a chosen spokesman will be contended for by organized laborers with all the legal weapons that nature, art, science and invention can furnish; and he who stands in the way of the speedy recognition of this inherent, inalienable right is an enemy of peace.

Before considering your second division of the question of the right of the employés, permit me to clearly recapitulate some of the rights that are included in the foregoing statement. Employés have the right: first, to organize; second, to strike; third, to prevent the employment of other laborers (within legal bounds); fourth, to divert trade to other parties; fifth, to the protection of the judicial and executive departments of State as against the false representation of facts, the employment of a private armed band, and as against the unwarrantable discharge and black-listing of the members of the organization or their representatives; sixth, the right to know cause why they are discharged; seventh, the right to be recognized through their representatives; eighth, the right to know cause why wages are reduced, or why they cannot be increased, their hours of labor reduced, and why the sanitary conditions and protective appliances of science and invention are not introduced; ninth, the right to their share in the joint product of the capital invested, the management and themselves.

This last brings us back to the question of interests. You say "each of these parties (the corporation, the employés and the general public) has its interests and rights." It is the interest of the employé that the management should be economical, that the stocks should not be watered, that a fair remuneration should be paid for the service of management and for the use of money; in brief, the interest of the employés includes the interest of the general public with this addition, that as regular and full employment at present wages, with hope of better wages as a condition, depend upon a successful business, the interests of the employés to this extent are one with the management. Interests conflict when high salaries or large profits accrue to tall talkers, and low wages and uncertainty of employment accrue to hard workers.

The second division of your question as to the rights of employés relates to the rights of employés (to put it in your language) after "voluntarily striking." It is held by many, and perhaps by most employers, as well as by many so-called political economists, that a strike is a permanent severance of the relations and interests between the employer and the employés who have struck. Against this position I quote the words of Geo. E. McNeil in a recent article on strikes. He says: "A strike is not the voluntary withholding of labor, it is the compulsory act of intelligent, self-respecting men and women; a method of self defense." This is true of strikes for less hours of labor and for higher wages as well as strikes against a reduction of wages, discharge of leaders, officers and other representatives, black-listing, shop rules, etc. The wage worker is a party in interest with his employer in spite of the fact that under the wage system they live in antagonistic relations toward each other. France and Germany continue their commercial and political relations and interests, but do not disband their armies or disarm their defenses. All civilized countries stand prepared for war, and yet they are constantly seeking new treaties (contracts) for mutual benefit. A war between two nations is but a temporary affair (a strike) that will ultimate in a renewal of commercial and political relations; often with enlarged mutual interests. The overthrow of Napoleon the First was not the subjugation of France. Every nation during war, or after defeat, has the acknowledged right of representation in negotiating terms of settlement. A strike is a war between two important factors in industrial or commercial enterprises, and the right to negotiate a settlement is never waived or vitiated. It is time public sentiment was awakened to the importance of the recognition of this truth.

A strike is an attempt not to destroy the enterprise, but to defeat the administration of the enterprise; in fact to compel a treaty (contract) that will give them (the strikers) greater advantage of conditions and opportunities.

The wage-worker not only has the right to control his time, that is, the amount he will sell, but he has the right to his special skill or adaptability in the position he occupies in any given establishment or enterprise. He has, by continuous employment for an employer, accumulated an equity, that is, an interest, that is lost to him, lost to the employer and the public, if he leaves that employer, except in rare cases when the change is purely voluntary; but it is nevertheless true that as they strike not against their employment, but against its conditions, they have an interest in equity in the past and future results of the joint effort of the employers and themselves. The opportunity to labor in the position they occupied at the time of the strike is their capital; it is their situation, their property.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defense," and in the constitutions of the several States this right to be heard by himself or counsel is fully provided and guaranteed. However great the crime against persons or property, the United States and the State governments not only permit, but provide for the representation of the accused by counsel. It is only in the relations of the employers and employes that this right is denied. General Butler has said that "the Constitution grows;" it is time that the judges of the courts, men of legal attainments, and the public generally, should grow up to the constitutional provisions for the protection of the rights of the wage-workers.

To your question, How shall these rights be secured and maintained? permit me to answer, that as the rights of the people have been obtained in the past by organized, earnest, self-sacrificing effort, it is safe to continue on that line. The effort to obtain a larger freedom is in itself an educator to still grander efforts.

Chicago & Alton Railroad Co.

BLOOMINGTON, ILLINOIS, May 26, 1890

ARTICLE III.

Way Freight Conductors shall receive $80.00 per month, and Brakemen $55.00 per month. No over time will be allowed. Trips made on lay-over days, or Sundays, will be paid for as per Articles I and II.

ARTICLE IV.

On regular construction or ballast trains, conductors shall receive $78.09 and brakemen $52.00 per month. Twenty-six days to constitute a month, and twelve hours or less to constitute a day's work. No loss of time when the crew is held for service.

ARTICLE V.

Conductors or brakemen dead-heading to a point to take charge of a train, or dead-heading from a point to which they have taken a train, when acting under orders from officers of the company, shall be paid as prescribed in Article I.

ARTICLE VI.

Any conductor or brakeman piloting a train or engine to any point shall be paid as prescribed in Article I, except that a brakeman acting as conductor in piloting, shall receive conductor's pay.

ARTICLE VII.

In case of freight trains doubling hills, conductors shall receive 3 cents, and brakemen 2 cents, per mile for the same.

ARTICLE VIII.

All conductors and brakemen, called as witnesses for the company, shall receive—for conductors, $3.00, and for brakemen, $2.00, per day, and expenses.

ARTICLE IX.

All the yard men at Slater, Roodhouse, and Alton, shall be paid at the present monthly rates, twenty-six days to constitute a month's work, additional days to be paid on the same basis.

ARTICLE X.

Passenger conductors and brakemen, making extra time, will be paid for same.

ARTICLE XI.

A caller shall be employed by the company, both day and night, at Brighton Park, Bloomington, Roodhouse, and Slater.

ARTICLE XII.

The right to regular runs and to promotion will be governed by merit, ability, and seniority. Everything being equal, the conductor, brakeman, or yardman longest in the service will have preference, the Superintendent to be the judge as to qualifications. Nothing in this Article shall be construed as preventing the company from employing experienced men from other roads when the good of the service requires it.

ARTICLE XIII.

Unless leave of absence for a definite time is given, conductors, brakemen, and yardmen leaving the service of the company to engage in other business, or to work on other roads, and who shall, subsequently, be re-employed by the company, shall rank as new men.

ARTICLE XIV.

No conductor, brakeman, or yardman shall be suspended or dismissed without just cause. In case of suspension or dismissal, if he thinks his sentence unjust, his case shall have a thorough investigation by the proper officers, at which he may be present, if he so desire. Any such investigation shall be made within ten (10) days from the date of notice in writing of his desire for further investigation, and if found unjustly suspended or dismissed, he shall be re-instated and paid full time while so out of service.

ARTICLE XV.

It is the rule and intention of the company to run through freight crews first in, first out; but circumstances may arise where this should be changed, and the company reserves the right to do so. For instance, we may deem it advisable to run certain crews upon certain designated trains—and we must be at liberty to arrange such matters for the best interest of the company.

ARTICLE XVI.

The rate contained in this schedule, and the rules relating thereto, shall not be changed—in any case—without the mutual consent of both parties to this agreement.

T. W. BATES,

Approved: Sup't. of Transportation.

C. H. CHAPPELL,

OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

The following agreed Schedule of Wages and Rules of Employment will govern train men in passenger and freight service on the Illinois Central Railroad from October 1, 1890:

I. PASSENGER SERVICE.

Class of Train.	Rank.	4,000 Miles, or Less on Regular Runs, per Cal. Month.	Over 4,000 to 6,000 Miles per Calendar Month.
Through	Conductors	$100 00	$110 00
	Baggagemen	55 00	60 00
	Brakemen	50 00	55 00
	Train Porters	30 00	35 00
Local or Branch.	Conductors	$90 00	$100 00
	Baggagemen	50 00	55 00
	Brakemen	45 00	50 00
	Train Porters	30 00	35 00

2. For mileage made by passenger crews in excess of 6,000 miles per calendar month, extra compensation at the rate of maximum mileage will be allowed.

3. Passenger crews assigned to regular runs, failing to make full month, will be paid pro-rata for service performed.

4. Freight crews running extra passenger, and making less than 4,000 passenger miles, will be paid pro-rata at passenger rates, on the basis of 4,000 miles per month for the class of service performed. In excess of 4,000 passenger miles per month, or when a full month is made on a regular run, full passenger rates for such will be paid.

5. When extra crews make miscellaneous passenger mileage, they will be paid for all the mileage made during the month, on basis of the class of mileage which predominates.

6. When through and local runs are pooled, and passenger crews run around in turn, the classification of the pooled runs will be determined by the class of train which contributes the greater portion of the mileage, and all crews will receive alike the rates of pay for that service.

7. Through passenger trains will comprise those runs which have a continuous schedule over more than one division, and change crews at division points. Trains scheduled on one division, and run through by the same crew, are local passenger trains.

8. Pay car and special runs will be classed as local.

9. It is the intention that no unreasonable service in making extra mileage shall be exacted under this schedule from passenger crews on regular, assigned runs.

10. FREIGHT SERVICE.

CLASS.	RANK.	RATE.
		PER MILE.	OVERTIME.
Irregular Fr't Runs.	Conductors Brakemen	3 cents 2 cents	10 miles per hr 10 miles per hr
		Per Month $90 00 60 00	Overtime 30 cts per hour 20 cts per hour
Local Freight and Mixed Trains.	Conductors Brakemen	Per Month $90 00 55 00	Overtime 25 cts per hour 15 cts per hour

Colored brakemen on lines south of the Ohio river will be paid 15 per cent. less than white brakemen.

11. There shall be two grades of freight conductors and brakemen.

For first year's service, 10 per cent. less than the established rates will be paid.

After one year's service, full rates as provided in this schedule will be paid.

To freight conductors promoted after October 1, 1890, a refund will be made of the 10 per cent. reduction on full rates, on the last six months of their first year of actual service as conductors, provided they render faithful and efficient service, have clear record, and prove themselves reliable, competent men; such refund to be made at the termination of the year's service.

Experienced conductors and brakemen employed from other roads will receive full rates of pay.

12. The actual number of days in any calendar month of twelve hours per day, exclusive of

Sundays, will constitute a month's work for that month in local or mixed freight or work train service—except on those local freight runs to which three crews are assigned. On local freight runs having three regular crews, four single trips per week over the section will constitute full time; 15 hours being allowed for each trip.

Crews assigned to regular freight runs will be paid additional, at established rates, for extra run outside of their regular work.

13. Overtime will be allowed as follows:

Crews in irregular freight service—for time on duty in excess of one hour for each 10 miles run.

On local freight or mixed runs where single trip is made each working day—after 12 hours continuous service; and on such runs where four trips per week are made—after 15 hours continuous service.

On local freight turn-around trips—where the time consumed on the road, and in switching at the turning point, exceeds 12 hours.

In work train service—after 12 hours on duty.

In computing overtime, any fraction of an hour, 30 minutes or less, will not be counted; over 30 minutes will be called an hour.

14. The assignment of crews, in local freight service, will be made by the Division Superintendent; the number of crews on a section, and the number of brakemen in each crew, to be regulated in accordance with his judgment, to meet the requirements of the service.

15. When a crew is called for a freight trip of less than 50 miles, 50 miles will be allowed; and if the time on duty exceeds 5 hours, extra time will be paid at 10 miles per hour.

On straight trips exceeding 50 miles and less than 100 miles, 100 miles will be allowed, provided no other work is done within the 24 hours ensuing from commencement of such trip. Overtime will be allowed for the time consumed on such trip in excess of 10 hours. When other work is performed within the 24 hours, actual mileage for the short trip will be allowed.

16. Short turn-arounds made within 24 hours from commencement of trip, where mileage is over 50 miles and less than 100 miles, will be allowed 100 miles; and where more than 100 miles, actual mileage will govern.

Overtime on such turn-around trips will be allowed when the time consumed on the road, and in switching at turn-around point, is in excess of an average speed of 10 miles per hour.

17. For light runs (engine and caboose) if six hours or less are consumed in the run, one-half mileage will be allowed; if over six hours, full mileage allowed.

18. Crews deadheading under orders, will be paid one-half their regular rates.

19. It is the intention to run crews not assigned to regular runs, first in first out, but the right is reserved to depart from this rule when the interests of the company require it.

20. Main line freight train men at terminal stations, living within one mile of the yard, will be called for trains. The working time of trainmen will commence from the hour train is listed to leave.

21. When freight crews are called and report for duty, and for any cause the train is abandoned, they shall be paid at overtime rates for each hour so held on duty, and will stand first out.

22. Trainmen attending court at the request of the company, if on assigned runs will be allowed full time, and in irregular service 100 miles per day, with $1.00 per day for expenses if away from home.

23. The right to regular runs and to promotion will be governed by merit, ability and seniority. Everything being equal, the men longest in continuous service will have preference, the Division Superintendent to be the judge as to qualifications. Nothing in this article shall be construed as preventing the company from employing experienced men from other roads, when the good of the service requires it.

24. So far as consistent with the interests of the company, the number of crews will be kept down to correspond with the business, so that crews in irregular freight service may make 2,600 to 3,000 miles per month.

25. In event of there being surplus of crews, and it becomes necessary to reduce their number, the oldest men shall have preference in employment, except where younger men in the service are found to be more reliable and efficient; it being the intention to retain the most capable men in the service.

And it is hereby understood to be the duty of conductors to promptly file charges, in writing, to their superior officer, against any unreliable or unsafe brakeman who may have been assigned them; and in the interest of retaining in the service the best men, it shall be the duty of such superior officer to promptly investigate, and if charges preferred are found correct, such brakeman is not to be transferred to another crew, but promptly dismissed.

26. All schedules, rules and regulations, in conflict with these now adopted, are void.

A. W. SULLIVAN,
General Superintendent.

For the passenger and freight train men,

F. S. STIMSON,
Chairman Committee.

Approved:

C. A. BECK,
General Manager.

Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT.

ST. PAUL, Minn., May 28, 1890.

By advice with and consent of the General Manager, the wages of trainmen on all divisions of the road will, from June 1, 1890, be established at rates in schedule below:

THROUGH FREIGHT.				WORK TRAINS.
	Per day of 10 hours or less, or 100 mls or less.	Overtime per hour.	Per mile over 100 miles.		Per day of 12 hours or less.	Overtime per hour.
East of Mandan	$3 00	.30	.03	$3 00	.30	Conductor.
Mandan	2 00	.20	.02	2 00	.20	Brakeman.
West of Mandan	3 20	.32	.32	3 20	.32	Conductor.
Mandan	2 20	.22	.22	2 20	.22	Brakeman.

SNOW PLOWS—BUCKING SNOW.

	Actual service per day of 10 hours or less.	Overtime per hour.	Passenger. Per Month.
East of Mandan	$3 50	.35		Conductors.
Mandan	2 50	.25	$60 00	Brakemen.
West of Mandan	3 50	.35		Conductors.
Mandan	2 50	.25	65 00	Brakemen.

ARTICLE I.

Overtime for trainmen on regular trains will begin when the schedule time of train is exceeded one hour. When schedule time of train is exceeded one hour or more, overtime allowed will include the first hour's delay. When the schedule time of a train averages more than ten hours for 100 miles or less, overtime will be paid according to this basis—ten (10) hours. In computing overtime, thirty minutes or over will be counted as one hour after the first hour's delay.

ARTICLE II.

Trainmen will be called, as near as practicable, one hour before the leaving time of trains. The caller will have a book in which the trainmen will register the time they are called, signing their names.

ARTICLE III.

Trainmen held waiting for trains beyond the time train was specified to leave, will be paid for each hour held at rate paid for overtime, provided train is held an hour or more.

ARTICLE IV.

When trains for which men have been called are abandoned, men will be paid for time held, between time they were specified to leave and time train was abandoned, at schedule rate for overtime per hour, or fractional part over thirty minutes, but in no case trainmen will receive pay for less than one-quarter of a day, and stand first out.

ARTICLE V.

The time of extra or wild trains will be computed on a basis of ten hours for 100 miles or less, all allowances made to regular trains will be made to extra or wild trains.

ARTICLE VI.

Sanding or cleaning stock cars, loading or unloading stock, or waiting for the same, will be paid for in all cases on a basis of overtime at schedule rates, except when done by worktrain crews, and time-train crews, so employed, will not be considered or paid for, except as stock loading.

ARTICLE VII.

Trainmen on work-trains will be paid for one day, twelve (12) consecutive hours, or less, more than twelve (12) hours will be paid for as overtime, at work-train rates.

ARTICLE VIII.

Conductors on work-trains will be paid at the rate of $3.00 per day east of Mandan, and $3.20 per day west of Mandan, for twelve (12) consecutive hours or less, including Sundays. Brakemen on work-trains will be paid at the rate of $2.00 per day east of Mandan, and $2.20 per day west of Mandan, for twelve (12) consecutive hours or less, Sundays included.

ARTICLE IX.

Trainmen assigned to snow-plow service will be paid for one day, as per freight train schedule, for each twenty-four (24) hours held in readiness to use. Where assigned to duty on the road and run over district or division, they will be paid for mileage made at schedule rates.

ARTICLE X.

When snow-plow crews are in actual service bucking snow, they will be paid: conductors $3.50 and brakemen $2.50 per day of ten hours—over ten hours per day will be paid for at the same rate per hour,—but Superintendent will select the men for this service without regard to turn. This applies to actual snow-bucking, and not to running over any district ahead of a train.

ARTICLE XI.

Freight trainmen deadheading on their respective divisions will be paid full freight train rates for such service.

ARTICLE XII.

Trainmen or yardmen when deadheading on company's business will be paid at schedule rates one day or 100 miles for each calendar day. In no case will less than one day be allowed, when no other services are performed. When held as witnesses for the company, trainmen and yardmen will be paid schedule rates, one day or 100 miles for each calendar day, necessary allowance for expenses will also be made when off their respective divisions. Time held attending court to be certified to by company's attorney.

ARTICLE XIII.

Trainmen on runs of 100 miles or more, when required to do switching at terminals, will be paid for such service at schedule rates for overtime.

ARTICLE XIV.

Dates will change at 12 o'clock midnight, the same as calendar dates, and two runs on the road commencing on separate dates will be paid for at not less than one day for each run, provided no other run is made on that day.

ARTICLE XV.

Freight trainmen running over district, Livingstone to Helena, Logan to Butte, Helena to Missoula, Missoula to Hope, and Ellensburg to Tacoma, will be allowed twelve miles constructive mileage for mountain service. Should the company deem it advisable to put on regular mountain crews between Livingstone and Bozeman, Whitehall and Butte, Helena and Elliston, Missoula and Arle (or Jocko,) Easton and Weston, they will be paid as follows: One round trip or less one day, three single trips or two round trips two days.

ARTICLE XVI.

The above allowances as per article xv, to apply only to mountain crews between the points named as terminals, and all miles run in either direction outside of limits named, to be paid for per mile at schedule rate.

Trips from Livingstone to Timberline and return, Bozeman to Muir and return, Helena to Blossburg and return, Missoula to Evaro and return, will be paid for same as round trip between the fixed mountain terminals; and single trips between the points mentioned, same as single trips between the fixed mountain terminals.

Trips to Livingston to Muir and return, Bozeman to Timberline and return, Elliston to Blossburg and return, Arlee to Evaro and return, Easton to Weston to Stampede or Martin and return, will be paid for as equal to a single trip between the fixed mountain terminals.

ARTICLE XVII.

Conductors will be promoted from the ranks of brakemen according to their age of continuous service on their respective divisions and their character and ability. Freight conductors when adapted to passenger service, will be promoted to passenger trains according to their ability and age of continuous service on their respective divisions. The question of ability and adaptation to be determined by superintendent.

ARTICLE XVIII.

Trainmen will rank from the date they are employed, and in the event of there being a surplus of men, the oldest in the service on their respective divisions shall have the preference of employment.

ARTICLE XIX

No more men shall be employed in the service than is necessary to do the work and earn a reasonable monthly average compensation at the schedule established, and whenever, in the judgment of the trainmen, there are too many crews, a committee of trainmen in good standing, employed on the division, may call the attention of the trainmaster or superintendent to such surplus of men, when the matter will be fully investigated, and, if conditions are found to warrant it, will be remedied; it being always understood that men will be retained under seniority of rights.

ARTICLE XX.

No trainmen will be suspended or discharged without proper cause, and in case a trainman believes his suspension or discharge is unjust, he may make a written statement of facts in his case, and forward to division superintendent, designating a committee of not less than three trainmen in good standing, employed on the division, to meet in conjunction with the superintendent of the division, and without unnecessary delay re-investigate the case, and prompt decision must be given in less than five days from the rehearing of the case. If the trainman is decided blameless he shall be immediately reinstated and paid for lost time at schedule rates for time lost on account of such suspension.

Trainmen charged with offenses involving either suspension or discharge, except in cases involving fraud or dishonesty will be advised of the offenses in writing. All parties concerned will be present at the investigation.

ARTICLE XXI.

Trainmen and yardmen will not be required to pay fines on account of breakages.

ARTICLE XXII.

After continuous service of sixteen hours or more, trainmen will be entitled to and allowed eight hours rest before being called to go out, provided they so desire and give notice thereof, except in case of washout, wrecks and other similar emergencies.

ARTICLE XXIII.

Freight trainmen not assigned to regular runs will run first in and first out on the district or division to which they are assigned.

ARTICLE XXIV.

Trainmen assigned to regular local freight trains on St. Paul division to be paid: conductors $90.00 and brakemen $60.00 per month for regular local runs, and will be paid overtime for mill work at Little Falls, and quarry work at Sauk Rapids: conductors 30 cents and brakemen 20 cents per hour.

Trainmen assigned to regular local freight trains between Staples and Fargo to be paid: Conductors $90 and brakemen $60 per month. If run with two crews: Conductors $95, brakemen $65, or mileage and overtime.

ARTICLE XXV.

Trainmen assigned to regular local freight between Fargo and Jamestown to be paid; Conductors $95 and brakemen $65 per month to run six days per week, overtime after twelve hours.

Trainmen assigned to regular local freight trains between Sprague and Hope, conductors $4.50 per single trip and brakemen $2.80 per single trip. Overtime to be paid at ten hour basis for all over twelve and one-half hours making a single trip. The men on regular local crews between Weston and Tacoma to be paid $95 for conductors and $65 per month for brakemen. Overtime to be paid for after twelve hours, at rate of ten hour basis.

Trainmen assigned to regular local freight trains between Tacoma and Kalama, between Seattle and Tacoma, to be paid: Conductors $100 and brakemen $75 per month. No overtime to be allowed.

That freight train crews will be allowed full freight train rates of wages for handling passenger trains or passenger equipments.

ARTICLE XXVI.

When trainmen or yardmen leave the service of the company, they shall be given letters stating time of service, in capacities or capacity employed, and cause of leaving service. The said letters to be given them three days from application, provided they shall have worked on the division thirty days, to be signed by the division superintendent.

ARTICLE XXVII.

Transfer crews at Kalama to be paid as follows:
Yardmaster,.....$90.00 per month.
Foreman,.....85.00 "
Night helpers.....2.50 per day.
Day helpers.....2.50 "

ARTICLE XXVIII.

Trainmen who have been discharged and who, upon further investigation, are found to have been unjustly dealt with, will be reinstated, provided the matter is settled within three months from the time such trainmen were discharged; otherwise if re-employed shall rank as new men on the road.

ARTICLE XXIX.

Trainmen leaving the service will be paid at the earliest practicable moment in full, less usual deductions which may be found against their pay and that they have accepted up to date of ending service.

ARTICLE XXX.

Yard foremen and switchmen west of Fargo in following yards shall be paid the same rate of wages as are now being paid at Tacoma, viz:

Portland, Ellensburg, Spokane Falls
Seattle, Pasco, Missoula,
Tacoma, Sprague, Helena,
Livingston, Mandan, Jamestown.

ARTICLE XXXI.

The following general board of adjustment hereby agree for themselves and all trainmen yard foremen and switchmen, to do their part towards the faithful observance of this schedule and use every honorable means to avoid any cause for complaint.

ARTICLE XXXII.

Should any trainmen or yard crews violate any part of above contract, we would respectfully ask to be advised of the same, and will do all in our power to adjust the same.

The Telegraphers' Trouble.

The Brotherhood of Telegraphers in Omaha received encouraging news Tuesday morning when it was made known that Superintendent Baker of the St. Louis district had promised to reinstate all brotherhood men discharged. The St. Louis night force, it is said, sent a grievance committee to Mr. Baker and refused to go to work pending his reply. He replied in person, assuring all the men that no discharges would occur without a just and sufficient excuse being given. With this assurance the men returned to work. Mr. Baker also notified the Kansas City office not to dismiss any men for the reason that they were members of the brotherhood.

It is understood that all the St. Paul strikers together with the discharged men, were reinstated Wednesday.

There is nothing new in the Omaha trouble. All the discharged men are out yet, and thus far no steps have been taken to demand their reinstatement. Miss Harker was dismissed Tuesday by the Western Union, and it is alleged that her discharge was owing to some remarks she made in sympathy with the brotherhood, although she is not a member.—Railway News Reporter.

Bro. Chas. Culross of Laramie Division No. 142 has been appointed train master of the 7th and 8th districts of the Wyoming Division of the U. P. railway. Charles is one of the "get there" sort and will fill his present position as well as he did that of conductor.

Employer's Liability.—Railway employes generally know little and think less about the responsibility of the company for damages growing out of accidents or injury to them. Therefore, to be forewarned is forearmed, and those who read the following will know just how far they are interested, and just what to do in case of accidental injury, etc.

First. A company is liable for injury to the employé, incurred through the direct negligence of the company, or that of its manager, to whom it has committed the work. If there are special risks not apparent, the company must fully notify the employé thereof, or be responsible for any injury.

See held in Wonder vs. R. R. Co., 32 Md., 411; Paulmier vs. R. R. Co., 34 N. J., 451; Lanning vs. R. R. Co., 49 N. Y., 521.

Second. It is the duty of the employer company to provide safe buildings and machinery, to make itself familiar with all defects in them, and to guard against and prevent any defects from which increased and unnecessary danger may occur; and if it fails to do this, or give its employes full notice of the danger, it is liable for any injury resulting therefrom to them.

Patterson vs. R. R. Co., 76 Pa. St., 392; Harrison vs. R. R. Co., 31 N. J., 263; Man'fg Co. vs. McCormick, 118 Pa. St., 519; Ford vs. R. R. Co., 110 Mass., 240; Goodfellow vs. R. R. Co., 106 Mass., 461; Gilson vs. R. R. Co., 46 Mo., 163; Greenleaf vs. R. R. Co., 29 Iowa, 47, and Baker vs. R. R. Co., 95 Pa. St., 211.

Third. A railway employé assumes such risks only as are incident to the work from causes open and obvious, and which he had an opportunity to ascertain, but it is otherwise when the causes are concealed and unknown to him. And even when he may know of defects, if he did not know they were dangerous he may recover damages. In such case, if the company fails to give him suitable notice of the danger, it is liable for any injury resulting therefrom.

Gildersleeve vs. R. R. Co., 33 Mich., 122; Muldowney vs. R. R. Co., 36 Iowa, 463, and Patterson vs. R. R. Co., 76 Pa. St., 389.

Fourth. A railway company is liable for damages to an employé for an injury resulting from the negligence of a fellow employé, unless the company can show that it had used due care, by inquiry or otherwise, before employing the negligent employé, and that it had no notice of his unfitness until the injury complained of had occurred.

R. R. Co. vs. Decker, 82 Pa. St., 119; Weger vs. R. R. Co., 55 Pa. St., 460; Hard vs. R. R. Co., 32 Vt., 473; Wright vs. R. R. Co., 25 N. Y., 562, and Wabash K. R. Co. vs. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454.

Extra Fare—Absent Ticket Agent—Expulsion—Conductor's Authority.

Where a passenger sought to buy a ticket at the ticket office, but could not, because the agent had left the office, and gone to meet the train, then standing at a water tank some 200 feet away, and the passenger refused, wilfully and captiously, to pay the conductor 25 cents in excess of the regular fare, and take a rebate check, (the requirement of the conductor being in accordance with his instructions, and having the sanction of the railroad commission of the state), and this refusal being persisted in by the passenger until the train was stopped and said passenger ejected.

Held, That the conductor was authorized to put the passenger off the train, and for such act no liability for damages are due.

Harrison vs. Fink, U. S. C. C., Ga., 42 Fed. Rep., 787.

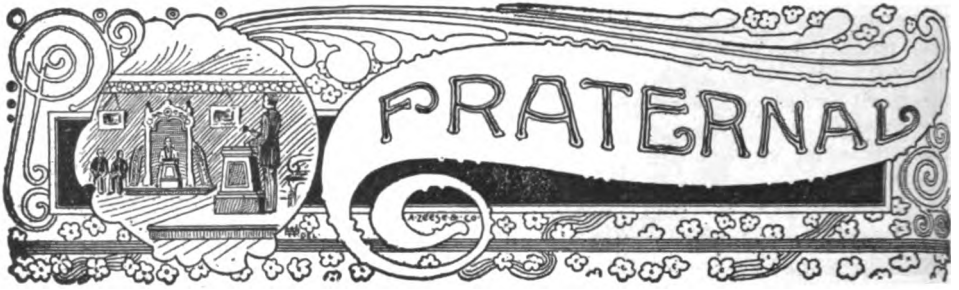

NOTE.—This would seem to conflict with the decision in case of R'y Co. vs. Dwelle, recorded in last number of THE CONDUCTOR, but for the fact that the court rules that it was the duty of the ticketless passenger to pay the excess and receive a rebate check for the amount paid in excess of the regular fare.

Carrier of Passengers—Conductor's Agreement—Failure to Keep.

Action for damages. Plaintiff applied to the defendant's ticket agent for a ticket to go on the limited train to a certain point on the line. The agent refused to sell her such ticket, because the limited train did not stop at that point. Plaintiff then applied to the conductor, who told her to get on the limited train without a ticket, and that he would let her off at her destination. This agreement was not kept by the conductor, and she was carried to the station beyond her destination. It was proven that another daily train was accustomed to stop at her place or destination. On appeal,

Held, That plaintiff had sufficient notice that any agreement the conductor might make to put her off at the place she named would be a violation of the rules of the company, and no recovery in damages can be had of the company because of the conductor's failure to keep his agreement.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. vs. Carmichael, Ala. S. C., Aug. 19, 1890.

VICKSBURG, MISS., Oct. 22, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Having been appointed correspondent of Vicksburg Division 231, I shall, from time to time, endeavor to portray in beautiful figures of speech, the flourishing condition of our "Hill City" Division. Our membership is steadily increasing. There were eight new members for initiation at our last meeting, and several applications for membership.

There have been several changes made in our division of late. Our past Grand Chief, John T. Savage, a worthy officer, and an honor to our division, having been appointed assistant superintendent of the Riverside division, L. N. O. & T. R. R., was compelled to resign his services as an officer, on account of arduous duties. Brother John T. Paul was then chosen as our Chief, but he was appointed train master of the Memphis division, and could not attend regularly, so he resigned, and at last, but not least, Brother A. J. Howard was selected, and all are unanimous in pronouncing Brother Howard as a man well fitted in every sense for the position. Generous, upright and faithful to the interests of the Order. As an orator, Brother Howard is always fully equal to the occasion, and to appreciate the soundness of his logic, you only need to hear him.

Below I give a partial list of the officers of Division 231 and their addresses:

Brother Howard is now absent as a delegate to the Union meeting in Atlanta, Ga.

For Brother Savage and Paul we predict much success in their new avocations. Brother Savage is one of the rising railroad men of the day, and we will not be surprised to see him take other steps of advancement, i. e. Brother Paul.

The following are some of the Brothers employed on the Miss. Valley route, L. N. O. & T., New Orleans division: Chas E. Gore, Geo. L. Gurley, J. R. Hawkins, M. H. McIlvaine, A. L. Williams, John Sherrin, Clinton Davis, John A. Morris, T. P. Hansard, W. H. Bellinger, W. Settoon, D. Hoke, E. Gaynor, J. C. Broad, John Ham, D. Morgan.

Memphis and Riverside division: J. C. Pritchett, W. H. Holden, A. Rials, J. C. White, T. P. Coburn, A. J. Howard, W. W. Word, H. B. Paul Chas. Gilmore, C. E. Clark, J. C. Wilson, T. A. Faulker.

Mr. T. P. Bellows, Chief Engineer of Division 281, B. L. E., has been appointed train master of the New Orleans division, with headquarters at Vicksburg. Mr. Bellows merits the esteem of all that come in contact with him—a true gentleman of the old school, courteous alike to the old and the young, the rich and the poor. In his official career, he has the good wishes of all the transportation department under his charge, and we bespeak for him much success. His experience as a railroad man is such, as to fully qualify him for the position. More anon.

Yours in P. F.,

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 26, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Federation first, last and all the time, is what we want and what we must have. During the latter part of the present month, I have been through several of the southern states, and have made it my business to see and talk with a great many railroad men, in all branches of the train service, and I find that almost 90 per cent. want a General Federation of the six orders, i. e., B. of L. E., B. of L. F., B. of R. C., O. of R. C., B. of R. T., and the S. M. A. A., and some even go further than this and advocate taking the O. of R. T. and the Train Dispatchers, and after looking the matter over from every side, I have come to the conclusion that they are nearer right than any of the rest. In union there is strength, and that is just what is required at the present time. We all know that there is a federation already formed among four of the orders. See what benefit has been derived on some systems where they have been called on.

Now the point is right here, if four organizations can do what we know they have done, what would be the benefit derived by a federation formed by six, and possibly eight orders. Brothers, this is something that interests you all and a thing that you must all stop and think about, and talk about. It is a matter that cannot be fixed in a day, no, nor a week; it must be brought before the division and thoroughly discussed by everybody and from every stand point imaginable; every member ought to express his own views on it, but one thing sure it must come sooner or later. As to the plan, I have none to offer and will leave that to those that are better able to do such work, hoping to see this matter thoroughly discussed through THE CONDUCTOR.

I remain yours ever in P. F.

O. W. POMEROY, Div. 134.

ALLIANCE, O., Oct, 30, 1890,

DEAR SIR: Brother R. S. Kaylor, past C. C., of Division 177, has been lying very low with typhoid fever, so low at times that hope has been despaired of, but Providence and good nursing have finally brought him out of danger. Those who attended the session of the Grand Division at Denver, will remember Brother Kaylor as the delegate from Division 177. He was also chairman of the A. G. Black monument committee some two years ago. Brother Kaylor has proved himself a model worker for the Order, and may he be spared for many years to come, is the wish of all who know him.

Yours in P. F.,

F. M. FOSTER,

Correspondent Division 177.

YOAKUM STATION, Texas, October 18, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

In my letter of recent date, I was glad to note the improved condition of the Railway Conductors as well as other departments of the train service. Strength created by unity is the sequel working out affluence, respect and progress. As I rise in my recollections of the past, I experience a sadness and not manly to confess of our days of bondage. The times are to all that is joyous and even cheerful. In a union meeting held on the 8th and 9th inst. in our quiet little city, for the purpose of making known a grievance, consisting of a violation of our contract, the company giving it a different interpretation than the conductors, we were pledged the unanimous support of the engineers, firemen, brakemen and switchmen. After singing "Blest be the tie that binds," and the doxology pronounced, we adjourned.

Results, the following will explain tie up of all trains except passenger, after 7 a. m. the following day, providing the receivers were not at Yoakum to confer with committee. No receivers came, so no trains run after that hour. In the evening they arrived from San Antonio by special train. We then held a consultation and all settled to our satisfaction. So the true and brave by the wayside, who were miles from the seat of discontent, received the cheering intelligence that all is well and to continue onward with your trains, though not to forget the lesson taught by this, our first experience. This world was not made for Caesar, but for you and I, and better be chained to the oar of a Spanish galley than retrocede. God bless us? Peace and harmony are now telling factors, as we do duty while the company experience the heaviest business ever done. I close, regretting that Brother Clark and members of the Supreme Council who were so near at this time failed to avail themselves of a reception, if they had come, not soon forgotten.

Heaven bless and prosper the train service is the prayer of

Yours truly in P. F.,

E. H. HÖHNE.

Editor Railway Conductor.

DEAR SIR:—If in your judgment it would in the least interest your many readers, I would like to give you a few notes of a recent trip made over the B. & M. road from Omaha, Nebraska to Denver, Colorado, and to express my satisfaction and pleasure in the trip, and with the road and its appointments. Our train consisting of one coach, two chair-cars and two sleepers, all well filled, pulled out of Omaha at 10:20 a. m., October 17th, a bright clear day. From the coach windows a fine bird's-eye view of the city of Omaha, with its factories, business blocks, and fine residences on many hills is afforded, making a pleasant picture of American life and industry. I should think this road must run through the best portion of Nebraska, and touch its best towns. But I have no intention of describing the state as that has been done many times by abler men than myself, and the public are well informed in regard to it, so I shall confine myself to the road and its equipments, and the men in charge of its trains. Owing perhaps largely to the small amount of rain fall and consequent dryness of soil, it has been possible to secure a magnificent road-bed solid and smooth as iron rails can be made, thus affording the first essential for good time and comfortable travel. I think that on this track the engineer could let his pet out to her full capacity with little or no fear of her taking the ditch. Now add to the splendid track the very best of coaches, chair-cars and sleepers, all kept in the best possible order and every modern appliance for comfort furnished, and it would appear as though all the requisites for a pleasant journey was placed at your disposal. Now, as a final attraction on this splendid road-bed and as nearly as possible perfect equipments, place a thoroughly competent and gentlemanly conductor with able assistants as brakeman and porter, (right here I want to say that in all the traveling I have done, which has been considerable in the last ten years, I have found but two or three conductors who were not gentlemen in the best and highest meaning of the word,) who are always ready to answer questions and impart information, pleasantly and apparently are on the watch for opportunities to add to the comfort and convenience of passengers, and it appears to me you have approached about as near to the ideal means of traveling as it is possible to come under present limitations of human knowledge and skill. All this I found on the B. & M., and feeling entirely confident that the traveling public will endorse my opinion, I confidently recommend this route to all who wish to visit the mountain regions of the country.

Respectfully,

W. F. DANIELS.

P. S. Before leaving this subject I want to return a vote of thanks to conductors J. L. Rathbun and G. D. Tarr, of the U. P. R'y; S. A. Rathbun and E. R. Young, of the D. & R. G. R'y; and N. D. Alward, of the B. & M. R'y; also one conductor on the D. & R. G., whose name has escaped me, for the efforts they made to render my visit to Denver pleasant and agreeable.

W. F. D.

PARKERSBURG, W. Va., Oct. 29, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Seeing nothing in CONDUCTOR from Division 181, and not being able to attend meetings and do not know what has become of our correspondent, will try my hand. The first on docket is a reward for Division 181's correspondent who is lost, strayed or stolen, and his return will be liberally rewarded. The conductors on the B. & O. S. W. are all O. K., all at work and making big time, also our superintendent has not forgotten the brakemen, as there has been quite a demand for conductors, there has been eight or ten of them given trains to run. Also our M. of M., Mr. Evans, has not forgotten his firemen, and quite a number of them have been given (hop) engines to run and all doing well. Division 181 O. R. C. is in flourishing condition with 52 members all in good standing and all employed as conductors except Brother Wm. Cherrington, who has left the rail and gone into his old business as photographer. He is now located somewhere in Washington, and Brother T. A. Taylor who runs a hotel in Portsmouth, Ohio. And score one more for Division No. 181. Brother C. H. Howard has been appointed train-master for the B. & O. S. W. with headquarters at Chillicothe. Brother Howard will be remembered by many who attended the Denver convention, as he was delegate from this Division to Denver and Toronto. Brother Howard has been in the service of this company for twenty-five years as operator, train-dispatcher and conductor; this is a well-earned promotion, and he has the best wishes of Division 181, and the boys have joined in with him to make his new line of business a success, and help him all that is in their power. Brother Howard's many friends join in with the boys to wish him all the success in the world. Billy Galligher has taken Brother Howard's run, Brother Murdock comes to the front on Galligher's runs which is the owl, and has increased in weight since Brother George Hitisman is next man on docket for passenger run. Well I am sleepy after a run of two-hundred miles, so if this does not make you tired, find place in CONDUCTOR for it. More some other time.

B.

Editor Railway Conductor:

It has been sometime since we have seen any communication from Division 162, we wish therefore to remind the members of the Order that 162 still lives and prospers with a membership that will raise the beam of prosperity at 160 members, and with the assistance of the ladies of the auxiliary, expect to, by the first of May, go 10 per cent higher. Those good ladies have taken no small interest in our welfare, which was more particularly shown at their late snipping party when they graciously presented a worthy Brother of 162 with a nursing bottle loaded to the muzzle with the elixir of life. We trust the Brother will use the beverage to the best interests of the Division. Another noticable feature of the gathering was the presenting of another Brother with a cake, the principal ingredients of which was composed of colored babies, and all on his, the Brother's highest bid of 45 cents. We also noted Brother Max was raising an elegant crop of autumn whiskers. Brother Post has been traveling on the Pacific slope. He gives us a glowing account of the wild and woolly west where railroading and card-playing is the principal recreation. Brothers Rielly and Bingham are opposed to Sunday labor but do not hesitate to turn over tons of musty Division records to ascertain the expenses of a previous frolic, and all this while our worthy Brother, Secretary (Lewis), looks on in wonder finally informing the delvers that he had the papers in question in his little desk. Brothers Manahan and Jones, we understand, are busy making up a slate for our coming election of officers. Brother Galligher does not feel justifiable in voting, on account of his youth. We trust he will be of age by our next election. We hope in the meantime a sufficient number of voting members will attend the Division meetings as will in future prevent thirteen members from voting any additional money out of the treasury. If the editor will kindly find room in THE CONDUCTOR for this nonsense, the writer will not give the Brother's name who was presented by the ladies of the O. R. C. with a cotton cake.

LISTENER.

WEST FARNHAM, Nov. 2, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR: Just a few lines this time. We held our regular meeting on Oct. 19th; a fair number were present. We should have had a larger attendance, only a few were detained by illness. We put in a good day's work initiating two members, Brothers Cooney and Hillman, besides transacting other business. There are two or three more applications ready which will receive our earliest attention. Brother John Hardy from Lowell, Mass., who was on his way west and who is also a member of this division, was present and rendered valuable assistance. We are sorry to lose John as he takes a great deal of interest in everything pertaining to the Order. Whoever goes to St. Louis next May will most likely meet him, as he intends to be present. John had a great many friends to visit before leaving Montreal. Our worthy Secretary and Treasurer, Joseph Moreau was chosen delegate to make a little visit to North Bay, he starts tomorrow, the 3d. Good-bye, Joe, and good luck.

I had the pleasure of meeting Brother Wilkins while he was in Montreal. We partly expected that he would give Division 80 a call before his return. I hope the day is not far distant when we shall receive a visit from one of the grand officers; we will do all in our power to make their stay a pleasant one.

I notice an article in THE CONDUCTOR of Oct. 15th from Brother Latimer, of Division No. 180, on the insurance question. Although I am not a member of the Beneficiary Department, I can plainly see that every one ought to join, especially those who have families depending upon them. I fully intend becoming a member as soon as possible; but heartily agree with Brother Latimer as regards total disability. Whenever a member becomes totally disabled from performing his duties as a conductor, he should receive the full benefit of his insurance. This article of Brother Latimer's is well worthy of perusal by every member of the Order.

A new time card—winter arrangement—takes effect to-day. Few changes have been made that I am aware of. Two or three suburban trains have been cancelled and that is about all. Business, upon the whole, is very good, and all the crews are kept busy. I am pleased to state, that Brother Whitney has been steadily at work holding down his old run. Hope he may continue.

Since my last letter to THE CONDUCTOR, Brother John Cunningham has been presented with a son and heir. Mrs. C. and boy are doing well. John is the happiest man on the Atlantic division.

Yours in P. F.,

F. G. MARTYN.

TOLEDO, Oct. 28, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

For the first time in many moons, Toledo Division No. 26, looms up from the silent darkness to give you and her many friends to understand although we have been silent as to any articles in THE CONDUCTOR, we still exist, and we are just egotistical enough to think "we shine" where others fail.

The most important question that interests the members of Toledo Division at this present time, is, how shall we manage or arrange to get our annual meeting here in Toledo in 1892.

We would ask that all consider this matter and give it their attention.

Toledo Division has nearly one hundred and seventy-five members, and as to its work, will compare favorably with most any division in the country.

The B. of R. C. has located their headquarters here, and while they are not making any particular progress in numbers as we can learn, they are working hard for prominence, and Mr. Howard leaves no stone unturned whereby he can give the Order a "black eye," which all can see by watching the papers.

At an open meeting in Saginaw, some two or three weeks ago he talked so shamefully against the Order and its members that all the brothers of the Order left the hall. The majority of our citizens here in Toledo think that the B. of R. C. and O. R. C. are one and the same thing, and I believe they (the B. of R. C.) would rather have them think so to swell their numbers. Now Toledo Division wishes to dispel this thought, and nothing will do it more effectually than for divisions to instruct their delegates who go to St. Louis next May to vote for Toledo for next annual meeting.

We have had talk with our newspaper men, our business men, city officials, and some of our railway officials, and they say they will do all in their power to make it a success. We ask all concerned to study well the advantages of Toledo as a place for bodies of this kind to meet. As a railway center it is second to none in this country.

Look at the map and see the intersecting lines of railway that center at Toledo. Come to Toledo and see the advantages she has. We will show you one of the greatest and best convention halls in this country.

Our hotels are of the best, and can accommodate legions, I might say, and we assure you rates satisfactory to all.

And as to the hospitality of our citizens, there can never be enough said in their praise. Ask of those who have been entertained in our city. They never do anything by halves. Look at our manufacturing interests. It would be well for any one looking for a place to invest their money, to come to Toledo before locating elsewhere.

I might go on for pages and show the advantages of our city, but will not at this time, but later on we will give you a more thorough illustration of what we want, and "why we want" the next annual meeting after St. Louis.

Yours in P. F.

M. A. L.

OCTOBER 28, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I am induced to write the following by hearing two good Brothers quarreling and swearing over a run, which one had and the other claimed as his by seniority. One of the teachings of the the Order is brotherly love.

Do we as Brothers realize what there is in this word "love?" It can be divided so as to cover all the peculiarities that we as conductors ought to inculcate.

I will mention among such, patience, kindness, generosity, courtesy, selfishness, good temper and humility.

Be patient. Our duties are of such a nature that sometimes we are sorely tried by angry passengers and also by men of our own calling infringing on what is, or we think is, our rights. In all such cases be patient, and if angry with a Brother think of the "love" we should bear toward each other.

Kindness. Have you ever noticed how happy a person looks after doing an act of kindness? Or have you ever felt what a joyous thing it is to do a kind thing to some fellow being for the love of doing good? What is kindness? It is "active love." Christ when upon earth spent a great portion of his time simply in making people happy, and it will make us better and happier if we follow the example and do good at all opportunities. Kindness begets love.

Generosity. "This is love in competition with others." Whenever you attempt to do a good thing you will find other men doing the same kind of work, and probably doing it better. If so, do not envy them, for envy is a feeling of ill-will to those who are in the same line as ourselves, and how can we live up to the standard of brotherly love if we envy every good thing done by a Brother, or covet his position, even if we should be a few days older in the service of the company?

Courtesy. "This is love in society." My Brothers, I do not think there is a class of men on earth that are more courteous than the railway conductors, but there are many instances where it is not given through love or kindness, but from force of habit. We can take the most uncultured person we can find and he has love in his heart for brother man. He will not behave himself unseemly in the highest society. We all know the meaning of the word gentleman. It means a gentle man—a man who does things gently, with love. The gentle man cannot do an ungente-manly act, no matter how untutored he may be.

Unselfishness. I am afraid I cannot do this justice. There is nothing that I know of that is so dominant, not only with conductors, but with mankind generally, as this one thing selfishness. St. Paul says, "Love seeketh not her own." Yet I do not think we are to give up that which rightfully belongs to us, but not to crave or seek a thing to the detriment of a Brother. It is a grand thing to be unselfish. Was there ever a man that was happy in the possession of anything that he, through selfishness, procured from another? "There is no happiness in having or getting, but only in giving." Christ said, "It is more blessed, it is more happy, to give than to receive."

Good temper. "Love is not easily provoked." We are inclined to look upon a bad temper as a very harmless weakness, but the Bible speaks of it again and again as a sin, and condemns it as one of the most destructive elements in human nature. We all know men who are all but perfect and women who are lovable in the extreme, and would be entirely perfect, but for the ease you can ruffle their temper. The compatibility of ill-temper, especially with a high moral character, is a sad thing to contemplate. I have known men who were leaders in society, who were considered the essence of purity by their friends, but, alas! in their homes all was sadness and sorrow, caused by an evil temper. No form of vice, not theft nor drunkenness, can do more for embittering lives, destroying friendship, devastating homes and demolishing brotherly love, than an evil temper. In short, for a misery-producing power this influence stands at the head. And in connection with this let me say, that a great number of the people of this country, and a great number of railroad men, too, think that it is impossible to be a successful railroad man unless they swear and blaspheme, and I am sorry to say there are many conductors who are not exempt from this abhorrence; and why is it? I know men who scarcely speak a word unless accompanied with an oath. If they only knew how badly it sounds to persons not of their turn of mind, and how people generally condemn them for it, I think they would guard against it, and they can stop it if they wish, as there are not many who will swear or use bad language in the presence of ladies; then why do so at any time? What are the ingredients of ill-temper? Jealousy, anger, false-pride, uncharity, cruelty, self-righteousness, touchiness, doggedness and sullenness. All these things must be guarded against in order to relieve us of ill-temper. Temper is significant; it is not in what it is alone, but what it reveals. A want of patience, kindness, generosity, courtesy and unselfishness are shown in one flash of ill-temper; hence to guard against it entirely, we must go to the source, change our natures in a manner, instill love within our hearts, love for each other, and then the angry humors will die away of themselves.

Humility. "Put a seal on your lips, do not vaunt the good you have done." You should do good, but after so doing say nothing about it. There is no good, kindness, or charity, when bestowed, expecting notoriety therefrom

OCTOBER 18, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Brother D. F. Knebles and myself are in this hot climate of the Island of Cuba, and we thought it would do some of the members good to hear how they used the natives down here. We had an accident on the 14th and nine men were killed, some of them being badly mangled. To see or to hear how they were buried is awful, and I think we ought to thank God that we have a nation where civilization prevails, and that is the land of the O. R. C.

The people here buried the victims with their boots and old ragged clothes on, not even washing the dirt from their faces. They put them in a box and never uttered a word of prayer over their poor remains. Now, my Brothers, we ought to be thankful that we have a better land than this to go to; and just as soon as our time expires in this climate we expect to go home to the land of the free, where we can express ourselves to our dear Brothers in that little Division No. 204. Brothers, we are not compelled to stay here, but when a man is making big money he can stand an awful lot of punishment.

Write us a few lines and let us know how the wind blows. Our address is: Care the Juragua Iron Co., Limited, Santiago de Cuba, Island of Cuba.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich., Sept. 27, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I have sixteen names for THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, and I am going to have four more. I believe nearly every member could get up a club of ten at least, by going to the people they trade with. For instance, among the sixteen names I have there are two dealers in boots and shoes and two in ready-made clothing; the others are druggist, insurance, dry goods, physician, paints and paper, meat market, grocer, barber, undertaker, coal dealer, hardware and jewelry. So you see it is easy for a man to find at least ten with whom he does business, that would feel it to their interest to subscribe simply to please him. And I think if we take an interest in it we can furnish them a magazine that will be of interest to them as well as to us. I think more incidents in the life and travel of railway men and tourists would make the journal more interesting to all.

N. E. R.

The wise men of this locality are amusing themselves in controversy over the information that Mr. Dock Flanders, the time-honored and estimable conductor on the U. N. railroad, has just closed a purchase securing some real estate in the re-baptized Idaho Falls. Some hold that Dock is going into beet and rye growing. Others say he contemplates erecting a peaceful residence and, joining hands with his Butte darling, retire from railroad life. Practical experimenters say they are sorry Dock didn't settle in the salubrious vicinity of Market Lake, Willow Creek or go a little farther south to the county seat, Blackfoot. Sorry when we see Dock stand in the center like a weather-cock figuring on the expense of building a fence to keep the white sand in the lot and around his beets and rye at Idaho Falls. Perseverance Dock.—C. O'LABRATH, in Idaho Herald.

"Dock" is registered as "O. A." on the books of Div. 209 and THE CONDUCTOR trusts that he may be as successful in all things as he has in the railway service, should the predicted change occur.

FRANKFORT, Ind., Oct. 26, 1890.

Johnny F., the only son of J. L. Haselton, who after a short illness of the dread disease, diptheria, died at the home of Brother B. F. Haselton, his uncle, Frankfort, Indiana, October 17th, aged 14 years, 11 months and 14 days.

At the regular meeting of Clover Leaf Division, No. 254, held October 26, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Great Ruler of the universe to remove by death the beloved son of our esteemed Brother, J. L. Haselton; be it Resolved, That we Brothers, do most sincerely sympathize with him in his hour of bereavement.

Resolved, That these resolutions be placed upon the records of our division, a copy sent the bereft father, and to Brother B. F. Haselton and family and to THE CONDUCTOR for publication.

Man, while in youth's happy morning,

When the world seemeth sunny and bright,

In the song of each bird hears a warning

The brooklets are whispering, night.

For time follows closely behind him,

And hurrys him half out of breath

And the gathering glooming will find him

In the valley and shadow of death.

Ed. F. O'Shea, commercial agent for the Southern Pacific with headquarters in this city, died at his home at 32 Lincoln avenue, October 15th, at the age of 30 years. Ed. F. O'Shea, it will be remembered, was grand secretary and treasurer of the Brakeman's Brotherhood and editor of the Brakeman's Journal from 1883 to 1890, when he resigned to take the western agency for the Massachusetts Mutual Benefit Association, with office in this city. About two months ago he gave up the insurance business and took service with the S. P. Railroad.

Wholly without experience he took charge of the brotherhood and it stands to-day a monument to his memory. His ability as a writer soon brought the Journal to the front, and it is now second only to the organ of the locomotive fireman, which is edited by the brilliant and dazzling Debs. Anything we might add would fall short of the estimate placed upon him as a gentleman by those of us who knew him best.

At the time of his death another brother, Henry lay unconscious with the same disease, typhoid fever. On the 21st of the same month he too passed away without even knowing that his brother had gone before him. Henry was but 21 years old and had recently came to Colorado from Galesburg, Ill., where he had been time-keeper for the trainmen on the Burlington for some time. We can pay him no higher compliment than to say he was like his brother Ed. Less than three months ago these young men stood by the grave of their father, so it will be seen that this is the third time the four brothers, their sister and mother have been called to look for the last time in this life upon the pale gold face of some one in this short space of time. The remarks of Father Malone at the grave of these young men, the words of cheer to the sorrowing friends and the beautiful picture of the meeting on the other shore was good to listen to.—Western Railway.

PLEASANT HILL, Mo., Oct. 27, 1890.

Editor Conductor.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: It becomes my sad duty to send you the unwelcome news of the death of Brother Albert Goodspeed, of Kaw Valley Division, No. 55, killed while in the discharge of his duty, at Japlin, Mo., October 19. He was in the employ of the K. C., Ft. S. & M. Ry at the time.

Kaw Valley Division, No. 55, has lost one of her best and most consistent members—steadfast and true to the highest principles of the Order, a friend to all good and true men. We mourn him as a friend and Brother of the highest type; and to the bereaved wife, father, mother, sisters and brother of Brother Goodspeed we, as members of the Order of Railway Conductors, send most sincere sympathy in their sorrow.

Yours in P. F.,

J. ASHLEY.

S. and T. Division 55.

At a regular meeting of Syracuse Division No. 155, held Sunday, October 19, 1890, the following resolutions of high esteem and respect were unanimously adopted upon the sad death of Brother Charles C. Hanna:

Our relations like many others with our departed Brother were most intimate and friendly, and we acknowledge our inability to do justice to his noble life and spotless character. He was as simple hearted as a child, brave and noble in every impulse and possessed of strict integrity, and to-day we cannot speak of him without regret, for standing as it were by his grave and in the presence of eternity, we are allowed to know how tenderly he observed the sacred ties of domestic life. He was not what we call a devout man, and yet he was a reverent one, believing that the great Law Giver is the Creator and Father of us all. He was ambitious and proud of his calling, performing in the fullest degree every duty required of him in his sphere of life. He was absolutely peerless in his actions and bold in the expression of his opinions, yet attentive and respectful to those with whom he differed. He was scrupulously honest and conscientious in all things, faithful to his friends, yet just to his opponents—enemies he had none. Though his call was sudden and unexpected, we fully believe he was ready and willing to pass the line dividing this world from the next. He always impressed us as a man who felt that he had done his duty and who could when the dread summons came stand erect in the presence of his Maker with open heart and clear conscience. He was the perfection of a husband and parent and his love and devotion to his wife and children approached idolatry. What more is needed for us to say? He has received his last summons, and the unseen hands of the silent messenger have conducted his departed spirit through the thick darkness of the night and along the mysterious ways that lead to the gate of immortality. We will see him, hear him, know him no more, except in memory. He has answered his last call, signed his last orders, made his last report, and for him there is no more toil, anxiety or vexations. His work is finished and he is ready for his crown of glory. Let us take up the lesson and so improve or present opportunities that we also may be assured of a blessed immortality.

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Chas. C. Hanna this Division laments the loss of a Brother who was ever ready to proffer the hand of aid and the voice of sympathy to the needy and distressed of the Order, and a true member, whose utmost endeavors were exerted for its welfare and prosperity; a friend and companion who was dear to us all; a citizen whose upright and noble life was a standard of emulation to his fellows.

Resolved, That to his bereaved wife and children our sincere sympathy extends, more especially in consideration of the sudden manner of his removal.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the wife and children of Brother Hanna, recorded in the records of the Division, and published in THE CONDUCTOR and daily papers, and that the charter of Division 155 O. R. C. be draped in mourning for thirty days.

BYRON HART,
J. W. HERRIMAN, } Committee.
G. W. WOOD,

At a called meeting of Stonewall Jackson Division No. 210, O. R. C. held in their hall Oct. 19th, 1890, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, God in his infinite wisdom has seen fit to take from our midst our beloved Brother O. J. McAbee.

Resolved, That we the members of Stonewall Jackson Division No. 210, desire to offer our tribute of respect to our departed brother, and tender our heartfelt sympathy to the beloved widow and fatherless children.

Resolved, That by the death of Brother O. J. McAbee, Stonewall Jackson Division has lost an earnest and worthy member, and his mourning family are deprived of a kind and loving father whose vacant seat in our division will ever remind us of the dangers that surrounds us, and that in the fullness of life we are in the midst of death.

Resolved, That to the widow and family we offer our heartfelt sympathy in this their hour of affliction, and tender our aid and protection in a time of need.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for the period of thirty days, and that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting, that a copy be presented to the bereaved widow, and that they be published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, and local papers.

HARNEST.—Died on September 26th, of typhoid fever, Mrs. H. E. Harnest, wife of Bro. Harnest of Division 53. The little daughter Hazel was taken very near the dark river by the same dread disease but happily recovered. Bro. Harnest has many friends whose sympathy will be with him in his great affliction.

The article headed "An infamous scheme to entrap railway employes" and noticed elsewhere in this issue, should be read by every railway employé.

November Scribner comes full of instruction and interesting matter.

The tale of a Tusk of Ivory by Herbert Ward, with its graphic illustrations, is fascinating. "Jerry," is continued. Robert Brewster Stanton's "Through the Grand Canon of the Colorado," is a most thrilling and interesting account of the experiences of the corps of engineers who passed through the canon last spring.

The Switchmen's Journal appears for the first time under the editorship of the newly elected editor John A. Hall. Brother Hall opens with a brief pithy introductory to the public the tone of which justifies the prophecy that under his management the Journal will be such a publication as every one interested in organization, upon protective principles, among railway men should, and will, eagerly take up and peruse. Brother Hall, we wish you unlimited success.

The Century is always excellent. John Hay contributes another of his interesting articles "Life in the White House in the Time of Lincoln." Anna Eichbury King tells a tale of life in the "Town of New York in 1695," in "A Legend of Old New York."

Very captivating is Edgar S. Maclay's "Early Victories of the American Navy."

"The Printing of the Century," tells in detail what its title indicates.

Every one should read "The First Emigrant Train to California," and learn of the hardships and perils braved and overcome by the "Argonauts."

The issue of the November number is the twentieth anniversary of the birth of the publication.

The Locomotive Fireman's Magazine shows the usual "snap" and enterprise. The editorials are pungent and clear cut. A great deal of space is devoted to accounts of the late conventions of railway organizations. The address delivered by Mr. F. P. Sargent, Grand Master, at the public-reception in their convention at San Francisco, is given in full as well as that delivered by Hon. Tom Fitch. Bro. Debbs, you should have included the Grand Master's address under the term "His Magnificen Address." Both are intensely interesting and uncommonly able.

The eloquent address of Mr. D. J. Brown, of Div. 283 B. of L. E. and the very appropriate and masterly sermon of Rev. Dr. W. W. Case, (prepared especially for the occasion and delivered at his church the following Sunday,) are also given in full.

A man of truly heroic make was Dr. Samuel Gridley Howe, whose life story is told by his daughter, Mrs. Florence Howe Hall, in the November Wide Awake; the article takes its title "A Modern Hero," from Whittier's noble poem of which Dr. Howe was the subject; the article is accompanied by a portrait of this great champion of the blind and all distressed souls, painted in his young manhood, by Miss Jane Stuart, the daughter of Gilbert Stuart, the artist. "Golden Margaret," by James Purdy, an episode of the Civil War, is the initial story of the number; further on appears a Southern dialect tale of great strength, "Lucy Pervear," by Margaret Sidney. A Western story, "How Tom Jumped a Mine," is from the pen of M. E. S. Stickney. Miss Risley Seward gives Part II. of a true ancestral war-romance, "A Story of 1812," with Commodore Perry for one of its heroes. Mrs. Frémont contributes the last of her series, "The Will and the Way Stories."

Children's Literature.

WHAT "ST. NICHOLAS" HAS DONE FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Victor Hugo calls this "the woman's century," and he might have added that it is the children's century as well, for never before in the world's history has so much thought been paid to children—their schools, their books, their pictures, and their toys. Childhood, as we understand it, is a recent discovery.

Up to the time of the issue of the St. Nicholas Magazine seventeen years ago literature and children's magazines were almost contradictory terms, but the new periodical started out with the idea that nothing was too good for children; the result has been a juvenile magazine genuine with conscientious purpose,—the greatest writers contributing to it, with the best artists and engravers helping to beautify it,—and everything tuned to the key-note of youth.

It has been the special aim of St. Nicholas to supplant unhealthy literature with stories of a living and healthful interest. It will not do to take fascinating bad literature out of boy's hands, and give them in its place Mrs. Barbauld and Peter Parley, or the work of writers who think that any "good-y" talk will do for children, but they must have strong, interesting reading, with the blood and sinew of real life in it,—reading that will awaken them to closer observation of the best things about them.

In the seventeen years of its life St. Nicholas has not only elevated the children, but it has also elevated the tone of contemporary children's literature as well. Many of its stories, like Mrs. Burnett's "Little Lord Fauntleroy," have become classic. It is not too much to say that almost every notable young people's story now produced in America first seeks the light in the pages of that magazine.

The year 1891 will prove once more that "no household where there are children is complete without St. Nicholas," J. T. Trowbridge, Noah Brooks, Charles Dudley Warner, and many well-known writers are to contribute during this coming year. One cannot put the spirit of St. Nicholas into a prospectus, but the publishers are glad to send a full announcement of the features for 1891 and a single copy to the address of any person mentioning this notice. The magazine costs $3.00 a year. Address The Century Co., 33 East 17th St., New York.

A Great American Magazine.

THE SUCCESS OF "THE CENTURY" AND ITS PLANS FOR 1891.

The Century Magazine is now so well known that to tell of its past success seems almost an old story. The New York Tribune has said that it and its companion, St. Nicholas for Young Folks, issued by the same house, "are read by every one person in thirty of the country's population,"—and large editions of both are sent beyond the seas. It is an interesting fact that a few years ago it was found that seven thousand copies of The Century went to Scotland—quite a respectable edition in itself. The question in England is no longer, "Who reads an American book?" but "Who does not see the American magazines?"

A few years ago The Century about doubled its circulation with the famous War Papers, by General Grant and others, adding many more readers later with the Lincoln History and Kennan's thrilling articles on the Siberian Exile System.

One great feature of 1891 is to be "The Gold Hunters of California," describing that remarkable movement to the gold fields in '49, in a series of richly illustrated articles written by survivors, including the narratives of men who went to California by the different routes, accounts of the gold discoveries, life in the mines, the work of the vigilance committees (by the chairman of the committees). etc., etc. General Frémont's last writing was done for this series. In November appears the opening article, "The First Emigrant Train to California"—crossing the Rockies in 1841—by General Bidwell, a pioneer of pioneers. Thousands of American families who had some relative or friend among "the Argonauts of '49" will be interested in these papers.

Many other good things are coming—the narrative of an American's travels through that unknown land Tibet (for 700 miles over ground never before trod by a white man); the experiences of Escaping War-Prisoners; American Newspapers described by well known journalists; accounts of the great Indian Fighters, Custer and others; personal anecdotes of Lincoln, by his private secretaries; "The Faith Doctor," a novel by Edward Eggleston, with a wonderfully rich programme of novelettes and stories by most of the leading writers, etc., etc.

It is also announced that The Century has purchased the right to print, before its appearance in France or any other country, extracts from advance sheets of the famous Talleyrand Memoirs, which have been secretly preserved for half a century—to be first given to the world through the pages of an American magazine. All Europe is eagerly awaiting the publication of this personal history of Talleyrand—greatest of intriguers and diplomats.

The November Century begins the volume, and new subscribers should commence with that issue. The subscription price ($4) may be remitted directly to the publishers, The Century Co., 33 East Seventeenth street, New York, or single copies may be purchased of any newsdealer. The publishers offer to send a free sample copy—a recent back number—to any one desiring it.

Our readers who write to any of the firms advertising in these columns are requested to mention

Everyone knows that Brother Belknap, the editor, is off on sick leave, and when this issue reaches its readers, those who read THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR regularly will undoubtedly wonder, "What is the matter with Daniels?" Nothing whatever is wrong. Brother Daniels is away and the G. C. C. is trying his hand as editor, finishing up this issue. Do not entertain any alarm. You will probably not be so afflicted again.

THE SCRANTON RESOLUTION AGAIN.

As there seems to be some misunderstanding relative to what we said in the last CONDUCTOR in regard to the above resolution, we wish to, if possible, make ourselves perfectly plain in regard to it. Some seem to have understood that in saying that Brother Clark said "no such resolution was adopted," we intended to claim that he said no resolution in regard to THE CONDUCTOR was adopted. In saying that Brother Clark said "no such resolution was adopted," we referred only to the copy sent by the secretary of the meeting, reciting that "the language used in THE CONDUCTOR was scandalous and disgusting in the extreme." Brother Clark distinctly stated to us that a resolution was adopted censuring THE CONDUCTOR for publishing matters in reference to C. S. Wheaton, but that no resolution of censure in general terms for the use of scandalous and disgusting language was passed.

It would seem to us that the statement that the idea of the resolution quoted to us by Clark was the same as that in the copy sent by the author, though differing in language, ought to prevent any such misunderstanding. Neither Brother Clark nor the author claimed to quote the exact language used in presenting this resolution. Neither should the secretary of the meeting be condemned for misunderstanding it, as it was nearly the last action of the meeting, a large number of those attending had already left, and there was some confusion consequent upon the departure of members, and it was passed without discussion under an order for the previous question. No one should understand that Brother Clark attempted in any way to misrepresent the action of the meeting or that there is any intent on our part to convey any such inference. Clark merely corrected the error of the secretary, and in doing so agreed exactly as to material points with the author, though differing somewhat as to language.

The Switchmen's Journal furnishes us with information which we have sought and failed to get. A circular has been sent out addressed to "Members of the Railway Employés' Club and to all Railway Employés," signed by W. E. Perry, general secretary, calling "the third annual State Convention of the Railway Employés' Club," at St. Paul on October 9th.

The circular sets forth that the primary object of the convention is the consideration of "questions of vital interest to all railway men in this state." The members of the various organizations in railway service are urgently requested to send delegates as well as all "who have no organization." The circular itself looks very innocent and would naturally lead the reader to suppose that they intended studying and looking to the protection of the interests of the common every-day employé, but coupled with the letter copied by Brother Hall sent out for the purpose of inducing the organization of a similar club in Illinois, seems after careful study to warrant the heading Brother Hall gives his editorial, "An Infamous Scheme to Entrap Railway Employés." We are sorry that lack of space forbids copying entire, but the following extract to our mind contains the pith of the matter and also exposes the forked tongue:

I hope we may all unite under one Supreme

Head, with one supreme animus and object, namely, protection to each and every railroad employe, and at the same time we should remember that if the company does not or cannot earn they cannot pay. We all know that the stockholders must and will have their dividends; the bondholder will have his interest; the official his salary; every road must use just so much material in proportion to its actual requirements. Now by hostile legislation or arbitrary or unreasonable demands of a railway commission the roads are compelled to curtail their expenses. Where do they commence, where are they compelled to commence? Of course with the employe every time. They cannot commence or end anywhere else.

They propose to establish a benefit department and magnanimously offer to allow "the paymaster of any road" to collect the dues of members if they so wish. In short, judging from the Journal's account of the affair, it is a scheme to induce the members of the different organizations to attach themselves to this "club," and then have the railroad companies dictate to them not only in regard to their employment and compensation therefor, but to take from them the right to recover from said companies where injured through their neglect or penuriousness, and worse than all to curtail the indisputable right of every American citizen to cast his ballot without fear or favor. Here is an article from their constitution:

ARTICLE XI.

SECTION I. It is accepted and understood that any and all members, in consideration of the benefits received from this association, do waive all gratuitous claims or contributions from any railway company for injuries received wherein said railway company is not legally liable.

One little word expresses our opinion of the whole scheme: "Rats!"

The 23rd annual convention of the "Old Reliable" Conductors Insurance Association of the United States and Canada was held in Chattanooga, Tenn., opening on Wednesday, Oct. 29th. This association has been in existence twenty-three years and is the pioneer of the mutual benefit associations among conductors. The annual report shows that since their organization there has been paid out by the association in benefits the handsome sum of $1,185,275.

The exercises were opened with prayer by Rev. G. W. Stuart. The committee on credentials reported 87 delegates present, but that many more were in the city, and yet to arrive.

The visiting conductors and their ladies, were welcomed to the city by Hon. H. M. Wiltse, Col. R. R. Hargis and B W. Wrenn. The annual address was delivered by R. A. French of the B. & O., followed by the address of President Sinclair, in which the attention of the members was called to many points and conditions of particular interest, and in which some very good recommendations were made. The committee on Constitution and By-Laws recommend some changes looking to a more economical management of the affairs of the association. The secretary reports total number of members 902. Amount expended for the year in assessments, etc., $1,937.39.

Proposition to reduce the salary of the secretary was voted down

A public reception was held at the Chamber of Commerce on the evening of the 29th, at which many spicy and entertaining speeches were delivered, notable among them that of Mr. Milton B. Ochs, of the Chattanooga Times. The welcome extended can be judged by the following extract from his speech:

"I hand you to-night the key which gives you entrance to our vast storehouse of hospitality, and in the name of Chattanooga and in the name of the South, I bid you eat, drink and be merry. From the top of our historic old mountain look down upon the world and view the finest panorama afforded upon this continent. From the pinnacle of Lookout you can see the boundary line of seven States, every one an empire within itself. Everyone of these commonwealths a little over a quarter of a century ago ran red with blood, and moaned with cruel war. To-day you can see the angel of peace who has spread her wings and holds in her folds not only the States you see, but binds them to the common country under one flag, from the border line of Canada to the surf line of the gulf.

"But a few years ago this land was desolate, left so by the strife which in ages to come will be chiselled upon the historic tablets of our country as a sad memento of a nation's grief.

"To-day look upon the same fields that were the carnage ground, and you will see the homes of peace and the homes of prosperity, the homes of progress, the hives of industries and the abiding place of brotherly love.

"With the sacred bones of the dead we buried our animosities, and our welcome to-night to the conductors of the North is the same we extend to those of the South.

"Digest this, for it is meant and spoken in all sincerity. I want you men of the far East, of the far North and of the far West to go forth upon your daily journeys and proclaim to your living freight, that the South booms not only commercially, not only financially, but so strong is the charge that the cannon has sent into everlasting oblivion the prejudice that lives only now with a partisan press and a small coterie of professional politicians, situated, unfortunately, South as well as North of the so-called Mason and Dixon line."

W. O. Beckley, better known as "Wabash Bill," was elected president for the coming year, and their labors done (and we predict, well done), the party left for a trip to Florida, having accepted the kind invitation extended by Mr. Wrenn, G. P. A., E. T. V. & G. R'y, to make the trip by that line.

We regret that the officers were obliged to report a decrease in membership. We believe that insurance against death or disability is a duty every conductor owes himself and those dependent upon him, and are of the opinion that it is much better to get it in an association of conductors, than to pay this hard earned money into the treasury of some regular insurance corporation doing business purely for the profit there is in it.

Whatever the future may have in store for the "Old Reliable," they have made a record of which they may well feel proud, and have builded many lasting monuments to the feelings of brotherly love and charity which exists in the hearts of the conductors, and we re-echo these words from the prayer of Rev. Stuart, before referred to:

"Many of our comrades of the rail have gone down by rotten rail, defective bridge or fatal tunnel, but we are left to greet each other, and we praise thee. We come to renew our acquaintance, and grant, Oh, God, that our interest in this association for the benefit of our wives and children may be increased.

AN ACT OF JUSTICE.

CHICAGO, Oct. 26.—No official act of President Harrison since the day of his inauguration has given such general satisfaction to railroad, commercial and board of trade circles, republicans and democrats alike, as his quiet remission, a few days ago, of the fine of three thousand dollars imposed at the last term of the circuit court upon Arthur Street, the ex-assistant general freight agent of the Michigan Central railroad, and who pleaded guilty to a violation of one of the provisions of the inter-state commerce law in granting secret rebates to Counselman & Co., well-known board of trade operators on east-bound grain shipments. The circumstances of this case, which created considerable of a sensation some months ago, will never be forgotten in the railroad and commercial circles in this city. Street, as the assistant general freight agent of the Michigan Central, was compelled to make the rebates and thus violate the law by his superior officers. The latter were indicted with him. Street was given to understand, that if he would allow himself to become the scape-goat and take the entire blame on his own shoulders, thus exonerating those indicted with him, the Michigan Central would take care of his defense and also see to it that he was well taken care of in the future. Street fell into the trap, only to find, at the last moment, that he was deserted by those for whom he had offered himself as a sacrifice. The Michigan Central actually avoided employing counsel for his defense. The trial absorbed all his means and the anxiety and worry cost his wife her reason. The verdict of the court found him penniless, a fine of three thousand dollars hanging over his head, and the back of the corporation that had compelled him to break the law and had then induced him to shelter it behind his own shoulders, turned upon him. Railroad and board of trade men, however, took care of the victim's immediate interests, and President Harrison has completed the good work by remitting the heavy fine. It is an open secret that antagonism on the part of certain officials of the passenger department of the road was at the bottom of the course adopted toward Street.

The President deserves the thanks of railway employes for this remission, but it will not restore reason to Mrs. Street, nor happiness to the desolate home, broken up by this corporation.

CHANUTE, Kans., Oct. 26, 1890.

Wm. P. Daniels, G. S. & T.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have the pleasure to report the organization of one more Division of the Order to-day, at this place, and, the latest will be known as Chanute Div. No. 265.

They start in with 15 charter members, but do not expect to remain at that mark long.

Their C. C. is Bro. E. A. Taylor, P. O. box 84, and S. & T. Bro. Peter Farrell, P. O. box 242. Place of meeting Masonic Hall, on the 2d and 4th Sundays.

I return thanks to Bro. Geo. Korner of 55, Bros. W. K. Maxwell and Wm. Chapman of 161, and last but not least to Bro. Jack Truitt, (did you ever hear him laugh?) of 53. The only mishap of the occasion, was when Maxwell, Chapman and Truitt started for Parsons, they visited on the road to the station so long they missed their train, and at once called a special session on the back platform, and passed resolutions denouncing the Republican Party and calling on the Farmers Alliance to furnish them transportation. They first took up a collection to buy a newspaper for the purpose of ventilating their wrongs, but when they called in their capital changed their plans and had a tune by "Max's band" and then Truitt made a speech. There is another train tomorrow and until that comes they are "only waiting." When any of the Brothers of the Order are in Chanute, they will find the latchstring of 265 out and a kindly welcome awaiting them. I am sincerely.

Yours in P. F.

GARRETSON, G. S. C.

RALEIGH, N. C., Oct. 26, 1890.

Wm. P. Daniels Esq., G. Sec. & Treas.

DEAR BROTHER: Enclosed find charter list for new Div. at Raleigh, N. C., which was duly organized on Oct. 26th, 1890. The 20 petitioners were never any of them members of the Order before. The following were present and made members.

T. H. Fowler, J. M. Groves, T. F. Kirkland, J. R. Renn, T. F. Wilson, P. J. Brown, W. C. Pollock, E. P. Stone, Jno. White, H. S. Waddell, H. M. Fawcett, J. H. Gilliland, J. T. Busbee, Bro. C. B. Guthrie and Bro. W. S. Witherspoon were admitted by card from Div. 221. The officers elected were C. C., C. B. Guthrie, Greensboro, N. C. box 309; Sec. & Treas. J. T. Busbee, 104 W. Hargett St., Raleigh, N. C.; A. C. C., H. M. Fawcett; S. C., P. J. Brown; J. C., T. H. Fowler; I. S., T. F. Kirkland; O. S., E. P. Stone.

The name of the Division is Raleigh No. 264. they will meet on the second and fourth Sundays at 2 P. M. in Odd Fellows Hall.

Yours Truly in P. F.

C. H. WILKINS, A. G. C. C.

SHALL WE MOVE.

The editorial in a late CONDUCTOR in reference to the location of the general offices of the Order, seems to have had the effect in two instances at least, of stirring up members to activity. We find the following in Indianapolis papers, which would seem to indicate, that if a move should be made, 103 intends to be 'in it':

The members of the Order of Railway Conductors who reside at Indianapolis feel very confident that with a little effort the association can be induced to select this city for its headquarters. H. Mounts, secretary of the Indianapolis division, has received a number of letters from officials of the organization and prominent members, strongly favoring the selection of Indianapolis as their headquarters. The association has in its treasury now $150,000, set aside to be used in the erection of a good building wherever the headquarters of the organization may be. The proposition is to erect a fine building, using such portions of it as are needed for the official's rooms and rent the other rooms. In the organization there are now over eighteen thousand members, scattered all over the United States and Canada. Their annual meetings would bring a large number of delegates to attend them and usually continue several days. There is hardly a day in the year that there are not committees from some of the divisions at headquarters to confer with the general officers. As evidence that the officials of the Order are in earnest in the move to make Indianapolis their headquarters, a portion of a letter which Secretary Mounts, of the local lodge, received yesterday from E. E. Clark, the grand chief conductor, is published. He says:

If you can, without expense or unreasonable trouble to yourself, ascertain what would be necessary for us to do in order to make Indianapolis our headquarters and conduct our insurance business in the State of Indiana, you will confer considerable of a favor upon me. What I would like to know is, could we conduct our assessment insurance business in Indiana without being an incorporated association, and, if incorporation is necessary, can we incorporate the insurance department without incorporating the organization.

Secretary Mounts last evening called on Bruce Carr, Auditor of State, to enable him to obtain information to answer the above questions, and the Auditor told him that Indiana had the best law in the world for just such organizations. All that was needed is that one hundred members apply for a charter, and he urged Secretary Mounts to push the matter.—Indianapolis Journal.

The Order of Railway Conductors, which has a membership of about 20,000, has decided to change its headquarters from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and build a permanent home at some point more centrally located. It is the intention to erect a building to cost from $150,000 to $250,000, the greater part of which the Order will be able to pay itself. Some of the officers and nearly all the members are very much in favor of Indianapolis, which is one of the most centrally located railroad cities in the country, with lines diverging in every direction, and a time schedule that is almost perfect. Should the home be located in Indianapolis it would bring to this city a small army of permanent residence, besides bringing a large number of railroad men who otherwise would not visit this city. The Grand Division would be held here annually, with an attendance of from 1,500 to 2,000 persons, representing every part of the United States, as well as Mexico and Canada. A number of cities in the west are making an effort to secure the home, Des Moines, Iowa, offering a bonus of $50,000. The question will be settled at the meeting of the Grand Division at St. Louis in May next, and thus Indianapolis has a chance to secure the building if the proper efforts are made. It has been suggested that the Commercial Club take some action in the matter. Division No. 103 of this city has appointed a committee composed of H. M. Mounts, A. J. Morrow and I. D. Baldwin, who will make a canvass of the city on the subject.—Indianapolis News.

The News states and the Journal seems to assume that the matter of removal has already been decided upon and in this they are in error.

No move has been decided upon or can be decided upon until the Grand Division meets in May next, but knowing that some members of the Order were in favor of a different location and believing that the matter would be brought up at the next session, we thought it but just and fair to inform all members, to the end that the matter might be discussed and all have an equal opportunity to present their ideas and the inducements that might be offered by different places. Des Moines has not as yet made any offer to the Order, but THE CONDUCTOR thinks that they will offer at least $50,000 conditioned on the erection of a building. The fact that Des Moines sent a man to Rochester to look after the matter indicates to us that she is alive to the advantages that would accrue to her from the location there. Cedar Rapids will also be very likely to submit a proposition. Should it be decided to surrender the corporate existence in this state and move to some other, Indianapolis will undoubtedly prove a strong competitor. It is a thriving, prosperous and beautiful city, and a railway center second to none outside of perhaps Chicago and St. Louis, and under the laws of Indiana, the Order can do all its business either with or without incorporating, a late law in reference to assessment insurance providing that secret or fraternal societies shall be exempt from the insurance laws if they choose. In respect to laws, THE CONDUCTOR believes the laws of Indiana to be, with the late amendments, as favorable for the Order as any state in the Union, not excepting Iowa, which heretofore have been the best in our opinion.

WHERE IGNORANCE, ETC.

The writer of the editorials for the New York Dispatch should, before attempting another editorial on railway employes' associations and their officers, make some little effort to become acquainted with what he writes of.

In the Dispatch for November 9th, we find a quarter column of eulogy of Geo. W. Howard, and the writer starts out by saying "those who were dissatisfied with the elimination of the strike clause immediately organized what is now known as the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, and with Grand Chief Conductor Howard at its head, this order has assumed a place among the champions of the rights of labor of no small importance." If the association is to be judged by the bluster and noise they make and the falsehoods that they tell, it certainly is of no small importance. For instance, its officers claim 9,000 to 10,000 members, while the brilliant but somewhat erratic Debs, of the Firemens' Journal, who is in a position to know, and who, whatever else may be charged against him, is so far as we know, of unquestioned veracity, says they have "about 2000." The animus of this writer is very plainly exhibited by the fact, that he takes a single sentence from the reply to the Trainmens' Journal in November 1st CONDUCTOR, misquotes it, and then wants the Order to "explain." The sentence referred to is as follows (with the misquoted words in italics): "that should the occasion arise and the cause be a just one they would not hesitate to order a strike." What THE CONDUCTOR did say was correctly quoted by the railway editor of the Dispatch in another column. We have no time, do not desire, and certainly will not attempt to explain anything to any editor who prates of railway organizations and is so ignorant that he does not yet know that Mr. Wheaton is not the executive of the Order, and we merely notice it that our readers may know what weight to give it when it is paraded, as it probably will be, by "the organ." This writer should confer with the person who prepares the railroad column for the Dispatch. In conclusion, we follow political precedent and use the "parallel column," only in this instance, the extracts are both from the same issue of the Dispatch.

The adage that "nothing succeeds like success" is applicable to the B. of R. C., which has demonstrated that it was wanted and has come to stay. Col. Howard is an indefatigable worker and has served in every capacity from section man to general manager. He is also Vice-President of the Supreme Council and lately, when the eyes of all the people in the country were turned to Terre Haute during the senseless struggle on the New York Central, his iron nerve and unflinching judgment was relied upon. He was a gallant soldier in the late war and a member of the G. A. R. It is not our intention to dilate on Col. Howard nor to score Mr. Wheaton; but justice compels us to say that some of the utterances of the O. R. C. are entirely too vague.—Dispatch, Nov. 9, page 4.

The Railway Conductor, in an editorial in its last issue, says that, the Order is not now on a strike basis. If the words are to be understood as meaning going around with a chip on its shoulder, daring every one to "knock it off," and talking of what they will do if they (the railway officers) don't come to time. We believe that there is no present officer of the Order who would hesitate to say, that should occasion require it, the Executive of the Order would not only authorize but would advise a strike. We have been of that opinion in regard to the matter and refrain from commenting, because we believe the Conductor would state the position of the "Order" at the proper time.—Dispatch, Nov. 9, page 5.

A Union meeting will be held at Jersey City, N. J., under the auspices of Division 169 on Sunday, December 7th. Secret session at 10 a. m., public reception at 2:30 p. m. All are invited, and any who may attend are assured of a cordial reception.

The B. of R. T. did well in re-electing Messrs. Wilkinson, Morrissey, Sheahan and Slattery. Although THE CONDUCTOR is not personally acquainted with the last named three gentlemen, it knows something of their official labors. Mr. George Newman, of Missoula, Montana, was elected third Vice-Grand Master.

We are in receipt of a joint communication from Brothers D. F. Knebel and G. F. Miller, of Division 204, dated Santiago De Cuba, Island of Cuba. Judging by the tenor of their letter, the Brothers are not completely enamored of the charms of Cuba except as indicated by their own confession, that "when a man is making big money he can stand an awful lot of punishment." They report an accident in which nine men were killed, all of whom were accorded a "full dress" burial, including the proverbial boots. In conclusion the Brothers express themselves as truly thankful that they belong to a country where the footprints of civilization are visible to the naked eye, and their fondest desire is that fortune may soon permit them to return to the land of the free and the home of the Order.

We have several times lately observed some statements as to what the Railway Employes' Club would do in Minnesota politics and have made inquiry as to what it was and of whom it consisted, but without receiving much information, conductors in St. Paul and Minneapolis being uninformed in regard to it. The November number of the Switchmen's Journal seems to have obtained some information and uses its scalpel on the "club" in an effective manner. A call for a convention of State clubs is issued by W. F. Perry, general secretary, and members of all the different organizations are requested to meet with this convention. We would suggest to all divisions of the Order, who may receive this circular, that no "delegates" be sent until the matter is thoroughly investigated. THE CONDUCTOR believes in the organization of railway employes for political purposes, but we do not wish to see our members or any other hoodwinked into something that will make them the cat's paw to pull out chestnuts for others. Can any of our members give any information in regard to this particular club?

Brother S. E. Hughes, of Division 20, called at the office on the 6th.

There is not a railway employé in the United States who will not regret to learn of the death of Ed. F. O'Shea.

An advance in pay has lately been granted to the employés of the Air Line Division of the Mackey system.

Every conductor is advised to carefully read the "Legal" in this issue. It will prove of incalculable value to some or all of you, some day.

The interesting letter from M. A. L. has been divided by us in order to get the report of the organization of the Ladies Auxiliary in the Ladies department.

Mrs. Jones, wife of Brother E. J. Jones, of Division 125, and her sister, Mrs. Kneeland, wife of Brother Kneeland of 34, have been visiting the wife of the G. C. C.

H. A. P. (py) Cronk of Div. 34 illumined the sanctum with his auburn locks a few days ago. He was in the city to attend the wedding of a cousin and as a matter, of course, called at the office.

Division No. 50 will give their first annual ball, at Foot Guard Armory, Hartford, on the evening of November 26th. Invitations are hereby acknowledged and we hope it will prove a success in every respect.

The Philadelphia Record charges the Reading road with an attempt to control the vote of its employés by threatening dismissal to all who refuse to support its candidates, although President McLeod denies it, and says that officers who have done anything of that kind did it without authority. The Reading wants a right of way through Philadelphia and it is asserted that it is endeavoring to compel its employés to aid it by voting for the men it selects. The Reading has a weary road to travel before it obtains what it wishes.

The Ohio Valley Car Company has delivered to the Queen and Crescent people four passenger coaches, one baggage car and one postal car, to be placed in immediate service on the Cincinnati Southern division of the Q. & C. route.

The account of an accident caused by a boy employé, found in another column, is an eloquent argument in favor of employing men of experience whenever they are to be had, even though they may "come a little high," for the time being.

Bro. N. Hawley and wife made us a pleasant visit during the past month. Bro. Hawley is a member of No. 48 and one of the Michigan Central's reliable conductors and with Mrs. Hawley are visiting relatives in Blairstown.

The Supreme Court of New York, decides that a train dispatcher is a fellow servant of a locomotive fireman and the latter injured by an accident caused by the dispatcher, cannot recover. Is it not time that railway employés united in an effort to change this state of affairs.

Brother Mead Stillwell, late division superintendent on the Mo. Pac. at Sedalia, goes to the C. H. V. & T., with headquarters at Logan, Ohio. His position there is that of superintendent and the employés are to be congratulated on the accession of Brother Stillwell to this position.

There seems to be a growing demand on the part of the traveling public who use sleeping cars, for something that will insure greater privacy than the present system; the Pullman company are arranging to meet that demand by placing in service compartment cars; one of the latest and finest will be the newly remodeled compartment car "Antioch," which went into service between Cincinnati and St. Louis on the Queen & Crescent route, on the first instant; the car is elegantly upholstered and tastily draped, and presents a beautiful appearance.

**

Hartford Division No. 50, gives its first annual ball November 26th, and THE CONDUCTOR is not forgotten by the boys. Sorry we can't be present and enjoy what will certainly be a very pleasant occasion. The boys have our sincere thanks for their kindly remembrance.

**

Any one knowing the whereabouts of Benton L. Lamoreux, at one time a member of Chicago Division No. 1, and when last heard from, running out of Denison, Texas, will confer a favor by sending his address to his sister, Mrs. F. W. Bradley, Sandusky, Ohio. Should this item reach the notice of Mr. Lamoreux, it will inform him that his father was buried Nov. 2nd.

**

Brother W. J. Cornelius of Division No. 60, has been engaged by the Railway Officials & Conductors Accident Association as a special agent with territory on the C. R. I. & P. railway. The company have secured a valuable agent in Brother Cornelius and the Rock Island employes will find a genial Brother in the agent who will present to them the advantages of a good accident company.

**

J. Wicks has been appointed travelling conductor on the Santa Fé, is the way the papers state it, but notwithstanding the disguise we recognize an old friend who back in the "sixties" was with the writer, employed as an "assistant conductor" on the I. & M. division of the St. Paul, Bro. J. C. Weeks, a member of Newton Division No. 11 and for several years past, a popular Santa Fé conductor.

**

THE CONDUCTOR advocates the twenty-four system of time notation and the abolition of the different standards in use at present, and the adoption of one standard for the entire United States, and we are glad to see that this idea is steadily, though slowly, gaining ground. A late number of the American Machinist, in an article which we reproduce elsewhere, gives many reasons for this reform.

**

And still they come. The railway officer who expressed the belief that the Order of Railway Conductors had closed the door to promotion of its members by eliminating the strike clause, must have been a little in error. A great many delegates to the Grand Division will remember C. H. Howard as a delegate from Division 181 and will join THE CONDUCTOR in a hearty "shake" on his promotion to train master of the B. & O. S. W., with headquarters at Chillicothe, Ohio.

Reports indicate that the farce called an organization of an O. R. C. division at Gainesville, Texas was a most disgraceful affair, characterized by a drunken debauch. All O. R. C. men who have become acquainted with the facts express regret and disgust.—Railway Service Gazette.

The above is a contemptible falsehood. A. B. GARRETTSON organized Div. 262 at Gainesville, Texas, and those who know him will fully appreciate the spirit that prompts such statements.

**

A reliable correspondent of the Gazette, who is in a position to know, says that W. P. Daniels has recently been sending telegrams to subordinate divisions of the O. R. C. to this effect: "For heaven's sake make peace with the engineers or we are lost." "System federation or we are shut out." In the role of high tragedy William is "amusing."—Railway Service Gazette.

The "reliable correspondent" is a plain every day liar, probably no other than "Majah Wellington de Boots" Leflet.

**

The Independent of New York, requested contributions from several well known writers on the late N. Y. C. strike and among them, President Gompers of the A. F. L. whose communications we reproduce. By some of the contributors, peculiar ideas are advanced and we hope to have time and space in the future to comment upon them and the conclusions drawn from them by the Independent. There is also a thoughtful article by Bro. Rogers of the Trainmen's Journal which will be given in our next issue.

We are in receipt of the following "Aviso General" issued by James Sullivan of the Compania Constructora Nacional Mexicana.

Ciudad de Mexico, Agosto 1. de 1890. En sustitucion del Senor J. C. Mordough que renuncio, ha sido nombrado Superintendente de la Division de Colime desde el 15 de Agosto, el Senor C. H. Starr. Which translated is to the effect that Bro. G. H. Starr of Div. 159 has been appointed superintendent of the Mexican National Construction Company with office at Colima, vice J. C. Mordough resigned, to take effect August 15th. (If our translation is a "little off," Bros. Bradley, Sayers or Greenleaf can correct.) Bro Starr is a former member of Div. 89 at Louisville and in railway service is a graduate of the old Toledo Wabash & Western and has many friends in the States who will be glad to note his prosperity.

Brother S. L. Boyer, a charter member of Pike's Peak Division, No. 244, at Colorado Springs, formerly road master on the Colorado Midland, and later, general manager of mines for Mr. John Scott at Aspen, goes to Central America as superintendent of construction of a new road there, the Pacific terminal of which is at Buenaventura, and of which Mr. Scott is president. Twenty miles of the road is completed, and the building of four hundred is contemplated.

**

The majority report of the committee favoring federation was rejected by the B. of L. E. by a few votes less than the two-thirds that were required to adopt it. Messrs. Ingraham and Everett were re-elected and two new offices were created, Assistant Grand Chief Engineer and Third Grand Engineer, Mr. Ash Kennedy, of Winnipeg, being selected for the latter, and Mr. A. B. Youngson, of the Nypano, for the former place. Mr. Youngson is the chairman of the general grievance committee of the Erie system. The matter of changing the time for the convention from October to May was discussed, but we are not informed as to the decision arrived at.

**

It was reported that Mr. J. M. Barr, late general superintendent of the U. P. at Cheyenne, had gone to the Pacific division of the same road, but such report was an error. Mr. Barr is now superintendent of the Chicago division of the St. Paul, vice S. J. Collins, resigned. Mr. Collins carries with him the best wishes of every employé and a host of friends, he having been in the employ of the St. Paul for nearly thirty years. THE CONDUCTOR has but a casual acquaintance with Mr. Barr, but we are inclined to think that in as much as Mr. Collins leaves, his place will be well filled by Mr. Barr. We think, however, that the St. Paul has some officers whom it could better afford to lose, than Mr. Collins.

To any member who has ever met and talked with Brother Clark it will be entirely unnecessary for us to say that he is the Grand Chief Conductor in fact as well as in name and that the silly assertions of those who wish to injure the Order, that "Daniels is the real head of the Order," is as unsubstantial as "the baseless fabric of a dream," but there may be those in the Order who have never met him and who might possibly think he was a weakling to be controlled by any person who happened to have the "leading strings." The present Grand Chief Conductor is not a man to be controlled by any one or by anything except in the way of reasonable argument and no one would attempt anything of the kind unless entirely devoid of the faculty of judging humanity. Finally, Daniels has no desire, and certainly has not attempted to control or interfere in any way with the duties or privileges of the Grand Chief Conductor, and any attempt to convince members of the Order or any one else that such is the case, is as malicious as it is false.

**

On Saturday, November 8th, there passed away a man to whom every railway employé in America owes a debt of gratitude, the pioneer in the path of organization of railway employés. William D. Robinson, the founder of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, originally the Engineers Footboard, who has been suffering for a long time from cancer of the stomach, laid down the burden of this life, and was buried Sunday. Mr. Robinson was the first Grand Chief Engineer of the organization, and was dismissed by the Michigan Central railway for his efforts to build up the association. He was widely and favorably known, and during the past year has been a prominent speaker at the various meetings of employés.

No member of the Order should permit himself to be deceived by the unlimited "claims" made by some of our friends (?) at whose nod and beck railway managers and presidents move like puppets, if we may credit the "claims." Some of the valiant correspondents of the Toledo sheet claim that they and they alone procured the increase of wages on the Santa Fé, the Southern Pacific, and various other roads, and do not even give any credit to their allies in the Council, the B. of R. T. Before crediting any such Quixotic assertions, let readers learn the facts by inquiring, if necessary, of the Grand Master of the B. of R. T., who has been present in most instances and is acquainted with the facts in all and who is above such contemptible falsehood and trickery.

The Western Union Telegraph Company seems to have commenced a war on the Brotherhood of Telegraphers, having dismissed operators who were members at Omaha, St. Louis and St. Paul. The latest news is that most of the dismissed men have been reinstated, but the statements in regard to conditions are contradictory, some dispatches claiming that the reinstated men have agreed to sever their connection with the association while others contradict it. There is a growing demand that a system of postal telegraphy be inaugurated by the United States government in opposition to the present monopoly of the Western Union, and if it shall continue to wage war upon organized labor, that alone will have no little effect in bringing it into competition with the United States.

A telegram received on the evening of the 6th, announced the sad death of Brother Frank S. Butler, Grand Outside Sentinel, by being run over at Anniston, Alabama, where he was employed as yard master. Hasty and impulsive, quick to resent a fancied wrong or to take offense, but also quick to acknowledge himself in the wrong when convinced, and as ready to forgive a real injury as to resent a fancied one, the Order has lost an energetic member, and the writer a warm personal friend. Generous and free-hearted, Frank was his own worst enemy, but at the time of his sad death, was nobly redeeming the one incidental error of his past, and the untimely end cuts short a life of great promise. The particulars are not, at this date, at hand, but we hope in the next issue to give a brief sketch of our lamented friend and Brother.

The various committees having in charge the matter of the federated schedule of wages on the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburg, are gathering at that city to-day, and it is the intention to formally present the schedule to General Manager Woods to-morrow. While the engineers are taking the lead, the firemen, conductors, brakemen, switchmen, car inspectors, in fact every branch of the service, is in it. The wages asked for are about the same as that granted the Big Four men, though in some instances the demand is higher. The men, however, are willing to make concessions, but insist that they shall be paid the same as men for the same class of work are paid on other roads. It is not anticipated that there will be any trouble. The Pennsylvania Company has always adopted a liberal policy toward its men and as there has been a wholesale reduction of the force in different branches, it is thought an agreement will speedily be reached. The new schedule is to go into force January 1. Gen'l Superintendent Miller arrived from Florida last night and will go to Pittsburg to be present at the conference.

From Kenton, Ohio, papers we learn of one of the great events in the life of a prominent member of the Order. Brother J. B. Andrews, train master on the Mexican Central and a member of Division No. 159, decided to retire from the rail and devote himself to something else, and has settled down in Kenton, and in company with his brother is ready, willing and anxious to supply every body in that section with house furnishing goods. Getting fairly started, the stock looked so attractive that Jap concluded to become a customer himself and made quite an investment. When he secured his goods and a place them, there still seemed to be something lacking, and after some cogitation he discovered that the one thing needful was a better half, and immediately made arrangements with one of Kenton's most accomplished young ladies, Miss Effie Ahlefeld, and the words that made them one were spoken October 28th. This is the explanation that Brother Andrews gives, but there be those who say that he tells the story wrong end first, and that after arriving at an understanding with Miss Ahlefeld, he decided upon the business in order to get a rebate on his own household goods; however that may be, he can be found ready to accomodate any who may wish to follow his example and happy enough to almost give goods away. THE CONDUCTOR joins in congratulations.

On Saturday the firemen on the engine of the work train below Villa Grove saw what he supposed to be a jack rabbit behind a sage brush about two hundred yards away. He took down his gun and fired at it. The fireman's aim was good, but instead of hitting a jack rabbit the unerring ball perforated the foot of a dago named Joss Miele. As soon as the dagos at the camp saw what had happened they procured all the available guns in the camp and started in hot pursuit of the fireman. He boarded the engine and pulled out for Villa Grove, thinking that a higher altitude would, under the circumstances, be much better for his health. The wounded dago came over to Salida for treatment, and has finally concluded that it was an accident and the fireman was not aware that he was firing at a man.—Salida Mail.

What a foot Joss must have.

Not the Same.

Like a lark in its flight empyrean,

Her voice rings out through the room,
And she sings of things, as she twangs the strings
That scatter away the gloom.

She trills me the ballad of "Robin Adair,"

And the loves of the "Low-backed Car,"
Doubly fair seems the air of "Wapping Old Stair," Doubly sweet my wheezy guitar.

She runs through the tunes of the lassies

That peep from the fields of the Rye.
Yet unsung by her tongue is the song to have wrung

A tear from out mine eye.

"Down Went—" she at last begins;

"Down Went—" and I start in my chair;
"Down Went—" the air rent ('twas the "Ballad of Kent!")

"Down Went My Sweet Robin in Prayer!"

“Don’t you give any premiums for twins?” asked the anxious-looking man who had edged his way through the crowd in front of the railing behind which sat the judges at the baby show.

“No, my friend,” replied one of them. “We have thought it best not to offer premiums for twins. Here is the premium list. You can see for yourself.”

“I didn’t know but you might have a consolation purse to offer,” said the anxious-looking inquirer, edging his way out of the crowd again.

“Begosh,” said the retired blacksmith, “this here etiquette book says a man must go naked all the morning!”

The revival meeting was at its height and one of the brethren was laboring earnestly with a young man in a back seat.

“My friend,” he said, “is there any reason why—by the way, may I inquire what is your trade or occupation?”

“I am a conductor on a horse railroad.”

“Brethren,” said the good man, raising his voice, “I must have some help on this critter.”—New York Mercury.

The Matter With Base Ball.

Foreign Visitor—I understand that your national game, baseball, is not so popular as it was. Why is that?

He Tried a Conundrum.

It was 11:30, but the young man could not tear himself away. In one of the pauses of the conversation the sound of snoring in some of the upper rooms reached the cozy parlor, and his facelighted up with the joy of a sudden discovery.

"Miss Chuckster," he said, "why is your house like a good line of railway?"

"I cannot imagine, Mr. Hankinson."

"Because it is well equipped with sleepers."

"Ha! Very good, Mr. Hankinson. Do you know why you are like a railway from Potato Hollow to St. Louis?"

"No. Why?"

"Because," answered Miss Chuckster, sweetly, "you don't seem to have any terminal facilities."

They Weren't His Mules.

I was in the smoking car of a train on the Louisville & Nashville road, running from Decatur to Montgomery, Ala. Just as the train started a man came bouncing in, breathing hard and evidently pretty well tired out. After sitting down for a couple of minutes he rose and came over to me. We were alone in the car.

"Stranger," he said as he sat down in half of the seat, "I am dead broke and want you to pay my fare to Guntersville."

"Very well, here's the change, and you can hand it to the conductor."

"Thanks. I see you have an overcoat lying on the seat. Would you have any objection to my slipping it on for five minutes?"

"None at all."

"You are very, very kind. Suppose we exchange hats for a minute?"

"Certainly."

"Now lend me your glasses and that book."

"Here they are."

He had just got settled when the conductor came in. The stranger said "Guntersville" and handed out the fare, and the official received it and passed out. The man hadn't another word to say until the whistle blew for his station. Then he got out of the overcoat, handed over the other effects, and shook hands and said:

"I can't tell how much I thank you. They weren't two minutes behind me."

"You were fleeing, eh?"

"I'd run two miles."

"And the—the cause?"

"Couldn't prove my ownership to a $250 mule team. Good-bye, old chap. If you ever go into mules and get brought up short, send for me."—Detroit Free Press.

The Crows and the Farmer.

The farm-house was cozy and sweet as could be. The green fields and orchards were pleasant to see—

Then why, do you think, was the farmer so glum? His good wife looked out, saying, "Why does he stand

Like a stock or a stone, with the hoe in his hand, When it's supper time, quite, and the cows haven't come?"

The farmer stood thinking, "There's nobody knows

The life a poor farmer is led by the crows!

It's much if they leave me a morsel to eat.

'Twas the peas, and the beans, and the oats, and the rye;

They didn't spare cherries enough for a pie, And now I'll be blest if they're not at the wheat!

"And I really believe that before I am older

They will come to that scarecrow, and light on his shoulder,

Or build them a nest in the crown of his hat!

If I live till to-morrow, we'll some of us see—

I'll take the old gun, and hide up in this tree.

I've buckshot enough; we'll try how they like that!"

How they liked it, however, he was not to see.

Though all the next morning he hid in the tree.

Not a crow was on hand, save one wary old scout,

Who crept through the bushes, flew close to the ground,

And took word to the flock, "The old gentleman's 'round

With a gun in his hand, and we'd better clear out!

"When he puts up a scarecrow we're certain at once,

And if we were not we should each be a dunce.

That there's lots of good eating, and nothing to pay;

But a man with a gun 's so unpleasant a sight

It destroys the most ravenous crow's appetite.

And when we're not hungry, pray why should we stay?"

THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

VOL. VII.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA., DECEMBER 1, 1890.

NO. 23.

QUEER RAILROAD LAWSUITS.

A WIDOW'S COW, A GIRL'S DOWRY, A FARMER'S INSURANCE, A COSTLY ENGLISH MALADY.

"I have been for twenty years counsel for railroads defending suits for damages resulting or alleged to have resulted from some fault of a railroad company or its employés," said a well-known New York State lawyer, "and have had to contest some most ridiculous and novel claims, but no matter how ridiculous the claim, I have never yet known a jury composed chiefly of farmers to fail to render a verdict against the railroad. I remember a case, for instance, in a central New York county, where a farmer's wife was the plaintiff. Her husband was killed by the cars, and the company paid the widow the statutory amount of damages, $5,000. It seems that the farmer had a cow which was a valuable one. The butter made from this cow he had contracted to deliver for one year to a village merchant for $100. The cow was eccentric, and would permit no one to milk her but the farmer. His death, therefore, left his widow in a predicament. The cow had to be milked or sold for beef, and the widow did not want to sacrifice so valuable a beast in that way. All friendly overtures to induce the cow to let herself be milked, failing in their object, she was hobbled and secured with ropes and enforced milking attempted. The animal in her struggles to prevent what she doubtless considered an outrage, injured herself so badly that she had to be killed. The widow thought the matter over, and became convinced that the railroad company was responsible for the death of the valuable cow in having killed the only person who could handle her, and that it was also liable for the $100 the cow would have brought in by the sale of her butter for that year. The worthy woman found a lawyer who agreed with her, and suit was brought against the company to recover $100, the value of the cow, and $100 for the butter she was to have produced. The jury was one in which the agricultural idea predominated, and the widow got a verdict for $200 and costs.

In the same locality a well-to-do young farmer was engaged to marry the daughter of a farmer in a neighboring town. There had been some objection on the part of the girl's father, to the marriage, but that had been overcome by the young man agreeing to settle $1000 on the girl when she became his wife. On his way to the farmer's house on the day he was to be married, he was so badly hurt in a collision on the railroad that he died next day. The young man's only relative was his mother, and the railroad company settled with her for the son's death. The father of the girl the young man was to have married, brought suit in her name against the company to recover $1000, on the ground that by causing the death of his daughter's affianced husband, it had prevented the settlement of that sum on the girl. This case was tried before a jury necessarily mainly composed of farmers, and they promptly returned a verdict for the plaintiff. It is hardly necessary to say, however, that their judgment was subsequently reversed.

A similar case was that of a farmer who had neglected to renew the policy of insurance on his house, which was a fine one, the farmer being one of the richest in central New York. He started for town one afternoon for the purpose of renewing the insurance. At a railroad crossing on the way a freight train had been derailed, and the road was blocked so it was impossible for wagons to cross. The farmer waited for two hours in the road, and there still being no thoroughfare he returned home, intending to transact his business next day. That night, as fate would have it, his house caught fire and was destroyed with all its contents, the entire loss being placed by the farmer at $8000, which I have every reason to know was not exaggerated. The farmer sued the railroad company to recover that amount, basing his claim on the fact that he was prevented from renewing his policy of insurance on the property by the accident on the railroad which barred his way to town, whither he was going for the express purpose of reinsuring. The jury found no difficulty whatever, in being of the same mind with the farmer, and gave him a judgment for $8000 and costs. We had to try that case three times, and finally settled it.

"But people in this country who are always, for some excuse, seeking to bring a suit for damages against railroad companies have not yet been seized with a disease known in England as 'railroad spine.' The malady is not a very common one, though, even in that country, but it has been a very costly one to railroads there, as far as it has gone. This disease was discovered by a prominent London physician, who was a few years ago a passenger on a railroad train somewhere in England; and the car he was in jumped the track and jolted roughly along on the sleepers for a long distance before the train was stopped. The physician found, a few days afterward that his spine wasn't acting exactly right, and finally it became so obstreperous as to not act at all. He became unable to attend to the calls of his profession, which, when he brought suit against the railroad company for damages, claiming that the jolting of the derailed car had disabled him, he swore yielded him $200,000 a year. The suit resulted in a judgment in favor of the physician for $250,000, the largest amount ever recovered from a railroad for personal damage. The affliction which had befallen the London physician became known as 'railroad spine,' and I know of at least three subsequent cases of it in England which have resulted in judgments against railroads in amounts varying from $50,000 to $100,000."—New York Sun.

Loaning Passes.

Roads doing business out of Denver east have been in the habit of late of issuing annual passes to passenger conductors on the mountain roads, the object being to create in this way a passenger agent on every train. Some of the men receiving such transportation had never had the honor of holding an annual pass before and some will not be troubled with one again soon.

The abuse of such transportation is not only dishonest, but it is a direct insult to the passenger departments of the roads issuing it. A prominent O. R. C. man running on one of the Colorado roads informed the writer a few days ago, that many of the conductors had "loaned" their annuals to friends who were going east.

We regret to publish things so disgraceful about railway employes, but our acquaintance with our informant leaves no room for us to doubt the truth of this statement. The passenger agents who issued these passes were only making an honest effort to get all the business they could, and it was an act which ought to be condemned by all honorable men for conductors to allow their passes to go out of their hands. There will not be so many annuals issued in 1891 as there was in 1890.—Western Railway News.

We sincerely hope that every such loaned pass will be detected and the pass taken up.

Today.

Oh, life it is sad and strange,
And love it is deaf and blind,
And the shapes of sorrow and change
Are always pressing behind!
If the tender impulse stay,
It is nipped by the frost of fate,—
So make haste to be kind today,
For tomorrow may be too late!

The eyes that crave for our smile,
Or ears for our kindly word,
May be closed in a little while,
And our loudest cries unheard,
Time mocks at our cold delay,
Death waits not, though we wait;
So make haste to be kind today,
Tomorrow may be too late!

A "Bluff" that Didn't "Go."

A "trampish-looking" man was walking along a lonely road when his attention was arrested by the sounds indicative of human distress. Walking on a little farther and looking about cautiously, he saw an old fellow kneeling behind a tree close to a deep bayou. The old fellow was praying. "Lord," he supplicated, "Thou knowest that I have fought against this day—knowest that I have struggled to beseech Thee not to hold my soul accountable for something that my body is compelled to commit. I see no other course than to take the life which Thou has given unto me. I am going to cast myself into this water; and when they find my lifeless body, they will regret the cruel wrongs they have heaped upon me. They will not give me work, neither will they give me food. They know that I am starving, but not a 5-cent piece will they give me out of their hoarded wealth. So, Lord, I trust that You will not send my poor soul to torment for something I could not help. I—"

"Say, there!" called the traveler. The old fellow got up and began to look about him. "Did some one call me?" he asked. "Yes, I did," said the traveler, advancing.

"And what do you want with me?"

"I heard you praying, and I want to ask you what's the matter."

The old fellow took off his hat, glanced upward, and then placing one hand on the traveler's shoulder said, "I am doomed."

"Why so?"

"I am starving and I have decided to kill myself."

"Oh, I wouldn't do that."

"Yes, I am determined to make way with myself."

"Having trouble?"

"Trouble! Why, man, I am starving. Oh, if I had only a dollar, I would not commit this awful act."

"Yes, a dollar sometimes does a man a monstrous sight of good."

"Then give me a dollar and I will not kill myself."

"I haven't a dollar, so you had better go ahead. Were you going to jump into the water!"

"Yes."

"Well, go ahead."

"I will, presently."

"No, go ahead now."

"What, do you want to see me die?"

"Well, rather. You promised the Lord that you were going to commit suicide, and I don't intend that you shall disappoint Him. Jump in."

"Oh, you surely would not compel me to do so rash a thing."

"Now, see here, old man, I understand you. You work the highway with this little game, and no doubt make a pretty good living. I haven't eaten anything but a hand-out for three days, and now, unless you give me a dollar, hanged if I don't throw you into the bayou and see that you do drown. Hear me?"

"I tell you that I have no dollar—that I am suffering for money this instant."

"All right, in you go."

"Hold on. I might get you a dollar if you will give me a chance."

"I am giving you a chance. Hand out the dollar."

"Let me go down the road a piece and perhaps I can borrow it."

"Oh, no, I never do business on borrowed capital. All my transactions must be on a solid basis. Going to hand out that dollar, or shall I throw you in?"

"If I only had a little time to reflect."

"You've had plenty of time."

"Think of my children."

"You ought of thought of them when you were telling the Lord that you were going to drown yourself."

"The Lord knew that I didn't mean to kill myself."

"Then you acknowledge that you are a fraud?"

"Sorter."

"That you make your living by pretending that you are going to kill yourself."

"Yes."

"All right. I think I'll be doing the traveling public a great service by drowning you. Now, if you want to pray, without any flirtation business, go ahead."

"Look here, I believe I have got just one dollar."

"Well, hand it out."

The old fellow gave up a dollar, and the "trampish-looking" man strode away, whistling a sweet tune of contentment.—Arkansaw Traveler.

In the Matter of the O. R. C.

In discussing subjects of interest to the different organizations of railroad men, the Federationist wishes to be distinctly understood as being governed "with malice toward none and charity for all." And with this understanding and in this connection we wish to say a few words to the organization known as the Order of Railway Conductors: It is, raining gentlemen, you had better come in out of the water or you may get wet. There will come a time, and not far in the future, when you will see the facts as they now exist although you now see as through a glass—darkly. In the past year the Order of Railway Conductors has been re-organized by a few men for personal gain, and the men who compose the rank and file of the organization are being blindly used as tools for the personal gain of the few chiefly concerned in the manipulation. These may be hard words but they bear the merit of truth. The Brotherhood of Railroad Conductors is a Brotherhood in all respects which the name implies; protective, benevolent and conservative. Manly enough to protect themselves from imposition, and conservative enough to command the respect of even its enemies, it is the coming order of railway conductors of the country, and our friends of the O. R. C. lack a proper appreciation of the benefits of organization if they do not desert the sinking ship which might have been saved by a competent commanding officer, and come into its safe harbor. We know that the O. R. C. is receiving many words of commendation for its "manly stand," its "protection of the rights of the company," its "loyalty to employes," etc., etc., but it is noteworthy that these honeyed words come from the very parties who expect to reap a benefit from said

"protection" and "loyalty," and we are very sorry to say that they number among them one very high in the counsels of the O. R. C. If the O. R. C. knew the treacherous nature of the ground upon which they stand to-day, Calvin S. Wheaton would not be able to repel the attacks of a setting hen to-morrow—so far as organization according to his ideas are concerned.—The American Federationist.

Three years ago the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers would hardly listen to any proposition to federate with other organizations. Two years ago the cause had very few followers at the Richmond convention. A year later the question was brought before the National Convention in this city and came very near being adopted. Some knowledge of the working of federation under the Supreme Council had been had, and all the Western men were in favor of it, but the Eastern element proved too strong for them. For three years the cause of federation had been gaining friends among the engineers, but the action of the delegates at the convention this year proved that the cause had lost many of its friends.

There must be some reason for this. We believe that jealousy between the grand officers of the B. of L. E. and the members of the Supreme Council had something to do with it; but we believe we can give a better reason for the engineers refusing to federate. Just this: The engineers don't want to be forced into a fight every two weeks, which may be brought about by such labor leaders as Lee, who caused so much grief on the New York Central recently.

Many of the engineers claim also that the action of the switchmen in going out on a strike without consulting anyone would be greatly detrimental to the interest of the brotherhood. We are not losing faith in federation, but we can scarcely blame the engineers for refusing to federate with organizations which would only increase their troubles. What we would recommend is a federation of trainmen and enginemen, and stop at that.

All organizations, members of the federation, governed by what is known as the Supreme Council, should be made to live up to the laws of the organization. This will inspire confidence and encourage other organizations to join the federation.—Western Railway News.

Judge Not.

Judge not; the workings of his brain
 And of his heart thou canst not see;
 What looks to thy dim eyes a stain,
 In God's pure light may only be
 A scar, brought from some well-won field,
 Where thou wouldst only faint and yield,

The look, the air, that frets thy sight,
 May be a token, that below
 The soul has closed in deadly fight
 With some infernal fiery foe,
 Whose glance would scorch thy smiling grace,
 And cast thee shuddering on thy face!

The fall thou darest to despise—
 May be the angel's slackened hand
 Has suffered it, that he may rise
 And take a firmer, surer stand;
 Or, trusting less to earthly things,
 May henceforth learn to use his wings.

And judge none lost; but wait and see,
 With hopeful pity, not disdain;
 The depth of the abyss may be
 The measure of the height of pain
 And love and glory that may raise
 This soul to God in after days!

A Race with Idaho Robbers.

JOAQUIN MILLER RELATES AN EXPERIENCE OF HIS YOUTH.

I was lying ice-bound at Lewiston, Idaho. Men wanted to send money below to their friends or families; merchants, anticipating the tremendous rush, must get letters through the snow to Walla Walla. Would I go? Could I go?

The snow was deep. The trails, over open and monotonous mountains, were drifted full. Could any living man face the drifting snow and find his way to Walla Walla? At first the merchants had tried to hire Indians to undertake the trip and deliver their letters. Not one could be found to go. When the storm abated a little, the men who kept the ferry across the Shoshonee River scraped off the snow, and cutting down the upheaved blocks of ice made it possible to cross with a horse.

At first I meant to carry only letters. But having finally consented to take a little gold for one merchant, I soon found I should lose friends if I did not take gold for others. The result was that I had to take gold worth nearly ten thousand dollars.

A few muffled-up friends came down to the river bank to see me off. It was a great event. For two weeks we had not had a line from the outer world. And meantime the civil war was raging in all its terrible fury. As I set out that bleak and icy morning, after I had mounted my plunging pony I saw in the crowd several faces that I did not like. There was Dave English, who was hung on that spot with several of his followers, not forty days later; there was Boone Helm, hung in Montana; Cherokee Bob, killed in Millersburgh; and also Canada Joe. This last lived with some low Indians a little way down the river. So when he rode ahead of me I was rather glad than otherwise; for I felt that he would not go far. I kept watch of him, however. And when I saw that he skulked under the hill, as if he were going home, and then finally got back into the trail, I knew there was trouble ahead.

But the "Rubicon" was now behind. My impetuous horse was plunging in the snow and I was soon tearing through the storm up the hill. Once fairly on my way I looked back below. Dave English and Boone Helm were bidding good-bye to two mounted cow-boys at the ferry-house. Ten minutes later, as I looked back through the blinding snow, I saw that these two desperate fellows were following me.

True, there was nothing criminal in that. The two highwaymen had a right to ride behind me if they wished. And Canada Joe had just as good a right to ride ahead of me. But to be on a horse deep in the blinding snow and loaded down with gold was bad enough. To have a desperado blocking the narrow trail before you with his two friends behind you was fearful!

I had two six-shooters close at hand under the bearskin flap of my saddle-bag where the gold was. I kept my left hand in my pocket where lay a small six-shooter warm and ready. Once, as the drifting and blinding snow broke away up the mountain, I saw Canada Joe with his head bent down in the storm still pushing on ahead of me at a safe distance. A few moments after, as I crossed and climbed the farther bank of an ugly cañon, the two robbers came close enough to hail me. One of them held up a bottle. They evidently intended to overtake me if they could, and profess to be friendly. This I must not allow. I urged my ambitious horse to his best. But, to my dismay, as I hastened up a narrow pass I found that I was not far behind Canada Joe. This low-browed black fellow was reported to be the worst man in all that country. And that was saying he was bad, indeed.

I was in a tight place now, and had to think fast. My first plan was to ride forward and face this man before the others came up. But I was really afraid of him. It seemed a much easier task to turn and kill the two rear men and get back to town. But, no! No! All this was abandoned almost as soon as thought of. In those days, even the most desperate had certain rights which their surviving friends would enforce.

I was now but a few hundred yards behind Canada Joe. So far as I could find out, the robbers were closing in on me. But we had ridden over the roughest part of the road and were within a few miles of high plateau, so that the wind was tearing past in a gale, and the drifting snow almost blinded me.

Suddenly I had a new thought. Why not take to the left, gain the plateau by a new route, and let these bloodthirsty robbers close their net without having me inside? I rose in my saddle with excitement at the idea, and striking spurs to my brave horse, I was soon climbing up the gradual slope at a gallop. Ah! but I was glad! Gallop! gallop! gallop. I seemed to hear many horses! Turning my head suddenly over my shoulder, I saw my two pursuers not a hundred yards behind me. They shouted! I was now on the high plateau and the snow was not so deep. Gallop! gallop! gallop! Canada Joe—thank Heaven!—was away to the right, and fast falling behind. Gallop! gallop! gallop! I was gaining on the robbers and they knew it. Fainter and fainter came their curses and their shouts.

And then: Whiz! Crack! Thud!

I looked back and saw that they both had thrown themselves from their saddles and were taking deliberate aim.

But to no purpose. Not one shot touched me or my horse, and I reached the first station and finally, rode into Walla Walla, with my precious burden, safe and sound.

A Perpetual Fire.

In the Peninsula of Abeheron, in the Province of Schirwan, formerly belonging to Persia, but now a part of Russia, there is found a perpetual, or, what the natives call, an eternal fire, which is known to have been burning 2,000 years. It rises with a constant flame from an irregular orifice of about 12 feet in depth and 120 feet in width. The flame rises to a height of six or eight feet, unattended with smoke or disagreeable smell, waving back and forth with the wind, like a field of golden grain.—St. Louis Republic.

B. of R. T. Convention.

ADDRESS OF S. E. WILKINSON.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:—

It gives us a great deal of pleasure to-night to have the opportunity of meeting in this land that is noted for its sunshine, its flowers, its beautiful women and the genial warmth of friendship that is extended by the true Californian. He is known by his appearance and by the genial and cordial manner in which he clasps your hand. While we have traveled a long distance to be here, it is that we may show you by our appearance and deportment that we belong to an organization of progress, an organization that is doing a good work for the benefit of the railway trainmen of this country, but I will detain you but a short time with its history, because it represents only seven short years. This is the first convention held under the auspices of the Railroad Trainmen. The organization was formerly known as the Railroad Brakemen, but we believed in our council of a year ago that we had perhaps outgrown that name, as we had by diligent labor been able to raise some of the brakemen to higher positions, that of conductor and a great many other positions having been given him through the influence, as we believe, of our organization. While in its beginning it numbered only eight men, in its existence it has numbered some 25,000, and a great amount of good has been done. We call your attention to the fact that in a short period of time one and one-half millions of dollars have been given to the widows and orphans of the maimed and deceased railroad men of this country. When we take into consideration the fact that our sister organization in its twenty-four years has only been able to pay its beneficiaries a little over three million. I don't believe we need have shame mantle our cheek for the great work done in the name of charity.

It is not necessary for me to tell you that the life of a railroad man, especially of a brakeman, is a specially hazardous one, because those of you interested enough to read the news given you day after day, already know of this fact. But you don't see any broad headlines of a terrible accident where only a brakeman or two were killed, but you will find it away down on the margin of the paper, only another brakeman added to the list, but let a passenger on a railway train meet with accident or death, and there are great headlines on the face of the paper, telling you of the accident that befell him. We are entitled to a great deal more recognition than we have received in the past. Week by week and year by year we are gaining it. We are attempting, as your Mayor said to you to-night, to educate the brakemen that they may fill other positions which they are competent and qualified to fill if opportunity offers. Perhaps within the reach of my voice a brakeman sits who is liable, if diligent and faithful, soon to be advanced to a General Manager. Our hopes are bright and our aspirations very high. You have heard a great deal about labor organizations. About officers that are identified with railroad organizations. Dynamiters they are sometimes called, and I would like to have you glance upon this platform and you can see the representatives of the railway train men, and to ask you to pass judgment. Do they look like a lot of men who came here for the purpose of desecrating your beautiful city? It has been said on a good many occasions that all we had to do was to draw our salaries, order strikes and smoke good cigars. But there never yet has been credited one strike to the great Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and we hope that there never will be, and we want to say to-night that there never will be if the General Managers will only come half way, and will open the door and give us an opportunity to get on the inside.

While our organization sets entirely aside questions of politics and religion, we have every reason to believe that the railroad men of this country have commenced to realize that it is necessary to take a little bit of a part in politics, and to vote for the right kind of a man. Why? We believe our lives are just as good and just as valuable as those of other American citizens, and we want to vote for men that will make laws to protect us and our families. We want a law that can be made universal in this country, that will not cause 20,000 cripples to be made every year and 2,500 brave men to be laid away in the cold, silent grave, by death-traps used by railway corporations. We appeal to the citizens of Los Angeles, and the great state of California, with our hearts and our hands, to call upon your legislature to pass a law in this state that will make it a crime to kill a railroad man, even though done by his co-employé.

You have heard a great deal about railroad brakemen. It often used to be said that all that it took was a suit of clothes and a great big drink of whisky to make a good brakeman. We don't have to be fired with any of that kind of ardor any more. Those days are gone, and to-day we are using our influence to shut up the rum shop by not patronizing it.

I want to take into consideration one or two things of a great deal of interest to the railroad men, and to all men in this country. One of the greatest objects of railroad men at the present time has been to come a little closer together. They have been identified with one another, and their closer relationship to-day has been brought about by something called federation. It is composed of one fireman, one brakeman, one conductor, and last but not least, one switchman. They have all been taken up until we have an organization that is known as the Federation. You have heard a great deal of talk about how, when these railroad men got Federation, why all they will have to do will be to go into the office and say to the General Manager, "You can have the title but we will run your road." That we are going to have things our own way, and not give anybody else even a chance. That has been very much misrepresented. I want to tell you that Federation means, if lived up to, that there will never be another railroad strike in America. It would not be necessary. Why? Simply because we are going to pass judgment upon these matters, and we are not going to allow any particular branch to ask what they are not entitled to, and all we want is an opportunity to live; a fair day's pay and a fair day's work; an opportunity to serve God, and to vote for the man who will look after and protect the widow and orphan if one of us should be taken off while performing our duty. How many of you have realized what it was to be a brakeman, an engineer or a fireman.

If you will take the statistics that were produced from 1860 to 1865, as you look over them at home, it is appalling to recognize the number of valuable lives that were lost on the battlefield to save the flag, but I want to tell you that you do not get an opportunity to get the statistics in regard to railroad fatalities. They have been kept from your gaze. When you are wrapt in slumber at home we have got to strain every nerve, and be ready for duty. We cannot afford to make any mistake, because your friend is intrusted to our care, your wives and your children, and if we make mistakes it is going to result fatally to them. There is not in the United States or the world to-day another class of people who are as great benefactors to the people of America as the railroad men of the United States. They toil harder and toil longer, and it is only within the last two or three years that they did not receive a smaller compensation than any other class of people, but we thank God that the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen has brought us strength to that we are satisfied in this section of the country.

You have heard a great deal said about capital antagonizing labor organizations. I want to be one representative to the great State of California to say to you all that that capital is not the greatest danger; that one of the greatest dangers does not emanate from capital, it emanates from the inside workings of the organizations themselves. Ambition to elevate; ambition that the human race seems impregnated with, to raise themselves up a little bit higher, no difference at what expense to any one else. It is an undeniable fact that all organizations suffer alike. I want to say to you that it is ourselves that are our own worst enemies and I hope that when we have convened in the city of Los Angeles that we may be able to meet upon the one common platform, as Brotherhood men, not only in word but in deed and action, and to make such laws as will benefit our Brotherhood, ourselves as individuals and our families.

A year ago, on the platform in the City of St. Paul, stood one of the brightest lights that the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen ever knew. To-night he sleeps out under the starlight in his grave; the first officer that has ever stepped down and out that has ever been identified with this organization, and when we started upon this trip there were many of us that expected to shake him by the hand, but we will never have another opportunity. Others have gone over the same road, and we must all pass away, but I believe that that testimonial to his remembrance is due from the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, because a great deal of its power and a great deal of its success belongs to him, and while we offer sympathy to his bereaved household we also offer sympathy to all the vacant chairs, and to all those who have spent the best part of their lives in the service and are now maimed and crippled.

Benevolence to world; because a railroad man would give anybody his last dollar; if he had it he would spare it: Sobriety at all times: Industry, because it is a matter of necessity. Unless you have a great deal of wit you have got to work. I thank you all for your kind consideration in listening to me. I want to say in conclusion that you will to-night hear a great deal that will be worth your consideration. Advice: take it, heed it, and accept, and may you all live and act while in this beautiful city that we can leave here and be kindly remembered, and should it be our good lot to come back to Los Angeles, that these people can extend the right hand of fellowship and welcome us all.

ADDRESS OF JUDGE J. G. M'GUIRE.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen—

I regret exceedingly that our distinguished and eloquent Lieutenant Governor could not be here tonight to extend to you a welcome on behalf of the State of California such as I know would come from his heart, if he were here. But it affords me a great deal of pleasure, speaking for the state, and especially for northern California, in his place, to join most heartily in the welcome extended to you by Mayor Hazard, of Los Angeles. The hopes and aspirations of our country, the destinies of our civilization, are wrapt up in the great labor movement of modern times. There is throughout the civilized world a great labor problem, a problem that must be solved before civilization can have peace and proceed in her natural course of progress. It must be solved upon the lines and principles of absolute, eternal justice, and I understand the labor organizations demand nothing more than justice, and never have demanded more. That labor is suffering wrongs which ought to be righted; that there is a foundation for nearly every claim made by labor organizations, and the denial of which causes laborers of various classes to band together for the assertion of their rights and defense of their cause, can not be denied. Labor produces the wealth of the world, and it produces the wealth of the world from the God given raw materials which come freely from the common Creator of mankind, to all men, for the satisfaction of their wants by labor and the supplying of their necessities. Primarily and of natural right, it would seem that labor is entitled to all the wealth which it produces. We have a condition of affairs by which, while the wealth of the world is produced by labor, for the creative plan knows no other means of producing wealth, yet the laborer gets but a small proportion of the wealth he produces, and in the absence of organization to protect and defend their rights, we know, and history proves that the share of the wealth produced which went to the laborer was getting regularly smaller and smaller as civilization progressed and as the wealth producing power of labor increased.

I shall not dwell upon these subjects, but confine myself to a few suggestions and give way to other speakers who follow me. I wish to say, that I believe that every demand made by labor is pretty nearly right. My reason is this: The greatest statistician that America has ever produced, the man now charged with collecting and procuring statistics upon the labor question throughout the union, a faithful and efficient officer according to my judgment, tells us that within the last forty years the wealth producing power of labor has been increased eleven fold, on an average, in all departments of labor, by the invention of labor machinery, and the increased intelligence of labor. On an average then, throughout the entire union, a man will produce as much wealth to-day with the aid of modern appliances and modern intelligent direction as eleven men could have produced forty years ago. Who gets the benefit? Where does it go? Has the condition of labor throughout the union been improved eleven fold, by reason of this improved power of wealth production? No; and until it has, labor has not secured its rights.

You are here, as I understand, to exchange thoughts and to legislate, so far as a civil and unofficial organization can legislate, upon the great questions of labor.

To consult and legislate upon the relation between capital and labor. I need not urge you to be moderate; not to take the first impression as conclusive, but to look behind the relations which appear to you when first glancing at the question of the relation between labor and capital. There are some capitalists that are oppressive. They are tyrants to be hated for their individual tyranny or oppression of their fellow men, and for their making property more to be respected than human life, but you must not deal with all capitalists according to the measure of justice that should be meted out to the individual tyrants and oppressors. Remember another consideration, too, that capitalists are victims of their environments, as you are victims of environments that are pressing you down. Bear in mind, that behind the capitalist, the true capitalist, I mean, there are other conditions that are largely forcing him to do what he would rather not do in dealing with you and in pressing you down. Treat him as a wronged and misguided brother, but none the less demand your rights and insist upon having them. Treat him as an enemy per se, but as a victim with yourself, living unfraternally to secure better conditions at your expense, whereas he should in brotherly affection come together with you to reason over conditions that are alike detrimental to him and to you. Call him into consultation and ask him to sit down and reason together over the situation. I was pleased to hear from the Grand Master of your Brotherhood the suggestion, that this organization is not favorable to strikes, except as a last and ultimate resort, and that as last resort, the immutable natural right of self defense may justly assert itself in strikes or in any form that may be necessary to preserve lives, or rights that are as sacred as lives. California looks upon you as earnest, zealous, temperate advocates of the cause and rights of labor, and every true hearted and true minded man within the borders of the state, hails your assemblage and welcomes you, and gladly will we watch your deliberations, in the earnest hope that they may be wise, and that their fruits may be great in establishing the natural, absolute and eternal justice, upon which this great labor question must finally be settled, and bidding you God-speed in the great work you have undertaken, let me say to you "Onward and upward," "Goodness is alone eternal; evil was not made to last."

Very Absent-Minded.

One of the most amusing cases of absent-mindedness on record, is that told on a certain famous professor of one of the northern colleges. He was one day in a book store, deeply absorbed in finding a work to prove some question in dispute. The store was well filled with customers, and as the professor started to leave, he stopped to shake hands with a few friends. Last of all he extended his hand to a sweet-faced lady near the counter, saying: "Good morning, madam. Your face looks very familiar but I am unable to recall your name." Absorbed in thought, he passed out, without waiting the lady's reply. She was his wife.

Cork oaks have been transplanted to California, where their raising promises to become an important industry. They produce there a cork of excellent quality. At present, however, practically all the cork used in America is imported from the Old World, where there are about three million and a half acres of cork oak forests producing profitable crops.

It has cost about $2,000,000 up to the present time, and twenty lives have been lost in the work upon it—all on that memorable day in July, 1880, when the shaft plates gave way and flooded the tunnel.

WHICH IS WHICH?

BY ELLA RODMAN.

A very cheerful-looking upper room was pleasantly littered with all manner of pretty things pertaining to a lady's wardrobe; and two young girls, who were engaged in a valuable discussion of the various articles, harmonized very agreeably with the beauty around them. There were "loves of organdies" spread out on the bed, delicate lilac, and rose, and blue; "perfect" silks hanging over chair-backs, and a simple, but exquisitely beautiful bridal dress arranged in state by itself. Then there were mysterious-looking boxes, and parcels, and things for which it would be difficult to find a name, making the room look as though a dry-goods store had been suddenly emptied into it.

"There certainly is something very exhilarating in a quantity of new things all at once!" exclaimed one of the young girls, as she gazed admiringly upon the attractive paraphernalia. "It is almost enough, of itself, to induce one to get married. But after all, Jessie," looking around critically, "while all that you have is very pretty, and in perfect taste, there is nothing costly or elegant—I do not quite understand it."

The fair bride-elect blushed, as though suspected of a misdemeanor, while she replied quickly, "You know, Emma, that papa is not rich, and Herbert is quite a poor young clergyman."

"Yes, I know all that," said the damsel, decidedly; "but I also know that Uncle Bridges, who is rich, gave you a check for a thousand dollars, 'to be spent in bridal foolery' as he complimentarily termed it. Now, in looking upon your purchases, unexceptionable as they are, I see nothing like value received for the sum in question; and I ask what has become of the thousand dollars—or, at least, of five hundred of it?"

Jessie's pretty face was in such an evident state of confusion, that her cousin suddenly exclaimed, "I see land ahead, I do believe! Jessie Ingleson, you've given the missing five hundred to that imaginary little church that Herbert is so frantic to have erected in the coal regions! You needn't deny it. I don't consider that the French Empress' appropriation of her diamond necklace for a school, or something, was anything compared to this—for diamond necklaces were comparative every-day affairs with her; but five hundred dollars is a sort of meteor that will scarcely cross your path once in a century!"

Jessie murmured softly, "'Neither will I offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing.' Please do not say any more about it, Emma; Herbert approves of what I have done, and that is sufficient for me."

"Of course," returned Emma, mischievously, "thine handmaid only desireth to do what seemeth pleasing in the eyes of my lord. But really, Jessie, I think I must reconsider my hasty promise to make you an early visit at the rectory; for I have an unpleasant vision before me of sitting down at the dinner-table, fearfully hungry, in full view of my favorite chicken-pie, all impatience and expectation, when suddenly his reverence, for whom we have waited, makes his appearance from outside, saying, in a matter-of-course tone, as he seizes the chicken-pie, 'My love, there is a poor woman at the door, with a drunken husband and six small children, who says she has not tasted chicken-pie for a month! I am sure that, after that, you and Emma will cheerfully dine off the cold meat. I will likewise take the sweet potatoes, my love,' (another pet vice of mine,) 'as we shall find bread a very good substitute. When we give, let it be of our best.' Now, I can't help being hungry," continued the lady, piteously, and when I am hungry, I am cross; so I am afraid I should be very uncomfortable, and make every one else uncomfortable among such good people."

"I declare, Emma, you are really too bad!" said Jessie, laughing in spite of herself at her cousin's comical expression while delivering this tirade; "and I have a great mind to punish you by not allowing you to come to the rectory at all.

But here," she continued, as a servant entered with a large bandbox, "is something to divert your thoughts from your anticipated troubles."

Two exquisite bonnets of white crape, trimmed with lilies of the valley, and made exactly alike, soon sent the mercurial Emma into ecstasies of admiration.

"One for each of us, dear," said Jessie, with an affectionate kiss.

"You should not have done this," was the reply, "especially after the deficiency in your accounts; there, don't look so reproachfully at me, I promise not to mention the subject of accounts again. But do you know, you little idiot! that bridesmaids don't wear bonnets exactly like the bride? How, in the world, are people to know which is which? You must let me take out these lovely lilies, that look so pure and modest, and put in a staring pink rose, in order to notify a credulous, trusting public that I am not Mrs. Herbert Wylie."

"No, no!" exclaimed Jessie, eagerly, "promise me that you won't, Emma! You don't know," said the poor little bride, trembling all over, "how dreadful that first Sunday in our own parish seems to me. I fancy myself walking up the broad aisle with Herbert, and every one pointing and looking at me, as they whisper, 'There's the bride!' 'That is the rector's wife!' 'What do you think of her?' I know that my face will be the color of a beet, and I shall not know what I am doing. You must promise to be with me on that first Sunday, like a dear, good girl, and wear the bonnet like mine."

The "amethyst eyes," as her lover called them, were looking most beseechingly into Emma's dark orbs, who exclaimed in delight:

"What a head it is for plotting, to be sure! under those innocent-looking waves of auburn hair. Yes, my dear, I will enter, heart and hand, into your diabolical scheme; and I do devoutly hope that, as no one could possibly take us for twinsisters, there will ensue a most delightful state of confusion."

Jessie looked rather alarmed. "Do you think it would be wrong?" she asked, timidly.

Her cousin immediately assumed a solemn expression of countenance. "I always had a great admiration," said she, "for that woman who, being reduced to selling crumpets for a living, added to herself, after calling out her wares, 'I hope to goodness no one hears me!' Now, if you feel at all uneasy respecting the deception of your admirably-arranged plan, you can pin a slip of paper on your bonnet with the words, 'I am the bride—but please don't see this.'"

Jessie's pretty under lip had something of a pout, as she exclaimed, "I really th it is very unkind, of you to tease me so; when I am going away, too!"

The wedding was over, and the wedding-trip which had occupied a blissful month, spent in lounging through quaint, Canadian cities, and dreaming on the beautiful waters of the St. Lawrence; and Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Wylie, with Mr. Allen Wylie, and Miss Emma Raybold—the brother of the groom and cousin of the bride—arrived at the rectory on Saturday evening.

Poor little Jessie dreaded the Sunday ordeal so intensely, that her mischievous cousin was quite moved in her behalf; and when service-time arrived, Mrs. Wylie appeared in her gray traveling dress and straw bonnet, trimmed with blue, and took her brother-in-law's arm, while Miss Raybold looked very lovely and bride-like, in the bonnet with lilies of the valley, and a white barege dress, with a mantle of the same, and coolly took possession of her new cousin.

Now, the Rev. Herbert had gone into such lover-like ecstasies over the becomingness of Jessie's traveling costume, that he innocently supposed she wore it this morning to pay him a particular compliment; he was also ignorant that it was not the custom for unmarried girls to attire themselves in bridal white. Thinking, too, that Jessie was particularly kind to Allen as his brother, she became more lovely than ever in his eyes; and the unsuspecting man walked blindly into the snare that these two artful girls had prepared for him.

A bright color glowed in Miss Raybold's cheek, and an enthusiastic young man declared that "she was a vision of beauty," as the party advanced to the rector's pew; but a mischievous light sparkled in the downcast eyes, as she found herself the object of curious, inquiring stares, that speedily assumed an admiring character. She knew that she was pretty, although by no means unpleasantly conscious of it; and this enabled her to bear with equanimity the wrapt gaze of a young man in the adjoining pew. She rather wished that he had not gazed at her quite so frequently, however; for, in the one glance he had directed that way, she saw enough to impel her to look again—but that was impossible when she was certain of meeting his eyes. He was first her beau-ideal—outwardly, at least; tall, fair, and aristocratic-looking—and Miss Emma was by no means as attentive to the service as she should have been.

Mr. Wylie was comparatively a stranger in the parish, having been there but six months; and all his doings, therefore, were still a subject of interest. People were unanimous in their praises of the bride; and not a few young gentlemen sighed that so fair a being should be appropriated. Some admired the sweet face of the quiet-looking little cousin; but it was generally agreed that she was a very pale star beside the moon-like bride.

As they returned to the rectory, Mr. Wylie, who had seemed to be looking for some one, observed: "I am quite disappointed that Frank Beechcroft did not come up to us after service, as I supposed he would have done. I wished particularly to introduce him to you, Jessie, for he is my pet parishioner, and has been of great assistance to me. He is a very gentlemanly, intelligent fellow, too. What is the matter, Emma?"

The damsel had heaved a deep sigh. "I don't know," she replied, "unless I am in love. Who is that nice-looking gentleman who sat on my right, and was so very devout and attentive?"

"The very friend of whom I was speaking!" exclaimed Mr. Wylie, with his face in a glow of enthusiasm. "I look upon Frank Beechcroft as a model man; he is superintendent of the Sunday-School; is devoted to the poor and sick in an unostentatious way; and yet he is the very incarnation of fun and frolic wherever circumstances warrant an outburst. We must have him at the rectory, Jessie, and let Emma give him some of her delicious music."

Allen Wylie was only a college-boy, rather at a loss what to do with himself, or his brother's fair guest, and far more disposed to devote himself to Jessie than to the bright and formidable Emma. The latter laughingly declared that he was too hopelessly "veal" for her to have any patience with him—and they seemed to enter into a tacit agreement to let each other alone.

The bride was not long without callers; each one of whom was apparently more astonished than the last to find that the bride was not the bride at all, but only her cousin. This ordeal was bad enough, to be sure; but Jessie felt intensely grateful that she had been spared that first Sunday appearance, for, by next Sunday, all wonder would have died out. The feminine portion of the community were now fully acquainted with the identity of Mrs. Wylie, as were also certain young gentlemen, who could scarcely conceal their joy at the discovery that the fascinating Emma was not forbidden fruit.

But Frank Beechcroft had no sisters to enlighten him, for his home was in a distant city; and on the very day after the arrival of the party at the rectory, he most unaccountably took himself off there on a visit of a week's duration. The young clergyman was considerably puzzled and disappointed; he had quite looked forward to displaying his prize to Frank, and he was the very one of all others who seemed to avoid them.

But the rectory became so transformed by the two bright presences that seemed to fill every nook and corner of it, that the master found himself afloat in such a sea of happiness, as left him very little opportunity to trouble himself about secondary matters. Even Jessie displayed quite an elfish and mischievous propensity, incited and abetted by Emma; and with Allen's contributions from his college stores, the inmates of the rectory conducted themselves in such a manner as rather to astonish the head of the house, and gave people generally the idea that they were "having a good time."

The rectory was a very pretty picturesque-looking place, with its vine-shaded verandah, that was very aptly designated the "summer-parlor." A young man passed slowly by, one evening, looking lingeringly through an opening in the vines, where a bewitching vision in a white dress and scarlet shawl, that contrasted brightly with the rich coils of dark hair, presented itself.

"Why, Frank!" called out Mr. Wylie, "is that you? Do come and show yourself!" and he rose to welcome the expected visitor.

But the gentleman, raising his hat respectfully to the ladies, passed quickly on, murmuring something about "business," and "great hurry!"

"I am very much afraid," said Mr. Wylie, solemnly, "that Frank is in love."

A sort of hysterical giggle proceeded from Emma's direction; but the next moment she was commenting very calmly on the stars.

The morning after, Mrs. Wylie was considerably surprised by the abrupt entrance of her cousin in a glow of excitement, and looking her very loveliest. The jaunty little hat, with its rose-colored feathers, was a most becoming contrast to the dancing eyes beneath; and the white dress, with rose-colored ribbons, was exactly like Emma, for she understood dressing herself to perfection.

"Such an adventure as I have had!" she exclaimed; "I feel so delightfully wicked!"

Then, throwing her hat on the sofa, she continued, "You must know, Jessie, that I rambled off by myself to explore that delightful piece of woods just opposite the orchard; and I was enjoying the cool, fresh greenness exceedingly, and feeling quite good and sentimental, when I heard an individual, like one of the brothers in 'Comus,' wandering near me, and repeating poetry to himself. I could not distinctly hear the words, but they referred to some 'she' of whom the speaker professed to know very little, but who had evidently made sad havoc with him generally. Animated by the spirit of mischief, and just to see what effect it would produce, I repeated the words: 'She only said, my life is dreary.' The effect was not at all what I anticipated, being nothing less than the sudden apparition of that very good-looking Mr. Beechcroft, who glared at me so wild that I believed I screamed, or did something foolish. You see I was reposing very comfortably on the grass, in an attitude that that rendered a speedy and graceful retreat out of the question; and I was, moreover, engaged in the infantile occupation of twining butter-cups into a wreath. Had I been a queen, he could not have approached me with more deference. 'Lady,' said he, in a most fascinating voice, 'do not be alarmed, I know too well what is due Mrs. Wylie to cause you any uneasiness.' I believe I sighed, (for the life of me I could not help it, Jessie,) and it all sounded so delightfully, like what you hear about French novels, (you know we were not permitted to read them,) where the heroes and heroines are always in love with other people's wives and husbands, that I quite held my breath in wonder as to what would come next. What did come next was, that the individual, after a prolonged gaze, (which I saw out of the tail of my eye) suddenly stooped, and kissed my lips in the most melancholy manner imaginable, and saying, as he did so, 'Farewell forever in this world!' seemed to vanish into thin air. I cannot imagine, I am sure, how he could suppose that a kiss was 'due Mrs. Wylie.'"

"Oh, Emma!" exclaimed her cousin, this is "really dreadful!"

"Isn't it?" continued the heroine, gayly. "Only fancy how Herbert will storm when he hears of this interview between Mrs. Wylie and Mr. Beechcroft!"

"Why did you not tell him at once that you are not Mrs. Wylie?" asked Jessie, rather indignantly. "It would save a great deal of trouble, besides putting at ease this man, who has evidently fallen in love with you."

"Because, dear," replied her cousin, demurely, "I do so love to be engaged in a little bit of romance; and I do not think that men who fall in love with people ever should be 'put at their ease'—it just spoils them. The unattainable is always most attractive, and should Mr. Beechcroft discover that there is only a plain, commonplace 'Miss' before my name, I am afraid his devotion would sink down to zero immediately. Only think of the fascinating enormity of his conduct; to lose his heart to the wife of the rector."

Jessie laughed a little at Emma's nonsense, but she did not feel quite easy on the subject. Allen came in just then to bid them good-by, as he was going back to college; and all conversation on the matter ceased.

The next day, at dinner, there was a very perceptible cloud on Mr. Wylie's face—he looked sad and troubled.

"Has anything occurred to disturb you, Herbert?" asked his wife anxiously.

"Yes," he replied, as though he scarcely knew how to begin it. "I had a very painful letter from Frank Beechcroft this morning, explaining his strange conduct, and informing me that he intends leaving the place at once. He is an upright, noble fellow, and I cannot blame him; but I would have given much if this had not occurred. He has told me everything."

Very much to his surprise, Jessie, who had turned crimson at the beginning of his speech, burst into tears, and suddenly left the table, while Emma sat there, pale and trembling, under a powerful effort to command herself.

"What does this mean?" asked her cousin anxiously. "Can it be possible that Jessie—"

A dreadful solution of his wife's distress rose to his mind, and almost maddened him; but, with a forced smile, Emma exclaimed:

"Don't be making mountains of mole-hills, Cousin Herbert; the whole affair, from beginning to end, is only a piece of girlish nonsense, as I will soon convince you. When I get through, you can give me a good shaking, if it will be any relief to you."

Mr. Wylie did not exactly administer the shaking; but he did administer rather a stern reproof, which Emma professed to laugh at; then, going in quest of Jessie, he found her such a wretched little bundle of tears and trembling, that he was obliged to take her in his arms, and soothe her with caresses and protestations of the most lover-like character.

His next performance was to seize Frank Beechcroft, just as he was packing his trunk with an air of the fiercest melancholy, and drag him, almost by the hair of his head, over to the rectory; where he was presented, in due form, to the wicked Emma, whose face burned painfully at the remembrance of that kiss; and then to the bona fide Mrs. Wylie, who looked so pretty in her confusion, that her husband thought it would have been an easy matter for the youth to commit himself as he thought he had done.

It took but a short time, after such a promising beginning, for Miss Raybold and Mr. Beechcroft to feel very well acquainted; and matters progressed so rapidly, that Mrs. Wylie was not at all surprised, when her mischievous cousin informed her, that she had given a promise to a certain individual to wear her bridal bonnet to church on the first Sunday after the ceremony that converted her into Mrs. Beechcroft.

Ladies, do you know that flour sprinkled on burning gasoline will soon extinguish the flame? I learned this from a friend who has tried it successfully.

Weariness.

BY ADA COBB, PENNINGTON, WIS.

(For the RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.)

I am weary, let me rest
 Underneath the budding clover,
 With my hands upon my breast,
 And the daisies bending over.
 Rest! the thought is wondrous sweet!
 Rest and peace, secure from sorrow
 And the tramp of busy feet,
 Rest that breaks not on the morrow.

I am weary, let me sleep
 With my hands upon my bosom,
 And I pray you let me keep
 In their grasp some little blossom;
 I have loved earth's flowers well,
 True is the friendship they have given;
 Will the flowers seem as fair,
 Blooming in the streets of heaven?

I am weary, let me rest,
 As a child with sorrow grieving
 Finds upon its mother's breast,
 Peace, in her great love believing,
 So to the green breast of the earth,
 Turned weary, tired and lonely,
 For the rest which I shall find
 Is on her gentle bosom only.

"Searching for Mamma."

The sorrowful songs have been sung, the tender prayers have been said, the last sad words have been uttered, all that love and sympathy and tenderness could suggest has been done for the wife and mother calmly resting in her satin-lined coffin under masses of beautiful flowers.

The mourners have gone out with aching hearts and tear-dimmed eyes. The hearse moves slowly away and the kindly neighbor women left in charge of the house go about softly putting things in order and speaking in an undertone, awed still by the majesty of death, although the one it has claimed has been carried forth. There is still that indefinable something in the deserted rooms that tells of the dread visitor.

Suddenly the door of an upper room opens and a sweet, childish voice says pleadingly:

"I want my mamma; I'm going to find my mamma."

"No, no, dear," says the nurse with a suggestion of tears in her voice, while she furtively wiped her eyes, "come with me, like a good girl."

"No, I want my mamma, I haven't seen my own mamma for two, free—oh, most four days. I'm going to find my mamma."

"But, baby dear, mamma isn't—she isn't—here."

"Where is my mamma, then? She is here, too. She's down in her own pitty room; I'm going to hunt for my mamma. Mamma! mamma! Baby wants you!"

In all this world of sadness and sorrow is there anything more sad, anything more pitiful, than the pleading, wondering cry of a little child, too simple to understand the mystery of death, and yet dimly comprehending that a change of some kind has taken place? Is there anything that touches the heart more deeply than to answer the pitiful, pleading questions: "Where is mamma?" "Why doesn't she come?" "She has gone away where?" "Won't she kiss me good-night any more?" "Can't I go up to Heaven and see her?"

The eyes of the little questioner open wide and there is a perplexed and dissatisfied look on her face, saying plainly that she does not understand what you mean by saying that "mamma is gone," that "God took her," that she is "up in Heaven now."

You try tearfully to make it plain to the child and to have her understand that she will see mamma again "sometime," but again the little voice says with pitiful petulency, "But I want my mamma now, and I'm going to hunt until I find her."

What a sorrowful, disappointing search it is! It ends in tears and heartaches, and it is long before even children understand that mamma will come no more to the little ones calling vainly for her. Everything is full of touches and suggestions of the mother who is gone. There are things that make her seem so real, so near. And so the baby goes hunting for mamma. May all such sorrowful little ones find their best mammas in the heavenly land!—Detroit Free Press.

The Little One's Rebuke.

There is a woman in this city whose wealth, position and goodness fill her life with social and charitable occupations. But for more than six months it has been impossible to procure her presence anywhere on Saturdays. She has told one or two intimate friends the reason:

"It was one day in the latter part of March that my little daughter, Constance, who is twelve years old, came into my room as I was hurriedly dressing to drive to a directors' meeting of one of the several charities in which I am interested. Her birthday had been the day before, and she had a game, one of her presents, in her hand.

"'Oh, mamma,' she cried, full of eagerness, 'this is the loveliest game; do try it with me.' Her request, in my haste and absorption, seemed in the highest degree trivial to me. 'Nonsense, Connie, you know I cannot,' I replied, rather sharply; 'this is board day at the hospital, and I am shockingly late now.'

"I was standing in front of the mirror, and I saw in the glass how her face fell and the light died out of it. 'I wish,' she said, wistfully, 'you would sometimes have a day with me, mamma.' The child's speech went through me like a knife. I had never received so stinging a rebuke. Was it possible that in the pursuit of other duties I was neglecting the one that should be chief? My drive to the hospital that morning was full of serious introspection, and Connie has had her Saturdays ever since."—New York Times.

The "happy medium" is always safest, in matters of dress as well as in other things. The fourreau style of dress, in moderation, is undoubtedly graceful and becoming, if the figure and carriage of the wearer be graceful; but the exaggerated glove-fitting skirts that follow so closely the outlines of the figure as to appear literally molded to the form, are becoming neither from an artistic nor modest point of view, and the inevitable reaction is, to an extent, already apparent. Not that clinging effects are by any means abandoned, but they are adopted with more discrimination: it is evident that the study of the figure in profile is becoming more general.

Princess effects are very popular, especially for dressy wear and for heavy, rich materials. A pointed basque-front over a petticoat with slight drapery, combined with a trained princess back, is a favorite model for ceremonious toilets, the train cut in rounded shape, no plaits at the side-form seams, but two and sometimes three breadths of a different material inserted at the middle seam of the back, laid in closely overlapped plaits at the top, fastened on the inside, and spreading out into a fan-shaped train. A stately effect is imparted by the high Medici collar, often of gold lace, wired into shape, jeweled on the outside and lined with ostrich-feathers, and tapering to a point in front, and the full, high sleeves, of the material used for the petticoat.

A favorite arrangement for dressy short or demi-trained dresses is a princess front, extending only to the front side-gore seam, with a round waist at the back to which the full breadths of the skirt are attached in gathers, or with the upper edge doubled and forming a standing frill on the waist. This model is liked for a combination of cloth and velvet, the princess front and the back of the waist of velvet, and the remainder of cloth.

An untrimmed waist, excepting in the most ultra of tailor-made costumes, is a rarity. Ready-made garnitures of braid and elaborate passementerie are expensive, but there are many pretty garnitures that the ingenious devotee of fashion can easily make at little expense. One of these is a plastron of heavy net embroidered with gold, silver, jet or steel beads, with a point reaching to the waist-line in front, and a shorter one at the back, and finished with a flaring collar, wired. To complete the set, there may be epaulets or deep-pointed cuffs. This will impart an air of distinction to any plain costume, and can be worn with different dresses. Square and pointed yokes, made of embroidered net, or of velvet seeded with jet, gold or steel beads, are also pretty additions to plain dresses.

The styles in removable collars and ruches are almost innumerable. Some for street wear are appropriately called "stocks," so high and stiff and unyielding are they, made of velvet, or cloth trimmed with velvet, with a plaited frill or narrow flaring collar at the top of a stiff standing collar, and a round or pointed collar at the lower edge, resting on the shoulders. Ruches made of a frill of doubled bias velvet, sometimes four inches wide, above and below a band of ostrich-feather trimming, tied in front with a bow of ribbon having ends reaching nearly to the foot of the skirt, are also worn with street costumes. These are in colors and black, black being admissible with a costume of any color.

Bows of black velvet ribbon, seeded with jet, are much used for garniture, on materials of all qualities, from gauze to cloth, placed wherever fancy may dictate. A large butter-fly bow at the foot of the skirt is considered very stylish.

The style of coiffure is distinctively different for house and street wear. For the street, the hair is almost universally worn in a twisted or braided knot, either just clearing the collar, or very low down if the lady be young. For house and evening wear, high coiffures are preferred for matrons, while young ladies most frequently wear the hair waived and carried loosely back to form a Psyche knot, the short hair falling softly and naturally over the forehead, or a short waived curl drooping in the middle. For the street, the uncurled bang slightly pointed in the middle is very popular. A unique style of coiffure has two loosely twisted knots, one in the nape of the neck, and the other smaller and almost on the crown of the head. All the hair is waived and combed toward these knots, only slightly waived natural-looking tresses falling over the forehead, with one decided curl in the middle.—Demorest's Family Magazine.

"THE HISTORY OF MARRIAGE" was most charmingly illustrated by the beautiful and artistic tableaux presented by the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association. The tableaux included

"Marriage by Capture," "Marriage by Purchase," "Roman Marriage," "An Ancient Jewish Wedding," "An American Marriage" (1614), "A Russian Wedding-feast," "A Dutch Wedding," "A Japanese Wedding," "Gretna Green," and "The Marriage of Stanley and Dorothy Tennant in Westminster Abbey." Several of these were faithful reproductions of famous pictures. "Marriage by Purchase" was a reproduction of "The Marriage Market of Babylon," painted by Edwin Long, the English artist whose picture "Diana or Christ?" was so much admired; "Roman Marriage" represented the wedding of Thetis and Pelus, and was an exact copy of one of the treasures of the Vatican; Makoffsky's famous picture "A Russian Wedding-Feast" was magnificently reproduced; and "A Dutch Wedding" was copied from Teniers' celebrated painting "A Peasant Wedding." The American tableaux represented the marriage of Pocahontas and John Rolfe; and among the "properties" used in it were a buckskin jacket trimmed with porcupine quills and a fringe of human scalp-locks, which was formerly the property of an Indian chief, and moccasins which once belonged to the renowned "Spotted Tail." A wealth of embroidery was used in the Japanese tableaux, "Gretna Green" was a charming bit of comedy, and the world-famous wedding in Westminster Abbey formed a beautiful picture. In most of the tableaux there was some action, in one, the wedding-guests dancing in the background. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore filled the roll of historian with her usual charming grace.

Tableaux vivants are enjoying a renewal of favor as parlor entertainments, and several semi-impromptu affairs of the kind have been very successful. At one, mannerisms and personal peculiarities of the guests comprising the house-party were "hit off" most admirably, good-naturedly, but exaggerated, of course.

There was "The Kicker," who objected to everything, upon principle, but always came around to the right view at last; and the sudden transition from defiant countenance and attitude to an expression of acquiescence was most perfect. "A Pair of Spoons" served for two tableaux representing the male and female flirts of the party, who never could resist "casting sheep's eyes" at one of the opposite sex. "The Dictator" who was always sure his way was the right way, and everyone else was wrong, and had a peculiar way of enforcing his ideas by gestures, laughed as heartily as anyone at his own portrait; "Her Dearest" showed a young lady who affected æsthetic dressing, smiling in her mirror; and "Our Darling" was the gentle house-mother in her favorite chair. She was the only one who represented herself and after being coaxed to do just as she was told, was the most astonished member of the party when the name of the tableau was announced by the one who acted as historian, who introduced each tableau with some expression of speech characteristic of the person represented.

A "Spoon Luncheon" was the very novel entertainment given by a recent bride to the bridesmaids and ushers who were to attend the wedding. The table-cloth was white linen with delicate drawn-work, over pale blue satin, the china white-and-gold, crossed spoons made of forget-me-nots were in front of each place, and the central decoration was a mound of white and pink rosebuds, supported by china Cupids, each holding a large spoon made of forget-me-nots. The souvenirs were, for each lady, a silver spoon with the combined monograms of the bride and groom, and the date; and for the gentlemen, scarf pins shaped like tiny spoons, with a turquoise in the bowl of each.

The bride-groom's wedding-ring is becoming of quite as much importance as the bride's, from a fashionable point of view. A quaint ring of some other mettle than gold,—iron and oxydized silver are specially preferred,—inlaid with a unique design in gold, and set with sapphires or other gems supposed to possess some occult charm to shield the wearer from harm, is the style of ring which the newly made wife now presents her husband to wear on his signet finger.—Demorest's Family Magazine.

The wives of the railway conductors of Newark, Ohio, organized an Auxiliary to the O. R. C. Division at that place on November 5th. They were installed by the Grand President of Columbus, assisted by the officers of the division at that place. The ladies start out in their new work under flattering circumstances, as was manifest by the deep interest expressed by each and every one. They will be known as Newark Division No. 7.

Sure death to the carpet-bug attends the application of the following preparation: One ounce of alum, one ounce of chloride of zinc, three ounces of salt. Mix with two quarts of water, and let it stand over night in a covered vessel. Next day pour it carefully into another vessel, so that all the sediment may be left behind. Dilute this with two quarts of water and apply by sprinkling the edges of the carpet for a distance of a foot from the wall. This is all that is necessary. Moths will leave, boxes, beds and any other resort which has been sprinkled with the solution, on the shortest possible notice, and nothing will be injured in texture or in color.—Exchange.

TRIP TO THE BLACK HILLS.

On the 27th of October, the correspondent in company with a friend left Chadron, Nebraska, for a visit to the Hills. We were obliged to be up for the train at 2:30 a. m. much against our principles, but when the sun began to peep above the horizon and the sky arrayed herself in her morning robe of rain-bow colors, we began to realize what we had lost by morning slumbers, and feel that we were amply repaid for the effort of a 2:30 exit. We traveled over a long stretch of broken prairie with the foot hills in the distance, while off to the left, at a distance of seventy or eighty miles we could see Harney's Peak whose summit was covered with snow. At eight o'clock we welcomed the whistle as we came steaming into the beautiful little town of Rapid City where we partook of a bountiful repast at the Hotel Harney, a beautiful brick structure three stories high and furnished with all modern conveniences. Rapid City is a place of three thousand inhabitants and has the most enterprising citizens of the Black Hills. It has four fine banks, a forty thousand dollar court-house, numerous brick business blocks, many elegant residences and fine stone churches that would do credit to a city three times its size. Here is where the state School of Mines is located. The Episcopalans are erecting a very fine school for the education of the Indians. At nine o'clock we arrived at Whitewood, the terminus of the road and what will be the junction of the Deadwood branch. It is a little village of three hundred inhabitants, located at the foot of the hills looking out to the north and east over a stretch of beautiful valley. Here we took passage on the old North Western Stage and went rattling along at a lively rate, being drawn by six fine horses. About two miles from Whitewood we passed through the deserted but picturesque village of Crook City which bears the name of one dead hero and once famous general. This village of perhaps twenty souls was in '76 a flourishing city of fifteen hundred inhabitants, and the center of mining interest. About a mile and a half beyond this we came to Gulch one of the most beautiful pictures presented along this drive. We soon came to Centennial Prairie a beautiful valley bearing the name significant of the year in which it was first discovered and settled. We soon plunged into the pine forest and began meandering through the gulch and gradually climbing up, up until we were on the mountain, slowly winding around the side looking hundreds of feet below into the deep canyon where is seen the Whitewood Creek whose waters are almost a blood red, made so from the mining that is done along its course. We reached Deadwood at one o'clock and dined at the Key Stone Hotel which is presided over by the popular landlord, Mr. Keith. After a half hour's rest we started for the White Rocks which tower one thousand feet above the main street. The day was delightful and long before we got to the summit the heat of old Sol forced us to shed our cloaks. When about half way up the mountain we came to the cemetery where lies the remains of the notorious Wild Bill who wrung terror from the hearts of many of the early settlers in Deadwood Gulch. After an hour's hard climb we sat on the summit of the White Rocks. Off to the south, seventy-five miles, we could see Harney's Peak, the monarch of the Black Hills. Looking out over the Whitewood Valley we could see old Bare Butte standing alone in the midst of a luxuriant valley abounding in crops white for harvest. In every direction were peaks whose surface covers up immense beds of wealth which shall ere long make the Black Hills one of the most important and populous portions of the United States.

At four o'clock we made a trip to Chinatown for the purpose of visiting their stores. The first visited was Wing Tsue, a very wealthy merchant who spared no pains to show his goods. After some conversation and finding that we had taught the Chinese for several years, he invited us to call on his wife. He informed us that he paid three hundred dollars for her six years ago, in China, and brought her here to share American life with him. They have four clever little children, two boys and two girls, who chattered away equally well either in Chinese or English. We found out that Wing Tsue with all his wealth and pomp, education and influence, is a polygamist. He has a small-footed wife in China whom he has left with his property. His American wife has medium-sized feet, or what they call large. The second wife must have large feet, so says Chinese law.

Wing Tsue has been a resident of Deadwood fourteen years, and is a kind of king among the Chinese population, which numbers about one hundred and fifty souls. The next morning we made our way to Lead City, by way of stage, the Deadwood Central trains having been abandoned for the purpose of relaying a third rail on the track which will be used by the B. & M. road as far as the toll-gate. This drive is a magnificent one in good weather, but the wind was blowing the dust a gale, and our experience up the mountain was anything but pleasant. We would have much preferred climbing the four hundred feet grade by train with the little engine puffing steam ahead, than to make the four miles trip in stage and the wind blowing forty miles an hour. We found Lead City a place of three thousand five hundred, full of life and bustle, and the streets thronged with pale-faced miners, who were off duty. The constant stamp, stamp, thump, thump, of the immense stamp mills is tiresome to strangers, while the inhabitants would feel nervous and restless from the stillness, were they to shut down. The gulch at Lead City is much broader than that at Deadwood, and the place does not seem so crowded. Our friend Mrs. S. R. Smith, one of America's most brilliant poetesses, accompanied us through the great stamp mills where we were shown the process used in the crushing of the ore. We were one day too early to see them "clean up" as they call it, therefore did not see the amalgam except on the boards where it is pitched up. From here we were taken to the hoisting works where the immense buckets of ore were being brought up seven hundred feet, it is there transferred to cars and is run several hundred yards over railroad to two immense crushers, which to us, resembled an old fashioned coffee mill on a large scale. We were then taken to see the mammoth pump, the finest piece of machinery ever in the Black Hills. The contract for its rock work alone was ten thousand dollars. We were from there shown through the foundry, blacksmith shop and pattern-maker's shop. We found Mrs. Smith one of the best guides. She was acquainted with all the men we met, and she spared no pains to show us everything of interest. We were shown through the Homestake Hotel, and the great Homestake store. In the evening our hostess took us to attend a benefit for a miner's widow given by the Miner's Union. The house was packed to its utmost capacity. When we asked what the net proceeds were they astonished us by saying about five hundred dollars. One thing we found, that the generosity of the Black Hills' people is unbounded.

One very striking feature of Lead City which we cannot fail to mention was that all the saloons were closed. The trial came off that day and was decided against them. The next day we took our leave over the Black Hills and Fort Pierre railroad. We climbed up the side of the mountain to get to the depot, when once there we felt repaid for all the effort made. The view was fine and the picture presented was magnificent. At one o'clock under the guidance of conductor Charles Crist, we started for Piedmont. The ride is a very picturesque one, and any who visit the Hills cannot afford to miss the trip. We traveled about twenty miles over what is known as the "old wood road," that is the narrow gauge over which wood was hauled from the mountains to the Homestake mills in Lead City. This little road has been in operation for several years, and traverses the most picturesque part of the Northern hills. They whipped us around horse-shoe curve and across immense trestle bridges, and down steep grades. The highest on this road being two hundred and twelve feet. We stationed ourselves on the platform of the rear car, that nothing should be lost sight of. We waited anxiously to see Brownville. Imagine the surprise when we came to three or four tumbled down buildings, and the Uncle Sam Mine Mills. This mine is rich and in paying quantities, but is now shut down owing to their having to work it to a disadvantage. We next came to Elk Creek Station situated at the head of a large and beautiful canyon bearing the same name. The company has a large supply store at this place and immense saw-mills near by which makes it the principal point on the road. About three miles below, half way up the side of the mountain, is Elk Cave, hung with stalactites which shine like silver in the gas light. This cave is composed of various chambers, and has been explored between three and four hundred feet in the interior. Further down the canyon we came to the picturesque knife-blade rock which towers hundreds of feet above us, and stands out with its sharp edge toward us as we turn the curve. The day was a fine one, and the untiring patience of the genial conductor who answered numerous questions and pointed out places of interest, helped to make the trip over this road a most delightful one.

At four o'clock we reached Piedmont, a junction of the Fremont-Elkhorn Valley, whose train we boarded for the Hot Springs, reaching there for late supper. We put up at the Minnekahata, one of the Spring's best hotels, and fared sumptuously during our short stay. This place is beyond description. A town, that in the past year has grown from a population of three hundred to one thousand five hundred, from a hamlet of shacks to a city of magnificent cut stone structures. Its scenery, natural curiosities, are beyond description. The state soldiers' home is located here. It is a magnificent four story cut stone structure, just completed. The Black Hills College is another imposing cut stone building, which is in operation, with a full corps of instructors. The Glespie hotel is a fine stone cut structure five stories high, and furnished with all modern conveniences. The Hot Springs hotel is another, of no less importance. The finest plunge bath in the world is under construction. The great Catholican springs sold a few days ago for one hundred thousand dollars. Here is also situated the Black Hills Chautauqua grounds, the most beautiful and romantic in the west. The baths here are not surpassed by any in the United States. The future of the Hot Springs is one of assured prosperity, and is to be the resort of the north west. For beautiful scenery, delightful climate, healthful baths, and pleasure, one does not have to seek the Rocky Mountains or the golden state of California. Go to the Black Hills of South Dakota and you will find all these and more. Our regret was that we had to make so short a stay where there was so much of interest to see.

A Look Into the Past.

It may be of interest to some to know just how, where and when the O. of R. C. was founded. It was first organized at Mendota, Ill., on the 18th day of July, 1868, by J. C. Coleman and Daniel Elliott, of the C. B. & Q., Samuel Comstock and J. W. Seymour, of the I. C., and the following officers were elected:

J. C. Coleman, G. C. C.; Samuel Comstock, A. G. C. C.; Daniel Elliott, G. S.; E. A. Sadd, G. T., J. W. Seymour, G. Sentinel.

Four Divisions were organized at this time and were located as follows:

No. 1, at Amboy, Ill.; No. 2, at Galesburg, Ill.; No. 3, at Mendota, Ill.; No. 4, at Centralia, Ill.

The general superintendents of the roads where the members were employed shut down on the Conductors' Brotherhood, as it was then called, and broke up the organization in a very short time. But in 1868, some time in the fall, Geo. Z. Cruzen and A. G. Black, called a meeting at Columbus, Ohio, and reorganized it. There were fourteen delegates present from the following roads: P. F. W. & C.; Cum, Val.; I. C.; I. & St. L. B. & O.; U. P.; D. M. V. and P. C. & St. L.

The following officers were elected: A. R. Church, G. C. C.; W. E. Griswold, A. G. C. C.; Joseph Packard, G. S. and T.

The above is from a letter from Brother E. A. Sadd, of Division No. 1, and if he is alive, he is the oldest member of the O. of R. C., living.

There is no record of the first five years. We next find them at Indianapolis, Ind., in 1872 with 23 divisions, and 1,000 members, and J. W. Hodges as G. C. C., with only 41 members insured. The next year, 1873, we find them at Pittsburgh, Pa., with J. W. Silsby in the G. C. C. chair, with 24 divisions. No report of insurance or membership. The following year they met at Baltimore, Md., with G. Z. Cruzen, in the chair, with 30 division and $20.35 in the treasury, and about 1,200 members. Nothing is said in regard to insurance. If this don't tire you, I will give you more soon.

NEWT.

[Our correspondent is mistaken in saying there is no record of the first five years, as there is an almost complete record from the organization of the "Conductors' Union," at Amboy, Ills., to the present time. A portion of the records were burned at one time and it was only by a patient and painstaking search of eight years, that they were replaced.—Ed.]

McKEE'S ROCKS, Nov. 9, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor.

With your permission I desire to monopolize a small space in the valuable CONDUCTOR. It has been some time since you have heard from McKee's Rocks Division 201 or the boys on the P. & L. E. railroad, the great O. R. C. route to the coke region. Everything is booming on the line and we have lots of work ahead. We are taking in new members every meeting and some of our Brothers stand in great luck among the oil derricks. Let us hope that they may strike a boomer. McKee's Rocks seems to be a new town since the O. R. C. was organized and the boys seem united.

The Brothers and their friends took part in a grand banquet, given at the Hotel Schlosser, on Sixth street and Pennsylvania avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., on the evening of November 4, in honor of Brother Charles Deitrick, our retiring train-master, who has accepted a position on the B. & O. railroad. After a sumptuous dinner, Brother Deitrick's friends of the P. & L. E. presented him with a beautiful gold watch chain, and charm, with his monogram on the charm. It was a pleasant surprise. The invited guests were. Hon. E. Holbrook, Superintendent on west end B. & O.

railroad; Mr. J. B. Yohe, M. of F.; Mr. J. H. Crawford, Chief Dispatcher; Mr. L. H. Turner, M. of M.; Mr. W. Pitcher, Road Foreman of Engines; Mr. Wood, Passenger Agent; Hon. Dr. McCord, and other distinguished persons, who made the evening very pleasant. Hon. E. Holbrook made a splendid speech, in which he gave the boys of the P. & L. E. a good send off. Brother W. C. Irvin, our station master of P. & L. E. railroad, acted as master of ceremonies and was O. K. J. B. Yohe presented the watch to Brother Deitrick, making an elegant speech. L. H. Turner also made a few pleasant remarks.

Later in the evening Dr. J. P. McCord presented Brother Deitrick with a fine gold-headed cane, with his name and McKee's Rock Division 201 engraved on it, which was a "dead shot" surprise. F. Blackford, Superintendent Leadville Branch, better known as New Castle, made it very pleasant throughout the evening by his witty remarks. Brother J. Lenick missed his connection with the cable line and got lost in the big city. Brother C. Liney was called on, who did the State Line act. Brother Boate, of Division 229, was called on and made some good remarks about his meeting "Daniel in the Lions' Den," which caused laughter. Brother J. N. Bartlett, of Division 169, got left with his Leadville train a round trip. He was detained too long at the mouth of the Leadville Branch, playing that good old game, "one out and two back." That's the way he missed fun and has been kicking himself ever since. Brother F. R. McFeathers, Division 114, could not attend; had to stay at home to count the votes for Governor Pattison; was afraid he would get left at Dickerson Run. Mc won his point and that's O. K. R. Robinson, W. Dawkins, and W. Mack, three of the fast flyers and as good as can be found on the iron horse, were with the boys. These three flyers do not own their engines any more; have sold them to the P. & L. E., and you can bet that they know where to put it in her. Our friend Bob Robinson has his new fence built and has painted it out of a "jackpot," but did not have a pair on the night of the 4th, when our master of ceremonies called on him and Bob had to throw up his hand. I had to pass, but Brother W. C. Irvin picked it up for me and done first-class—just the man for the place. Brother J. K. Mackey was in luck, as our trainmaster put his three-wheel caboose in the shop on the 4th; that gave Brother Mackey a chance to attend and take the city in for a night or two. Now you can see him with a box-car playing between Youngstown and the Rocks. Of course he will call for a "show down." Brother Tucker stayed up all night counting Pattison votes. Mr. Reynolds, passenger conductor on the P. & L. E., made a very nice speech and did some good singing. We hope we will soon have the pleasure of hearing him sing again those good old songs, "Home, Sweet Home" and "His Aching Heart." Then Brother C. Deitrick made a splendid speech, and enthusiastically expressed his thanks to his friends, and hoped that McKee's Rocks Division 201 would always prosper. Then, after singing that good old song, "Auld Lang Syne," all merrily departed.

Yours in P. F.,

CHILlicothe, O., Nov. 10, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor.

This article will probably open and close my official career as correspondent for your excellent journal. I do not desire, however, to retire from office and have it said that I have not earned my salary. December being nearly here some one will probably succeed me as correspondent, when it will be necessary for you to enlarge THE CONDUCTOR in order that you can publish the voluminous letters from Chillicothe Division 181.

I will not at this late day offer any excuses for my failure to discharge the duties of correspondent, nor will I make any promises for the future, provided I should be re-elected, which is rather unlikely.

In this communication I am pleased to record the promotion of our worthy Secretary, Brother C. H. Howard, to the position of trainmaster of the B. & O. S.-W. railroad. Brother Howard will be remembered as delegate from Chillicothe Division 181 to the Grand Division at Denver, Colorado. The writer of this article, after an acquaintance with Brother Howard of nearly twenty years, can and does cheerfully testify to the many qualities of both mind and character with which he is endowed and which will enable him to discharge the duties to which he has been called in a manner endearing himself to his superior officers, the general public and the employes immediately under his charge.

The question of federation being up for discussion, I will not close this article without first giving my views on this (to railroad men) all important subject.

Of all the plans proposed, that of system federation offers to my mind more reasons for its adoption than any other. First among these is the fact that under this system each order preserves its individuality, and cannot become absorbed by any other order, as is likely to become the case with any other system. Under system federation the trainmen are brought into closer sympathy with each other, and much of the bickering and petty jealousies now existing would be done away with, and where this state of affairs now exists, under the ameliorating influence of system federation, harmony would reign supreme, a state of affairs desirable above all others. Then, again, the plan of representation is just, fair and equitable, the stronger organizations having no advantage over the weaker ones. It will be found that under this plan nearly every case of grievance coming up will be settled by the executive committee representing the order in which the grievance arose, and in but very few instances will it be necessary to call on the entire board.

After years of toil and labor, and having reached that distinction of being the first and foremost railroad organization in the world, a plan whereby we would lose this proud distinction and become absorbed by some other order, would be suicidal and not to be thought of. At all hazards we must preserve our organization intact.

In this same connection I wish to record my voice in favor of biennial sessions of the Grand Division. New divisions are being added, and ere long the expense attached to annual sessions will be more perceptible. It is not clear to my mind that a large portion of the expense occasioned by annual sessions could not be more profitably applied.

It seems possible to perfect a state organization that will largely discharge the functions of the Grand Division and lesson its duties when in session. Of course, no questions except local ones would come before the state organization, while all questions affecting the Order as an entirety would be reserved until the meeting of the Grand Division.

I also have a hobby about representation.

The plan I would suggest in place of the present system of electing delegates, would be to make the Grand Division delegation composed of the C. C., A. C. C. and S. C., each entitled to a vote in the Grand Division, either by person or proxy, the past C. C. to have a vote if present, but no proxy. Now for my reasons for what might seem a very radical change from the present one. It is to be presumed that in selecting your officers in subordinate divisions you choose your best men and by virtue of their office they are familiar with the wants of the Order and its wishes in all matters pertaining to legislation. When at the Grand Division questions sometimes come up on which the delegate has no instructions. He is then at a loss to know what course to pursue, and in many instances votes in a way contrary to the would-be wishes of his own division, if they were to hear the question; while under the plan above outlined, the three principal officers being present, they could consult with each other, and by reason of the number are less error in recording their vote, and would in a majority of cases vote to suit their constituents.

I hope I have made myself plain in this matter and that others will discuss this subject through THE CONDUCTOR.

I have written this under many disadvantages, laboring under a severe cold, by reason of which I have but crudely expressed my ideas. But as I started out with the intention of making this the Alpha and Omega, I am,

Yours in P. F.

O. T. DEWEY

CHICAGO, Ills., Nov. 18th, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I noticed in THE CONDUCTOR of November first that in your reply to an editorial printed in the B. R. T. journal under the heading "Where Does The O. R. C. Stand" that you took the liberty of stating "that you believed I was to some extent misquoted" and the extent to which the misquoting is carried is such that it makes directly the opposite of what I said appear as my words. I will say right here and now that I never made any such statement as that ascribed to me, and any member of the O. R. C. or any other person who has ever heard me say anything at all on the subject will bear me out when I say that nothing that I have ever said could I believe be construed into even conveying that inference. I have made the statement both privately and publicly that I believed that a large majority of the conductors of this country both members of the Order and those who are not members, believe that Federation was just what we wanted and what was actually necessary for the welfare of all and the success of the organization as such, and I again repeat, that to-day more than at any time previous do I believe that a large majority of the conductors of this country, want something in the way of Federation; and I also believe that the only thing that will defeat Federation at the next Grand Division will be that—there being so many different ideas—they cannot settle down on any one plan that will be satisfactory to the necessary majority. This alone I believe will be all that will defeat Federation; and right here I might add a word for the benefit of all, that while every division of the Order is in a position to instruct their delegates positively on the matter of Federation I sincerely hope that no division will undertake to do anything of the kind. If any division wants Federation of any kind and desire to instruct their delegates instruct him to vote for Federation and don't tie his hands and bind him to any particular plan, for by so doing you are just as surely taking a long step in the direction of working against just what you yourselves want. The division, when they elect a delegate for the purpose of representing them in Grand Division, should elect some Brother in whom they have confidence enough, to do what is right, and he certainly is in much better position to judge after hearing both sides of the question and the merits and demerits of all plans presented, than all the rest of the division who are not present and hear nothing of it. Now Brother Editor, perhaps you know as well as any member of the Order my private opinion in regard to Federation, but my private opinion don't amount to any more than any other member, and from knowledge which I have gained by traveling about I would be very foolish, to say the least, to make the statement which I am credited with making, "that at most, System Federation is the only thing the O. R. C. would sanction," for never having entertained that idea privately, it would seem out of line that I should make any such statement publicly. As to the editorial in the journal which you were replying to I have not been fortunate enough to see it, but I can see no reason for Brother Rogers asking any such question, and as has already been remarked I have no doubt that he can answer his own question and answer it truthfully and do the Order no injustice either. It seems potent to me that the disposition on part of some is to see that everything possible is done to belittle the O. R. C. in the eyes of not only members of the O. R. C., but those who might become members if let alone. If all would act with the spirit that F. P. Sargeant evinces by his utterances I don't believe that any such question would be asked and that the feeling instead of tending to keep apart would have a strong tendency to more closely unite the membership of all railway organizations. Life is too short to be spent in bickerings and we should all strive for the betterment of not only our own members but for the betterment of all mankind. And in this connection I believe that a better feeling exists to-day between the O. R. C. and the other organizations composed of railway employes than has existed for some time past and I also believe that this feeling of friendship has been the means of accomplishing a great deal of good in the past six months which—without having existed—would not have been realized. This of itself should be an incentive to all to continue as they have started and strengthen the feeling of friendship in every possible way, and without any feeling except that of the greatest good to the greatest number. I think it would look a great deal better on the part of Brother Rogers to reach out the hand of friendship to the O. R. C. instead of throwing all the stumbling blocks in their way which he can find. Now, I presume that some member of the O. R. C. will feel terribly hurt that Brother Rogers should be asked to reach out a hand to the O. R. C., and if they do I cannot help it. What I have said in that respect I say not that I fear the O. R. C. would not be able to stand alone for she has stood alone for quite a number of years, but almost a year ago it was demonstrated that some other plan of action was necessary in order that the best results might be obtained, and now I ask in all fairness to all concerned if the disposition shown by Brother Rogers is such as will tend to make members of the O. R. C. feel that he is in sympathy with or willing to see them take the position which they undoubtedly will take regardless of Brother Rogers or anyone else. There is no reason why the O. R. C. should not be recognized as an organization which is worthy of respect, and while they would be glad of the respect, confidence and good will of all the other organizations, they are not likely to feel that they have it while such tirades are being made against them. It is hard work to make a man believe that you are his friend if you are constantly finding fault with everything he does or if he does not complete some certain action before he has it fairly commenced. In conclusion, let me say with all kindness, let the "dead past" alone, and from this time forward let us all, regardless of what organization we belong to, work for a closer and more united feeling and action and if we will move to that end I have no fear of the outcome, and it will not be necessary to ask, "Where does the O. R. C. Stand?" Yours truly in P. F.

C. H. WILKINS.

[We think Brother Wilkins misapprehends the intent of the article in The Trainmen's Journal. We do not think it was written in any fault finding spirit or with any ill-will, but rather on an impulse, stimulated by the attacks and vociferous assertions of others, and without inquiry. The officers of the B. of R. T., as well as the Journal have been notably fair in their treatment of the Order since their St. Paul convention.—ED.]

ATCHISON, Kas., Nov. 20, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: As it has been some time since THE CONDUCTOR has heard from me, I concluded to trouble you once more. Carver Division is getting along all right, and the division is still here, but there are some of the members that live here in the town, and are in town on meeting Sundays who fail to put in an appearance in the division room. In fact I know some Brothers that could not work their way into the room, should the division be called to Order; they have the new work, and that is all—they couldn't use it, and if met by a strange Brother they could not tell whether he was a member of the Order or not, if he did not show them some emblem or a card. Now, some of the Brothers ask the question: "Can't there be something done to compel them to attend?" I will answer right here; NO. They have the work, and pay their dues, and what are we going to do? You can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink. Some of the Brothers speak of Enthusiasm, and some speak of one thing and some of another, but all I have to say is, if they don't want to come let them stay away; I earnestly hope, however, that they will come out and meet with us. They certainly don't want to see the division go by and be a thing of the past, for Division No. 28 is as good a working division as any I know of, for a small division; we only boast of about fifty members in good standing, and an average attendance of about, well, from five to ten, when there are from ten to fifteen members right in town and won't turn out. It may be that I am tiring you with my talk, but just for fear that you have overlooked something, I would say, that next Thursday is Thanksgiving; woe be unto the turkey and cranberry sauce, oysters, and other articles too numerous to mention. Everything is running pretty smoothly, but nobody on the list. We had a new conductor about four weeks ago and showed him the whole "Biz." Well, I must close, hoping to hear from someone else in regard to non-attendance, and with malice toward none and goodwill to all, I subscribe myself,

Yours in P. F.,

DANNIE MOULDON.

P. S.—The old man is well and hearty, and still corresponding for the eastern journal, and says I must quit writing for THE CONDUCTOR or some of the boys will lay for me with a stuffed club.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Nov. 10, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

Thinking perhaps a few words of interest from the Forest City would be agreeable, I will endeavor to enlighten the readers of THE CONDUCTOR as to what deck plank No. 14 of the rotten old ship is doing to keep her off the rocks. Since the Rochester meeting we have received twenty petitions and are willing to gamble that by the time we meet at St. Louis we will have added fifty to our crew. Nor is this all. We believe through the influence of members of old 14 another division will shortly be added to our directory with a goodly number of charter members who have never belonged to the Order before. The division has the utmost confidence in the policy of G. C. C. Clark and can assure him he has our solid support.

Now, Mr. Editor, I will wind up by saying, at our meeting yesterday afternoon Brother John F. McVean presented the division with a portrait handsomely framed of Brother E. E. Clark. It is needless to say that both the presentation speech of Brother McVean and acceptance by your humble servant were efforts of which any statesman might well be proud, but if Brother Clark had been present he would have been more highly flattered by the comments on the picture than by the flowery language used by the orators.

Yours in P. F.,

C. P. HODGES,

C. C. Division 14.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 9, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

DEAR BROTHER: One of the leading railroads running out of this city has kept up a warfare for several years against railway labor organizations—the last move they made was against the Order of Railway Conductors. A short time ago they ordered some of the employes to shave off their beards. What earthly use this could be to the business of the road no one knows except the officer whose fertile brain conceived this idea. The public looked on these things as a forward movement in the railroad business and appeared well pleased that there was one road which would have nothing but first-class men. Now if these same people could see the misery caused by recent wrecks on this same road, and could be informed how they occurred, they would be inclined to think this company had made a bad bargain, and would have to pay dear for their whistle, and that the company would have been better off to have held on to the men who were inclined to take care of themselves and families by being members of their respective orders. They did not stop to consider at the time that when this company put off true and tried men they would have to take on new and inexperienced men or the refuse of other roads. Some people would have looked at this thing differently if they had known this order would have made paupers of all the widows and children of all men who had the misfortune to be killed or crippled for life on this road. Holding a membership in one of the orders is the best way the men have to provide for their families so they will not be entirely destitute. They say to us, "Why do you not go into other insurance companies?" They will not let us into anything like a good company, for the rates are so high we cannot pay them. Those that are not first-class we do not want to get into, for we have a good insurance that we help to manage ourselves.

Yours truly in P. F.,

G. W. L., Div. 162.

Frank S. Butler.

Our Brother, Frank S. Butler, Grand Outside Sentinel of the Order of Railway Conductors was killed on the 6th of November, 1890, at Anniston, Ala., at the depot of the Georgia Pacific Railway Company. A wrecked train was in the yard to be moved. He went in between the cars to examine a crushed drawhead in a string of ten or twelve condemned cars. An engine was at each end of the string of cars. Without motion or warning to him, one of the engines was moved, causing him to be knocked down, one pair of wheels passing over him. He lived for several hours, without a groan or murmur, fully realizing his condition. He died like the brave man that he was. Brother Butler, at the time of his death, was yard master. He had endeared himself to his associates by his fair and just treatment, to his employers by his energy and devotion to his business and his skill. The community mourn his loss as an upright, law abiding citizen. The road was blocked with freight, and he was, at the time the good Lord sent for him, exercising every energy to open the yard. In this instance the affirmation "that death loves a shining mark," has been verified. A gallant gentleman, a true man, a faithful employé in the full glory of his strength has been transplanted from earth, and is blooming in the garden of Heaven. To our Order he was faithful and devoted, as he was true to all his relations in life. He leaves a widow to mourn his loss, to whom the fraternity extend their heartfelt sympathy. We knew him, honored him, loved him.

Scarcely two weeks ago his eloquent voice was ringing out, in Dr. Pine's opera house in Atlanta, in the international meeting of our Order; an address indicative of the man, logical, eloquent, impressive—freighted with love and good-will for our Order, and bidding them a God's speed, and at the same time saturated with the tender affection of his great heart for the afflicted families of our Order; little did we reckon, that so soon the wail of his own widow would be sounding in our ears and echoing in our hearts.

His remains were taken charge of by Brother

Chas. Shumate, a committee of honor accompanying it to his home in Iowa; to the grand woman who had blessed him with her love, and crowned him king with her devotion Brother Shumate sent his dear dead form. He died as all true men would esteem it an honor to die—with armor on and at the post of duty.

"Requiescat in Pace."

"BROTHER."

PENDER.—In memory of Miss Viola Pender, who died October 6, 1890, at Cleveland, O.

We miss thee from our home, dear,
We miss thee from thy place,
A shadow o'er our life is cast,
We miss the sunshine of thy face;
We miss thy kind and willing hand,
Thy fond and earnest care,
Our house is dark without thee,
We miss thee everywhere.

At the regular meeting of Cleveland Division No. 14, Order of Railway Conductors, held Sunday, October 12th, 1890, by committee appointed, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God in His wisdom, to take from this world, Miss Viola Pender, to adorn His blissful presence on high; therefore, be it

Resolved, That while we most deeply deplore the loss sustained by our Brother, yet we bow with resignation to God's will.

Resolved, That the heartfelt sympathies of this division be extended to the family; and

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the record of the division, and a copy be transmitted to the parents of the deceased, and a copy sent to THE CONDUCTOR, for publication.

At a regular meeting of Arkansas Valley Division No. 36, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Grand Chief Conductor of the Universe, to remove from our midst our worthy Brother A. K. Waddill.

Resolved, That in this dispensation of divine providence, the Order of Railway Conductors have lost a wise conductor, and this Division one of its most earnest and respected members; and that the wife of our Brother has been called upon to mourn the loss of a loving and affectionate husband, and our city, a man in every way worthy of the highest esteem.

Resolved, That Arkansas Valley Division No. 36, extend to the wife and friends of our deceased Brother all the sympathy vouchsafed humanity to bestow in this their great affliction.

Resolved, That the charter of Arkansas Valley Division No. 36, be draped in mourning for a period of thirty days as a token of respect to our esteemed Brother. And further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to his wife, and published in THE CONDUCTOR.

Brother H. H. Hoyer was called to Denver, Colorado, to bury the remains of his brother, who was killed in an accident on the D. & R. G. Ry., about October 2d., and on his arrival at Denver received sad news of the death of his son Edgar, who died of typhoid fever.

At a regular meeting of Alliance Division No. 177 the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That while the pangs of death have penetrated the hearts of this family with such great force, yet it is but a reminder that we all are subject to the sting of death at any moment.

Resolved, That the members of this division extend their heartfelt sympathy to brother Hoyer and family in their affliction:

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the records of the division, a copy be presented to the family, and also copies be furnished the city papers and THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR for publication.

POLITICS VS. PARTISANSHIP.

The Federationist declares that it will have "no politics" and says that the laboring man should not permit politics to enter his mind, and on this assertion we are compelled to take issue with our contemporary. THE CONDUCTOR believes that politics pure and simple, should by all means occupy the mind of the laborer above all others. The divergence between us, however, is more apparent than real, and arises more from what we believe to be a misconception of the meaning of the word on the part of The Federationist than from any real difference of opinion. Webster defines politics as, 1st, The science of government; that part of ethics which has to do with the regulation and government of a nation or state, the preservation of its safety, peace and prosperity; the defense of its existence and rights against foreign control or conquest; the augmentation of its strength and resources, and the protection of its citizens in their rights, with the preservation and improvement of their morals. 2d, The management of a political party; the advancement of candidates to office; in a bad sense, artful or dishonest management to secure the success of political measures or party schemes; political trickery; and to illustrate gives a quotation that expresses the position of THE CONDUCTOR exactly: "When we say men are talking politics, we often mean that they are wrangling about some mere party question." THE CONDUCTOR believes in politics for laboring men and particularly for railway employes but it condemns mere partisanship and in that sense, will join in the opinion that we should have nothing to do with politics. A little farther on, The Federationist declares that if a time arrives when the interests of its readers are threatened by adverse legislation, its voice will be heard with no uncertain sound; in other words, it will then enter politics and will lend its aid "in the regulation of the government of the state or nation;"

will try to see that its "safety, peace and prosperity is preserved;" and will join with us in the "protection and preservation of the rights of our citizens," and we sincerely hope that while we may differ with The Federationist in party, that when it comes to genuine politics, we may always agree.

In arousing interests in a proper appreciation of the increased rate of mortality and disability from natural causes, we have in mind the in-roads made on our members from Pulmonary Consumption, Rheumatism, Kidney and Bowel troubles.

The Brotherhoods of Railway Engineers, Firemen and Switchmen, have been awakened to the necessity of counteracting these alarming factors, and being of parallel import to Railway Conductors, they must meet with equal regard. We, therefore, proffer for consideration practical measures embodying the theories of prominent medical scientists. To guard against exposures and dangers that arise in passing from a warm to a cold atmosphere, (a necessity with conductors during service) is of great moment.

Prof. Buck in his researches on the health of Railway men, recommends individual hygiene and regards proper clothing as a prominent factor. He says: "Underclothes more especially should be so constructed as to equalize the body temperature in varying conditions of atmosphere." To practically accomplish this, has been the work of Mr. I. Jaros, now of New York, whose experiments cover a period of over six years.

His field of labor has been with men in public service, and the satisfactory results in the U. S. Army, Navy, Police and Fire Departments, and last, but not least, with railway men—(engineers, firemen, and switchmen) has given prominence to his creation of a material for underwear that will guard against sudden chilling of the body under varying conditions of atmosphere. It is a pronounced success and characterized by prominent medical specialists as an "ideal material," bearing also official endorsements and recognition of the departments and Brotherhoods mentioned.

We feel, in advocating a consideration for protection of the body, in so simple and effective a form as is accomplished by the Jaros Hygienic Underwear, that the most good is done to the greatest number. An eighty page treatise covering reports from renowned physicians on the excellent results, to which are added the official statements from governments, and organizations, evidences the possibility of reducing the mortality and disability rate from natural causes.

LOCATION AGAIN.

It is beginning to become apparent, that should the Order decide to make any change in the present location of its offices, there will be no lack of competition, and it may be embarrassed to choose between the many favorable locations presented and advantages offered. The Toledo Evening Bee says:

"All the members of the Order of Railway Conductors in Toledo and adjoining cities are working their best to have the headquarters of the Order brought to Toledo.

The Order, which has a membership of about twenty thousand, has decided to change its headquarters from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to some point more centrally located.

It is intended to erect a building costing from $150,000 to $250,000. Indianapolis and Des Moines are both working to have the Order locate with them.

It would be a good thing for Toledo if the Order would come here, and the conductors would soon discover that in doing so they had made a good move.

The grand division would be held here annually, with an attendance of 1,500 to 2,000 persons, from every part of the United States as well as Mexico and Canada. The matter will be settled at the next meeting of the grand division at St. Louis in May.

Said Chief Conductor B. F. Osborn of Toledo Div. No. 26, to a Bee reporter this morning: "We want to get the grand division here in 1891, and in fact desire that the Order make its headquarters here. We are doing everything in our power to effect this end, and have the promise of plenty of help from the business men of Toledo. Other cities are offering a bonus, and we are prepared to do as well."

The following is taken from the letter of the Toledo correspondent of THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR, the organ of the Order:

"Toledo Division has nearly one hundred and seventy-five members, and as to its work, will compare favorably with most any division in the country. The B. of R. C. has located their headquarters here, and are working hard for prominence.

"We ask all concerned to study well the advantages of Toledo as a place for bodies of this kind to meet. As a railway center it is second to none in this country.

"Look at the map and see the intersecting lines of railway that center at Toledo. Come to Toledo and see the advantages she has. We will show you one of the greatest and best convention halls in this country.

"Our hotels are of the best, and can accommodate legions, I might say, and we assure you rates satisfactory to all.

"And as to the hospitality of our citizens, there can never be enough said in their praise. Ask of those who have been entertained in our city. They never do anything by halves. Look at our manufacturing interests. It would be well for any one looking for a place to invest their money to come to Toledo before locating elsewhere."

The above expresses the sentiment of Toledo in the matter. Her citizens will do everything in her power to make it desirable for the Order to locate here.

Possibly, however, "Majah" Leflet has not yet been consulted, and if he should decide not to permit us to locate in Toledo and bring his "influence" to bear, that point will be removed from the list of competitors.

WILLIAM D. ROBINSON.

We clip the following from the Indianapolis News, which conveys the first information to us, that an effort had ever been made to organize the engineers prior to the organization of what is now the Brotherhood. It is likely that the engineers will take some steps soon to erect a monument to the memory of the man whose name heads this article, and when they do so, we hope that their arrangements will be such that all interested in the organization of railway employes may become contributors. We believe that all will esteem it a privilege to contribute their mite.

"The late Wm. D. Robinson, Daviess County, was recently spoken of as the founder of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. At the time of his birth, in May, 1826, there was not a mile of railway in the country. In 1846 he began railroading as a fireman on the New York Central, and in 1848 he was promoted to an engineer, and served for seven years in that capacity. In 1855 he joined in a movement to organize a mutual association of engineers, and he was appointed Grand Secretary as the result of the meeting held at Baltimore, which was attended by seventy delegates. This order was called the "Grand National Protective Association of Locomotive Engineers," but as an organization it was not successful. Mr. Robinson, however, continued the agitation, and in May, 1863 at Detroit, the "Brotherhood of the Foot-board" was organized, with Mr. Robinson as Grand Chief Engineer. He continued in this position until August, 1864, during which time fifty-four divisions were organized. From that time until his recent death he was employed on various lines, but nearly all the time with the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company. Besides being a thorough mechanic, he was a ready writer and speaker, and during the campaign of 1888 he took an active part for Harrison. He wrote with ease and grace, both prose and poetry, and many of his productions are given high praise because of their literary value."

Division 17 requests that all officers who reply to their circular of Nov. 20, give the name and numbers of their respective divisions.

Vice-President Holcomb contradicts the rumor that Traffic Manager Mellen has been asked to resign, and says that he will remain with the U. P.

The secretary of Division No. 48, requests that any who knows, will kindly send him the present address of Bro. M. G. Root.

Information is wanted as to the location of Bro. W. H. Hollister of North Platte Division No. 35. Anyone sending his address to this office will confer a favor.

Boone Division No. 36, Knights of Pythias, gave their first annual ball Thanksgiving night, and THE CONDUCTOR is under obligations for an invitation to be present.

Bro. A. Marsh of Queen City Division No. 60 has been appointed superintendent of the main line from Sedalia to Kansas City, Lexington branch, Jefferson City, Booneville & Lexington and Sedalia, Warsaw & Southern divisions of the Missouri Pacific Railway, to succeed Bro. Mead Stillwell who has gone to the C. H. V. & T.

Bro. W. A. Jameson of Pueblo Division No. 36, was killed at Clarendon, Texas, November 8th. His remains were taken to Pueblo and laid to rest by the Masons and the Order. Bro. Jameson leaves a bright little daughter of eight years who will receive the care of Division 36 and thanks to his precaution in life will have $7,500 in insurance.

Early last spring Bro. Art Maxon was thrown from a carriage breaking his arm and otherwise injuring him. For the past six months by the best medical skill and care he has endeavored to save the arm, but in vain, the arm being so badly injured that amputation became necessary in order to save his life, and accordingly the operation was performed a few days since. He has many friends who will regret to learn of his loss, and will be remembered by the older members of the Grand Division as the delegate to New York in 1879 from Division 58.

Brother F. G. Ellison, a D. & R. G. conductor allowed himself to get "pinched" some little time ago but is back on his run again now. For the information of our readers who may not be versed in railroad parlance, we would say that "pinched" does not mean being placed under arrest but getting a hand caught between draft-irons.

Bro. T. E. Gaither of Sierra Nevada Division No. 195 has been appointed trainmaster on the S. P. with office at Lathrop, Cal. Bro. Gaither is the kind of material that makes good officers and his friends may expect to see him successful in the new position and need not be surprised if he does not hold it very long as he is not unlikely to vacate it to "go up higher."

A correspondent writes us asking if we can give him the present address of a former "partner" in train service, E. D. Proctor. Mr. Proctor is not now a member of the Order but was formerly a member of Division No. 87. We are unable to give the requested information, but if any one of our readers can oblige us we will gladly forward it to the inquirer.

The Assistant Grand Chief Conductor of the B. of R. C. says that he wishes us to be "a little more explicit" in reference to him. Bro. Clark is now engaged in procuring evidence in relation to one matter, and when it is all in, we shall show our readers that our statement in regard to Mr. Martin was correct, though, of course, we do not expect to satisfy the gentleman himself.

Among the cities striving for the location of the general offices of the Order, will be found the Rocky Mountain metropolis, Denver, and if they were located some ten hundred miles further east, other places would find a dangerous competitor in Denver and possibly as it is, it will prove one not to be laughed at. It is a progressive, liberal city whose citizens do not do things by halves.

The engineers at their recent convention, reaffirmed their former position on federation, again deciding in favor of federation by systems.

Have you started a subscription paper for the Railway Employés Brotherhood Home yet? It is a worthy enterprise and deserves your support.

As we write, a strike is in progress on the C. & E. I. railway, and the dispatches say that it is for a third brakeman and the dismissal of a train master.

The Secretary of Division 191 would like the addresses of the following Brothers: J. M. Cavanaugh, P. E. Furham, J. B. Messick, R. J. Swayze, A. F. Ward, R. B. Williver.

The Secretary of Division 8, has important communications for Brothers P. K. Bushnell and John Sweeny, but does not know their address. Will somebody advise him, quick?

The C. M. & St. P. railway have resumed control and management of the sleeping car traffic on that line, their eight year contract with the Pullman company having lately expired.

The secretary of Lincoln Division No. 206 would like to hear from the following members before December 31st, 1890, as he is unable to find their whereabouts: Brothers J. J. Fitzpatrick, C. E. Pixley, and C. B. Alleman.

Toledo Division No. 26, Order of Railway Conductors, is in a flourishing condition. Seven members were initiated yesterday, and five more applications were received. "Our order was never in better condition," said Chief Conductor Osborn this morning. "Our membership is increasing rapidly and we are doing much good."—Toledo Evening Bee.

Mr. C. L. Mayne, superintendent of the Chicago & Erie has resigned his position. Mr. Mayne has been with the old Chicago & Atlantic for some time as train master and superintendent, and was highly esteemed by the employés. There will be much regret over his resignation. Mr. F. E. Merrill from the "Frisco" succeeds Mr. Mayne.

Brother W. H. Mixer, the efficient secretary of Division No. 249, at Tacoma, Washington, has resigned as chief train dispatcher of the Cascade and Pacific divisions of the N. P., and it takes two men to fill his place. Mr. J. M. Flynn having been appointed chief dispatcher on the Cascade division and Mr. E. H. Schrader on the Pacific division.

"If at first you don't succeed, try, try again" was the motto of Brother Sam Keller an old Northern Central conductor and a member of Division No. 143 of the Order. He has been elected sheriff of Dauphin county on the democratic ticket although the county is republican by about 2,000, which shows something of Sam's popularity.

We are just in receipt of information of the untimely death of Brother F. L. Hendry, of Boston Division No. 122, who stepped from his caboose on to another track and was run over by an approaching engine that he did not observe. Brother Hendry leaves a widow to mourn his loss, and his presence in the division room will be sorely missed by his Brothers.

The Gripsack says that when the hour hand of a watch is pointed toward the sun, south is exactly half way between the hour hand and the figure XII on the face of the watch. For instance, if it is four o'clock and the hour hand is pointed toward the sun, the II on the watch-face will point south. This is a useful bit of knowledge and may be as new to many of our readers as it was to us

A circular has been issued by Mr. Adam Menche, general organizer of the American Federation of Labor, stating that President Gompers of that association will make a trip to the Pacific coast and address meetings through the west and asking any who wish to secure an address free by Mr. Gompers, to correspond with the general organizer at Denver. No charge is made for the services of Mr. Gompers, but localities where he speaks are expected to pay a proportionate part of the expenses of the trip.

The "McKinley bill" does not prevent some importations, but in view of the late democratic "land slide" and the fear that in the probable revision of the tariff by the 52d Congress and a possibility that they might place a prohibitory tariff on valuable packages of certain kinds, the genial secretary of Pueblo Division No. 36 hastened away to the Queen's American dominions and now defies a democratic congress or anything else to interfere. He recently returned to Pueblo from Ottawa, Canada, with Mrs. E. C. Mattes and is now receiving the congratulations of his friends, among whom THE CONDUCTOR is proud to be reckoned.

G. W. Hill, for many years a well-known conductor on the B. & M. R. R., and a member of N. E. Div. No. 157, has turned his attention to the care of his guests with such success as to make him one of the leading landlords of the west end. A glance at Bro. Hill's rubicund countenance assures one of his success, and of the good things contained in the larder of the Derby House, 25 Cambridge street, Boston.

Brother George A. Helm has resigned his position of superintendent of the G. C. & S. F.; Brother Helm is one of the charter members of Division 217, at Temple, Texas, and has been a member of at least two Grand Divisions. No matter who may succeed Brother Helm, the employes will not be gainers by the change, for no man can fill the position with justice to his employers and do better by those under him. Bro. Helm is succeeded by Mr. Sullivan H. Morris.

John McConiff Division No. 246, and Pike's Peak Division No. 244, the former at Wymore, Neb., and the latter at Colorado Springs, Colo., remembered "ye editor," and send him a cordial invitation to trip the light fantastic with them. The former give their second annual ball Thanksgiving night, and the latter their first on Thanksgiving eve. That all who attend either will enjoy a happy evening goes without saying.

One of the actions of the late convention of the B. of R. T. that while it indicates prosperity is no less an indication of good business management and foresight, was the provision for purchasing the necessary type and machinery for doing its own printing. We congratulate them on the move, and believe that sooner or later all railway organizations that publish a journal will follow their example, and we believe the sooner the better.

Members get to the front in our sister republic of Mexico as well as in the United States. In our last, we noted the promotion of Bro. Starr, and we are now advised of the promotion in September of Bro. W. G. Mitton, a member of City of Mexico Division No. 159 to the position of Master Mechanic of the Mexican Railway or "Jefe de Tallers, Ferro-carril Interoceanico." Bro. Mitton was formerly employed by that company as a locomotive engineer.

The very genial and popular conductor, W. H. Hogue, of the Western Div. of the Boston and Maine R. R., who is C. C. of N. E. Div. No. 157, and chairman of the democratic city committee of Newberryport, Mass., has become a successful instructor of youth and beauty in the graceful art of which Terpsichore is said to be the special patroness, and is conducting well-attended classes for adults, and also for children, this season.

November 20th, occurred the grand union ball of the conductors and engineers at Troy, N. Y., given under the auspices of Troy Division No. 37, B. of L. E. and Thos. Dickson Division No. 171, O. of R. C., and THE CONDUCTOR was kindly remembered by both an invitation and complimentary for which the Brothers have our heartiest thanks. Knowing something of the hospitality of the boys in that section adds to the regret, that we were unable to join them. We hope to receive a full account for THE CONDUCTOR before going to press.

Readers of THE CONDUCTOR who have any old coins issued before 1869, with plain dates, should write to W. E. Skinner, Boston, Mass. Mr. Skinner pays high prices for old coins and in many cases a single coin is worth a small fortune. One man found one that was worth $1,000, and many others have been successful in finding rare coins. Collecting old coins is sometimes a profitable business, it takes no time and with the opportunities that conductors have, they may often pick up a valuable coin. Read Mr. Skinner's advertisement in this issue.

Brother Fred. Moore, a member of Boone Division No. 34, an old friend of the writer, well and favorably known by a host of "the boys," is now special agent for the Railway Officials and Conductors Accident Association, with territory west from Pocatella, Idaho, and makes his headquarters at LaGrande, Wash. Fred lost an arm while running a train on the C. & N. W. about three years ago, and lately has been employed as yard master at Council Bluffs. We recommend both Fred and the company he represents to employes in the northwest.

The B. of L. E. Journal gives notice of a crook as follows:

Again we are compelled to notify the members of the B. of L. E. of man's duplicity. One more McDonald, with several aliases, is traveling about the country claiming to be a member of Division No. 303, and at times 356. He has by some hook or crook become possessed of a traveling card, which he is using to good advantage. He is about 5 feet 6 inches in height, with a blind or cock eye. In conversing he has a Scotch accent or brogue. He is on the borrow. Several Divisions and members have been victimized by him. Be on your guard.

Brother N. E. Retallick, one of the energetic members of Battle Creek Division No. 6, and formerly secretary, sends us a list of fifty names for THE CONDUCTOR with the cash for the same. Brother Retallick has procured these subscriptions within a few days and without loss of time from his business and has received in the way of premiums, enough to pay him well for his trouble. This illustrates what might be done by some member of the Order on every line of railway and in every city in the United States if they would exercise just a little energy. THE CONDUCTOR is well worth the price asked for it, and it pays to canvas for it.

Prior to its absorption by the C., M. & St P., the Milwaukee & Northern was paying its passenger conductors $150 per month. When the St. Paul assumed control, the officers immediately decided that $150 per month was too much wages and cut them to $125, making a proportionate cut in the pay of brakemen and baggagemen, but as a matter of justice to them agreed to pay them extra for the excess mileage they were making over the main line runs. When they came to figure up and found that the conductors will draw about $165, the brakemen about $70 and the baggagemen something over $80, the saving by the "cut" was not apparent. The boys 'ain't sayin' a word."

Brother Robert Laughlin is spoken of as a candidate for railway commissioner of Michigan, and the Toledo Bee says "the conductors all through the state of Michigan are desirous that Robert Laughlin, of East Saginaw, be appointed railway commissioner. He is a thorough railroad man having worked in every department almost. It would certainly please the railroad men to see him appointed." In addition to pleasing the railroad men, it would give to the state of Michigan an able officer who would be a credit to the state. Brother Laughlin and the writer have been arrayed on opposite sides in our Grand Division in many cases and we expect to "scrimmage" again in the future, but we have always found him an honorable opponent, an able man and THE CONDUCTOR will be gratified as highly as any one can be should he receive the appointment.

We clip the following from The Call and Herald published at Wilkesburg, Pa.:

Mr. W. B. Rice has just completed, and will open Monday morning, one of the finest and coziest store rooms in the borough. The building is on the corner of Penn avenue and Center street, and is a one story frame structure. The front is of the Queen Anne style of architecture, with large plate glass windows, while the interior of the room is all finished in hard wood and highly polished. It is, without doubt as handsome a store room to be found anywhere. Mr. Rice will engage in the produce business, and proposes to run a strictly first-class establishment. In the rear of his room he has erected a large refrigerator, where he can keep his stock cool and fresh. It is his purpose to furnish to our citizens at the lowest market prices, Poultry, Game in season. Oysters by the can or gallon, fresh Butter, Eggs, all the Standard canned goods. Cranberries, Celery, Apples, fine Teas and Coffee. You should not fail to drop in on Monday, the opening day, and see this cozy room and his fine display of canned and other goods.

Bro. Rice is Assistant Chief Conductor of R. B. Hawkins Division No. 114, and THE CONDUCTOR wishes him success in his new venture.

In railway literature, there is no more interesting or instructive book than The American Railway, published by Charles Scribner's Sons, and from which we have liberally quoted during the past year. It is finely illustrated and the pictures in THE CONDUCTOR for August 1st and September 1st, and which have been favorably commented upon by a number of our readers, are from its pages. It opens with a chapter on The Building of a Railway, by Thomas Curtis Clarke, in which the building is minutely described, from the initial stake of the surveyors to the laying of the rails. Feats of Railway Engineering comes next from the pen of John Bogart, State Engineer of New York, giving descriptions of the famous bridges, loops and tunnels. American Locomotives and Cars by M. N. Forney, well known as a mechanical writer and editor of Railroad and Engineering Journal. Railway Management, by Gen. E. P. Alexander, President of the Central Railroad and Banking Company, of Georgia. Safety in Railroad Travel, by H. G. Prout, editor of the Railroad Gazette. Railway Passenger Travel, by Gen. Horace Porter of the Pullman Company, and well known in railway circles. The Freight-car Service, by Theodore Voorhees, general superintendent of the N. Y. C. How to Feed a Railway, by Benjamin Norton of the Long Island Company. The Railway Mail Service, by postmaster general, Thos. L. James. The Railway in its Business Relations, by Arthur T. Hadley, professor of political science in Yale College. The Prevention of Railway Strikes, by Charles Francis Adams of the Union Pacific. The Every Day Life of Railroad Men, by B. B. Adams, of the Railroad Gazette, and by the way, Mr. Adams writes as if he "had been there," with a final chapter on Statistics, by Fletcher W. Hewes. Members of the Order can procure this book through this office on favorable terms, as will be seen by reference to our advertising pages, and we believe no investment will yield a better return than to buy it.

When steps are taken to perpetuate the memory of William D. Robinson, THE CONDUCTOR suggests, that instead of a costly monument, a simple and inexpensive stone be placed above his ashes, and the remainder of any fund that may be collected be invested in behalf of the Railway Employés Brotherhood Home or some other deserving charity, having for its object the benefit of railway employés and to be known as THE WILLIAM D. ROBINSON FUND. We believe that such action would be more in accord with the wishes of the deceased than any other.

In his annual address to the convention of the K. of L., General Master Workman Powderly said:

"We see the editor of a daily paper and the President of the New York Central operating the raising of a fund to feed men and women in Ireland, who have been robbed through exactly the same diabolical system as that which is now beginning to rob the workmen of America. That which is found worthy of praise in the Irish workman when he strikes against injustice is damned in his brother in America when he asks for enough to keep his children out of the poor-house.

We believe there is not an insurance company in the world that can compare with the R. O. & C. A. A. for prompt payment of losses. When this company was first organized, we, with others, were somewhat doubtful of its success, as it seemed by a comparison with the rates that were being charged by other accident companies, that it would be but a matter of time until it would be unable to pay its losses. In reply to inquiries we simply said that their rates were low, so far as we knew they had paid all their losses, and that from a personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Order, who were members of its board, we were satisfied that there would be no dishonesty on their part. We have seen the association steadily grow and extend its business and usefulness, and in addition to the acquaintance with our own members who were officers, we have formed the acquaintance of Mr. Bellis, the secretary, and know something of his business methods, and we have no hesitation in recommending it to our readers and railway employés generally, as in our opinion the best. As an instance of their prompt payments, Joseph Jones, a brakeman on the C. & E. I., was killed November 13th, and within twenty-four hours the amount of his insurance had been forwarded by Mr. Bellis. This association in employing agents and solicitors, gives the preference to railway employés, and among them are many members of the Order, while among its officers and general agents are such men as L. D. Hibbard, Geo. J. Johnson, Rube Willard and other names that are familiar to all.

Within the past decade, building and loan associations have grown into public favor and have become an approved institution for investing the small savings of laboring men. They are now governed and regulated by law in several of the states, and where so governed annual reports are required to be made to the state, and their books and condition are subject to examination by a state officer at any time. With the protection thus afforded, the laborer may invest his savings with at least as much security and certainty as in a savings bank, and with a probability at least, of a considerably larger profit. Any person thinking of investing in an association of this character, should first of all, see that it is a duly incorporated institution, and further, that it is duly incorporated under the laws of some state that provides for a rigid superintendence of them by some state officer, and second he should look to the character, standing and commercial and financial ability of those who manage the association. Such an association may be subject to the same careful supervision that is given to a savings bank, but if its managers are not men of ability in financial affairs, the returns are likely to be small, and while there may be, owing to legal supervision, no actual loss of the principal invested, the association is likely to fail and pay its members no dividends. In building and loan associations as in assessment insurance companies, there are frauds and deceptions who expect to fatten on the success and reputation of legitimate enterprises, and who locate in some state where no legal restrictions interfere with them. New York exercises over loan associations as rigid a supervision as it does over its savings banks, and no loan association can do business in that state without incorporating, without violating its laws. To those who are able to save a little each month, and wish to invest it safely and with a reasonable prospect of a fair profit, we would call attention to the National Mutual Building and Loan Association of New York, whose advertisement appears in this number. Its officers are all men of almost national reputation and ability in the direction required for the successful management of the association, and we believe that it will pay any of our readers who wish to invest their savings, or who may wish to borrow money to pay for a home, to investigate the merits of this association.

Has any division of the Order a member who is disabled, either temporarily or permanently, from his usual avocation? If so, write to the secretary of the Railway Employés Home, Chicago, Ills., and ask for a blank application for admission. Don't confound this home with any of the Brotherhood Hospital schemes. The home is a charity pure and simple, established solely for the benefit of disabled members of the B. of L. E., B. of L. F., B. of R. T., B. of R. C., S. M. A. A. and the Order, and no one can receive its benefits unless a member of one of the above named associations. The hospitals are started simply to make money for the originators, and while they may all be legitimate enterprises, we do not believe them to be called for or necessary. 'The Switchmens' Journal', whose editor is in a position to know, says that the best of service can be procured at several different hospitals in Chicago at very reasonable cost. The only possible benefit of the Brotherhood hospital idea is that, by the certificate of membership system, the well would pay a part of the cost for the sick or injured.

A conductor on the X. Y. & Z. railway, where duplex checks are used when the conductor collects a fare, dropped the covers of a used duplex book in a coach. A short time later it was picked up by the news boy and taken to the conductor. Upon examination, it was found that some passenger, who was something of an artist and author both, had utilized the blank space on the back cover for the portrait of the president of the road, the face being wreathed in smiles, while underneath the portrait appeared the following lines :

"This is a check upon the conductor,
And keeps him from stealing a cent,
Invented by that king of all robbers,
The X. Y. & Z. president.

It stops up the leak at the spigot,
Throws chaff in the stockholder's eye,
But the leak goes on at the bung-hole,
And the officers wink on the sly.

A scheme for saving a penny
To a stockholder, seems a big thing ;
His eye is stopped up by a copper,
While a dollar goes off on the wing.

A new applicant for the favor of railway employes comes to our table in The American Federationist, and their motto "the world is our field," would suggest that the publishers are somewhat ambitious, and if The Federationist shall succeed in covering its field, THE CONDUCTOR will not be of those who envy its success. It is published by W. H. Johnson & Co. at Mattoon, Ills., for one dollar per year. We do not find anything in No. 1 which tells how often it is issued, but from the date we presume it is monthly. It is a six column, four page paper, and as its name purports, it is a supporter of the idea of national federation as exemplified by the United Order of Railway Employes, and we assume is intended to be to a certain extent at least, the mouthpiece of the Supreme Council, though the paper appears to be a private enterprise. In a two column introductory, to which reference will hereafter be made, it gives its platform as for federation, no politics, fairness and temperance. If the publishers will substitute partisanship for politics, it will have a platform that is a good one. We extend a friendly hand and the best wishes of THE CONDUCTOR to the boys, and X with pleasure.

As a rule the writer is "down on" patent medicines but as there are exceptions to every rule there is an exception to this one. One of the visitors at Rochester to the last Grand Division was Brother H. H. Moran, a member of City of Mexico Div. No. 159, and for a long time a conductor running out of that city. We first met Bro. Moran in 1885, at Louisville, and his physical condition at that time was not to be envied by any one. He came to Rochester a stout, robust and physically perfect man. Expressing some surprise at the change, Brother Moran told us the cause, "Cactus Blood Cure" and insisted on our taking a bottle home and using it. He said "it won't do you any good if you set it away and do not use it, but just use this bottle and then let me know the result." We did not use the medicine but gave it to another who was not blessed with the health that we enjoy, and the result fully verified Brother Moran's prediction. The virtues of the Blood Cure are also testified to by such well known conductors as H. H. Greenleaf, the secretary of 159; Brother C. H. Starr, superintendent of the Mexican National Construction Company, and many others. We recommend any of our readers who perhaps "don't feel just right" to try a bottle of the Cactus Cure.

Civic Pride.

Parke Rowe—Brooklyn people seem to take great pride in their home institutions.

Potter Belding—How do you mean?

Parke Rowe—I've just got a letter from Dekalb Walkabout. He's out in the Yosemite region, and he speaks of it as the Prospect Park of the West.—Puck.

Still a Margin of Profit.

Clerk—I collected only one of the bills. The other three men skipped the town.

Plumber—That's nothing, so long as one of them paid. Come, and I'll open a small bottle.—Life.

THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

VOL. VII.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA., DECEMBER 15, 1890.

NO. 24.

TWO CHRISTMAS EVES.

[FOR THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.]

At a broad front window, in a neat little cottage surrounded by evergreens and tall rock maple trees, on a clear Christmas eve, sat Marion Ray, a lovely girl of twenty summers, stitching away diligently, on a dainty, filmy garment that was to be worn by one of society's fair belles. She must finish it by five o'clock, so as to send it home in time to adorn the beautiful blonde, Miss Rosalind Horton, for a reception and banquet given this Christmas eve, at their next door neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. James Weston, a wealthy banker, in honor of their son, Roger S., who had just returned from a visit to a friend in sunny Florida. He had graduated with honor from a law school of renown in Philadelphia, last June, and after a short visit at home, accompanied by a fellow student, had gone to his friend's home in Florida, for a visit and rest, after his long course of study, and had now returned to Breton, his old home, to settle in the practice of his chosen profession. Marion and Roger had been schoolmates in early childhood, and always warm friends. Roger, naturally a bright scholar, had surprised every one with his rapid advancement, and as no expense was spared in his education, being of a genial, sunny disposition, and withal, possessing a good degree of common sense, he was always, and everywhere, a great favorite, now became more popular than ever, as having reached his majority, he came into possession of a fine fortune, bequeathed him by his Grandfather Weston.

Mr. Ray, Marion's father, was at one time a prosperous merchant in Breton, and owned the residence adjoining the Weston home, and now occupied by the Horton family, who were from the South, and had come here to try the effect of a more bracing climate for Mrs. Horton, who was something of an invalid. But to return to our friends, the Rays. We last saw Mr. R. in a prosperous business, enjoying perfect health, and happy in his family relations. With a noble and accomplished wife, who adored him, and who was a fine musician, and though much admired and sought after in society, never neglected her family in any way; was a tender, affectionate and indulgent mother and always ready to administer to the wants of the many poor people who came there for sympathy or relief. Marion was possessed of a fine figure of medium height, well developed, and was lithe and graceful in every movement, had dark chestnut hair and clear complexion with a rose tint, and soft hazel eyes, with a depth that few could fathom, and which indicated strength of character.

Myrtle, the younger sister, was of a different type, with pink and white complexion, blue eyes and fair hair. She was her sister's opposite in everything. An affectionate little miss, whom all admired and petted without spoiling her.

Mrs. Weston, though different in many ways from her high born friend and neighbor, was yet a noble, worthy and capable woman, and the two had been on intimate terms for years. But there came a change in these two delightful homes. Roger, after graduating from the college in B., went to a law school to complete his education, leaving their home quite desolate for a time, being the only child, his parents missed him very much, especially his mother, who almost worshiped her gifted and talented son. The fond heart grieved over his absence and the hours and days dragged slowly on for a time, but she was a woman of too good judgment to long give way to such feelings, and soon turned her attention to other things, and in doing for others, visiting the sick and attending to various charities in which she was interested, and some church work besides, the time sped by, and cheered by long letters from the absent dear one, she was again her happy self.

But, let us now look in upon the other household, with which our story has to do. We find the loving husband and father prostrate upon a bed of suffering, and the rest of the family in deep grief on his account. Mr. R. was a lover of fine horses, and one fine October morning, proposed to Mrs. Ray to take a ride, behind a pair of beautiful chestnut horses, which he had purchased not long since. They were of fine blood, and high mettle, and they anticipated a charming drive in the country. Mr. R. was a fine horseman, and enjoyed driving the spirited pair so he dispensed with the services of Joe, the coachman, and took the reins himself. The air was clear and cool, the roads smooth, the horses in fine spirits started off at a brisk trot. They were enjoying the ride and scenery. The trees were gorgeous with autumn colors of crimson, scarlet and yellow, with here and there a bright evergreen to relieve the glare of the brighter foliage. When just as they were about to cross a railroad track, they were surprised to see the limited express train come tearing around a curve, with bell ringing and whistle sounding at a furious rate, which so terrified the horses, that they gave a dash forward, and at once became unmanageable. They had just cleared the track when the train sped by as on the wings of the wind, and more frightened the horses ran faster and still faster, Mr. R. keeping them in the road and hoping to control them when they were over their fright. But they heeded neither reins or words, and as they neared a large tree standing beside the road, appeared undecided which side of it to go on, and at last seemed to differ in opinion, as while one sheared to to the right, the other inclined to go the other way, which brought them square up against the sturdy oak with a shock, that snapped in two the tongue of the carriage as though it were a pipe stem and threw the horses upon the ground, where they lay quivering with fright and flecked with foam. The occupants of the carriage were both thrown out upon the the hard gravel road, where they lay unconscious, until discovered by a farmer, who was on his way home from B. When he had examined them and found that they were still alive, he soon procured assistance and removing them to a farm house near by, summoned a physician, and informed the friends at home. It was learned that Mrs. R. was somewhat bruised and had a sprained wrist. With good treatment and kind attention she soon returned to consciousness, and was much grieved to learn her husband was quite seriously injured. His left leg was broken, his right wrist was badly sprained, his back severely bruised, but fortunately his head was uninjured, and it was hoped he might recover.

The team were found to be scratched some, but no bones broken, and under the hands of Joe, the competent coachman, soon lost all traces of their escapade.

As it was not thought best to remove Mr. R. at present, they both remained at the farm house.

Mrs. R. was able after a few days to be at her husband's bedside much of the time and administer to his wants. Marion and Mertie also came often to cheer them and bring clothing and articles of comfort from home. So the time did not seem very long until Mr. R. was well enough to bear the ride, and all returned to their own comfortable home.

But the days of his convalescence were necessarily slow and tedious. It was discovered that his spine was injured, which caused him much suffering.

Thus the weeks slipped by. The holidays passed very quietly as far as our friends were concerned, still they exchanged little gifts, and all tried to be cheerful and hope for the speedy restoration of the dear ones to health. However, they were doomed to disappointment. As the cold weather came on he became weaker, had a nervous fever, which became quite alarming, and despite the care and skill of a loving wife and able physician, all saw that they must give him up.

The blow came with terrible force to his loved ones, and it seemed for a time more than they could bear. The devoted wife seemed utterly crushed. She had been almost constant in her attention to her husband since recovering from her own injuries, which had so worn upon her nervous strength, that together with the sudden and grievous affliction, the loss of her husband, caused nervous prostration. She succeeded in keeping up until the funeral was over, and the dear one laid to rest in the silent city of the dead, then took her bed and suffered on for two weeks, when under good medical treatment, aided by a fine constitution, she began slowly to recover.

But what of our Marion during all this sorrow and trouble. When the accident occurred she was attending college in B., whence she was summoned to care for her mother, and attend to her father's wants when necessary. He was provided with a competent nurse, but liked best the loving hand of his wife or daughter, to bathe his aching brow, or smooth his pillow, and a hundred other little attentions which none but they could think of, which were so grateful to the sufferer that they never tired of caring for him.

Marion was nearly heart broken at the loss of her father, whom she idolized. She had always spent much time with him at the store and when he went to the city to purchase a stock of goods often accompanied him. And now that he was gone from them, and her mother ill, the burden of the household fell upon her, and she saw that she must be brave and cheerful for the sake of her mother and young sister, so she assumed a cheerfulness which she could not feel, and in trying to make her sister happy, hopefully attending to her mother's wants, and looking after the servants, she found almost constant employment, and the satisfaction of knowing that she was a comfort to others helped to dull the pain at her own heart. Help also came to her from above, where she had been taught to look for comfort and strength in affliction.

It is now the middle of February and four weeks since Mr. Ray had left them for his long and brighter home. Mrs. Ray was now able to sit up, and it became necessary for some one to look after their business affairs. Mr. Ray was the head of the firm of Ray & Baker, and had always done the purchasing of stock and looked after the finances. His partner being young and rather inexperienced, having care of the store and clerks.

At the time Mr. Ray was injured the business was in a prosperous condition, but things soon began to go wrong, and the business showed the want of a head. The clerks became careless and the cashier proved untrustworthy, and by the time Mr. Ray was gone things were in a bad condition, and now the business must be settled by the courts. An executor was appointed, who after looking over the affairs of the estate, found that when all the liabilities were paid there would be little left for the family that had always been accustomed to all the comforts, and many of the luxuries of life.

It was also found that an insurance on his life in favor of Mrs. Ray, of $10,000, had been allowed to lapse by neglecting to pay an assessment which was made soon after the accident occurred, when all was confusion both at the store and at home. Thus they must face another calamity.

And what did our little heroine do in this trying position? She arose to the emergency. It was found after affairs were settled, that there was saved to them a neat comfortable cottage, sufficient for their wants, located near the business part of town, but with pleasant surroundings. Thither they went, in April, retaining only one servant, faithful Martha O'Ryan.

Mrs. R. at first thought they must do without help, save one, to wash and iron, and to do occasionally a day's work. But when she talked with Mattie of the change, and offered to find her a place with a friend, she found it not an easy matter to so dispose of her.

"What," she said she, "not take me wid yez, to the nice little home. Sure and ye must be goin crazy. Not have oney body to cook and wash, and scrub, and tend fires, and do errands, or oney thing at all, at all. Sure an' its not myself that's a goin to lave yez, after that fashin: Havent I always lived wid you and the master since yez was first married, and he brought you to the nice house a swate blushin' bride, and didn't you put up wid all my failures in cookin' and the loikes for a long time, 'til we both larned how to do things, and so good and patient ye was, too. And then when ye got rich, and kept a coachman, and a foin man he was, too, good Michael O'Ryan. When he falls in love wid me, and I wid him, and thought we would be married and go by ourselves, didn't good Mister Ray go to Mike and say, says he, 'Mike, why do you want to lave me? If you and Mattie wish to be married, I will raise your wages, and if she is willin' you can both stay wid us, and so we stayed, and yez made a nice weddin' present, and besides the fine brown silk dress and a bonnet to match, to be married in. And then whin poor Mike died wid the fever, didn't yez give him a nice funeral, and say comfortin' words to poor Mat, and I think of the ungratefulness of lavin yez now, when yez need me more than iver, and what would I be doin without my dear girls? No indade, where you goes, I goes, and as to payin', me I am not nad'in any pay. I have plenty of clothes and have got a bit of money saved up, so you just never mind, I'll take care of myself."

Thus it was arranged, that the cook in the old home should be maid of all work in the new one, at a slightly reduced salary.

When they were settled in the cottage, they found that their limited means would hardly suffice for their needs, and keep Mertie in school, or give her musical advantages, so Mar'ion began to think what she could do to add to it. As she had not fitted herself to teach music, she could not hope to do anything at that, and she did not wish to go about anything that would take her from home, she soon decided to try dress-making. She had often been told that she possessed excellent taste, and had planned her own and her mother's dresses, which were much admired. She also frequently trimmed her own gowns, and seemed always to know just what was becoming. They decided to use the parlor for a sewing-room, as the sitting-room had a grate and was so cheerful for the family room, and as they did not expect to see many society people, they could get along nicely without a parlor. She also secured the services of a competent dress-maker, who could cut and fit with satisfaction—a girl near her own age—Ada Goodwin, who had once been a schoolmate of hers, and now had an invalid mother to support, and it was decided that if they had need of it, they would hire a good seamstress by the day, so that they should not over work. They provided themselves with some of the leading fashion journals, among them Demorest Family Magazine, and were then ready for business.

When it became known that Marion was dress-making, her old friends who had all admired her taste in dress, and it may be, somewhat envied her, came to have their work done, and the girls soon had all the work they could manage, from people able and glad to pay them well for their work. They also kept a small stock of trimmings, and often ordered them for customers, which afforded them a little profit, and when Mrs. Ray saw how energetic her daughter was, and that she was carrying quite a burden, she aroused herself from her grief to see what she could do to assist her and lighten her burdens. She first looked after the housekeeping, attended to the marketing, etc. Then as they wished to give Mertie a musical education, and had not the means at hand to employ a competent teacher, she began teaching her, both on the piano and in voice culture, which she was fully competent to do, at least for some time. She found too, that being employed in this way, she found it easier to bear her loneliness and sorrow. Thus they passed the summer and fall to the time when our story begins.

The other girls had gone home, and Marion, who did most of the trimming, was putting the finishing touches to the soft blue crepe dress. (The order had come in late, and was the first which they had from Miss Horton). She had fastened the delicate lace in the neck, and was just arranging some loops of ribbon on the skirt, when her mother entered saying:

"My dear, Tommy has come to take Miss Horton's dress to her, are you ready for him?"

"All ready, mama dear, just taking the last stitch," said Marion, cheerily. "Isn't it lovely? She will look beautiful in it, with her fair hair and blue eyes, her white, plump neck and pretty arms. I have just been thinking, she is near my own age, and lives in our old home, and even occupies my own room there. She is quite a favorite in society, I am told, and her mother, who is something of an invalid, and seldom goes out, is to be one of the guests at Mrs. Weston's, to-night. I wonder if Roger has changed much? It is so long since I have seen him. Two years and more. I think we shall find him greatly improved, with his study and travels."

"I feel so anxious to see him," said Mrs. Ray.

While the conversation was going on Marion had carefully folded the beautiful garment, and placed it in a pasteboard box, that it should not be rumpled in carrying, and dispatched the boy a few minutes before six.

"Just in time," said M., as the clock was striking. It was one of the rules, that they should not sew for customers after six o'clock, so they had a little time for recreation, and did not injure their eyes working by lamp light. It also gave Ada time to look after those at home, and in summer the girls often went for a walk after tea. There were hills and woods along the river that flowed past the village, which afforded some fine views, and from the top of one particular hill Marion loved to watch the sun set and then enjoyed the walk home in the twilight. The girls were always accompanied in these rambles by Nero, the large Newfoundland dog, which they brought with them to the cottage, and who was a great pet and a faithful protector to the household.

Marion was busying herself picking up the scraps and tidying up the room, when they heard the tea-bell ring, and as they did not respond at once, the privileged Mattie came to see what occasioned the delay.

"What is this ye are doin', me little dear," said she; "jist ye go and ate yer supper, while the cakes is hot, and it's me-self that will clare up the room."

"Thank you, Mattie, that will be a favor; and you can put all these things away, for we shall not sew any more for a whole week. We are going to have a good rest."

So the mother and two daughters repaired to the cozy dining-room, where a neat, dainty tea was served, and then returned to the sitting-room, where a bright fire in the grate lent a cheerfulness to the room that all so enjoyed. Without it was cold and the air was filled with snow, which promised to increase to a real Christmas snowstorm, suggestive of sleigh-bells and Santa Claus.

"Mertie, dear, will you please sing for us; it will rest me, I think," said Marion.

"Certainly, sister; what shall it be?"

"Oh, let us have the Christmas carol I heard you practicing to-day, and, mama, please sing your part, too, and I will be the audience."

Mertie went to the piano, a fine one, by the way, that was a part of the old home furniture, and was a birth-day gift to Marion from her loved father.

Mertie possessed a clear, sweet soprano voice, full of tenderness and feeling, which is so rare, and her mother a rich contralto. As they sang together the beautiful Christmas carol, Marion experienced a feeling of pride and joy. How nicely their voices blend and how Mertie's is improving in strength and volume. Then she plans how they will procure a teacher for her, or wonders if they can send her to the city to study. No, that would separate them, and is not to be thought of; they could not do without their "Sunbeam," as they were wont to call her.

So Marion decided to see Madame W., a noted teacher, who came out from the city once a week to teach a small class of young ladies. Mertie was now in her sixteenth year, and Marion thought it best to give her good instruction, although it might be rather expensive. They found that their business had been so profitable that they could afford to give her at least one term of lessons with Madame W., and it was decided to have her begin as soon as the holidays were past. After discussing the subject, and having decided upon that plan, they all three retired to rest, contented and hopeful.

On the Christmas eve with which our story opens, the spacious and elegant home of James Weston was all ablaze with light, beautiful with decorations, and thronged with guests, many of them from the city with some of Roger's friends from the University, besides an aunt and cousin—his mother's sister and daughter—from Philadelphia. Among them all we find our blonde lady, Miss Horton, arrayed in the blue crepe and looking more beautiful than ever. She has a self conscious air as she has always been admired and complimented, and feels that she is looking unusually well. And now that the reception is over and they are about to enjoy this banquet, she is honored with having the young host, Roger Weston, as an escort to the table. It had been thus arranged by Mrs. W. since Miss Horton was now their next door neighbor, and a comparative stranger in the place.

When the Ray home was sold, her father, a retired broker from the south, who was in search of a quiet home, where he could bring his family and enjoy his accumulated wealth, had bought this beautiful residence and removed here in May. The invalid wife who had become peevish and dissatisfied with everything, was not at all pleased with the change, so they were not likely to remain long.

Roger was very polite in his attentions to his guest, but could not feel much admiration for her as she seemed rather shallow and seemed to think more of herself than aught else. He could not help comparing her with the friend he had once known that occupied this home she now enjoyed, and Miss Horton suffered greatly by the comparison. Marion seemed to occupy his thoughts a great deal of the time, at least he spoke of the friends who had once lived as their neighbor and asked if she had met Marion; she replied with a smile which was almost a sneer, well, yes, she is my dress-maker. Quite a change isn't it, I don't suppose you will be likely to see her now, as she has dropped entirely out of society, and rightly too, as who would care to associate with one's dress-maker. The implied sneer touched Roger in a moment, and he replied "I see no justice in your remark, and surely if Miss Ray made the gown you wear to-night she is at least mistress of her profession." The spoiled beauty took this as a compliment to herself and simpered, "so you like my dress do you." But the feast was over by this time, and toasts were offered and responded to, and soon all left the tables and repaired to the parlors to enjoy some fine music by some professionals, that Mr. W. had brought out from the city, for the occasion.

Then the guests began to depart with the usual compliments to host and hostess, until, only those stopping at the house were left. When Roger sought his cousin for a little chat, saying, "well Mae how have you enjoyed the evening," "very well indeed," said Mae, "and judging from appearances you have been equally happy." "What of the beautiful blonde, is she as interesting as she is beautiful?" "I saw that she appeared to be very much pleased with your attention."

"I do not like to express an opinion on so short an acquaintance," said he; "but should I in this case, I fear it would not be particularly flattering to the lady in question. But, mother, what of our old friends, the Rays? How are they getting along, and is Marion still sewing, as you once wrote me? I must see them soon."

"Yes," said Mrs. W.; "the dear girl still keeps her shop and has done a good business. She is just as much a lady as ever, and so self-sacrificing. Who would have believed she could have accomplished what she has? I invited them here to-night, but as they have not been out any yet, they did not feel that they could come, so sent regrets. She is a noble girl, and, though offered assistance by friends, chose to do what she could and not feel dependent."

"Well, mother, I will say good-night," said Roger, going over to her chair and kissing her fondly, as had always been his wont. "It seems so good to be home once more."

Then he bade the others good-night, and soon the house was quiet and dark.

During the week that followed Mrs. W. and Roger called at Mrs. Ray's—not a society call, but as old, true friends—and were made quite welcome.

It was a pleasure to Marion to find that their changed circumstances had made no difference with these friends. Mrs. W. had been very kind, indeed, and often took them out for a ride, and did them many favors, in such a way and with such tact that they could not feel hurt or under any obligation to her for it. This was the first of many visits these two made at the cottage, and Roger often spent an evening with them, sometimes accompanied by Mae, who stayed several weeks with her aunt.

Roger was a lover of music, possessed a fine tenor voice, and he would coax Marion to play accompaniments for him, as she used to do, and Mertie and her mother enjoyed singing with him, too; so they spent many of the long winter evenings quite pleasantly. He often came with a sleigh and took the girls out for a ride on the clear, moonlight nights, which delighted Mertie beyond measure.

The girls still kept the dress-making going, and in the spring found they had been able to get along without using much of their small means. Marion was pleased with this, as she hoped to be able to send Mertie and her mother to the city for a few months, where Mertie could have better advantages, and her mother a change, too.

And now a delightful surprise awaited them. Mrs. Ray's only brother, William Bently, whom she had not seen for years, and from whom she had seldom heard, having heard of the death of her husband, wrote his sister, asking her how she was situated, and on learning the state of affairs, at once closed his business and set sail for home. He had been in business in Australia for a number of years and had amassed quite a fortune. He had married an estimable young lady, rather late in life, and after a few short, happy years, had laid her dear form, with her infant daughter upon her breast, in the cold, silent tomb. It seemed for a time his heart was buried with them, but on hearing of his sister's loss, he determined to come to her as soon as possible.

And on a bright June morning he rang the bell at the cottage door, and soon had that fond sister in his arms and held her to his heart, while both wept from sympathy and joy. When they were somewhat composed, Mrs. R. called her daughter, saying:

"My dear Marion and Mertie, this is the Uncle Will of whom I have so often told you."

The girls were delighted to see him and felt that they now had some one to care for them.

He soon took the management of affairs saying he had no one else to care for, and was going to have his way in this case.

After Marion had finished what work she already had engaged, he insisted that she take no more, and then began to look about for a house to suit him. In this he consulted Mrs. R., and as it was learned that their old home was for sale, she felt that she would rather live there where so much of joy and grief had come to her, and in due time they were at home and with many of the familiar things about them and some nice new furniture, they were quite contented and happy with Uncle Will ever ready to gratify every wish.

The cottage was let to Ada rent free who brought her mother there, now very much improved in health and delighted with the cosy home.

Ada continued in the dress-making business and gave good satisfaction to her many customers.

Mrs. Weston and her family were delighted with the return of their friends to the former home, and Roger and Marion spent many happy hours together, and when he asked her to be his wife and share his fortune, she did not say no. And when he asked her to name an early day for the wedding, she said "I would like to be married on Christmas eve." So it was settled that they should be married on the following Christmas eve. And as Roger wished to travel more, and it had always been the desire of Marion's heart to see first her own country and then the old world, they decided to go first on a leisure tour through the south. Then to California, via the Southern Pacific to San Francisco, and when they had enjoyed the beauties and delights of that favored portion of our continent sufficiently, take passage for the other side of the great sea and travel over the eastern continent to their heart's content. Intending, if they enjoyed it, to be away for a year, and on their return to settle in the fine new house to be erected for them during that time, under the supervision of Mr. W.

Uncle Will was anxious to give his niece a grand wedding, but Marion would not consent to it, but insisted on a very quiet one with only a few intimate friends of both families. Nor would she accept of an elaborate trousseau since they were to travel so long, and could not be burdened with much luggage. She went to the city with her mother and uncle and purchased material for two lovely evening toilets and two good traveling suits, one of gray and one of dark blue with other necessary articles, and insisted on taking them to Ada and help to plan and trim them herself, so she had her way in this, and a lovelier bride or one more beautifully dressed is seldom if ever seen.

Her dress was of soft cream crepe with low corsage and trimmed with fine old point lace which was her mother's present to her for the occasion, the soft lace falling from the shoulder over the beautiful rounded arm on which she wore a pair of handsome bracelets with diamond settings, a gift from her uncle, and on her neck a string of pearls with a lovely pendant set with a cluster of rare diamonds, a gift from Roger. Their present from Mr. and Mrs. Weston was a solid silver tea set, and besides these were many beautiful and costly gifts from other friends.

The ceremony over, they received the congratulations of friends, then partook of refreshments, and at once started on their journey south.

The parting of mother and daughter was sad, and Mrs. R. felt quite desolate when they were gone, but with Mertie and her brother to cheer her, and many things to take her attention, she overcame the feeling of sadness and went with Mr. Bently and Mertie to New York, to stay a few weeks to see the sights and hear some fine operas. It was decided that Mertie should not pursue her musical studies any further at present, so they gave themselves up to all the luxuries that wealth can procure.

Roger and Marion or Mr. and Mrs. Roger Weston, as we now must call them, finished their travels over the continent, boarded a fast line steamer at San Francisco in March, happy and in perfect health, where we leave them to each other, wishing them a pleasant voyage across the blue ocean and adown the journey of life on which they have entered with such bright prospects and anticipations.

NEW CONTRIBUTOR.

In Defense of Strikes.

By L. W. Rogers, Editor "Railroad Trainmen's Journal," Galesburg, Ill., in "The Independent."

The relative rights of the employers and the employed is a subject that interests the public, if interest in anything may be measured by the disagreeable inconvenience it causes. And not only does it interest the general public in a business sense, but it should be of great importance to it, because, like the old question of the relation of master and slave, it embraces a problem the rightful solution of which is essential to the nation's political welfare and commercial prosperity. On the principle that pain is a friendly danger signal that warns us of what if not avoided will prove fatal, it may not be a bad thing that strikes are very disagreeable to the American people.

The question whether it is right to strike is one upon which the employes themselves differ widely. There are two distinct classes of organized labor in the United States—the striking and the non-striking. The most important of the latter in railway service is the Order of Railway Conductors and the Order of Railway Telegraphers. The employes composing these organizations seem to believe they can secure all the rights to which the employes are entitled without resorting to the strike, and that whatever cannot be secured peaceably it is better to lose. The employes who compose the striking organizations in railway service (and they are vastly in the majority)—the most prominent of which is the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, the Switchmen's Mutual Aid Association, and the Knights of Labor—regard the strike as a legitimate weapon to be used in the defense of personal rights and for the prevention of unjust reductions of wages. But our position on this question is very much misunderstood by the public. The popular idea of a strike associates violence and lawlessness with it, and those who engage in strikes are commonly but erroneously supposed to be always ready to indulge in those unreasonable demands upon employers that can be obtained only by a disregard of reason and the use of force.

To this class of organized labor I belong and in its defense I wish to speak of some of the things we consider our inalienable rights, and how we propose to maintain them. I take it for granted that we all agree that every man is entitled to an honest share of the wealth his labor creates. Of course it is simply impossible to determine exactly what that fair share is, but in a country the agricultural products of which can almost feed the world, with mineral resources almost inexhaustible, with conditions such that tens of thousands of our business men are accumulating fortunes that princes envy—in such a country the fair share of the men who labor with their hands should at least be enough to furnish an abundance of wholesome food, good clothing, comfortable homes, and a little leisure time for recreation and mental development. To secure such a part of the wealth produced in the country, it is necessary for us to organize on a strike basis. People who censure us for this never tire of saying that the laws of supply and demand regulate the labor market and that the natural conditions should not be disturbed. I am willing to admit that a striking organization is a combination for controlling the labor market; but our defense is that it is a necessity of the times. When great monopolies take possession of the industries of the country and the natural operation of the laws of supply and demand is interfered with by combinations of measureless strength, there is absolutely nothing for the toilers to do but to pit themselves against it and oppose combination with combination. In the absence of any protective law for which the great corporations have a particle of respect, it is necessary for the employés to unite and assert themselves or be ultimately reduced to poverty. Every fair-minded person will surely agree that the employé has as much right to a voice in the fixing of wages as the employer; that it is just as fair for him to resist a reduction as for the employer to resist an increase, and that the power of tying up a railroad is no more cruel in its effect than the power to enforce the laborer into idleness. Whoever does not admit the right of labor to a voice in the fixing of wages must look upon the laborer as a slave who is expected to accept in silence whatever the employer is pleased to offer.

But fair wages is only one of the many things we propose to defend with the weapon of the strike. It is our purpose to protect, by the power of united action, our members against any infringements of their rights as employés and citizens, and one of the first and most important of these is the right to organize for mutual protection. Upon this right depends everything else we hope to secure, and unless it be conceded there is nothing left but submission to industrial slavery. If the right to organize on a striking basis is denied and the claim of the employer, which we so often hear advanced, to the right "to run his own business as he chooses" is admitted, then what is to secure us even a small measure of fair treatment? The right of one man to quit working amounts to nothing. The corporations employing all the railroad labor are not so numerous but that a definite understanding among them is an easy matter, and unless the employés are likewise a unit there is nothing to prevent any arbitrary measures the corporation chooses to enforce.

If the right to organize on a principle of resistance to employers is admitted, does it not follow that we have the right to strike without forfeiting our right to the place we occupy? To illustrate: a company discharges a few of our members because they belong to a labor organization. The whole membership remonstrates, but the corporation remains firm. Then we all stop work. The company forced a part of us into idleness, and we force the company into idleness as a measure of self-preservation. It is simply a retaliatory measure. It is a temporary suspension of labor and not a resignation of our positions. Has not an employé some claim to a place he has faithfully filled for years that a corporation is bound to respect? When he works for years as a machinist, then another term of years as a fireman, and finally becomes an engineer; when he does faithful service in this capacity for a number of years; when his savings are invested in a home half paid for; when he has grown gray in the perilous service, has he not a right to the place that stands higher than the whim of some master mechanic? Does a corporation possess the unquestioned right to send such a man adrift in a vain search for another position? The truth is that no corporation has a right to "run its own business as it chooses." It should have only the right to conduct its business in conjunction with the employés. The party that owns the coal and locomotives is no more entitled to a monopoly of favorable conditions than the party that owns the nerve and muscle.

The interests of the general public are seriously involved in this issue between employer and employé, and its hope of immunity from the baneful effects of strikes lies wholly with organized labor, and its attitude toward it should be friendly and encouraging. It is to the interest of the public, the employer and the employé that strikes should not occur. But no legislation can prevent their occurrence, and they will never be avoided until the labor organizations are so equally matched against the corporations that it would be evident folly to engage in the industrial warfare commonly called a strike. The splendidly organized armies of Europe are said to maintain its peace. This principle is well illustrated by the creation of the federation of the striking railway organizations in 1889, since when none of them have had a strike, although its central power, known as the Supreme Council, has satisfactorily adjusted three grievances that would have involved either separate order in a costly strike. Had the Knights of Labor been a member of this federation the strike of the New York Central would not have occurred. The same is true of the C., B. & Q. strike in 1888, which kept two thousand men in idleness almost a year. Had labor organization at that time been perfect, a speedy compromise would have resulted. The public is in error in associating lawlessness with strikes, and in supposing that labor organizations ever desire either. The object of more perfect organization is not to invite battle, but to avoid it. By balancing corporate power with that of united labor, we hope to banish force and allow reason and diplomacy to take its place.

A Doctor Without a Diploma.

I have said that there was no regular physician in California. Later, in 1843, in a company that came from Oregon, was, one Joe Meeks, a noted character in the Rocky Mountains. On the way he said, "Boys, when I get down to California among the Greasers I am going to palm myself off as a doctor"; and from that time they dubbed him Dr. Meeks. He could neither read nor write. As soon as the Californians heard of his arrival at Monterey they began to come to him with their different ailments. His first professional services was to a boy who had a toe cut off. Meeks, happening to be near, stuck the toe on, binding it in a poultice of mud, and it grew on again. The new governor, Micheltorena, employed him as surgeon. Meeks had a way of looking and acting very wise, and of being reticent when people talked about things which he did not understand. One day he went into a little shop kept by a man known as Dr. Stokes, who had been a kind of hospital steward on board ship, and who had brought ashore one of those little medicine chests that were usually taken to sea, with apothecary scales, and a pamphlet giving a short synopsis of diseases and a table of weights and medicines, so that almost anybody could administer relief to sick sailors. Meeks went to him and said, "Doctor, I want you to put me up some powders." So Stokes went behind his table and got out his scales and medicines, and asked "What kind of powders?" "Just common powders—patient not very sick." "If you will tell me what kind of powders, Dr. Meeks—" "Oh, just common powders."

That is all he would say. Dr. Stokes told about town that Meeks knew nothing about medicine, but people thought that perhaps Meeks had given the prescription in Latin and that Dr. Stokes could not read it. But Meeks' reign was to have an end. An American man-of-war came into the harbor. Thomas O. Larkin was then the United States consul at Monterey, and the commander and all his officers went up to Larkin's store, among them the surgeon, who was introduced to Dr. Meeks. The conversation turning upon the diseases incident to the country, Meeks became reticent, saying merely that he was going out of practice and intended to leave the country, because he could not get medicines. The surgeon expressed much sympathy and said, "Dr. Meeks, if you will make me out a list I will very cheerfully divide with you such medicine as I can spare." Meeks did not know the names of three kinds of medicine, and tried evasion, but the surgeon cornered him and put the question so direct that he had to answer. He asked him what medicine he needed most. Finally Meeks said he wanted some "draps," and that was all that could be got out of him. When the story came out his career as a doctor was at an end, and he soon after left the country.—The Century.

The Ticket Agent.

HE HAS PLENTY OF CAUSE TO BECOME "GROUTY" AND DISAGREEABLE.

A writer in the Boston Transcript, himself a ticket seller, reports a scene which he witnessed not long ago while seated in the office of a large railway station. The 11:40 was about due to leave, when two women hurried up to the window, and the taller of them called for two tickets to C—. The man at the window took them from the case, and as usual called out the price—sixty cents.

The tall woman stopped her search of her purse, and looked up in amazement.

"Sixty cents!"

"Yes'm, and you'll have to hurry if you want to catch this next train."

"I didn't think the price was so much as that."

"The tickets are thirty cents each."

"Oh, of course!" she said with a sigh of relief, "but I only want one."

"Excuse me," said the agent, "I thought you asked for two."

"Yes, but the other lady will pay for hers."

The agent said nothing, though he might have said that he could hardly been expected to know that the customer who called for two tickets was to pay for only one of them.

By the time the transaction was completed it was past 11:40 but the train had not gone. The two women left the window, but immediately came back again, out of breath.

"Are these excursion tickets?" they cried.

"No."

"Oh, but we wanted excursion tickets."

"Then give me fifteen cents more, each of you, and I will change your tickets."

One of the women, in her hurry, dropped her purse and spent several seconds in picking up the scattered change, before she had found her fifteen cents the train drew out of the station.

"The train has gone!" frantically exclaimed the short woman.

"When is the next train for C——?" asked her companion.

"At 12:50."

"Oh! Oh!" cried the short woman.

"Now, you see, we've got to wait here an hour and ten minutes just because you didn't give us the right tickets," said the tall woman, glaring at the ticket-seller.

"I beg your pardon, I gave you what you asked for."

"Of course, we wanted to come back."

"But I didn't know it."

"Did you suppose we wanted to live there forever?" asked the short woman.

"It is hardly my place to suppose at all, madam; I must give people what they ask for."

"I shouldn't mind your stupidity if we didn't have to wait more than an hour on account of it."

With this they turned their backs and flounced away.

"Madam," cried the agent after the tall woman, "you've left your change."

And so she had. In her excitement she had left four dollars and eighty-five cents upon the window-shelf, to be pocketed by the first passer. She did not even thank the man for calling her back.

A few minutes later the writer of the sketch passed near the two women in the waiting-room.

"What a grouchy fellow that ticket agent was!" he heard the tall one say.

"Yes," answered the other, "ticket agents are all alike. I never could understand why they are so disagreeable."

It was no wonder they were provoked; but it does seem a little strange, as the teller of the story remarks, "that the ticket seller—the only one of the three who had not made a mistake, and who had not lost his temper, and the only one who had been civil—should in the end have been called grouchy and disagreeable.—Iowa Plaindealer."

That Famous Goose Story.

"Wust scrape I eber got into wid ole Marsa John was ober Henny. She was a harricane in dem days. She come into de kitchen once, where I was helpin' git de dinner ready an' de cook had gone to de spring house, an' she says:

"'Chad, what ye cookin' dat smells so nice?'

"'Dat 's a goose,' I says, 'cookin' for Marsa John's dinner. Wegot quality, 'say I, pointin' to de dinin'-room do'.

"'Quality!' she says. 'Spec' I know what de quality is. Dat 's for you an' de cook.'

"Wid dat she grabs a carvin' knife from de table, opens de do' ob the big oven, cuts off a leg ob de goose, an' dis'appears round de kitchen corner wid de leg in her mouf.

"'Fo' I knowed whar I was Marsa John come to de kitchen do' an' says 'Gittin late, Chad; bring in de dinner.' You see Major, dey ain't no up an' down stairs in de big house, like it is here; kitchen an' dinin'-room all on de same flo'.

"'Well, sah, I was scared to def, but I tuk dat goose an' laid him wid de cut side down on de bottom of de pan 'fo' de cook got back, put some dressin' an' stuffin' ober him, an' shet de stove do'. Den I tuk de sweet potatoes an' de hominy an' put 'em on de table, an' den I went back to get de baked ham. I put on de ham an' some mo' dishes an' marsa says, look-in' up:

"'I t'ought dere was a roast goose, Chad?'

"'I ain't yerd nothin' 'bout no goose,' I says. 'I'll ask de cook.'

"Next minute I yerd ole marsa a-hollerin':

"'Mammy Jane, ain't we got a goose?'

"'Lord-a-massy! yes, marsa. Chad, you wu'thless nigger, ain't you tuk dat goose out yit?'

"'Is we got a goose?' said I.

"'Is we got a goose? Did n't you help pick it?"

"I see whar my hair was short, an' I snatched up a hot dish from de hearth, opened de oven do', an' slide de goose in just as he was, an' lay him down befo' Marsa John.

"'Now see what de ladies 'll have for dinner,' says ole marsa, pickin' up his carvin' knife.

"'What 'll you take for dinner, miss?' says I. 'Baked ham?'"

"'No,' she says, lookin' up to whar Marsa John sat; 'I think I 'll take a leg ob dat goose'—jes so.

"'Well, marsa cut off de leg an' put a little stuffin' an' gravy on wid a spoon, an' says to me, 'Chad, see what dat gemman 'll have.'

"'What 'll you take for dinner, sah?' says I. 'Nice breast o' goose, or slice o' ham?'"

"'No; I think I 'll take a leg ob dat goose.'

"'I did n't say nuffin', but I knowed bery well he wa' n't a-gwine to git it.

"'But, Major, you oughter seen ole marsa lookin' for de udder leg ob dat goose! He rolled him ober on de dish, dis way an' dat way, an' den he jabbed dat ole bone-handled carvin' fork in him an' hel' him up ober de dish an' looked under him an' on top ob him, an' den he says, kinder see like:

"'Chad, whar is de udder leg ob dat goose?'"

"'It did n't hab none,' says I.

"'You mean to say, Chad, dat de geoses on my plantation on'y got one leg?'"

"'Some ob 'em has an' some ob 'em ain't. You see, marsa, we got two kinds in de pond, an' we was a little hurried to-day, so Mammy Jane cooked dis one 'cause I cotched it fust.'

"'Well, said he, lookin' like he look when he send for you in de little room, 'I 'll settle wid yo after dinner.'

"'Well, dar I was shiverin' an' shakin' in my shoes, an' droppin' gravy an' spillin' de wine on the table-cloth, I was dat shuck up; an' when de dinner was ober he calls all de ladies an' gemmen, an' says, 'Now come down to de duck pond. I 'm gwine to show dis nigger dat all de geoses on my plantation got mo' den one leg.'

"'I followed 'long, trapsin' after de whole kit an' b'ilin', an' when we got to de pond"—here Chad nearly went into a convulsion with suppressed laughter—"dar was de geoses sittin' on a log in de middle of dat ole green goose-pond wid one leg stuck down—so—an' de udder tucked under de wing."

Chad was now on one leg, balancing himself on my chair, the tears running down his cheeks.

"'Dar, marsa,' says I, 'don't ye see! Look at dat old gray goose! Dat 's de berry match ob de one we had to-day.'

"'Den de ladies all hollered an' de gemmen laughed so loud dey yerd 'em at de big house.

"'Stop, you black scoundrel!' Marsa John says, his face gettin' white an' he a-jerkin' his handkerchief from his pocket: 'Shoo!'"

"'Major, I hope to have my brains kicked out by a lame grasshopper if ebery one ob 'em geoses did n't put down de udder leg!

"'Now, you lyin' nigger,' he says, raisin' his cane ober my head, 'I 'lt show you—'

"'Stop, Marsa John!' I hollered: 't ain't fa'r, 't ain't fa'r.'

"'Why ain't it fair?' says he.

"'Cause,' says I, 'you did n't say Shoo' to de goose what was on de table.'"—The Century.

December.

On Christmas day, when fires were lit,
And all our breakfasts done,
We spread our toys out on the floor
And played there in the sun.

The nursery smelled of Christmas tree,
And under where it stood
The shepherds watched their flocks of sheep
All made of painted wood.

Outside the house the air was cold
And quiet all about,
Till far across the snowy roofs
The Christmas bells rang out.

But soon the sleigh-bells jingled by
Upon the street below,
And people on their way to church,
Went crunching through the snow.

We did not quarrel once all day:
Mamma and Grandma said
They liked to be in where we were,
So pleasantly we played.

I do not see how any child
Is cross on Christmas day,
When all the lovely toys are new,
And everyone can play.

The Fishing Party.

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY, IN "THE CENTURY."

Wunst we went a fishin'—me
 An' my Pa an' Ma—all three,
 When they was a picnic, 'way
 Out to Hanch's Woods, one day.

An' there was a crick out there,
 Where the fishes is, an' where Littls boys 't ain't big an' strong
 Better have their folks along.

My Pa he ist fished an' fished!
 An' my Ma she said she wished
 Me an' her was home; an' Pa
 Said he wished so worse'n Ma.

Pa said ef you talk, er say
 Anythin', er sneeze, er play,
 Hain't no fish, alive er dead,
 Ever go' to bite, he said,

Purt' nigh dark in town when we Got back home; and Ma, says she,
Now she'll have a fish fer shore!—
 An' she buyed one at the store.

Nen' at supper, Pa he won't Eat no fish, an' says he don't Like 'em. An' he pounded me
 When I choked!—Ma, didn't he?

A Southern Wonderland.

We have been visiting friends in the Alabama Highlands, in the neighborhood of Huntsville, one of the famous places of the Old South, a place that was known through the length and breadth of the land, while yet the now populous cities of Chattanooga and Birmingham were unborn. Huntsville is said to be proud of the past, and it gives evidence of having been a center of culture, refinement and wealth, but its glory seems to have, in a great degree, departed. Railroads and factories, those great levers of the present, seem to pass her by; booms do not take root in the soil of the conservative old town, but any one who carries the evidence of respectability about his person, can be sure of a dignified and graceful hospitality flavored with an old time courtesy that is very refreshing in these days of shoddyism and brusquerie.

There is one feature of Huntsville's future that seems assured. She will doubtless become a great educational center. She already has a very fine female college, also a seminary of some note, and a military academy that its promoters (and as it impressed us, not unreasonably) expect to see equal West Point during the life-time of some of its first graduates. The martial spirit is, and always has been, prominent in the southern character, and there is practically no limit to the prominence that might be attained by such an institution, well officered, well handled, and well endowed, and any one knowing the south can have no doubt, that, granting the two former, the latter will surely follow.

The stranger visiting Huntsville is apt to be impressed with the adaptability of the old town as a seat of learning, and the healthfulness of the place. I was told that an epidemic has never once gained a foothold, though her doors have always been thrown wide open to yellow fever fugitives of New Orleans, Vicksburg, Memphis and other places. Her water supply is unique and unapproachable; it is furnished by an immense spring of the purest water, which discharges millions of gallons daily, from beneath a ledge of rocks, within one hundred feet of the public square, and in turn operates a turbine wheel, which works a pump that carries the water to the highest point in town, and in addition a stream passes over the dam, which we estimated at fifteen feet wide and six inches deep, forming a river-like stream, which, we were informed, was used in anti-bellum times as a canal, to convey cotton from Huntsville to the Tennessee River, some fifteen miles distant.

The streets are broad, well paved and shaded, and added to this, the town is surrounded by beautiful mountains. One, Monte Sano, has been noted from earliest times as a health resort, particularly so for children. In ante-war times we are told people used to camp in tents on the summit, but now all that is changed; a railroad runs on the top, and, in addition, a macadamized pike allows of easy driving. A hotel of two hundred rooms has been erected. It is managed by a northern man, who is said to give great satisfaction. The top of the mountain is fairly well laid off in drives and walks, while the views are simply magnificent. Recent discoveries in some of the valleys would seem to indicate that in prehistoric times this whole region was covered by the sea. We wandered two or three miles along the so-called shores, and the names as given by our guide were, some of them, at least, very suggestive. Big Eddy had evidently been scoured out by a whirling sea. Titian Bluff, some seventy to one hundred feet high, had just as plainly been battered for thousands of years by a stormy sea, while it was just as plain that broken bluff had been undermined by the sea and the result was an overhanging mass of rock, projecting from thirty to fifty feet. Ragnarock Avenue, with its masses of rock weighing hundreds of tons, piled promiscuously around, was very suggestive of the only power that could so arrange or disarrange them, viz., water. While Big Cleft and Little Cleft, great slices of bluff weighing thousands of tons, had been undermined so gently but surely, that when they let go of the present bluff, and had settled down a few feet and found solid bottom, they landed back against the bluff leaving a crevice just about wide enough for an ordinary person to pass through, which we did with the daylight peeping through some seventy-five to one hundred feet above. We confess to having had our own doubts about the safety of the passage, but we had faith in the assurance of our guide that there was really no danger, but one of our party, after entering the Big Cleft—as our guide expressed it—lost her sand, and broke down entirely, and lamented, like Rachel weeping for her children, refusing to be comforted. She declared that she knew she could never get through if she tried a thousand years, but after a short rest, and the administering of something from a bottle, that our guide called rattle-snake poison, her nerve came back, and she pulled through with room to spare. St. Helena, a towering rock about as big as a two story building and leaning at an angle of forty-five degrees, should have a rough statue of Napoleon I. placed on its summit. Demon's Cavern is very suggestive of the demon of high waters holding high carnival. Danger Bay is well named, while the various water marks pointed out by our guide, showing conclusively where the sea had beat for ages and then in some great convulsion of nature the level had fallen some ten or twelve feet, and remained at that level for other ages, filled our hearts with charity for that much abused individual who wrote "Atalantis," and caused us to think that perhaps after all it wasn't altogether fable. Perhaps we ought to have been afraid to rest beneath Canopy Rock, but the good things enjoyed there had a tendency to soothe the spirits and add to one's courage.

Sylvan Falls and Varnishing Falls are both spots of rare beauty, and when the region shall have been more fully developed and its great possibilities more completely utilized, then some of our own summer resorts nearer home will have to look to their laurels, for this veritable wonderland of the south will not be denied her share of patronage. One could write a much longer letter, and then only glance at a tithe of the sights to be seen, and described, but time and space does not admit, but I cannot close without describing the greatest wonder of all. Our guide took us to see what he called the natural well. Imagine a hole in the ground, in a depression on the mountain side, said hole some thirty or forty feet in diameter (and with the exception of some ten or fifteen feet on one side near the top) as smooth as if cut with a diamond drill, and extending down beyond the reach of vision. A stone thrown in was twelve seconds before it struck, and then it seemed to strike the side and go on rebounding to an almost illimitable distance. Our guide claimed to have been the first man to had ever descended into its depths, and since that there have been only four others who have been down, and they accompanied him on the occasion of a second visit. He says it is one hundred and eighty-five feet from the top of the well to the top of the rubbish pile in the bottom, said rubbish pile having been formed by people throwing stones, sticks, etc., etc., into the well during the fifty years that it has been known to exist. He says that the rubbish pile is about one hundred and fifty feet high, and at the bottom extensive caverns open out. But I guess I have said enough to convince you that there is something worth seeing here. More of which I propose seeing during my next vacation, when I shall give myself more time.

Chicago & North-Western Railway Company.

CHICAGO, Ill., Sept. 29, 1890.

The following rules will govern the employment and compensation of freight conductors. They will take effect on October 1st, 1890, and will supercede the rules issued under date of May 8th, 1890, and in effect June 1st, 1890.

ARTICLE I.

Rates and Grades.

1. There shall be two grades of freight conductors established, and the compensation shall be as follows:

(a) For the first year's actual service after promotion from a brakeman, sixty-eight dollars ($68.00) per month. (b) For the second year's service, and thereafter, seventy-eight dollars ($78.00) per month.

2. Conductors of way freight trains will be paid eighty-five dollars (\$85.00) for twenty-six hundred (2600) miles or less, made in one month. All mileage in excess of twenty-six hundred (2600) miles in any one month will be paid for at the rate of three and one-quarter ($3\frac{1}{4}$) cents per mile.

3. Conductors of work trains will be paid not less than eighty-five dollars (\$85.00) per month of twenty-six (26) days, ten (10) hours or less to constitute a day's work. All time made in excess of ten (10) hours will be paid for at the rate of three and one-quarter ($3\frac{1}{4}$) cents per mile.

4. The pay of mixed train conductor will be computed at freight rates.

5. Freight conductors temporarily in passenger service will be paid freight mileage.

ARTICLE II.

Rules for Computation.

1. The monthly compensation is to be based on a mileage of twenty-six hundred (2600) miles, or twenty-six (26) days per month, and any excess over this mileage made by freight conductors will be paid for in the same proportion as the monthly compensation is to twenty-six hundred (2600) miles.

2. If the mileage of a freight conductor falls below twenty-six hundred (2600) miles in any one month, and he has been ready for service, losing no time on his own account, in such cases full time will be allowed for twenty-six hundred (2600) miles.

3. The first year's service is to consist of twelve (12) calendar months.

4. Should it become necessary to reduce the force on account of decreased business, and the conductor still remains in the employ of the company as brakemen, his promotion is to date from the time he made his first trip as conductor, and he shall receive the highest rate paid brakemen.

5. Freight conductors will be notified when time is not allowed as per trip report.

ARTICLE III.

Extra Mileage.

1. All freight conductors on regular runs will receive compensation for extra mileage made outside of their regular runs.

2. All runs of less than one hundred (100) miles shall be computed as one day's work, provided the men do not go out again the same day, except on branch runs where the mileage is less than sixty (60) miles per day, where the company reserves the right to make special agreements with its conductors as to the compensation they shall receive.

3. When crews are required to double hills, such crews will be allowed the extra mileage made.

ARTICLE IV.

Delayed Time.

1. Conductors will be called, as nearly as possible, one hour before the leaving time of their trains. They will be paid for delayed time at terminal stations, provided the delay exceeds one (1) hour. They will also be paid for all delayed time between terminal stations in case of accidents, washouts, snow, or unloading or loading material, provided no claim will be made unless there is a full hour's delay, or if train arrives at terminal on time.

2. All delayed time will be paid at the rate of ten (10) miles per hour.

ARTICLE V.

Dead-Head Time.

1. Conductors will be allowed ten (10) miles per hour for dead-heading on passenger trains. All other dead-heading shall be computed as actual miles run.

2. When freight crews and way cars are ordered dead-headed, the crews shall accompany their way cars.

3. In ordering crews, the first crew shall run the train, the next crew dead-heading, when such service is required, said crew being ahead of the crew with whom they dead-head, on reaching the terminal of that run.

ARTICLE VI.

Switching Service.

1. If freight conductors are required to do switching at terminal stations either before leaving or after arriving at such terminal, they will be paid extra for all such switching at the rate of ten (10) miles per hour. Less than forty-five (45) minutes will not be counted. Forty-five (45) minutes and less than one (1) hour will be counted one hour.

ARTICLE VII.

Discipline.

1. In case of dismissal or suspension of a conductor by anyone below the division superintendent in rank, he shall have the right to appeal to the division superintendent for a full and impartial investigation. Should the division superintendent fail to adjust the case, the conductor may appeal to the general manager or the general superintendent.

2. No fault shall be found with a conductor who refuses to go out on account of needed rest.

3. When a freight conductor is taken from his run for an alleged fault, an investigation shall be held, ordinarily within three (3) days. Where more than three (3) days elapse he shall, if found innocent, receive pay for all time lost after the third day. No punishment to be fixed without a thorough investigation,

ARTICLE VIII.

Conductor's Rights and Privileges.

1. Conductors will be allowed to lay off on account of the sickness of themselves, their families, or for other good and sufficient reasons, provided due notice is given to the proper officers, so that their places may be filled with other men.

2. This does not permit the conductor to leave the division on which he is employed without permission from the superintendent.

3. Any conductor having been absent to exceed six (6) consecutive months, thereby forfeits all rights with the company, except in case of sickness, or where leave of absence has been given. No leave of absence shall be granted to exceed one (1) year, nor re-instatement made after one year's continuous absence, except in case of sickness.

3. The rights of a conductor commence on the day of his promotion, and he shall have the choice of runs to which his age as conductor entitles him, providing he is intellectually and morally fitted for it in the opinion of his superintendent.

5. When passenger crews run over more than one freight division, the oldest freight conductor on either division will be considered as entitled to the promotion to passenger runs as above. Nothing in this article shall be considered as preventing the company from employing experienced men when the service requires it.

6. Conductors having charge of trains shall be held responsible for their safe management, and shall have the right to place their brakemen as their best judgment may dictate.

7. When a conductor leaves one division, of his own accord, to work on another division, he shall be considered as a new employé, but should he be transferred by order of the company, the same rights he possessed on the first division shall be maintained on his return to the same.

ARTICLE IX.

Calling of Men.

1. A book shall be kept in the train dispatchers office, showing the name of each conductor and his residence. Superintendents shall agree with their men on certain limits within which men shall be called to take their trains, where call boys are provided.

2. Call boys shall be provided with a book in which conductors shall register their names, and the time they were called.

8. Conductors shall also register in a book kept for that purpose in the train dispatcher's office, or other designated place, thirty (30) minutes before their trains are due to leave.

ARTICLE X.

Running of Crews.

1. On other than assigned runs the crews will run first in first out.

S. SANBORN,
General Superintendent.

MOUNTAIN DIVISION.

SCHEDULE OF PAY FOR TRAINMEN, TO TAKE EFFECT
MAY 1, 1890.

WYOMING AND IDAHO DIVISIONS.

1. Freight runs of more than one hundred miles to be paid at the rate of three cents per mile for conductors and two cents per mile for brakemen. All time consumed in making any one trip on these runs in excess of that time necessary to complete the trip at an average rate of eleven miles per hour will be paid for as overtime. For example, a run of 132 miles will be paid 132 miles at mileage rates and all time used in excess of 12 hours will be over time. Excepting that on 5th Wyoming Division District, overtime will not be paid until after 8½ hours, on the 9th Wyoming Division District until after 9½ hours and on the 2nd Idaho Division District until after 10 hours. All overtime to be paid 30 and 20 cents per hour respectively for conductors and brakemen. The pay of the Idaho Division men to remain as now for the present.

2. Local freight and mixed trains, where crews are assigned regularly to the runs, will be paid $100 per month for conductors and $75 per month for brakemen.

3. The pay of Main Line passenger train men on assigned runs will be $125 per calendar month for conductors, and $75 per calendar month for brakemen and $85 per calendar month for baggagemen.

4. Short, irregular runs, not otherwise provided for, will be paid for at the daily rate. More than five hours and not more than twelve hours daily constitute one day. All time over twelve hours will be paid extra at thirty and twenty cents per hour respectively. Less than five hours, one half day, and if not regularly in daily service crew will stand first out.

The daily rates will be:

Passenger conductors.....	$4.00	per day.
Freight "	3.25	" "
Work train "	3.25	" "
Brakemen	2.17	" "
Work train brakemen.....	2.25	" "

5. Allowance for light runs with engine and caboose will be made at the regular rates for freight-train service. Passenger conductors and brakemen will not be required to make more than 5,900 miles per month, except on Fast Mail trains. Present trains 503 and 504 on O. S. L. and trains No. 1 and 2 between Green River and Ogden, not being construed as fast mail trains. Mileage in excess of 5,900 miles will be paid for at rate of 2½ cents per mile for conductors and 1½ cents per mile for brakemen.

Maximum mileage for Fast Mail trains for O. S. L. to be 7,100 miles; for Wyoming Division to be 8,000 miles.

6. Train men will be called at all division or terminal stations by the train caller, who will always be provided with a book in which the men called will enter their names, together with the time they are called, unless they are called earlier at their own request, in which event their time will begin at the time set for the departure of the train.

7. After continuous service of 16 hours or more, train men shall be entitled to, and allowed, 8 hours for rest before being called to go out; provided, they so desire and give notice thereof, except in case of washouts, wrecks and other similar emergencies.

8. When the freight traffic is light so that the crews in service are not able to make reasonable time, crews will be taken off, beginning with the youngest, until the crews left in service are enabled to make reasonable wages. Conductors temporarily suspended under this rule will be given preference as brakemen over younger men, and will retain their rights as conductors. They will also be again placed on their trains when the traffic requires an increase of crews.

9. Where a train man is taken from his run for investigation of an alleged fault he shall, if found innocent, receive pay for time lost; no punishment to be fixed without a thorough investigation, said investigation to be held, ordinarily, within five days of the date of the removal from service.

10. All crews required to deadhead will be allowed full pay therefor, except when necessary to equalize crews and power, in which case only half time will be allowed. When attending court at the request of an official of the company, train men will be paid legitimate expenses and daily rate as per Article 4.

11. Where train men are called, and from any reason other than their own action do not go out at all, if held on duty less than 5 hours they will be paid one half day and stand first out. If held more than 5 hours they will be paid one day and go behind other crews at that point.

12. As far as possible certain trains will be designated to do the local work, the way freight and other local work to be put on these trains.

13. When freight crews make continuous runs over more than one district the mileage allowed will be the amount of the actual mileage of the districts run over. The present arrangement for constructive mileage to remain in force.

14. In computing over time or delayed time, no fraction of an hour less than 30 minutes will be counted. Thirty minutes or over will be counted one hour.

C. F. RESSGUTH,

General Manager.

To take effect May 1st, 1890.

Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Saint Joseph and Grand Island Divisions.

June 7th, 1890.

1. Crews on freight runs of one hundred miles or over first in first out, will be paid at mileage rates—three (3) cents for Conductors and two (2) cents for Brakemen. All freight runs not otherwise provided for, will be paid at daily rates; less than five hours to be one-half day, over five hours and less than twelve hours, one day. On runs of over one hundred miles overtime will be allowed after what the time would be, based on a schedule of eleven (11) miles per hour. To be paid for at thirty (30) cents per hour for Conductor and twenty (20) cents for Brakemen. Fifth District Union Pacific, Denver & Gulf and Colorado Division to remain as at present. Time used in switching at Division and Terminal stations to be included in computing overtime.

2. There shall be ten passenger crews between Omaha and North Platte, exclusive of fast mail, to run first in first out, including Grand Island local.

Five passenger crews between North Platte and Cheyenne, exclusive of fast mail.

Six crews between Kansas City and Ellis; and between Ellis and Denver.

Colorado Division crews remain as at present.

3. Local freight and mixed trains, where crews are assigned regularly to the runs, will be paid Ninety-Five Dollars ($95) per calendar month for Conductors and Seventy Dollars ($70) per calendar month for Brakemen. Eighty Dollars per calendar month for baggagemen on main line runs.

4. Allowance for light runs with engine and caboose will be made at regular rates for freight train service.

5. Trainmen will be called within fourteen blocks of main line divisions or terminal stations by the train caller, who will always be provided with a book in which the men called will enter their names, together with the time they are called. The time of trainmen will begin at the time set for the departure of their trains.

6. After continuous service for sixteen hours or more, trainmen shall be entitled to and allowed eight hours for rest before being called to go out, provided they so desire and give notice thereof, except in case of wash-outs, wrecks and other similar emergencies.

7. When the freight traffic is so light that the crews in service are not able to make reasonable time, crews will be taken off (beginning with the youngest) until the crews left in service are enabled to make reasonable wages. Conductors temporarily suspended under this rule will be given preference as Brakemen over younger men, and will retain their rights as Conductors. They will also be again placed on their trains when the traffic requires an increase of crews.

8. Where a trainman is taken from his run to investigation of an alleged fault, he shall, if found innocent, receive pay for time lost; no punishment to be fixed without a thorough investigation. Ordinarily said investigation to be held within five (5) days of the date of the removal from service.

9. All crews required to dead head will be allowed full pay therefor, except when necessary to equalize crews and power, in which case only half time will be allowed. When attending Court, at the request of an official, trainmen will be paid legitimate expenses and daily rate.

10. Trainmen required to remain on duty with their trains after arriving at main line terminal stations thirty minutes or more, shall be paid in accordance with Section Thirteen.

11. Where trainmen are called, and from any reason, other than their own action, do not go out, if held on duty less than six hours they will be paid one-half day and stand first out. If held more than six hours they will be paid one day and go behind other crews at that point; it being understood that in case crews go out within six hours, time on duty will be reckoned from time first called to go out.

12. On the following districts there will be designated certain trains to do the local work. As far as possible, the way-freight and other local work will be put on these trains, and the crews of these trains will, in all cases, consist of a Conductor and three Brakemen.

Nebraska Division—First and Second Districts.

Kansas Division—Main line between Kansas City and Salina.

O. & R. V. Division—Second District (and Stromsburg District, when business justifies.)

St. J. & G. I. and Colorado Division as agreed.

13. In computing overtime or delayed time, no fraction of an hour less than thirty minutes will be counted. Thirty minutes or over will be counted one hour.

14. That all trainmen shall be examined according to age in the service, and, all things being equal, if they pass a satisfactory examination, they shall be promoted accordingly.

W. H. HOLCOMB,
Vice President

Mart's Actions Didn't Suit.

This is the story Brother Warman of The Western Railway tells on a former member of 126.

Some years ago, Mart Suiter, who is now taking tickets, and money and other things that he thinks he needs, on the Scenic Route of the world, was arrested charged with an awful crime. As the accused was acquitted, and the story is a very funny one, we can't resist the temptation to tell it. Mart was running a freight train on the Union Pacific and another old maid was running an Indian school on the line of the same road. There was a water tank near a little artificial lake; a big fill made a dam, and the dammed water made a lake, and near the lake stood the school house where the young ideas of forty-three Juanita's were being taught how to shoot. Twice a week the prim school marm and her forty-three Indian maidens were want to go into the laughing water and bathe their back hair. Although trains seldom stopped at this place for water, the teacher noticed that on wash-day—as the train men called it—no engineer was ever able to get by the tank. On the day of which we write, Suiter's caboose stood exactly on the fill. While they waited the train crew went out and sat on the ends of the ties and flipped pebbles at the bangless heads of the youthful hair-lifters, while the teacher chinned the billows and roasted the car-hands in good English. When at last the train pulled out, and the angry school marm went ashore and made her toilet, she proceeded to get even. She went into the town and swore out a warrant charging Suiter with an attempt to do great bodily harm and so on to herself and the other forty-three ladies who were in the bath with her. The whole train crew was led into court headed by an attorney for the railway who was to defend the railway employés. When the school marm had told her story, the magistrate dismissed the case and he and the lawyer and the train crew went over to McMullen's saloon and had a good long laugh.

The Ogden Commercial has its say in regard to president Adams of the U. P., in the following manner:

The Union Pacific is continually making changes. Its most competent men are beheaded summarily. There is no official in the operating department who knows whether his head will be on his shoulders or in a basket twenty-four hours hence. General Traffic Manager Mellen was the latest victim.

That such a system of decapitation tends to demoralize the service and imperil the traveling public there can be no question. Theoretically C. F. Adams is a good railroad man. He neglects to put his pleasant theories in practice. As a president he has been a failure. He has looked after the financial part of the road to the detriment of everything else. This is not saying that he is not an excellent gentleman and well received in Boston's circles.

While changes are in order a few more could properly be made. The western traffic could receive attention, the western rolling stock could be doctored a little, the western road-bed be ballasted, the western ties that rot be replaced by sound ones. Then, perhaps, it would be possible for a Union Pacific train to reach Ogden on time. There must be something the matter. The passenger trains from the east are invariably late. Sometimes they are only an hour late, but such promptness as this is seldom witnessed, and next day the deviation from schedule time is about six hours. Why not change the schedule to fit the trains, since the trains cannot fit the schedule? For instance the 1:30 a. m. train that averages 5 a. m., could be booked for 5 a. m. and come somewhere near making it.

These suggestions are thrown out freely, and the worthy president of the Union Pacific, swinging his headman ax with cultured glee, is welcome to pause a minute and consider them. Really they are worth it.

A Railroad on Tree Tops.

It may not be known outside of the neighborhood in which it is situated, but it is nevertheless a fact, that in Sonoma county Cal., there exists an original and successful piece of railroad engineering and building that is not to be found in the books. In the upper part of the county named, near the coast, may be seen an actual railroad bed on tree tops. Between the Clipper Mills and Stuart Point, where the road crosses a deep ravine, the trees are sawed off on a level with the surrounding hills, and the timbers and ties laid on the stumps. In the center of the ravine mentioned, two huge red-wood trees, standing side by side, form a substantial support. These giants have been lopped off seventy-five feet above the bed of the creek. This natural tree bridge is considered one of the wonders of the Golden State, and for safety and security far exceeds a bridge framed in the most scientific manner.—American Sentinel.

The committee of Lake Erie and Western employés are still here holding private meetings and declining to give any information to the press. Manager Bradbury has the schedule of wages paid by all the other lines in this territory, and insists that the men on his system fare as well, and in many instances better, than on other lines, and remains firm in his intention to make no general increase. A well-founded report is that members of the committee are urging a strike, but the engineers and firemen are opposing it, and if a strike does come will remain loyal to the company, in accordance with the contract made by their Grand Chiefs.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 27, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

It has been a long time since the correspondent of West Philadelphia Division No. 162, has contributed anything to THE CONDUCTOR, yet at odd times "Listener" has contributed to your columns and has given considerable information and sport. Listener, is a very mysterious person. I believe there are only about four members of No. 162, who know who he is, and I hope he will continue writing.

Last Thursday evening, Nov. 20th, we celebrated the sixth anniversary of our organization as a division, with a concert and banquet—about 275 ladies and gentlemen taking part.

The committee on anniversary were: Past C. C., William A. Bingham; Ex-S. and T., A. H. McCauley; Asst. Sec. Wm. Showalter; A. C. C., A. Hughes and C. C., Wm. J. Maxwell, ex-officio members. The committee deserves considerable credit for the able manner in which it was conducted, it being superior to any anniversary we have yet had.

After some delightful music by the orchestra, Brother A. H. McCauley introduced Brother E. E. Clark, G. C. C., who delivered a short address on our Order, showing the bright prospects for the future, and outlining some of the work already accomplished, and the substantial increase in the membership in the last six months.

Next followed singing by Mr. Frank Mulvey, who is connected with the B. & O. R. R. in Philadelphia.

C. C., Wm. J. Maxwell, was next introduced, who delivered an address on our division since its organization, which I would like to reproduce for the benefit of our members, but not wishing to take up too much space I will only give some few facts for the benefit of our readers.

Our division is one of the few divisions that pays a regular weekly sick benefit, and from the date of our organization, Nov. 16, 1884, to Nov. 1, 1890, we have paid out $5,253.00 for sickness and distress. Our expenses have been $3,324.56, and our total receipts from all sources in the same time, were $9,145.93, leaving a net total in the treasury of $568.05. My opinion is, that this is a very creditable showing for 150 men; something they can all be proud of.

We have been called upon to bury 14 of our members, 11 of whom were in good standing in our insurance at death. At the present time we have 147 members in good standing, 99 of whom are insured. If all our divisions could show this percentage $\frac{2}{3}$ in our insurance, the department would show up much better, and I think would be somewhat cheaper all around.

And further, if our sister divisions would adopt the payment of weekly sick benefits, there would be less begging circulars sent out.

During the late scourge that was going over the earth (La Grippe) we paid out for sickness: $430 in December 1889, and January and February of 1890, and paid it as it came due, while other older organizations around us suspended payment on account of the heavy drain, and all this is done at an average cost per member of $9.25 per year.

Following Brother Maxwell, Corporal Kay of G. A. R. fame, was introduced and favored us with a comic song, and was followed by Brother Robert McDonald, of Neptune Division No. 169, with a humorous address. The Brothers who attended the Louisville, New Orleans and Toronto conventions will remember Brother McDonald as delegate from Division No. 169, and those who had the pleasure of his company at any of the above meetings well know his ability to entertain an audience and I can assure you he maintained his record.

On behalf of Erickson Division No. 5, L. A. of O. R. C. Grand C. C., Clark, presented our division with a handsome memorial in the shape of a white oblong card, folded at two corners, bearing the inscription: "Presented by Erickson Division No. 5, L. A. of O. R. C., to West Philadelphia Division No. 162, O. R. C., on their Sixth Anniversary." The card set on a bed of white satin handsomely painted with flowers. The folded corners of the card caught by bows of silk cord, and all encased in a handsome frame of white and gold. The memorial was received by the C. C., W. J. Maxwell, on behalf of our division, in a few appropriate remarks.

One of the comical features was, Brother McDonald found, back of the stage, an amateur crayon portrait of a locomotive and man's head. The thought struck him to present it to Brother McCauley, and forthwith did so, saying: "Brother McCauley, in recognition of your long standing as a conductor, and ability in railroad business, I am directed to present to you this handsome token of our esteem. (At the same time unfurling the paper and exposing the picture.) Which caused great merriment. Brother McCauley, somewhat taken back, but equal to the emergency, said: "In accepting this token, I am both surprised and pleased, surprised at receiving a token of this nature at this time, and pleased that the man's head, drawn on the paper, is such a good likeness of the one presenting it, and would always cherish it in memory of this pleasant evening." This time the laugh was on Brother McDonald.

At 10 p. m., the audience was invited to the supper room and dancing floor, as our room was limited, all could not eat at one time, so those that did not eat at the first table had the pleasure of dancing, and dance they did, and eat they did. The supper beggars description. I will not undertake to describe it, it simply excelled comment, and was just delicious; in fact, some of those that got to the first table forgot others were waiting, and were inclined to stay all night, and others that did think of those waiting, embraced the first opportunity to return, after they had danced the first invoice down to the bottom, others filled their handkerchiefs and pockets for those they had left behind at home, but we had plenty for all, and all they got they were welcome to.

The committee of ten ladies of Erickson Division No. 5, who got the supper up, outdid themselves, and we as a division, shall ever feel under eternal obligations for the efficient manner in which they conducted their undertaking. And from what I can learn and have heard, quite a few new recruits will knock at the door of Erickson division for admittance, and I think it would be well for the wives of all our conductors to make up their minds to get there. They, as an organization, have proved themselves a blessing to more than one widow since they organized, and a boon to us, and our wish is, that they will never grow weary, and harmony and good cheer forever follow them.

In all we had a very enjoyable evening, and will long be remembered by those in attendance.

Our division is prospering—new members coming in every month, and good prospects of quite a few more in the near future. One point that is to be commended is our attendance. From thirty to fifty members turn out at every meeting, and take a hand in making things lively for its C. C. If they enjoy it, I am glad of it. As their C. C. I certainly will assist them in keeping things warm.

Our election of officers will be December 21st, and we propose to have a public installation in the evening. We have invited Erickson Division No. 5, L. A. of O. R. C. to attend in a body, and also our sister divisions close at hand.

With kind regards to all, and prosperity to our Order, I am yours in P. F.,

W. J. MAXWELL,

Corresponding Secretary No. 162.

THOMSON, Georgia, Nov. 24, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor.

On the twenty-second a conductor handed me a number of your interesting paper, the first I had ever seen, and as a railroad man congratulate you on the make-up of the copy. Very interesting especially to railroad men.

I am one of two of the oldest living railroad conductors in the world. The oldest is William Printop, living about ten miles from here. We both reside in McDuffy county, Georgia. He ran on the Georgia railroad. He began in 1841, and I in 1842. Conductors of freights. Although in that day when railroading was in its infancy, there was not any distinction as to conductors as now. We often ran as passenger conductors.

An accident to my train in 1843, in November, when my car turned over, I on top, at night, was thrown backwards thirty feet to the bottom of an embankment. I was so injured that I had to cease running as conductor. Could not ride on a train on my heels in a year, from misery in my right shoulder. The company acted like all railroads should, continued my wages while I was laid up and paid doctor bills, and the noble superintendent offered me any place I could fill in the service of the road, and while I was advised by lawyers and friends to sue the road for damages, I never had the heart to do it. The company granted me a life pass over the road, of which I was not aware until seven years after. Being in the service of the road I did not need it. It was granted because of my injuries and my not making any claim for damages. But I never have recovered from that fall.

As soon as I could get about after it occurred, I just felt like I wanted to get well. I was so stiff and sore for months, and, being born a carpenter, I took the position of foreman of the freight car department in the car factory, and went to work at the bench. No planing machines then—all work by hand. I have stood at my bench, dressing lumber, six months at a time, and that year, God knows, I have often gone from the shop to my room at sunset, and went to bed, so tired, so sore, but, "with a will there is always a way," and I did as much work as either of ten hands under me—and a kind Providence favored me. That year, 1844, I built the first supervisor's hand car, with crank and lever, ever put up south, and put up the first span bridge ever built south on the Georgia road, over the Alcory river—three spans, each 144 feet. It was burned in the war and there is now an iron bridge. So you see, that I know something of railroading from the track up—on the road as agent—and rendering aid to the old Georgia in damage cases when needed. I could now, if I had two hands, run a locomotive from here to your place easily.

In 1854 I entered the Baptist Ministry, having, I trust, found out I was a poor sinner, in 1847 the good Lord brought me to Him and impressed me that I should render some little aid to His great cause, the salvation of poor sinners.

I embarked in the good work in 1855, and remained in active work among churches here until 1875, when the disease caused by my railroad accident compelled me to retire from the pulpit in winter. My right bronchial being in such a state as to produce coughing in such a degree that I was of little service. In summer I was relieved of it.

Last year, I, having kept up with the rapid advance in rail roading, and living near the Georgia Road, which I called my road, and watching its management, the superior working in my department under the able management of Major J. W. Greene, who has been chief manager now for twelve or fifteen years, and it being the first long line of railroads ever conceived, running from Augusta to Atlanta, Ga., 171 miles, with its five wide awake branches, to Natchez, Washington, Macon, Gainesville, and White Plain, I thought I would write up its history, for the interest of railroad men and the descendants of its employes, and while engaged in gathering the material had to stop on account of a cancer forming on the back of my left hand, from a spider bite. In January, 1889, was thrown in bed for eight months on account of the suffering, and had my hand amputated in Atlanta on the 24th of last April. I was so reduced that I fear it will be a long time before I can rally enough to prosecute any work; but it is my intention to finish up the book. It will be interesting as it will make comparisons in railroading, then and now. The construction of track, cars, engines, speed, etc.

It took ten years to complete the road from Augusta to Athens and Atlanta, 211 miles.

The South Carolina railroad from Charleston to Hamburg, 136 miles, was the first line built of any length, in the world. The Georgia was the next projected. The South Carolina road was completed to Hamburg in 1833. I saw the first engine arrive in Hamburg, on a Sunday in August, in 1833, and the first engine roll out of the Georgia road shops in 1836.

I am thinking, if the good Lord spares me, and my condition will allow it, when I get my history published—of making a tour through the states, and lecturing on railroading fifty years ago—to railroaders, and at the same time preach to railroad men. The engineers and conductors have so little chance to go to meeting, and I have thought of sending my name to the Conductors' Association, for admission as an honorary member, and it would be a great treat to me to be at their next annual meeting. All the roads that I apply to, kindly give myself and a daughter, a pass, who goes with me to assist me dressing, etc.

Some years ago, I was in a circle of friends, with our then Governor Colquitt, and in talking about railroading, they asked if I had ever been a conductor. I told them yes—I knew something of the trials of men running on railroads. When one of the company said, "and you a preacher!" "Who ever heard of a conductor being a preacher?" I remarked that if they all get killed like I did, they would all preach.

But I am rejoiced that the day has come, that men who risk their lives in aiding to keep up the advance in civilization, in conveying the masses, and all that we live upon, have come to the proper elevated standing in our associations in life demanded; and while I live, my humble efforts shall be given to protect and defend their characters on all sides.

Least I weary you I close. I am providently with an afflicted wife and daughter, at the foot of poverty hill. But I am content, only hoping I am one of "the Lord's poor," or, I could subscribe to THE CONDUCTOR. If you will favor me with a copy, and it will be agreeable, I might give you some amusing details on the long ago railroading, when the first trip I made, it took my engineer twelve hours to run thirty-seven miles, when the terminus of the Georgia road was Madison, 105 miles. It took eleven hours for the passenger schedule, and three days for a freight train. And now what a "Presto Change." Under the able management of Major J. W. Greene, and his able corps of assistants.

Col. E. R. Dorsey, president and freight agent; Col. S. A. Hamphill, superintendent; J. S. Cook, master machinist; L. C. Preval, master car builder; Carleton Hillyer, auditor; J. W. White, general passenger agent; Wm. Richards, treasurer.

Perhaps no road in the world is better managed. It is now styled the "Old Reliable," on account of promptness in its passenger schedule.

running three daily through passenger trains. The fast train making 171 miles in four and a half hours, and it rarely happens that the trains are a minute out of time in passing, or at stations.

Then, the relations between officers and employes are just as they should be on all roads, cordial intimacy.

The superior management of the road excites the admiration of all who go over the route.

Would be glad to hear from you, and invoking God's continued blessing on our railroad conductors, and in all departments and upon yourselves, I am,

Humbly yours,

J. H. STOCKTON.

ROME, Ga., Nov. 31, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I am no professional at writing for either books or papers, but I have been reading THE CONDUCTOR pretty regular all this year, and I have failed to see a single communication from my division—Rome Div. No. 230. I can't account for this unless our correspondent is lost. We had a tail-end collision some time last summer, but I did not learn that he was knocked out of existence.

Well, Mr. Editor, I am very glad to inform you that our division is in fine trim and increasing in membership rapidly. There is not a meeting, for some time past, but what we have from one to three applications, and all good material, men who will in all circumstances be willing to abide by the majority vote. They are chips from the old parent tree, so far as going with the majority is concerned, and I presume some who may see this, and who were at the St. Louis convention, will know who the tree is after I repeat his speech before that honorable body. It was: "Your people shall be my people; your God shall be my God, and whither thou goest we will go." He gets very eloquent sometimes while in the division room, and explodes by letting off some very fine lectures to the division.

Then there is our good and dear friend, Bro. Givans, whom the boys all love, whose smiling face and kind words are always as a ray of sunshine in our division room, but, sad to say, he is now in possession of a traveling card and conductor's badge, for "there will be one vacant chair." Then our worthy secretary and treasurer, a man whom we challenge the world to beat for punctuality at meetings, promptness in the dispatch of business, and whose truth and veracity no one dare dispute, and when he takes his seat in the division room is monarch of all he surveys. But he is aspiring for promotion in our coming election. He wants to be a private, in all the ranks to stand.

I ought not to pass our honored Chief Conductor by without at least saying that he is a noble officer and resembles very much a king upon his throne. And when that gavel sounds from his station, well, you ought to see the boys fall into their chairs.

Our lodge meets every second and fourth Sunday at 2 p. m., and I will just say right here that the latch string of the door is always on the outside to all true members of the Order. If you will just pay us a visit, and we do you no good, we will promise to do you no harm, but hope that when you go away you will say, as did the Queen of Sheba, "the half had not been told."

A MEMBER.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., Nov. 27, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

For the first time in many moons, Ozark Division 30, looms up from a silent darkness, to give you and its many friends to understand, although we have been silent as to an article in THE CONDUCTOR, but we still live, and we are just egotistical enough to think that we shine, however, from the able management of our worthy chief, who is struggling to make a mark in his official career as Chief of Division No. 30, and I can frankly say, that he has proven to the satisfaction of every member of Division 30, a true and worthy officer. As to our membership, it is useless for me to say, that we have anything but A No. 1 material.

We have actually more work than we can possibly do. Owing to the great pressure of business, both freight and passenger, on our line, it makes it rather inconvenient to hold meetings, but gentlemen, I tell you, when we do get together, we tear things up the back pretty lively. We have had some material changes here in our passenger runs of late, extending numbers 3 and 4 through from Fort Smith to Paris; making it a very long and tedious run for the boys. Brothers Carr, Lopp, Robson, Buell, Johnson and Washburn of Division 3 are the big 6. Woe to the Red skins when they come in contact with them. They are the banner team, no question.

I understand, that Brother Carr and Mr. Kinney struck a bonanza the other night. How is it, Brother John? I am sorry to say, however, that the shift will change some day. Beware of numbers 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Brother Carr says that he had a very pleasant trip to Atlanta with Brother Clark, accompanying him from St. Louis. Many flowery sights were seen on the trip, and I believe one or two while there as Jack says that the Brothers there made it quite pleasant for him, and he became very much infatuated with several articles of interest. When Brother Carr goes out and don't have a good time, there is something wrong.

While writing, I cannot overlook and forget to mention the delightful smile that I saw on Bro. J. M. Wightman's face this morning. I dare not ask, why so smiling, Brother W? but could only imagine, Another Conductor. A new one, Brother W. May your happy days begin.

I feel it my duty while writing this article to not overlook many of the other good Brothers, and bring them all in line as to their runs. You will find Brothers Carver, Lydon, Little, Van Dusen, Wightman, Evans, Kite, Shipley, Markwell, Ralston, and Mr. Garrott, who is not a member, all running west of Springfield, and the most pleasant set of conductors you will meet in many a day's travel.

Now comes the blossoming nine: Brothers Senator, Douthett, Cary, Mansfield, Parsons, Smith, Coffey, Lamoreaux, Thornhill and Ivett. Extra: Brother Dyer, between St. Louis and Monett. I tell you, gentlemen, it would be hard to muster up any better set of conductors than I have last mentioned. They are conductors by name, nature and ability, and king hustlers from the word go. What Brother Mansfield can't think of, the Senator can. Senator, don't let your brains get sluggish and inactive; trot in 249, and we will be sure and get there, Eli.

While we recognize that the fiscal year is about ended, I am unable to say who shall be our representative to the next Grand Division. However, I can say, that we were ably represented at our last, and shall be so represented at our next Grand Division.

Remaining yours in P. F.,

R. E. I.

WAUKESHA, Wis., Nov. 29, 1890.

Editor Railway Conductor:

I wish to say a few words in commendation of Brother Latimer's letter in THE CONDUCTOR of October 15, 1890. I am heartily in accord with his expressions regarding the disability clause of our Insurance Laws, and think that the law should be amended to read as he says, viz: "Whenever a member becomes totally disabled from following his avocation as a conductor, he should have the benefit of his insurance."

I know personally of a number of conductors who would be totally unable to follow any other business successfully, were they unfortunate enough to be disabled and unable to follow their chosen profession of running a train.

We had an argument regarding this same clause at the Denver meeting, and when one member asked about this clause, and it was explained to him, declared then and there that he was out of the insurance, as he would not belong to an insurance of conductors, that did not insure them against disability as conductors, and there are others who feel the same way.

Now, I firmly believe, that with that clause changed as indicated, that our membership would increase very rapidly.

Our Order is now upon a protective platform let it therefore be protective in all its branches or departments, and let the members themselves see that it is made so by their united actions. I believe if each member of the insurance department would try, and would use his influence and explain the plan and laws of this department to more members, that we would be surprised at the increase in a short time, and that we would have one of the strongest Insurance Departments (in membership) there is in existence.

As to the cost, I have seen a great deal written and heard a great amount of talk about other insurance being cheaper and better, yet I have the first one to see prove their claim in the long run, and give the same benefits as the insurance of the O. R. C.

Just think of it, Brother, ten cents a day saved and paid into this department and you are insured for $2,500, and your family protected from want and provided with a comfortable sum to keep them or yourself, if unfortunate enough to become disabled (as I, and you too, have seen hundreds such unfortunates) are provided for, and able to yet live and be comfortable. Just a cigar or two less each day, or a few less luxuries daily, and the amount thus saved put into the insurance and there you are—Fully Protected.

Brothers, those of you who read this and are yet uninsured, go right away to your secretaries, or send to them before your eyes close in sleep and get an application, fill it out and send it in, and feel safe. I will guarantee you most anything that you never could make to your wife, your children, mother or sister, a Christmas present that would gladden their dear hearts, as a present of this kind would; try it. Brothers don't wait, but be up and doing.

Now, Brother Secretaries, you have a duty to perform, also; look up all members of your division who are uninsured, and send to them immediately a blank application for insurance, and request them to fill out and return to you at once, and not to forget it or put it off. I am sure the G. S. and T. will be only too glad to furnish you with blanks for this good work.

All officers of divisions should use every effort to try and get members to join the Insurance. Talk it up now, and keep talking it up, in the division room and out of the division room. Whenever you meet a Brother who is not insured, don't let up, but work for it all the time. I would like to see every member of the Order a member of the Insurance, and hope the day is not far away when it will be so.

I hope Brother Editor, that you will be able to find room for these few feeble words, and if you do, that they will do some Brother or Brothers good, and I will close, and remain as ever,

Yours truly in P. F.,

IRA YANTIS.

There are so many pitfalls in the path toward culture which our boys and girls must tread, so many objectionable books veiled under alluring titles, so much that is really harmful to the growing mind in the mass of periodical literature that is scattered broadcast over the land that the perplexed parent, desiring only the best, relies on what he knows is good, as does the anxious mariner on his sheet anchor in a drifting storm.

Such a sheet anchor is the young people's magazine, Wide Awake—a periodical that has stood the tests of time, of rivalry, of criticism, and of the fickle "popular taste," and stands to-day the acknowledged leader of all the young people's magazines.

The Christmas issue of Wide Awake has always been a notable production, upon it being lavished the thought and labor of months of preparation, the editors striving to make it unique—both as a holiday number and a gift book combined—while the work of the best writers and the best artists is drawn upon for entertaining and attractive contents.

The Christmas number for 1890, greatly enlarged, resplendent in a new form and dress, cannot fail to be a delightful surprise to its hosts of readers and friends and its contents afford a perfect feast of good things for the entire household. To it, indeed, may be applied the praise of Milton—though to a different subject—for from cover to cover the Christmas Wide Awake is truly

"A perpetual feast of nectar'd sweets, Where no crude surfeit reigns."

Among this varied table of contents may be mentioned: "Gypsies and Gypsyism," by Elizabeth Robins Pennell; "A Royal Exile," by Mrs. Greene (Sallie Pratt McLean); "Arithmetic Among the Greeks," by L. S. Crawford; "The Celestial Army" (a story of Attila the Hun), by John C. Carpenter; "Sister Agnes's Basket," by Charlotte M. Vaile; "Jasper Dowling's Legacy," by George Whyte; "Proportions of the Child-Figure" (a lesson in drawing), by Caroline Hunt Rimmer; "The Oldest Chair in America," by Otis T. Mason; "Kevin the Fisher" (a poem), by Graham R. Tomson; "Where does Santa Claus Live?" by H. A. H.; "The Breaking Waves Dashed High," all about Mrs. Hemans's famous poem with fac-similes, and the beginning of three great serials: "Five Little Peppers Further On," by Margaret Sidney; "Marietta's Good Times," by Marietta Ambrosi; "Cab and Caboose" (a railroad story), by Kirk Munroe.

The Christmas Wide Awake is a Christmas souvenir by itself, and will be so esteemed by every boy or girl who may be fortunate enough to receive it as a Christmas gift. And at what a trifling cost. A copy will be sent postpaid to any one who will hand twenty cents to his or her bookseller, or, no bookseller being handy, to any one who will send twenty cents to the publishers.

D, LOTHROP COMPANY, BOSTON.

The December number of St. Nicholas has for frontispiece Rembrandt's wonderful portrait of himself, engraved by T. Johnson. This portrait is referred to in Mrs. Dodge's account of Holland and its strange features. There are to be two of these papers, and it is the first which here appears under the name "The Land of Pluck," fully illustrated by new drawings made expressly by George Wharton Edwards. New and old readers of "Hans Brinker" will welcome these sketches gladly.

Another important contribution is "The Story of the Golden Fleece," retold for American boys and girls by Andrew Lang, with illustrations by Birch—this number containing the introduction only.

The serials, by J. T. Trowbridge, Noah Brooks, and Mrs. C. V. Jamison, are the strongest stories for the young now in course of publication; all three serials are strongly illustrated, the first by Sandham, the second by W. A. Rogers, and the third by R. B. Birch.

Among the shorter stories, Joaquin Miller has an exciting tale of his own early life just after the discovery of gold in Idaho; this bit of autobiography is illustrated strikingly by Remington. Frank M. Bicknell tells an amusing extravaganza called "The People who Jumped," which is illustrated by E. B. Bensell; Miss Ewell tells of "Master Muffet's Mishap," in being hung up in a tree while seeking to test the good behavior of his mare "Sally"; Adele M. Field describes an "Elephant Hunt in Siam," and Emilie Poulson tells a pretty Christmas story in which Santa Claus is forced to fill a little boy's stocking with sawdust.

The leading verse contribution is a poem by R. W. Gilder, which opens the number; and besides this, there are a "Sewing Song," by Mary J. Jacques, illustrated by Mrs. Foote, a jingle by Isabel Frances Bellows, with a picture by Mrs. Wheelan; a pretty poem, entitled "The Little Fir-Trees," by Evaleen Stein, and various pictures, bright notions, and suggestions to be found in the usual departments and elsewhere.

The number is of even merit and well-sustained excellence.

Long ago the London Spectator pronounced St. Nicholas "the best children's magazine in the world." No magazine for the young is said to have so wide a range. Its aims are ever in advance of its doings, and its works follow its ideals. So, in the future, it sees plans of usefulness brighter and better than the best that has gone before.

With the advent of St. Nicholas began a new era in children's literature. Indeed up to the date of its appearance, literature and children's monthlies were almost contradictory terms. But—"let there be light and there was light!" The days were numbered when parents could feel that they had done their whole duty by their children in providing for them the conventional "good" books of the period, which oftener, in truth, were merely "good-y good-y." In St. Nicholas a more sincere spirit met the questioning of young minds. False standards, secretly disregarded by grown folk, were not as theretofore set up to image a safe but weakly state of life and society that did not exist. The children with their fresher thought true instincts, and spirit of inquiry were met honestly and fairly, and were indirectly shown good reason for the deference to experience—the best safe-guard against forwardness or childish presumption.

The Christmas edition of the Cosmopolitan Magazine is one hundred thousand copies. The order, as originally given to the printers, was for 85,000 copies, but while on the press it was thought advisable to increase the number to 100,000.

It contains a feature never before attempted by any magazine, consisting of 123 cartoons from the brush of Dan Beard, the now famous artist, who did such wonderful illustrations in Mark Twain's book, "The Yankee at the Court of King Arthur."

These cartoons are placed at the bottom of each page of the magazine, and taken for their subject, "Christmas during the Eighteen Centuries of the Christian Era," with variations, showing the way in which we modern christians carry out some of the chief texts of the Christian Gospel.

Above, and at each side of the page is a quaint border, the whole effect being novel and extremely pleasing, and with the unusually varied table of contents, will make such a Christmas number as is worthy to go into more than 100,000 households.

The frontispieces of the Cosmopolitan have of late become noted for their beauty, some of them having as much as four printings. That for Christmas, while in but two printings, is not behind anything that has preceded it in artistic merit.

An excellently illustrated article is one on tea-pots, by Eliza Ruhamah Scidmore. Literary Boston is treated with numerous portraits, and an article which comes with the ninetieth birthday of Von Moltke, sketches the life of the great Field-Marshal in an interesting way, and is by Gen. James Grant Wilson. Elizabeth Bisland has one of her charming articles.

The Christmas issue contains 228 illustrations, nearly double the number that have ever appeared in any illustrated magazine.

"A MERRY CHRISTMAS!" is the cheery greeting shining from every page of that ideal monthly, Demorest's Family Magazine, the December number of which—a genuine holiday number—is just at hand. What one will not know about preparing for Christmas, about trimming the tree and suitable gifts and good cheer and how to heartily enjoy the merry Christmas-tide, after reading this charming magazine is not worth knowing. "Lighting the Way for Santa Claus" is the very appropriate introductory water-color, the rich humor of which will be appreciated by the little ones and "children of a larger growth" as well; and the page engraving that follows, "Raphael Painting the Virgin and Child," is from a noted painting, and will be appreciated for its historic value as well as its beauty. Besides these, there are at least two hundred and fifty other handsome illustrations, for this representative Family magazine is noted for the quantity and good quality of its pictures.

"In the Streets of Paris" is a profusely illustrated article, in reading which one is in fancy transported to that charming city; and if one prefers to visit nearer home, the description and exquisite pictures of the Washington residence of Senator Sawyer of Wisconsin, afford a revelation of beauty. There are splendid stories and poems, and every department is brimful of just what you want to know in its special line. "Sanitarian" treats of that sad affliction "Obesity," and the common-sense treatment recommended is bound to be efficacious; and "Our Girls" will be delighted with the comedietta in their special department.

Frank Clement a son of Bro. J. S. Clement of Slater Div. No. 212, was thrown off of a flat car, and fell under the wheels and was fatally injured at Brownington, Mo., on the Kansas City and Southern Railroad, on Nov. 19th, from the effect of which he died in a few hours.

In the death of Frank, Bro. Clement loses an idolized son who had just reached the years of manhood, one who would have been a help to Bro. Clement in his old age.

Frank was braving for his father at the time of his death.

To the grief stricken parents the members of Div. No. 212 extends heartfelt sympathy.

Yours in P. F.

BLOOMINGTON, Illinois, Nov. 30 1890.

At the regular meeting of Bloomington Division No. 87 held this day, the following preamble and resolutions on the death of our late Brother John Lyons, were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Supreme Conductor of the Universe to call from our midst and his labors, suddenly, on Sept 25th, Bro. John Lyons; and

WHEREAS, While we bow with resignation to the decree that has taken from his family a kind father and husband, and from the Order of Railway Conductors a true and honored Brother; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we tender to the family of our late Brother our warmest sympathy in their sad bereavement and sincerely join them in mourning the loss of their husband and father, and our old companion.

Resolved, That our charter be draped in mourning for the period of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the family of our late Brother.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR for publication.

Resolved, That they be spread upon the minutes of the Division.

ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS. }

CONNEAUT, O., Nov. 26 1890.

At a special meeting of Nickel Plate Div. No. 145, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, God in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to remove from our midst, the beloved wife of our esteemed Brother John Smith.

By the death of Mrs. Smith we feel that it not only afflicts our Brother and his children, but also every member of our Order, and commend them to the Supreme Ruler who only can alleviate the sorrow of their hearts.

Resolved, That it is but a just tribute to the memory of the departed to say that in her removal from our midst; we mourn for one who in every way was worthy of our respect, affections, and regard.

Resolved, That the wives of member of Div. 145, O. R. C. deserve great praise for the beautiful floral offering (Pillow of roses) to their departed friend.

Resolved, That this heartfelt testimonial of our sympathy be sent to our Brother, published in the Conneaut papers, recorded on the minutes of the Division, and published in THE RAILWAY CONDUCTOR.

By committee of entire Division.

TIME IS WASTED.

In making any attempt to correct a continued course of misrepresentation, and we have been so fully convinced of that fact, that when members of the Order wrote us requesting us to note the assertions of Mr. Howard in the Toledo Commercial, and at a meeting at Saginaw where his abuse of the Order, its members and officers was so extreme that members of the Order left the hall, we replied that we did not think it worth while to notice it, and that statements of that character would defeat themselves in the end, but after consultation with Brother Clark and other officers, it was decided to briefly note some facts. Brother Clark read and approved the article in THE CONDUCTOR for November 1st before it went to the printers. This much in reference to Mr. Howard's assertion that Brother Clerk and he are the best of friends in order to persuade Clark's friends, and members of the Order generally, that he endorses Howard's course, and that he is not in sympathy with THE CONDUCTOR. They have been, but Brother Clark does not understand or relish the friendship that expresses one thing before him, and abuse of the Order, including himself, behind his back, and when he is not present to defend himself and the Order. Mr. Howard has also in the recent past, expressed friendship for the writer both to himself personally and to others; but such professions do not accord well with expressions at Saginaw and elsewhere when we were not present. And in relation to the Saginaw utterances, we would say that our information from there comes from a member who has, so far as we know, always been opposed to the writer, and who we believe is yet opposed and who would support almost any other member of the Order in preference to the writer, but who with all that personal opposition is a man who commands our respect as well as that of his friends, and who was one of those who left the hall rather than to listen to what he called Mr. Howard's abuse of the Order. Mr. Howard takes several columns of a late issue of their official paper to "thresh over old straw" that has been long ago pounded to pieces, and which we will notice no further than to say that in regard to the quotation from what was said at Louisville, Mr. Howard does not quote the whole, and in quoting a part only, seeks to give a false impression. What was said was "that under the same circumstances and with the knowledge then possessed, I would do the same; with the knowledge obtained a short time later, action would have been different." Mr. Howard says the Toledo Commercial quoted him incorrectly and we certainly wish to give our readers the benefit of his statement, and have no wish to wrong or misquote the gentleman in any respect, but the purported interview was published nearly a month before we commented upon it. Mr. Howard certainly must have seen it and failing to question or deny its correctness, we could only suppose that he was correctly reported.

In regard to Mr. Howard's defeating federation at Savanna, we have quoted the resolution adopted by the last meeting of the Supreme Council and said that unless there were some other laws that were not made public, Mr. Howard exceeded his authority when he said to members of the B. of R. T. at Savanna, "I, as vice president, order you not to vote upon or discuss the matter," and we still say the same; under the resolution of the council, it was the duty of Mr. Howard to prevent the members of the B. of R. T., or S. M. A. A., entering a system federation if he could do so by reason or argument, but he had no right to assume or usurp the authority of the grand officers of those associations and order them not to vote and not to discuss this or any other question. We imagine that an order from Grand Master Wilkinson to members of the B. of R. T. not to vote on a question discussed in a meeting of members of different associations would be questioned by many of its members.

We do not question the statement that the Supreme Council offered its aid to the engineers, on the contrary we do not doubt it in the least, but we commented on the singular fact that the laws of the council prevented them from aiding the K. of L. on the Central in a definite case and permitted them to proffer unasked aid to another association without any regard to circumstances or conditions. It is however easy enough to be explained. The organizations who are now members of the council want the engineers to join them, and this is particularly true of the B. of R. C., for they hope then to have the aid of that organization in making a war upon the Order, and they are willing to coax, cajole or threaten in any way to get them in, and while Mr. Howard insists that the Order and the B. of L. E. can't "amalgamate" he and the other members of the B. of R. C. seem to be extremely anxious for fear they might form some kind of an alliance and spend considerable time in effort to convince themselves that it can't be done.

So great was the fear of Mr. Howard that the engineers might possibly make some overtures to the Order that he attended the convention at Pittsburg, and, although not a delegate, as we are informed, was accorded the floor twice, and indulged in his usual harrangue against the Order and Daniels, and asked the convention to endorse his efforts and promised that if they did he would "wipe out the O. R. C. before next May."

We believe that a majority of all the members and officers of the organizations in the Supreme Council, except the B. of R. C., would be glad to have the Order become a member, but it is hardly likely that the Order will take any steps looking to an application, even should a majority of its members believe national federation to be for their benefit, so long as they are continually attacked and with a certainty of the opposition of one organization.

At the Sedalia union meeting Mr. Howard pursued his usual course of abuse of the Order and occupied the floor so long that the chairman of the meeting was obliged to "call him down" and remind him that others might wish to use a small portion of the time.

Mr. Howard in his statement of the report made to the last Grand Division is incorrect, as any one will see by consulting the proceedings, and Daniels does not claim that the Order has 16,000; we repeat Mr. Howard's invitation to all, including members of the B. of R. C., to come here and look at our books, but will Mr. Howard be as free with an invitation for an examination of the books of his own association as with one to examine books with which he has nothing whatever to do?

Finally, with an injunction to members of the Order to make due allowance for partisan statements in regard to the Order and its members and officers, we end this matter, and will have no quarrel with Mr. Howard, nor will we permit him to draw us into one with the engineers or anyone else, though that is a manifest intent in Mr. Howard's last "bale of hay."

THE C. & E. I. STRIKE.

On the evening of Friday, November 21st, a crew was called to leave Danville with a train of forty-five cars, thirty-eight cars having been the maximum train up to that time. The crew declined to go out with such a train, unless a third brakeman was provided, and the whole crew was dismissed; a second crew was called and the conductor got his orders, gave a copy to the engineer and was all ready to go, but at the last moment the crew, including the conductor, decided not to go, and they were dismissed. We are not advised as to whether the two crews were members of any organization or not; the conductors were not members of the Order. The train was then taken out by the train-master as conductor and the chief dispatcher as the solitary brakeman, the engineer supposing that the conductor who gave him the first order and his regular crew were in charge of the train until some distance out on the road; he then decided that, inasmuch as the conductor had said nothing to him prior to leaving Danville, that he would take the train through. No further attempt was made to run freight trains until Monday, when a crew was called, and upon their refusal to go out, an imported crew was placed on the train, but the engineer then refused to go out with them.

In the meantime a meeting of employes had been held and all had agreed to support each other and the two crews that had been dismissed. During this meeting came an illustration of the fine sense of honor and delicacy of the Grand Chief Conductor of the B. of R. C.; he came uninvited to Danville and attended the meeting of employes, and urged them to place the matter in his hands, assuring them that he could "fix it" for them, and asked the conductors to form a division of the B. of R. C. on the spot; his magnanimous (?) offer was rejected and he would have been required to leave the meeting but for his membership in the B. of L. E., the members of that organization present interceding for him, and he was finally permitted to remain. This action of Mr. Howard is in full accord with the line of action adopted by himself and his associates in the B. of R. C., and his proposition was a direct insult to every man present at the meeting, and he should have been shown the door without regard to his membership in the B. of L. E. or anything else, and yet he claims to be the warm personal friend of Brother Clark. Members of the Order can rest assured that no man can be a friend of Brother Clark who pursues such a course and exhibits so entire a lack of principle.

To resume, the matter of a settlement was placed in the hands of a committee, who called on the General Manager, and pending the settlement of the difference all have returned to work except the first two crews dismissed. If a satisfactory settlement is made and the two crews reinstated, there will be no further trouble, but our present understanding is that the men will insist on their reinstatement, and there is no question of the accomplishment of their purpose, if they are not interfered with any further by Mr. Howard; if, however, he should interfere any further in what is none of his business and endeavor to crowd himself in as a "mediator," and receive any support from any of the employés, whether members of the B. of L. E. or others, it will undoubtedly disorganize and disrupt the employés so that nothing can be accomplished. What we have heretofore asserted, that the whole aim of Mr. Howard was to win "feathers" for himself regardless of cost to others, and when impossible to direct matters to secure his own ends, to endeavor to tear down and prevent the accomplishment of anything by any one else, is fully demonstrated by his officious interference in this matter. That he will continue his effort to frustrate a settlement of the differences there and to prevent the employés from accomplishing anything unless he can have the credit of it, is almost certain, as from the ruins of any failure that he is able to cause, he hopes to build a division of the B. of R. C. What would Mr. Howard and his gentlemanly (?) compeers say if an officer of the Order interfered in a like manner with members of other organizations, and particularly with members of the B. of R. C.? Mr. Howard told the writer that he was blamed by "his members" for not being aggressive enough, and that he might have to concede something to them. He seems to have made the concession and his idea of aggressiveness seems to be synonymous with what most people call dishonorable methods.

To members of the Order who are concerned in the C. & E. I. matter we have only to say, utterly ignore any further interference on the part of any outsider, but do not understand by that that we counsel you to be uncivil, nor that we refer in the slightest to any grand officer of an organization that may be legitimately called in or connected with the matter; if a settlement is prevented by any such further interference, you will have the consciousness of having acted in a gentlemanly, straightforward way, and that failure cannot be laid at your door. Follow carefully the advice received from Brothers Clark and Wilkins and this will place the responsibility for any failure to work unitedly on others.

PUBLISH THE LETTERS.

We are informed that the Grand Chief Conductor of the B. of R. C. claims to have in his possession, letters "written by Daniels," which reflect discredit upon the writer. He is hereby invited to make public any letters of that kind, and permission is given to include any that may have been written as private or confidential; it is further noted, that this request to make public, includes letters written to others than himself, no matter whether procured in a legitimate way, or in the way that gentleman is said to have procured at least one letter written by another. This latter is added because of the fact, that the writer has had no correspondence with Mr. Howard, and if he has any letter or letters "written by Daniels," they certainly must be addressed to some other than himself. We believe that there is no person on earth who does not occasionally write private and personal letters that he would not wish paraded before the public, and we are very free to say, that we have written many such letters, but at the same time, there is no letter in existence that we fear to have published, and certainly none that we fear will reflect any discredit. We imagine, that if Mr. Howard has made any such statement, that he refers to a private letter written to Geo. W. Lovejoy, in February 1889, and of which the latter published a part in "Majah" Leflet's Gazette, anonymously, about one year ago, quoting a portion in such a manner as to lead to the belief that much was withheld. The letter in full is as follows:

Geo. W. Lovejoy, Esq., Terre Haute, Ind.:

BRO. GEO.: As you are personally well acquainted with Debs, I wish to ask you if he is a man that you can talk to confidentially? That is, if he will keep confidential anything that you ask him to. If I was certain that I could trust him to do this, there are some things I would like to tell him that would be very interesting to him and probably to Sargent also, just now. Ask him if he knows what Arthur said at Richmond in regard to "Federation?" I could tell him if I knew it would be confidential. Ask him if he knows of the agreement made by Arthur in behalf of the B. of L. E. with the body of renegade conductors, the initials of whose motto tell the whole story of the association. The new "Federation" between the B. of L. E. and the B. of R. C. will be given in the March MONTHLY, as it was given to a member of the Order by one of their Grand Organizers, though he did not know he was telling a member of the Order. At least I have given it to C. S. W. and I think he will print it.

Yours in haste,

WM. P. DANIELS.

Mr. Lovejoy did not reply to to this letter in writing, but visited this office soon after and said, that he did not write as he expected to be here soon, and in the presence of several persons, cautioned me to "beware of Debs," saying, that he could not be trusted, and that he was "full of whiskey most of the time." Lovejoy further said, that while formerly he and Debs had been warm personal friends, they had lately had a quarrel over politics, and did not speak to each other; he further explained that Debs wrote all his editorials with a bottle of whiskey and a plug of tobacco on the desk before him. We would not thus quote Mr. Lovejoy, although the conversation was not a private one, had he not forfeited any claim to consideration, by anonymously publishing a garbled portion of the above letter. Our experience since that time has shown us, that while personally "hostile," to the writer, Mr. Debs is a gentleman who would violate no confidence placed in him, and that Lovejoy is the man to "beware of." If too, the statement that Debs writes his editorials while under the influence of liquor is true, it might be well for some of the rest of us to learn what brand it is, and provide ourselves with some of it. Let the public have any letters that you have, Mr. Howard, or Lovejoy either, and the latter might include the letter to him dated August 7th, 1889, a copy of which is said to have reached Mr. Mackey, and to have had no little to do with the resignation of Train Master Howard, though to remove any possible opportunity for misunderstanding, we will say, that no copy of the letter was sent to Mr. Mackey from this office, nor in compliance with any request from this office, direct or inferred. A copy of the letter was sent to Division No. 92, and to the member of the division who advised us of Lovejoy's statements.

FAIRNESS.

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us,
It wad fra monie a blunder free us.
And odd notion."

In its declaration of principles, the initial number of The Federationist, proclaims fairness as one of its planks and in relation thereto says:

It shall be the aim of this journal to treat all with fairness, no matter what their opinions. The publishers hold that any man with ordinary intelligence is entitled to his own private or individual views upon any subject whatsoever, and in our future issues we shall use only sound argument upon any subject or line of subjects it may fall to our lot to handle. We utterly detest personalities—they are not argument. We are charitable enough toward the man who does not think as we do, to believe that he is honest in his belief, and if we cannot convince him of his error, he may be able to show us that we are in the wrong ourselves. In this event we should "acknowledge the corn"—not abuse the man who convinced us. One thing is certain, this paper will not stoop to personalities until forced to do so by the attacks of others, which we sincerely hope will not occur. In the event of personal attack from others, however, we reserve the right of self-defense; the God-given right and first law of nature.

Which all sounds extremely well and if carried out there would be no room for complaint but after reading this, what is our surprise on turning to the inside of the paper to find an unwarranted, unfounded and untrue attack upon the Order of Railway Conductors. This article was reproduced in the last CONDUCTOR, so that the wish of The Federationist to "say a few words to the organization known as the Order of Railway Conductors" might be gratified, and that our readers might judge for themselves as to whether we are justified in our assertion in regard to the article.

It is exactly upon the line of the argument (?) that is used by Messrs. Howard, Martin et al and exhibits ignorance that is unpardonable in any one that professes to speak in behalf of railway organizations.

In view of the ludicrous errors that are made every day by the ordinary newspaper writer and his ignorance in regard to train service generally, it is not surprising that the editor of a paper like the New York Dispatch should suppose that Mr. Wheaton was yet the executive of the Order, but that The Federationist should make so gross an error would be astonishing if it were not ludicrous. The Federationist prefaces its article by another assurance that it is supremely unselfish "governed with malice toward none and charity 'for all'" and then says "in the past year the Order of Railway Conductors has been re-organized by a few men for personal gain, and the men who compose the rank and file of the organization are being blindly used as tools for the personal gain of the few chiefly concerned in the manipulation." Such a wanton and uncalled for attack upon such men as those who composed the last Grand Division and who by a very large majority "manipulated" the change requires no reply or comment from us, further than to call the attention of members to it and also to the fact that these publishers, who as they say in their introductory "are both members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, have served their time with the scoop and pick," credit them with less sense than ordinary barn yard fowls. This from men who are so little acquainted with the affairs of the railway employes world as to be ignorant of the fact that Wheaton was succeeded by Clark nearly seven months ago makes it apparent that these newly fledged publishers will not fail on account of superabundance of modesty. The secret of this attack is probably the same that actuates some members of the Supreme Council. They recognize the fact that so long as two organizations with the influence and prestige of the Order and the B. of L. E. are not members of their federation, that it cannot be a complete success and that they must induce the engineers to "come in" and then with their aid either force the Order in or disrupt it. With a few, and particularly the vice-president, the latter course is preferred and in proportion as they realize the hopelessness of their task, their desperation in attacking the Order, its members and officers increases; we do not believe this to be true of a majority of the officers of the Supreme Council, nor of the members of the organizations represented by it, in fact we believe that while undoubtedly a very large majority of the members of these organizations and of the officers of the Council would be glad to have the Order join with them, they will have no part in any attempt to coerce or to punish for failing to do so and are willing to work harmoniously with us as has been repeatedly demonstrated by actual occurrences and as is proven that it has required entreaty, persuasion and in one case at least, unwarranted dictation to prevent them forming alliances with us; in at least one instance the vice-president went so far as to order members of the B. of R. T. and B. of L. F. not to discuss or vote on the question. It is undoubtedly true that some who are now members of the Supreme Council would oppose the admission of the Order if it should apply for membership in the hope that its members would desert it and flock to the B. of R. C.; such a hope however is vain and to The Federationist and all others who hope to advance the interests of federation, we would say "molasses catches more flies than vinegar" and you will not particularly attract members of the Order by calling them fools nor by abuse of their officers. There's nothing so cheap as advice you know, and you are not obliged to take ours, but an assertion on the first page that you "will not stoop to personalities" and a virulent attack upon such officers as Clark, Wilkins and Garrettson and thousands of members that we might name, will not build up a reputation for consistency.

The fact that C. S. Wheaton was acquitted at the trial lately held in Elmira Division No 9, having been given to the press by some one, coupled with the statement that "Grand Secretary Daniels failed to sustain the charges," constrains us to say that we believe that the charges were fully sustained and that the acquittal was the result of the sympathy that was appealed for, and the further belief that but for the fact that the law provided expulsion as the result of conviction, he would have been convicted and suspended. The charges were for disloyalty to the Order only and concerned nothing but his membership in the "Independents." Had the simple fact of his acquittal been given the papers, without an effort to convince the public that we had failed to sustain anything that has ever been charged against him this would not have been written. Brother Wheaton will have to answer to more serious charges in the Grand Division.

ATTACKING CLARK.

Failing in the effort to accomplish anything by a general denunciation of the Order and the writer, the courteous (?) and gentlemanly (?) correspondents of the B. of R. C. organ are beginning to follow the example of its illustrious (?) editor in attacking Brother Clark, with the hope that such a course may aid them in their crusade.

The following is from its columns:

"Ed. Clark and his gang were here to-day, and the biggest part of his crowd were conductors from foreign cities, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville and Memphis being well represented. Would these conductors one year ago lost the time to have come to our city to organize a division? I say no. But the chief executive of the Order has told them that 'we are in a bad fix, and unless you fellows rally to my support, we are gone.' So they all turned out and came down to our city to make a good showing, so that the new division would not get discouraged.

"Well, just hold your breath until Uncle George Howard gets in this section, and we will have him right here in Atlanta, and soon at that, and then you will smell his smoke.

"There are but a few B. R. C. men in Atlanta, but we are on the alert, and we will have George W. Howard here soon. However, we learn that he is busy organizing new divisions, and so let the good work go on. One new division of the O. R. C. where there were six new divisions of the B. R. C. organized. Altogether, the blow-out was a tame affair. We understand that Mr. Clark takes his boys over to Savannah, for a meeting on the 28th. It looks a good deal like the 'Salvation Army' 'Marching Through Georgia.' As we have plenty of B. R. C. boys, who will be at Savannah, we suppose some one will report the meeting. Josh."

As the division at Atlanta consists of 127 members and has been in existence five years, this contributor shows by his ignorance his fitness for a Gazette correspondent. It is not our purpose to waste time in noticing these slanders as a rule, and merely refer to it now to show self-respecting conductors the kind of warfare that is being waged and the stuff that is being used to prejudice them against the Order and its officers. Yet these same "correspondents" and members of the B. of R. C. are asking favors of members of the Order every day, although it is our opinion that much of the stuff is written in Toledo and dated from various places, with the intent to deceive, and this opinion is strengthened by the fact that a communication purporting to come from Savannah bears the ear-marks of the Atlanta communication, and assaults Clark in the same way.

MENTIONS

Nickel Plate Division No. 145 announces itself in favor of national federation.

It is rumored that an effort will be made to have Mr. Dickinson return to the Union Pacific.

Readers of THE CONDUCTOR will do well to give the Jaros underwear a trial. S. B. Dix & Co. are the agents in Cedar Rapids.

The Philadelphia Record christens him Chauncey Mephistophéles Depew and the Firemen's Magazine notes its approval.

On December 21st, three divisions of the Order will be organized, though none of them will have seventy-two charter members.

The Secretary of 87 wishes to obtain the addresses of John Spain, George Green and James Tearman. Who can oblige him?

The Grand Secretary of the S. M. A. A. wishes the address of Frank Zimmerman. Any reader of THE CONDUCTOR who can do so will confer a favor by sending it.

Our readers will be glad to know that Brother Belknap has so far recovered as to commence the resumption of his duties, the Christmas story in this number having been written by him.

Inquiry is made for Brother A. D. Murray of Division No. 104, and we are requested to say that it will be for Brother Murray's interest to communicate with Brother C. E. Weisz at once.

We are indebted to Bro. Sayers for late Mexican papers and to Bro. Michael of the government printing office for a copy of the President's message and other papers. Both have sincere thanks.

It is rumored that Mr. R. B. Cable will not return to the Reading at the expiration of his present leave of absence, but that he will be general manager of a southern road. Mr. Cable is too good a man for the Reading.

A correspondent says: "I see in the mentions that a railway man was nominated for the Illinois legislature and in regard to receiving support from the railway men, will say every railway man in his district should support the candidate, for it is about time we were alive to our own interests and try to place our working men in our legislatures.

The presentation of a horse and buggy valued at $500, to Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Hanrahan would indicate that the Vice-Grand Master of the Firemen, and his better half are highly esteemed by their Chicago friends.

Queen City Division No. 60 has lost track of Brothers R. B. Taylor and I. A. Campbell, and would like to hear from them. Any one knowing the address of either will confer a favor by sending it to the Secretary.

A federal grand jury in Chicago have indicted Messrs. Egan of the C., St. P. & K. C., Miller of the C., B. & Q., Johnson of the C., R. I. & P., and Long of the Illinois Steel Company for violating the inter-state commerce law.

It is said that there has been organized in Atlanta, Georgia, an association calling itself the National Railway Association, to which only members of the Order and the B. of L. E. are eligible. Our information is from the columns of The Firemen's Journal.

This is to notify Brother Warman, of The Western Railway, that the title of his paper suits us as it is and that the "amendment" made by us in our last issue, by which we gave credit to The Western Railway News, was made inadvertently and without any such intent.

Thos. C. Little, formerly a member of Division No. 54 of New York City, fell under the wheels while making a coupling at El Moro, Colo., November 22d, and sustained injuries from which he died. His remains were forwarded to Hornellsville, N. Y., by members of the Order.

In the case of Brother Lafferty against the O. & M. for damages, a verdict for $3,000 was given him, which completes his vindication from the charges made against him and establishes a precedent that will not only be of benefit to members of the Order, but to every conductor in the land.

The great Schem from the banks of the Che-mung canal, Carroll Ambrose Millard, writes that he has not yet been afflicted with the "Messiah" craze, but that he has all the "ghost dance" that he wants in looking after the Pacific Short Line. By the way, Brother Millard would like to hear from or of an old Erie engineer for whom he used to fire, by the name of John Hall, familiarly called "Jack."

Tuesday evening, December 16th, the Omaha boys will spread themselves on the occasion of their second annual ball. THE CONDUCTOR is in receipt of a "bid" and hopes to again on that occasion, as we have many times in the past, test the hospitality of 126 and its members.

The net gain in membership in the Order during the months of September, October and November, so far as reports have been received, was 364; several divisions have not yet made their reports for October and November, and when received they will probably materially increase the net gain.

The result of the conference between the Rock Island committee with Assistant General Manager Allen, was entirely satisfactory to the members of the committee, and undoubtedly will be to all members, as by it all the grievances complained of are to be remedied.

Brother C. E. Schaff, of Hollingsworth Division No. 100, has been appointed train master of the Cleveland division of the "Big Four," while Bro. T. J. English of the same division succeeds Bro. Schaff as general yard master at Cincinnati. Both Brothers have many friends who will congratulate them on the deserved promotions.

Brother L. Malloy has been appointed train-master of the Mountain Division of the U. P., vice Brother W. A. Mills, resigned. Those who know him will not need to be told that "Larry" will make a worthy successor to Brother Mills and that no just cause for complaint will remain that he can remove after it is brought to his attention. He is a member of 128.

"They come high," but some people "have to have 'em." The Pullman Company have lately sent to president Corbin of the Long Island, a private car, the cost of which is said to have been $60,000. Something of a contrast between this and the private car of superintendent Collins of the "St. Paul" which was an old "caboose," and which was in use not a great while ago.

The grief for the deposition of president Francis Adams of the U. P. will be confined to a very few "theoretical" railroad men who will probably be at leisure soon. There will, however, be general satisfaction over the retention of vice-president Holcomb, who, it is to be hoped, will now be permitted to manage the road in accord with his own practical experience instead of by the theoretical ideas of some one else.

The assertion made by some that the B. of L. E. are indebted to the B. of L. E. for a large sum of money advanced to them in 1887 is either malicious or the result of unpardonable ignorance. Over a year ago the official organ of the firemen noted the loan and the fact of its payment and certainly in the absence of any official statement from the engineers to the contrary is entitled to full credence.

Editorial comment on the uncalled for attack upon the Order by The Federationist, which was printed in the last CONDUCTOR, was unavoidably crowded out after the article was printed. Both should have appeared in the same number and no one should understand by the omission of comment, that we endorse or approve such onslaughts, though we fraternally welcome the boys to the field of railway journalism.

Whether or not, the long practice of calling "all a-board" is the proper kind of training for an auctioneer, has never to our knowledge, been decided but is now in a fair way to be settled in one case at least for Bro. F. W. Kimball of Savanna Division No. 78 is now a full fledged "crier" in the progressive city of Spokane Falls. Fred says that a nod is good as a wink and that the firm of Colgrove & Kimball are doing well

Brother Rogers of the Trainmen's Journal classes the Order with the Telegraphers as a non-striking organization, and while as we have often reiterated, we are not making any bluster about "makin' 'em come to time" and other uncalled for exhibits of braggadocio, the Order is now in a position to, and does protect its members. Brother Rogers should, by this time, be better informed than to class the Order with the O. of R. T.

From the City of Mexico comes news of some well known members of the Order. Bro. Greenleaf, the secretary of Div. 159 has been selected to act as train master of the Tampico division of the Mexican Central, while Mr. Wilcox visits the States. Bros. Provence and Mazurie of 159 leave our sister republic to again locate in the States, both to enter the employ of the E. T. V. & G. Bro. Jerry Sullivan of 69 takes superintendent McCotter's place while he enjoys a vacation.

J. J. Mahoney, the popular Chief Conductor of Waseca Division No. 90 has been appointed train master of the Winona & Southwestern with office at Winona, taking effect December 1st. Bro. Mahoney, the employes and the company have the congratulations of THE CONDUCTOR, the first on the recognition by his employers of his ability, the boys on the fact that the office will be filled by an honorable, capable man, and the company on the good judgment used in the selection.

Is there an increase in crime? One might be led to think so from the fact that out in Holton, Kansas, recently, one of the most prominent and well known young ladies became a confirmed Gambler. That is, Miss Maude Drake became the bride of Brother John R. Gamble, December 2d, and John says he is ready to Gamble that he "is a winner," and we congratulate him sincerely and wish for the happy couple a long and prosperous future. Brother Gamble is a member of Kaw Valley Division No. 55 and a U. P. conductor.

Bro. Wilkins called on Division 145, but held no meeting on account of telegram calling him away on important business of the Order. The division wishes him to call again,

The seventh annual ball of Toronto Division No. 17, will be given on the evening of December 30th, and it won't be necessary for us to advise any member who has ever visited the members of this division or who attended the Grand Division in 1889, to take a trip to Toronto about that time if possible. Neither is it necessary for us to wish them a happy and successful time; that is assured beforehand for the boys there know how to make it so.

The wife of Brother John R. Huddleston, who lives at Stevenson, Ala., died recently under peculiarly sad circumstances. She had been ailing somewhat for a short while, but on the morning of her death felt better, and told her husband that he need not be afraid to take his "run" out. He took his train at 8 a'clock, and before 12 he received a message announcing her death. She had died of heart disease. She was a bright, genial, pleasant woman, beloved by all who knew her.

General Manager Ackert, of the Iowa Central, has the thanks of the conductors and brakemen on that road for a voluntary increase of salaries, and if the action of Messrs. Black, Fagan and Ackert of the Monon, K. C. F. S. & M. and I. C. respectively, were generally followed by officers of other lines that are not paying standard wages, it would save considerable committee expenses to the men, and the companies would be more than compensated by the feeling occasioned by such action.

The Chadron correspondent of The Railway News Reporter says that Charley Elliott has been appointed superintendent on a division of the Iron Mountain, with office at Van Buren, Ark. Bro. Elliott is a worthy and reliable member of the Order and will make an excellent official, and we congratulate the employés on their good fortune in having such a man for their superintendent. Our opinion of Brother Elliott is corroborated by the Brother who "interviewed" the National Capital with him about three years ago.

The Indiana members of the Order of Railway Conductors will have a meeting in this city in a few days for the purpose of formulating plans whereby it is hoped that a fund may be raised sufficient to induce the removal of the headquarters of the Order to this city. The local committee has been working very hard and have received considerable encouragement. The members say it rests entirely with Indianapolis whether or not the Order's headquarters are brought here.—Indianapolis News.

Efforts are being made, with a prospect of success, for a raise of pay on the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburgh, the P. & L. E. and the Monon. A committee representing the members of the B. of R. T. and the O. R. C. who are employed on the St. Paul system are in conference with the general manager in regard to an increase of pay and the redress of certain grievances, and a committee representing the passenger conductors of the Rock Island and the Santa Fé roads are in conference with the respective general managers in regard to a violation of lately formed agreements.

Martin Stewart Summers would have been a Texan ranger if he had opened his eyes upon this mundane sphere a few decades ago, but as it is he will grow up into an excellent specimen of the genus conductor, that is, judging from present appearances; the "old man" trains around the house at all hours of the day and night, and Master Summers is the conductor whose signals he obeys. Martin Stewart gives notice through THE CONDUCTOR that he will keep open house during the holidays and that all his friends will be welcome at 615 Campbell street where he "runs the ranch."

The office of Grand Chief Conductor of the Order of Railway Conductors is a "soft snap," something like the Irishman who wrote to his friend on the other side, that he got "big wages for doin' nothin' at all; I jist carry a hod full of bricks up a ladder and the man at the top does all the work." So with Brother Clark, he has "nothin' at all to do," except to hustle over the country night and day to make calls. He was in his office two days during November, and has been here one day this month, and at the present writing is in Chicago with a Rock Island committee, while there are telegrams here calling him immediately to two other places.

The "Majah" says Mr. Howard telegraphs the organization of a division of the B. of R. C., at Emporia, Kansas, with seventy-two charter members. To any one acquainted with the number of conductors running into Emporia, the utter absurdity of this claim will be apparent at once. From two different correspondents we learn, that the actual number was seventeen; that of the seventeen, a majority were men who have had very little, if any, experience as conductors, while some of them had merely ran a train for a trip or two. The "seventy-two" is about on a par with the claims that are continually being made by members and officers, as well as the "official" paper of the B. of R. C.

It is stated that an assertion has been made that Division 232 had made three or four efforts to get the Grand Chief Conductor to make them a visit but had been unable to get any officer to come. Bro. Clark was invited to attend the union meeting at Sioux City on November 9th, and that is the only effort that has been made to have him visit Division No. 232 that we are aware of. He fully intended to be at Sioux City on the 9th and had so advised the division, but on the 6th received a telegraphic call to Topeka, Kas., and Savannah, Ga. As a matter of course, these calls in matters of grievance were given preference over a union meeting and Bro. Clark went to Topeka and Savannah instead of Sioux City. Bro. Garrettson started for Sioux City but on account of missing connections, did not get there.

At its recent meeting in Chicago, the M. A. & B. re-elected Brother James Curran as president, and as a matter of course Brother Huntington as secretary. The address was delivered by the venerable Brother, Deacon W. S. Sears; the board of directors consists of E. A. Sadd, J. S. Cooper, C. H. Averill, A. J. Arand, A. W. Connors, T. M. Carhart and C. F. Rexinger, nearly all of whom are well known and reliable members of the Order. The Chicago papers make as much of a boy of our old friend Sadd as is possible, by spelling his name with an "L." We are glad to note the improved condition of this association, both financially and in membership, and sincerely hope that its days of prosperity may be many.

That there is merit among the members of the Order of Railway Conductors and that it meets with recognition or else railway managers are very poor judges of the proper material for promotions, is a proposition that must be self-evident to any one who has read the columns of THE CONDUCTOR for the past few months. It has been our pleasant task to chronicle from one to several promotions in every issue for some time past and this one is no exception to the rule. Bro. C. A. Beach of Thos. Dickson Division No. 171, is one of those whose faithful service and demonstrated ability has made him a "marked man" and he has just been promoted to the position of train master on the N. Y. C. between Albany and Syracuse.

Columbus, Ohio, gracefully "shies its castor into the ring" and gives notice that it will have something to say in regard to the contemplated removal of the offices of the Order, and insists if a removal is decided upon, Columbus will be the place. Division 100 have appointed a committee in the persons of Brothers Garrett Fox, Harry P. Feltrow and James S. Brown, that will leave no stone unturned to succeed, and they have the promise of energetic support from the citizens and the commercial organizations there. A copy of the insurance laws of Ohio, revised to 1889 has been sent to us, and upon careful examination we are unable to find anything that will prevent the Order from incorporating under the laws of Ohio if it chooses to do so, while the laws contain the same special provision exempting such associations as the Order in case they do not wish to incorporate.

Every Division of the Order should have at least one good member acting as agent for THE CONDUCTOR. There is not a division that with a little energy could not send us from a dozen to a hundred subscribers, thereby aiding the Order and making a nice little profit themselves. Let us suggest that at your election of officers you choose an agent for THE CONDUCTOR, or if your election has already been held, let the C. C. appoint one or more to canvass for subscriptions. One member sends fifty subscriptions that he procured among the business men of the town in which he resides. Members of the Order should make an effort to place THE CONDUCTOR in the hands of other employes, in order that they may be correctly informed as to the Order, instead of being misinformed by its enemies, and a particular effort should be made to place it before conductors who are not members of the Order, while we are subjected to so much misrepresentation and slander by the official organ and the officers of the B. of R. C.

W. C. Allen has been appointed yard master of the lower Union Pacific yards at Omaha, and will undoubtedly fill the bill. In the seventies "Bill" and "Pekay" Kelly were on the Northwestern; ill-fortune visited them and they journeyed to the Black Hills to recuperate, and came home so near broke that an ordinary job of braking on the B. C. R. was fortune enough for them. Both were placed in charge of trains in a short time and "Pekay" remains with the Iowa route. Which reminds, us that during the time that "Bill" was running on the north end and the writer was struggling with a local, he was approached by a man with the appearance of a granger, who offered his hand with a "How de do Bill," and as the name fitted us as well as Allen we acknowledged the the acquaintance, but when after a short conversation, in which we were considerably lost, we were told that "the girl expects you over Sunday," we braced up and suggested a possible case of mistaken identity. "Why, ain't you Bill Allen?" was the astonished query, and this circumstance always made us think, that when Bill "went over" he didn't visit much with the "old man". "The girl" became Mrs. Allen, a short time later.

We are pleased to note the revival in the Benefit Department. For the past two years, there has been a small but gradual decrease in membership but within the recent past, the membership has begun to increase. We can see no reason why members of the Order should not all or nearly all, become members of the Benefit Department. With all the insurance companies and associations, there is not one in existence that offers the advantages that are offered by the Order insurance for the same cost. Other companies and associations offer a part of the benefits of ours for a little less cost, but mark that it is only a part. An examination of our list of losses will show that a large percentage of them are from sickness, and members insured in accident companies, receive nothing from death from sickness. In case of accident, in many of the companies for the loss of a hand or foot only one-quarter to one-half the amount insured for is paid, while in the Order the full amount is paid. We believe that members should patronize their own insurance so long as it offers them more for less money than any other, and we are very glad to note the improved condition. The loss in members has never been on account of excessive forfeitures as the rate of forfeitures has been and is now, very low; it has been on account of a general lack of interest in promoting the welfare of the Department, and consequently but very few new members. We would be glad to have the discussion of our insurance, so ably begun by Bros. Lattimer and Gilbert, continued by other members.

"THE STATION AGENT,"

The representative journal of the freight and ticket departments of the railways of the United States and Canada.

READY FOR DELIVERY DECEMBER 15.

This issue will contain contributed articles by prominent writers on railway subjects that will be of interest to every person in the service. Edward Needham, Superintendent of the Midland Railway, of England, explains the system of train workings on his road, and the method of handling traffic. In this article are shown fac-similes of way-bills, blanks, records, etc., used on English railways, a comparison of which with those in use in this country will be interesting as well as instructive. J. L. Ringwalt, author of "Developments of Transportation Systems of the United States" details the "Reduction in Transportation rates since 1869," giving some solid information. Marshall M. Kirkham, second vice President of the Chicago & Northwestern railway, writes on the subject of "Care of Cash by Agents." A prominent fast freight line agent gives the History of the Fast Freight Lines of the Country.

This article should be read by everyone interested in freight traffic. A feature interesting to all ticket agents will be an article on tickets, showing fac-similes of all coupon tickets now in use, and many obsolete forms, with history of the development of the present ticket system in this country.

Don't fail to secure a copy of the Holiday number of THE STATION AGENT. Price 25 cents. Annual subscription $2.00. Subscribe now, and secure the magazine for one year from January 1, 1890, thus receiving the Holiday number free.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Every occupation of railway employees is classified, and the very lowest possible cost is charged consistent with the hazard or risk insured against. Our certificates of insurance protect railway men against the unforeseen accidents which happen to them while awake and while asleep; in the daytime and in the night-time; on Sunday and on week days; at home and when abroad; on land and on water; in church and in office; in the workshop and in a railway car, and on a locomotive; in a street and on a sidewalk; in an opera house and in a lodge room; when riding and while walking; when working and while resting; when bones are dislocated, fractured or broken; when burned, scalded, cut, wounded, crushed or mangled. Against the result of these all and singular, and other disabling injuries too frequent and numerous to recite, we give indemnity; and when disaster comes and courage fails, then this Association comes to the rescue and offers a goodly refuge.

AND REMEMBER!

It gives you ninety days to die from the effects of an injury. It gives you fifty-two weeks if necessary, to recover from one. It gives you the full death benefit for the loss of both hands or both feet, or the sight of both eyes, and give you one-half of the principal sum for the loss of one foot or the loss of one hand; or in the event of your death by the means as aforesaid, it gives to your family the full amount you secured them, payable in such sad event. It gives to you prompt settlement of all claims without delay. And still further, it gives you full protection for your wife and little ones, who look to your strong arm while in health to provide. And for all these, in return, the Railway Officials' and Conductors' Accident Association asks from you your patronage and support. If you are not already a member, don't delay, as accident protection is of the most vital importance to yourself and those depending on you.

We Pay all Claims Promptly.

Conductor F. W. Witherbee was killed January 17, 1890. His claim was settled within twenty-four hours, as the following will show:

From Cincinnati Enquirer, Sunday, January 19, 1890:

Conductor Witherbee was insured in the Railway Officials' and Conductors' Accident Association, headquarters at Indianapolis, for $2,000. W. K. Bellis, Secretary, yesterday morning telegraphed $250 to the widow as a funeral benefit, and $1,750 was sent to Superintendent Neilson, of the C. H. & D., to be delivered to her in person.

To Railroad Men:

This is to certify that on Friday, the 21st day of June, 1890, I insured in the Railway Officials' and Conductors' Accident Insurance Company of Indianapolis, Ind., and on Saturday, the 22d of June, 1890, had my collar bone broken by being struck with a rock thrown by a malicious person, and received my first indemnity money five days after mailing proof of my accident to home office. I heartily recommend this company to my brother engineers, firemen and all railroad men as being the best protection they can secure against accident. They pay their claims promptly and without any delay, and will do what is right by you.

Very respectfully,
GEO. M. KEENE,
Engineer G. M. & G. R'y, Div. 409, Columbus, Ga.

103 State Street, S. E. Cor. Washington, CHICAGO, ILL.

A conductor on a Western Express is the marvel of those who have been let into his secret. Although having had both of his feet amputated, he is a conductor of extraordinary ability.

He passes through his train when going at the rate of fifty miles an hour. The car jolts, hitches, sways, and he retains his balance without the least awkwardness.

At stations he alights with agility, watches his passengers and gives signals, boards his train and walks the passageway with the steadiness of one possessing his natural legs.

Day after day for three years he has performed this round of duty, and not a soul has had occasion to suspect that he operates on a pair of artificial legs with rubber feet, and only those to whom he voluntarily reveals his condition ever know of his dependence on artificial extremities.

All this is made possible by the virtues of rubber, which largely composes the feet; the old methods of artificial limbs, with wooden feet and artificial joints, would render this man unsafe, tottish, unsteady, and unfit for a position that requires sound footing. The engraving represents Mr. Wade operating on his artificials in his chosen profession.

Conductors, engineers, firemen, brakemen, and men of all trades, who have met the loss of either extremities, have been restored, and enabled to resume their labors by the use of artificial limbs with rubber hands and feet of the Marks patent.

Subjects can remain home and have artificials made with fit guaranteed. One-half the legs and arms are made from measurements and profiles, without the presence of the wearer.

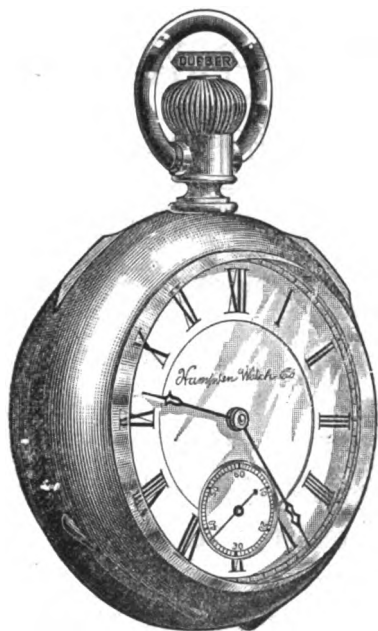

Indorsed by the United States Government, the eminent Surgeons in the country, and over 11,000 men, women and children who wear them, residing in all parts of the world.

A treatise of 400 pages, with 200 illustrations, and 1,000 testimonials, sent free of charge.

$1,000 FOR AN OLD COIN

IF YOU HAVE ANY COINS

dated before 1871, with plain date, send us a list. We pay high prices for hundreds of dates and kinds. Among coins that we want are: silver dollars dated between 1794 and 1888; dates of half dollars before 1884; quarters of all dates before 1888; all dates twenty-cent pieces; all dates dimes before 1869; silver five-cent pieces before 1867; five-cent nickels of 1877 and 1883; all dates of silver three-cent pieces; nickel three-cent pieces before 1870; two-cent pieces between 1864 and 1873; all large copper cents, also small cents with eagles on, also cents of 1873 and 1877; all half cents; foreign coins, fractional and Confederate currency, etc. For above we pay big amounts over face value, if in required condition. This is a comparatively new business, and by merely keeping your eyes open when handling money, you may find many coins that we want. A short time since (Jan. 23), A Scotchman in an Illinois town found one coin worth $700. Others have done even better. The New York World says: "Many people have become rich by looking after coins wanted by collectors." The Home Journal says: "Collecting coins is a very profitable business now-a-days, as there are but few in it. One Boston broker, Mr. W. E. Skinner, buys from agents all over the country, and pays them big sums for rare coins." Coins that are very hard to find in one section of the country are often easily found in others. Largest business, highest prices, prompt payments, best references. Write at once for further particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, which may be worth hundreds of dollars, perhaps a fortune, to you.
